As ſoon as his partiſans, at Paris, were informed of his eſcape; they began to conciliate the affections of the Pariſians, and to prepare every thing for ſecuring him a favourable reception in the capital. Pecquigny, le Coq, and Marcel, had the inſolence to go to the dauphin, and, with all the boldneſs of ſucceſsful villainy, demanded a ſafe-conduct for the king of Navarre; while the prince, aſtoniſhed at their audaciouſneſs, had not the courage to refuſe what, indeed, he had not the ability to prevent. From that moment the biſhop of Laon placed himſelf at the head of the dauphin's council, without even aſking his conſent; and dictated and delivered all his anſwers. Charles the Bad, having received his ſafe-conduct, haſtened to Paris; and, in the different towns through which he paſſed, endeavoured, by ſeditious harangues, to excite the people to revolt. At his approach moſt of the deputies from the principal towns, particularly from thoſe of Champagne and Burgundy, haſtily retired, to avoid any ſuſpicion of being concerned in his eſcape. John de Meulant, biſhop of Paris, went to meet him as far as Saint Denis; and this unprincipled monarch, whoſe machinations had ever been directed againſt the repoſe and tranquillity of the ſtate, made his triumphal entry into Paris, with all the pomp of a conqueror, attended by John of Pecquigny, the provoſt, and the aldermen, and was received by the people with the ſame tokens of reſpect, and ſymptoms of joy, as if he had come to releaſe them from ſlavery. He paraded the ſtreets of the city, and alighted at the abbey of Saint Germain-des-Pres, where apartments had been prepared for his reception. The day after his arrival, he harangued the people; profeſſed his attachment to their intereſts; and artfully alluded to his own right to the crown of France. This alluſion, being reported to Edward, confirmed that prince in the reſolution he had adopted never to afford Charles ſufficient aſſiſtance, to give him a decided ſuperiority over his enemies. The people, ever fond of novelty, liſtened to his harangues, which were calculated to rouſe their feelings, and inflame their paſſions, with incredible ſatisfaction.

Marcel, emboldened by the ſucceſs of his firſt attempt, went to the palace, and begged the dauphin to redreſs thoſe grievances of which the king of Navarre complained. The biſhop of Laon, without waiting for orders, immediately replied, that the prince would do ample juſtice to the king, and treat him as one brother ought to treat another. The dauphin, compelled to yield to the importunities of a council that was wholly devoted to his enemies, conſented to an interview with the king of Navarre, at the reſidence of queen Jane; whither he repaired with a ſmall retinue: but the king was attended by a numerous body of armed men, who obliged the duke's attendants to retire, and placed themſelves at the door of the apartment where the two princes were to meet. Nothing particular paſſed at this conference, at which mutual hatred naturally gave riſe to mutual diſſimulation.

It was now determined by the council to grant all the demands of Charles the Bad; ſome members, indeed, who were not abſolutely ſold to the faction, ventured to remonſtrate, but their oppoſition was ſet aſide by a majority of ſuffrages. The provoſt of the merchants, perceiving that the dauphin evinced ſome repugnance to their proceedings, ſaid to him, "Sire, amicably grant the king of "Navarre all that he requires; for it is proper it ſhould be ſo." It was therefore decreed, that Charles ſhould be reſtored to all his poſſeſſions, eſtates, and fortreſſes; that the bodies of the count of Harcourt, the lord of Graville, Mainemars, and Doublet, ſhould be taken down from the gibbet, and delivered to their friends or relations, to be honourably interred; and that their effects ſhould be reſtored to their heirs. With regard to the ſums which the king of Navarre pretended were due to him, the diſcuſſion of that article was referred to the next aſſembly of the ſtates, which was convened for the fifteenth of January following.

But nothing can convey ſo juſt an idea of the cruel ſituation to which the dauphin was reduced, as his compliance with the laſt condition exacted by the king of Navarre. That monarch, inured to crime, and willing to ſecure the attachment of men whoſe ſouls were congenial with his own, inſiſted that all the priſons in Paris ſhould be thrown open*. The dauphin was, in conſequence, obliged to iſſue a declaration by which, at the requeſt of the king of Navarre, he ordered the provoſt of Paris to releaſe priſoners of every deſcription—Thieves, murderers, highwaymen, coiners, forgers, ſeducers, raviſhers of women, diſturbers of the public repoſe, aſſaſſins, ſorcerers, witches, poiſoners, &c. The king, himſelf, furniſhed this liſt of crimes. Similar orders were alſo iſſued to the abbot of Saint Germain-des-Preſt, to releaſe all the criminals confined in the priſons within his juriſdiction. The king's debtors were compriſed in the general liberation; and the provoſt of Paris, and the other heads of the different juriſdictions, were ordered to apply to the creditors of ſuch as were confined for private debts, to conſent that they ſhould be releaſed; and, in caſe of refuſal, other means were to be adopted.

The king of Navarre remained ſome time at Paris; during which the dauphin and he often met and dined together ſeveral times, as well at the palace, as at the reſidence of queen Jane, and at the houſe of the biſhop of Laon. It is ſuppoſed to have been at one of theſe repaſts that Charles the Bad found the means of adminiſtering poiſon to the dauphin, which was ſo violent in its operation, that, notwithſtanding he had immediate aſſiſtance, his nails and his hair fell off, and he felt the effects of it all the reſt of his life. The circumſtances attending this horrid tranſaction are but imperfectly explained by the ancient hiſtorians; and it is probable that the king of Navarre had taken his meaſures with ſuch ſecrecy, that nothing like a proof could be furniſhed againſt him, particularly as no mention was made of the tranſaction during the criminal proceſs that was inſtituted againſt him, in the reign of Charles the Sixth.

When Charles the Bad preſented himſelf before thoſe towns, which, according to the late treaty, were to be reſtored to him, moſt of the governors refuſed to give them up; obſerving, that, as they had been entruſted to them by the king, to the king alone would they ſurrender them. This refuſal ſerved as a pretext to the king of Navarre, for complaining of a violation of the treaty, and conſequently for levying troops, in order to enforce its execution; for which purpoſe he had, before he left Paris, been ſupplied, by the chiefs of the ſedition, with conſiderable ſums of money. The governors of ſuch places in Normandy as ſtill acknowledged his authority had a private conference with him at Mantes, when they received inſtructions as to their future conduct.

The reception which his brother experienced at Paris, and the influence which that monarch poſſeſſed in the capital, could not induce Philip of Navarre to truſt himſelf to the mercy of a wavering and inconſtant populace. So little reſpect, too, did he pay to the late treaty, that his troops advanced to within five leagues of Paris, on the ſide of Trappes and Villepreux, where they laid waſte a conſiderable extent of country, took Maule-ſur-Mauldre, which they fortified, and from thence continued their depredations. Peter de Villiers left the metropolis with a body of militia, in order to attack him, but he returned either from fear or diſaffection, without effecting the object of his ſally; and the unprotected inhabitants of the country, to eſcape the fury of Philip, were compelled to retire within the walls of the capital.

The dauphin, anxious to repreſs theſe deſtructive incurſions, gave orders to aſſemble a body of men at arms* ; but the factious leaders of the people gave him to underſtand, that the Pariſians diſapproved of his intentions to introduce troops into the capital. In vain did he urge the integrity of his deſigns, and the neceſſity of ſuch a force; they placed guards at the different gates, with orders to ſuffer no armed man, that was unknown to them, to enter the city. The king of Navarre continued his preparations unmoleſted, and the nation was threatened with all the horrors of a civil war.

Marcel and his accomplices, at length, determined to lay aſide even the ſmall appearance of reſpect for the government which they had hitherto preſerved, and openly to declare themſelves, by giving to their party a ſtamp of independence, and a public badge of diſtinction†. The badge they adopted was a kind of cap reſembling a monk's hood, compoſed of red and blue cloth, embelliſhed with a ſilver enamelled claſp of the ſame colours, bearing this inſcription, A bonne fin‡—when the rebels had hoiſted this ſignal of revolt it was dangerous to appear in the ſtreets without the party-cap, ſo that even thoſe who condemned their proceedings, were compelled to wear it. The univerſity alone—to its honour be it ſpoken!—evinced its loyalty and attachment to the laws; the rector iſſued a prohibition to all ſtudents and others belonging to the univerſity, to wear any mark of faction||.

The dauphin, anxious to ſtifle this ſpirit of ſedition, and to conciliate, if poſſible, the affections of the Pariſians, invited the people to meet him in the market-place, that he might have an opportunity of explaining his intentions. In vain did the biſhop of Laon and the provoſt of the merchants ſeek to diſſuade him from this attempt; he repaired to the appointed place, accompanied by a ſmall retinue. This proceeding made a viſible impreſſion, on the populace who attended in great numbers. The prince aſſured them it was "his wiſh to live "and die with them;" that his ſole object in aſſembling troops, was to employ them in their defence; that he ſhould already have repelled the deſtructive meaſures of the enemy, which deſolated the neighbouring country, had he poſ-ſeſſed the neceſſary power; but that thoſe who were entruſted with the adminiſtration of the finances, had ſeized the produce of the taxes, with the deſign of appropriating it to their own private uſe; that he hoped, however, he ſhould one day be able to make them anſwer for a conduct ſo prejudicial to the welfare of the ſtate. This ſpeech was received with great applauſe; all preſent were affected at ſeeing the heir-apparent condeſcend to juſtify his conduct to his future ſubjects, and to call on them to be the judges of his actions.

Marcel, alarmed at this ſudden change, ſummoned the people to meet him the next day at St. Jacques de l'Hopital; where the duke of Normandy, who had been appriſed of his intentions, alſo attended. John de Dormans, chancellor of the duchy of Normandy, addreſſed the people in the prince's name, and repeated the ſame remarks and proteſtations which Charles had made the preceding day; which were received with the ſame marks of ſatisfaction. When he had finiſhed, Charles Conſac, an alderman, attempted to ſpeak, but was prevented by a general murmur. As ſoon, however, as the duke had retired, impreſſed with the idea that his triumph was complete, the emiſſaries of the provoſt and the biſhop of Laon, diſperſed among the crowd, inſiſted that Conſac ſhould be heard. He accordingly made a long ſpeech in which he inveighed bitterly againſt the duke's officers. Marcel next ſpoke, and affirmed, with an oath, that the money ariſing from the taxes had neither been touched by him, nor by any of the deputies choſen by the ſtates. An advocate, named John de St. Onde, one of the ſuperintendants of the revenue, declared, that the greateſt part of the produce of the new impoſts had been employed for bad purpoſes; and that there had been delivered to different knights, by the duke's orders, ſums to the amount of fifty thouſand moutons of gold*, as could be proved by the accounts. Conſac then pronounced an eulogy on Marcel, who was preſent, proteſting that he had never done any thing but with a view to the general good; and obſerving, that, if the Pariſians forbore to protect their provoſt of the merchants, he muſt ſeek for ſome other aſylum, where he could be ſcreened from the danger to which he had expoſed himſelf by his ſtrenuous exertions in the cauſe of liberty. This appeal had the deſired effect; the inconſtant multitude, who but a moment before had declared themſelves in favour of the dauphin, now embraced the oppoſite party with the ſame facility; they unanimouſly exclaimed, that Marcel was in the right, and they would defend him againſt every one. Thus terminated this ridiculous ſcene, in which the ſovereign pleaded his own cauſe before the people, againſt a band of audacious rebels; "but the worſt part of "the ſtory," ſays father Daniel, "is, that he loſt it."

In the midſt of this tumult, the new deputies arrived at Paris; but the repreſentatives of the third-eſtates, and ſome of the clergy, only attended. The nobility diſdained to appear in an aſſembly, where the principal authority was uſurped by thoſe who had the ſmalleſt pretenſions to it. No buſineſs was tranſacted; the members agreed to meet at Mid-Lent, and, in the interim, ordered a new coinage, leſs pure than the former; one-fifth of the profits ariſing from thence was appropriated to the duke of Normandy, for his own private expences, and the remainder was reſerved for defraying the expences of the war. But a few months before, the very attempt to adulterate the coin had nearly excited a general inſurrection.

An incident which occurred about this time, though of no great conſequence in itſelf, ſerved to diſplay, in a ſtronger light, that ſpirit of revolt and independence which marked the preſent period. A low fellow, named Perrin Marc, ſtabbed John Baillet, treaſurer to the duke of Normandy; the murder was committed in the Rue Neuve St. Merry, and the culprit took refuge in the church of that name. The duke, being informed of the circumſtance, gave orders to John de Chalons, mareſchal of Champagne, to ſeize the aſſaſſin. The mareſchal, accompanied by William Staiſe, provoſt of Paris, and a body of armed men, broke open the church-door, which was ſhut againſt him, and apprehended Perrin Marc, who was publicly executed the next day, after having his hand cut off at the ſpot where the crime was committed. The body of this villain was claimed by the biſhop of Paris, as that of a clerk, and, being conveyed to the church of Saint Merry, was there interred with the ſame pomp as if he had died a martyr; the ceremony was attended by the provoſt of the merchants, and ſeveral of the citizens; and the funeral ſervice was performed at the ſame time as that of the murdered treaſurer, at which the dauphin aſſiſted.

Charles, with a view to intimidate the leaders of the faction, propagated a report that peace was on the point of being concluded between the crowns of England and France, when the king would be reſtored to liberty; but their intelligence was too good to ſuffer them to be deceived by ſuch a ſtratagem: John de Pecquigny was now diſpatched to Paris, by the king of Navarre, to complain that the articles of the laſt treaty had not been fulfilled: but the dauphin, at a public audience, formally denied the aſſertion, and told Pecquigny, that though he could not himſelf cope with a man of ſuch inferior rank, he had many knights in his court, who were ready to ſupport the charge of falſhood which he had juſt preferred againſt him. The biſhop of Laon, however, interrupted the diſcourſe, by obſerving, that the duke would conſult with his council on the propriety of granting the king's demands, and would ſpeedily give a ſatisfactory anſwer.

Some days after this, the Pariſians, at the inſtigation of Le Coq and Marcel, ſent a formal deputation to the duke, to engage him to ſatisfy the king of Navarre. Simon de Langres, general of the order of Saint Dominic, was at the head of the deputies, and acted as their orator. This audacious monk had the impudence to tell the prince, that he and his colleagues had aſſembled, and decreed, that the king of Navarre ſhould prefer all his demands at once; that, as ſoon as he had made them, all his fortreſſes ſhould be reſtored; and the other articles taken into immediate conſideration. When he had ſaid this, the orator pauſed: but another monk (the prior of Eſſone near Corbeil) exclaimed—"You "have not told all." He then addreſſed himſelf to the duke, and gave him to underſtand, that it was the unanimous determination of the Pariſians to declare themſelves either againſt him or the king of Navarre, if either of them ſhould refuſe to ſubmit to their deciſions. As ſoon as theſe rebellious monks had fulfilled their commiſſion, they withdrew, with their followers, without waiting for an anſwer.

A. D. 1358.] Matters were now come to a criſis, and the chiefs of the ſedition reſolved, by the deſtruction of their principal enemies, to remove every obſtacle to the accompliſhment of their deſigns. On the twenty-ſecond of February, Marcel aſſembled the greater part of the Pariſian artiſans, in the vicinity of the church of Saint Eloy. As the populace was repairing, in arms, to the appointed place of rendezvous, Regnaut d'Acy, the advocate-general, was attacked, on his return from the palace, near the church of Saint Landry, and purſued as far as that of the Magdalen. The mob overtook him juſt as he entered a paſtry-cook's ſhop, with the view of eſcaping their rage; and inſtantly put him to death. The provoſt of the merchants then led the furious rabble to the palace, and entered, without ceremony, the dauphin's apartment, who betrayed ſymptoms of fear, when he ſaw ſuch a multitude come into his room. "Sire," ſaid Marcel, "do not be aſtoniſhed at any thing you ſee; for it is ſo "ordained, and it is proper it ſhould be ſo." Then, turning to his followers; "Come," ſaid he, "and quickly diſpatch the buſineſs you came about."

He had no ſooner ſaid this, than the mob ruſhed on the mareſchals of Champagne and Normandy; the firſt of whom, who was the lord of Conflans, was inſtantly murdered in the preſence of the dauphin, whoſe cloaths were ſtained with his blood. The other, Robert de Clermont, ran into an adjoining cloſet; but the ruffians followed him, and maſſacred him without mercy. All the duke's officers, alarmed at this ſcene of blood, left the palace with precipitation. It is ſaid that the prince himſelf, forſaken by every one, and expoſed to the mercy of theſe lawleſs aſſaſſins, beſought Marcel to ſpare his life: to which the villain replied, "Sire, be not afraid." Then taking off his cap, the badge of faction, he placed it on the head of Charles; and took the prince's in return, which he wore in triumph the reſt of the day.

The bodies of the murdered noblemen were dragged through the room where the dauphin was, down the ſteps of the palace, and placed on a piece of marble, immediately before the window of his apartment, where they remained till night, when, by command of the provoſt, they were carried to the convent of Saint Catharine du Valdes-Ecoliers. But the monks durſt not inter them, till they had received an expreſs order from Marcel, who told them, in that reſpect they might comply with the duke's orders. Charles, at a loſs how to act, deſired they might be interred without any ceremony. When they were about to render them the laſt ſervice, the biſhop of Paris forbade them to beſtow the rites of ſepulture on Robert de Clermont, who had been excommunicated for apprehending Perrin Marc, in the church of Saint Merry. The two mareſchals, therefore, were privately buried, together with Regnaut d'Acy, (who had been murdered the ſame day) by two ſervants, who were rewarded for their trouble with one of their cloaks.

From the palace Marcel repaired to the town-houſe, from one of the windows of which he harangued the populace; telling them that what he had juſt done was ſolely with a view to the public good; that the noblemen who were killed were falſe, wicked, and treacherous; and that it was neceſſary the people ſhould ſcreen him from the conſequences of an action which had their welfare for its object. This ſpeech was anſwered by a general acclamation, followed by an aſſurance that they would live and die with him. Elated with this proof of popular favour, he returned to the palace, and repaired, with a choſen party of his followers, to the dauphin's apartment, who fully expected he was come to put him to death. The mangled bodies of his attendants, which were ſtill before his eyes, encouraged this idea. The provoſt of the merchants inſulting that grief, which any but a villain inured to crime muſt have reſpected, brutally told him, that he ought not to grieve at what had happened, as it had been done by the will of the people, in whoſe name, he now came to demand his approbation of all that had paſſed; and, at the ſame time, to requeſt that he would enter into a cloſe union with the Pariſians. The dauphin, aware of the inutility of refuſal, granted all his requeſts. He begged the inhabitants of Paris would become his friends, and aſſured them that he would be theirs. That ſame night, the provoſt ſent him two pieces of cloth, one red and the other blue, to make caps for himſelf and his officers.

Such of the members of the ſtates, as had repaired to Paris, aſſembled previous to theſe tranſactions, and decreed that a ſubſidy ſhould be levied of half a tenth, on the revenues of the clergy; and that the walled towns ſhould ſupply one man at arms for every ſixty-five hearths; and the inhabitants of the country one man for every hundred hearths. After the murder of the mareſchals, Marcel requeſted the deputies to meet at the convent of the Auguſtins, where he extorted from them an approbation of his conduct.

Every day produced ſome new ſcene of violence and diſorder. The chiefs of the ſedition paid the dauphin a viſit, at which they inſiſted that he ſhould confirm the deciſions of the deputies; ſuffer them to hold the reins of government as they had hitherto done; diſmiſs ſome of the members of his council, and replace them with three or four citizens whom they named. All reſiſtance being fruitleſs, they obtained whatever they aſked.

During theſe tranſactions the king of Navarre arrived at Paris, with a numerous train of armed followers. Relying on the preſent diſpoſition of the people and the impotence of the dauphin, he came to encreaſe the trouble and confuſion which prevailed in the capital. The very day of his arrival he had a long conference with the provoſt of the merchants, at the hotel de Neſle, where he eſtabliſhed his reſidence: and the dauphin was conſtrained to ſubmit to an accommodation with this treacherous prince, the conditions of which were drawn up by Marcel and le Coq.

While the capital exhibited a ſcene of murder, treachery, and revolt, the provinces were expoſed to deſolation, though proceeding from a different cauſe. After the battle of Poictiers, the troops, who, from the deficiency of pay, were no longer retained in diſcipline, threw off all regard to their officers; ſought the means of ſubſiſtence by plunder and robbery; and, aſſociating to them all the diſorderly people, with which that age abounded, formed numerous bands, which infeſted all parts of the kingdom. They deſolated the open country; burned and plundered the villages; and, by cutting off all means of communication or ſubſiſtence, reduced even the inhabitants of the walled towns to the moſt extreme neceſſity. As a part of theſe troops were ſecretly encouraged by the king of Navarre, all travellers were compelled to obtain a paſſport from that prince, to which more reſpect was paid than to thoſe which were ſigned by the duke of Normandy.

When the king of Navarre had ſettled his projects, and eſtabliſhed a proper correſpondence with the chiefs of the ſedition, he left Paris to purſue the ſame meaſures in other parts. The day after his departure, the duke of Normandy, who, ſince the captivity of his father had only borne the title of lieutenant, aſſumed that of regent of the kingdom. Charles had then completed his twenty-firſt year; the age required by the laws to enable him to hold the reins of government*. Hitherto all decrees of parliament, and other edicts, had been iſſued in the king's name, although the king was abſent; but henceforth the prince's new title of "Charles, eldeſt ſon to the king of France, and regent "of the kingdom," was prefixed to all edicts, declarations, &c.

In none of the ancient hiſtorians is the ſmalleſt trace to be diſcovered of any oppoſition to the dauphin's aſſumption of the regency; although the power of that prince was never, at any period, ſo limited and confined, no one preſumed to diſpute his right to a title which lawfully belonged to him as heir apparent to the throne. Theſe circumſtances combined, clearly demonſtrate that his minority was the only obſtacle which prevented him from aſſuming it before, or from engaging the ſtates of the kingdom to confer it on him. But though, by the acquiſition of the regency, the whole ſovereign power became veſted in Charles, he was not ſuffered to enjoy any greater extent of authority. The lawful augmentation of his power only tended to encreaſe his real dependence. The leaders of the faction compelled him to admit into his council three aldermen of Paris; Robert de Corbie, Charles Conflac, and John de L'Iſle; without whoſe conſent, and the previous approbation of the provoſt of the merchants, and the biſhop of Laon, no meaſure was adopted; the regent even loſt his perſonal liberty; ſurrounded by a deſperate banditti, all his motions were watched.

At length the yoke, under which he groaned, became ſo intolerable, that he reſolved to ſhake it off. The perpetual contradictions he had experienced, for the laſt eighteen months, had inured him to conſtraint; and the obſtacles he had encountered had inſtructed him in the arts of government. In concert with the king of Navarre, and his partiſans, he had convened an aſſembly of the nobles of Picardy, at Senlis; which gave him an opportunity of leaving the capital without alarming the Pariſians. From Senlis, the regent, inſtead of returning to Paris, repaired to Compiegne, where he was met by numbers of the nobility. Several deputies of the three orders, for the province of Champagne, aſſembled at Provins, in obedience to his citation; but the king of Navarre, who had promiſed to attend, did not appear. The Pariſians, who began to be alarmed at the abſence of the prince, ſent Arnaud de Corbie, an alderman, and the archdeacon of Paris, to confer with the deputies for Champagne.

The regent explained to theſe deputies the ſituation and wants of the ſtate; pointed out the neceſſity of a ſtrict union between the prince and the people to preſerve the kingdom from deſtruction at this critical conjuncture; and concluded by obſerving, that the two deputies for Paris would communicate the intentions of the inhabitants of the capital. The other deputies, however, refuſed to admit the Pariſian envoys to the private deliberation which they requeſted to hold among themſelves; and the reſult of which was made known to the prince the next day by Simon de Rouſſy, count de Breſne. That nobleman aſſured the regent, in the name of all the inhabitants of Champagne, that they were ready to give him proofs of their zeal and fidelity as their ſovereign, and to ſupply him with all neceſſary aſſiſtance; requeſting, at the ſame time, that he would appoint another aſſembly at Vertus, to deliberate on the nature of ſuccours the moſt ſpeedy and effectual; and declaring that the deputies for the province were determined never more to attend at Paris.

The count of Breſne, turning towards Arnaud de Corbie, and the archdeacon, told them that he had no anſwer to make to them; then addreſſing himſelf to the regent, he aſked him, in the name of his countrymen, whether he had ever found the lord of Conflans, mareſchal of Champagne, guilty of any baſe or criminal act, which merited that death which the Pariſians had thought proper to inflict on him, obſerving, that he did not ſpeak of the maſſacre of

Robert de Clermont, mareſchal of Normandy, becauſe he was convinced that province would take care to revenge it. The prince replied, that the two mareſchals had always proved themſelves faithful ſervants and able counſellors. The count then threw himſelf on his knees, and ſaid, "My lord, we, the inhabitants of Champagne, who are here aſſembled, return you thanks for this declaration; and we expect that you will inflict a proper puniſhment on thoſe who put your friend to death without cauſe."

On this delicate occaſion, where it was neceſſary to ſoothe both parties, Charles diſplayed that conſummate prudence, which, in the ſequel, gave him the ſuperiority over his enemies; and procured him the character of the greateſt politician of the age. To betray a partiality to either party was equally dangerous; had he diſguſted the deputies for Champagne, he would have loſt thoſe ſupplies which were abſolutely neceſſary to the accompliſhment of the plan he had in contemplation; and, had he openly declared for them, he would have given the rebels of Paris to underſtand what they had to fear. To extricate himſelf from this difficulty, he exhorted the former to conſent to an union, without explaining the nature of that union which the latter wiſhed to contract with them; and he only ſpoke of the murder of his officers in general terms. This conduct produced the deſired effect; it encreaſed the indignation of the inhabitants of Champagne againſt the citizens of Paris, and urged them the more ſtrongly to gratify his private reſentment, which he had prudence to conceal.

On the diſſolution of the ſtates the regent haſtened to Meaux, where his conſort had taken refuge, and which the Pariſians had formed a plan for reducing. Finding their project fruſtrated, they wrote letters to Charles, couched in terms of inſolence, and containing what was tantamount to a declaration of war. When the regent left Paris, he was followed by all the nobles in the place, and this general deſertion of the firſt order of the ſtate had excited the fears of an inconſtant and timid populace, whoſe minds receive, with equal facility, the impreſſions of fallacious hope, and of ſudden terror. Marcel wiſhed, by ſome bold enterpriſe, to diſſipate the conſternation into which they were thrown. With this view, he ſeized the caſtle of the Louvre, which was then ſituated without the walls of the city, and placed in it a ſtrong garriſon, compoſed of men who were entirely devoted to his ſervice. He there found a large collection of arms and weapons of all kinds, which he diſtributed in the different quarters of the town. By this ſhow of hoſtility, he flattered himſelf he ſhould render it impoſſible for the Pariſians to procure a reconciliation with the regent, and that, conſequently, they would preſerve their attachment to him, from intereſt and neceſſity.

The ſtates of Vermandois, preſided by the regent, aſſembled at Compiegne, and granted a ſimilar ſubſidy to that which was voted by the ſtates of Champagne, which met at the ſame time, at Vertus. Theſe ſubſidies conſiſted of a tenth of all eccleſiaſtical revenues ; a twentieth of the revenues of the nobles and their vaſſals ; the ſupport of a man at arms for every ſeventy hearths in the towns, and for every hundred in the country. This impoſt even extended to people in a ſtate of ſervitude, who were compelled to furniſh and ſupport one man at arms for every two hundred hearths.

The time now approached for the convention of the ſtates-general of the kingdom at Paris. The regent, having ſecured thoſe of Champagne, Vermandois, and of ſome other provinces, ventured to change the place of meeting from the capital to Compiegne. The conduct of the faction had ſo far diſguſted the greater part of the kingdom, that the majority of the deputies were highly pleaſed with the alteration. At their firſt ſitting, the ſtates entreated the prince to expel from his council and preſence Robert le Coq, who was conſidered, by every honeſt man, as a traitor, and as one of the chief conſpirators and promoters of thoſe diſorders with which the kingdom was afflicted. This prelate, who had become an object of univerſal hatred and contempt, was happy to eſcape the indignation of the nobles, who threatened him with an exemplary puniſhment ; he ſecretly withdrew from Compiegne, and, repairing with precipitation to Paris, arrived in that capital under the eſcort of a numerous guard, whom his friends had diſpatched to meet him on the road.

Hitherto Charles had been reduced to the neceſſity of running from province to province, in order to ſolicit aſſiſtance from each ſeparately ; but he had now the ſatisfaction to ſee moſt of the towns, which had not been infected with the ſpirit of revolt, unite their ſuffrages in his favour. The ſtates-general, aſſembled at Compiegne, regulated their grants by the ſubſidies accorded by Champagne and Vermandois. All the proceedings of the ſtates holden at Paris in the preceding year were generally condemned, as well as the conduct of the Pariſians and others who had followed their example, while Charles received the praiſes of the aſſembly, which, in the name of the nation, thanked him for not having deſpaired, in thoſe tempeſtuous times of trouble and calamity, of ſaving the kingdom from deſtruction.

The Pariſians ſent no deputies to this aſſembly, ſome days before the meeting of which, the king of Navarre had deſired an interview with the regent, who, accordingly, met him at Clermont in Beauvoiſis. Charles the Bad, wiſhing to penetrate into the prince's deſigns, talked to him of a reconciliation with the Pariſians ; the regent replied, that he was attached to the city of Paris, and knew it contained many loyal citizens, and good patriots ; but that he never would enter it again, till the authors of the revolt, and of the diſorders and exceſſes conſequent thereon, had met with the puniſhment due to their crimes. This anſwer being taken by the king to Paris, Marcel began to be ſenſible of the danger which threatened him, and accordingly made ſome efforts in the capital to place Charles the Bad at the head of the party ; but, as this diſpoſition was not general, that prince left the town, after paſſing ſome days there.

The provoſt of the merchants now perceived, by the regent's preſent conduct, that he had been greatly miſtaken in the ideas he had formed of his talents and genius; he was ſorry he had proceeded ſo far; but it was difficult to retract. He attempted, however, to avert the ſtorm. For this purpoſe the rector of the univerſity, attended by ſeveral of its members, was prevailed on to repair to Compiegne, in the hope of effecting ſome kind of accommodation. The prince received them with kindneſs, and told them, as he had before told the king of Navarre, that he was willing to grant a general amneſty to the Pariſians, provided they would return to their duty, and deliver into his hands ten or twelve or even five or ſix of the moſt criminal, whoſe lives he promiſed ſhould be ſafe; adding, that without this proof of ſubmiſſion they had nothing to expect from him. Marcel, who formed his opinion of others from the ferociouſneſs of his own mind, thought it impoſſible that the prince could poſſeſs ſo much generoſity, as to ſpare his life, if once he had him in his power. He was ſenſible alſo that his crimes were ſo atrocious—as he himſelf acknowledged to the monk who continued the Chronicle of William de Nangis*—as to be wholly undeſerving of pardon. At once tormented by the conſciouſneſs of guilt and the dread of puniſhment, he ſaw nothing but the moſt diſmal proſpect before him; loſt to hope, and devoid of conſolation, deſpair ſupplied the place of courage in his guilty breaſt. Reſolved, at leaſt, to protract the hour of deſtruction, he doubled the fortifications, as if he intended to bury himſelf beneath the ruins of the capital. He introduced a body of Engliſh and Navarreſe troops into Paris; ordered ſoldiers to be raiſed in all quarters, and even ſent as far as Provence to purchaſe arms. Theſe arms were bought and forwarded, but the count of Poictiers ſeized them and ſent them to his brother, the regent. The biſhop of Laon, reduced to the ſame ſituation with his infamous colleague, adopted the ſame precautions, and fortified his dioceſe.

The Pariſians, victims of their own obſtinacy, were ſoon reduced to the neceſſity of confining themſelves within their new fortifications. The irregular troops of marauders that had ſpread themſelves over the country extended their ravages to the very walls of the capital; the nobles too, whom they had irritated and defied, took up arms, and treated them with the ſame ſeverity. Foulques de Laval, at the head of a body of Bretons, laid waſte La Beauſſe, while another troop ſacked and burned the town of Etampes. The interior parts of France formed one continued ſcene of deſolation by fire, pillage, and murder, the towns and villages were deſtroyed, and the wretched inhabitants periſhed. The regent, meanwhile, continued, with the aſſiſtance of the nobility of thoſe cities which had preſerved their loyalty, to collect a ſufficient force to reduce the rebels to ſubmiſſion.

Though evils of this magnitude appeared ſcarcely ſuſceptible of augmentation, yet a new ſpecies of calamity ſprang up, which involved the nation in ſtill deeper miſery, and ſeemed, for a while, to ſuſpend the animoſities of party and the turbulent rage of rebellion*. The country being expoſed to all the horrors of war, and the inhabitants ſubject to continual depredations; the peaſants forſook their labours, and left their fields and habitations to the mercy of thoſe barbarous plunderers, againſt whom they were unable to protect themſelves. Conſtantly inſulted, indiſcriminately oppreſſed by the oppoſite factions; compelled, notwithſtanding their extreme poverty, to purchaſe an exemption from impriſonment; deſpoiled of their property, and their griefs daily increaſing, without any proſpect of relief, they at length bade adieu to hope, and became furious from deſpair. The firſt ſpark of this revolt, which ſoon cauſed a general conflagration, appeared in the Beauvoiſis, where a few peaſants aſſembled, and ſwore to exterminate the nobility and gentry, under pretence that they were a peſt to the kingdom, and that they who would deſtroy them all would accompliſh an object of great national utility. They immediately armed themſelves with loaded bludgeons, and attacked the houſe of a gentleman in the neighbourhood; having forced open the doors, they ſeized the gentleman, his wife, and children, and maſſacred them all; they then pillaged the houſe, and ſet fire to it. All the environs of Paris, and the Iſle of France; the provinces of Picardy, the Soiſſonnois, and the Beauvoiſis; in ſhort, all the northern parts of the kingdom, were infeſted by numerous bands of armed ruſtics, who even ſlew ſuch of their brethren as refuſed to join them. This inſurrection took place, in different parts, on the ſame day†; and, what is ſomewhat extraordinary, there never was any reaſon to believe it was the reſult of a premeditated plan: moſt of the peaſants were unconnected with each other, they had never quitted their uſual employments, no public meetings had taken place, and they had never interfered in the affairs of government. Several of theſe troops uniting, ſoon formed a conſiderable body; and a contemporary hiſtorian aſſerts, that if they had been all collected together, they would have compoſed an army of a hundred thouſand men‡. The moſt formidable of theſe troops appointed chiefs, one of whom was William Caillet, an inhabitant of the village of Mello. The appellation of Jacques was given to theſe ruſtic inſurgents.

The exceſſes they committed ſurpaſs every thing which the moſt unprincipled revenge, and the moſt atrocious barbarity, could imagine. The chronicles of the times relate an inſtance of their inhuman rage, which almoſt exceeds belief, though, unfortunately, it bears ſuch marks of authenticity, as not to admit of a doubt. A band of theſe ruffians having forced an entrance into a nobleman's houſe, tied the maſter of it to a poſt, raviſhed his wife and daughters before his face; then impaled him, and, after roaſting him by a ſlow fire, compelled his family to eat of his flesh, and concluded the horrid scene by murdering them all, and burning the house*. Upwards of two hundred country seats were pillaged and reduced to ashes. When they were asked—says Froissard—what could urge them to the commission of such abominable actions, they replied, that "they did not know, but they did what they saw others do, and they "thought it was their duty to destroy all the nobility and gentry in the world."

This unexpected revolt, at first, produced a general consternation; every body fled before the Jacques. The nobility took refuge in the walled towns, or else in castles sufficiently strong to resist their attacks. The duchesses of Normandy and Orleans, with several ladies of the first distinction, were compelled to fly for safety to Meaux; for their sex and rank would rather have fomented the rage, than superinduced the forbearance, of these ferocious savages. As soon as the nobility had somewhat recovered from their first alarm, they met together; while the gentry applied for assistance to the neighbouring princes; when they were joined by many foreign knights from Brabant, Flanders, Hainault, and Bohemia. They then went in search of the Jacques, and attacking them in separate bodies, exterminated the greater part, and compelled the rest to return to their habitations.

It is a matter of astonishment that the king of Navarre should have been active in suppressing this dangerous insurrection, since it was apparently his interest to encourage a war, the professed object of which was the destruction of the nobility, most of whom were attached to the regent. It is true, indeed, that by so doing, he revenged a personal injury which he had sustained by the massacre of William and Testard de Pecquigny, knights of Artois, brothers or relations of John of Pecquigny, one of his most zealous partisans. This prince killed three thousand of the Jacques in one day, near Clermont in Beauvoisis, and hung their leader, William Caillet. When the nobles found themselves sufficiently strong to take the field, they sallied forth, laid waste the country, and massacred indiscriminately all the peasants they met, guilty or innocent.

Such of the country people as had not joined the insurgents, fortified their churches by surrounding them with a ditch, and supplying the towers with stones and other missile weapons, to throw down on the enemy, while they fixed a man at the top, who kept watch night and day. As soon as an enemy approached, the centinel gave the signal by ringing a bell, or sounding a horn, when all those who were at work in the fields or in their houses, immediately took refuge in the church. In short, a civil war so eccentric in its object, so destructive in its effects, the annals of nations cannot produce; an epidemic fury appears to have prevailed throughout the kingdom, or rather the wild state of nature, in which men are wholly independent on each other, and strength and cunning are the ſole ſtandards of juſtice and of right, ſeems to have been renewed.

The regent, in the midſt of theſe diſorders, aſſembled the principal nobility, viſited the provinces, won over to his party many of the towns that were yet uncorrupted by the ſpirit of faction, confirmed others in their fidelity, and employed every reſource which a wiſe policy could ſuggeſt for recovering the falling fortunes of the ſtate. The gentry, avowed enemies to the rebellious citizens of Paris, enliſted under the banners of Charles. Some of them had engaged in the ſervice of the king of Navarre, when he marched againſt the peaſants, but ſpeedily convinced that his deſigns were not favourable to the tranquillity of the kingdom, they left him to join the regent. Marcel and his faction, in the mean time, though abſolute maſters in Paris, were not exempt from inquietude. They were aware that many of the moſt reſpectable citizens were hoſtile to their views, and only waited for a favourable opportunity to declare themſelves. At this very time an attempt was made to introduce ſome men at arms belonging to the regent into the city, which muſt have convinced them that the prince had more than one partiſan among the people. The plot being diſcovered, one of the king's carpenters, and the maſter of the bridge, were apprehended and executed in the Place de Greve.

During the abſence of the regent from Meaux, Marcel and his adherents formed a plan for taking that city, where the ducheſs of Normandy and her daughter, with Iſabella, ſiſter to Charles, and many other ladies of rank, had retired for ſafety. With this view, three hundred armed citizens were ſent from Paris, under the conduct of Peter Gilles, a grocer, who were joined on the road by ſome ſtraggling companies of peaſants. On their arrival at Meaux, the mayor and inhabitants opened the gates to him, in violation of the oath of allegiance they had recently taken to the regent; but the ladies were ſaved from the brutal treatment to which, if taken, they would have been expoſed, by the courageous conduct of Gaſton, count of Foix, and of the captal de Buche, who, though in the ſervice of England, flew to their reſcue with all the generoſity and gallantry of a true knight, and not only defended the citadel with ſucceſs, but ſallied forth and beat off the Pariſians and their ruſtic allies, with great ſlaughter. The garriſon, enraged at the perfidious conduct of the mayor, immediately hanged him, and put a great number of the inhabitants to the ſword; they then ſet fire to the town, which continued burning for a fortnight. Upwards of ſeven thouſand men periſhed that day. The peaſants, who accompanied the Pariſians, were almoſt wholly deſtroyed. This defeat annihilated the faction of the Jacquerie, which never more appeared in the field. Young Enguerrand, lord of Coucy, placing himſelf at the head of a ſelect troop of gentlemen, purſued the fugitives, and maſſacred them without mercy wherever he found them.

The check which the Pariſians ſuſtained at Meaux, conſiderably cooled their courage. Marcel, equally intimidated by the enemies who threatened him from without, and by the diviſions which prevailed within the city, reſolved to call the king of Navarre to his aſſiſtance, and to revive the zeal of his partiſans by the preſence of a powerful chief, who, having troops at his command, was able to ſupport the tottering faction. That monarch obeyed the ſummons; and, on his arrival in the capital, harangued the people; he was followed by alderman Conſac, who ſaid, the ſtate being ill-governed, wanted ſome one who would govern it better, and that the king of Navarre was the only prince whoſe birth and perſonal endowments qualified him for the important office of captain-general.

If, in the courſe of theſe tumults, the king of Navarre ever conceived the deſign of aſcending the throne of France, as many of his meaſures ſeemed to indicate, the folly of his pretenſions muſt now have ſtricken him, in a forcible point of view. Moſt of the gentlemen who had been ſeduced to join him by his falſe profeſſions of rectitude, no ſooner diſcovered his ambitious projects than they immediately abandoned him. Great numbers, too, of the nobles of Burgundy, who had followed him during the preſent campaign, now left him, diſdaining to ſerve under a captain of rebel-citizens. By theſe deſertions the regent's party acquired ſtrength; and that prudent prince took care to profit by all the falſe ſteps of his enemies.

The nobility having exterminated the Jacques, haſtened to join the regent, who, by this time, had collected a body of three thouſand men at arms, with which he advanced towards Paris, reſolved to make the inhabitants of the capital feel the weight of his reſentment. The troops, diſperſed in the environs of the town, pillaged and burned the country-houſes of the Pariſians. The king of Navarre, their new captain-general, ſallied forth with ſix thouſand men, but he did nothing deſerving of the title they had conferred on him.—He went firſt to Goneſſe, and then approached Senlis, on which a detachment of his army made an unſucceſsful attempt. The regent, in the mean time, had advanced to the abbey of Chelles, within four leagues of Paris, where ſome propoſals for an accommodation were made and rejected; after which he marched from Chelles, and pitched his camp in the vicinity of Vincennes, Conflans, and Charenton. Marcel, appriſed of his motions, haſtened the completion of the new fortifications. He had introduced into the city ſeveral bodies of Engliſh and Navarreſe troops, leſs with a view of adding to its ſafety, than of giving authority to his party, which began to decline. Some of the noblemen in the regent's army, approaching the walls, defied the Pariſians to come forth*; but they refuſed to accept the challenge, ſaying, "Their deſign was "not to take up arms againſt their lord; but if they were attacked, they were "reſolved to defend themſelves."

* Spicil. Cont. Nang.

The regent, yielding to the ſolicitations of queen Jane, conſented to an interview with the king of Navarre; for which purpoſe a pavilion was erected between the town of Vincennes and the abbey of Saint Anthony*. The regent's army, amounting to twelve thouſand men, was encamped in four diviſions. The troops of the king of Navarre, conſiſting only of eight hundred men at arms, occupied a hill between Montreuil and Charonne. Both armies kept at a diſtance from the place where the conference was holden. An accommodation was concluded between the two princes; the claims of Charles the Bad were eſtimated at four hundred thouſand florins, which the regent conſented to pay by inſtalments, and farther to grant him land of the yearly value of ten thouſand livres. The king, in return, engaged to join the regent, and induce the Pariſians to ſubmit, and to contribute three hundred thouſand crowns towards the king's ranſom, on condition that the regent ſhould grant a general amneſty. After the concluſion of this treaty, the biſhop of Liſieux celebrated maſs, in preſence of the nobles and of the two princes, who ſwore to fulfil the treaty, on the ſacred body of God, which the biſhop held in his hands. But, when the conſecrated wafer was preſented to the king of Navarre, wicked as he was, he ſhuddered at the idea of profaning a ceremony thus ſacred, and pleaded his having broken his faſt as an excuſe for refuſing the proffered ſacrament.

When the two princes parted, the king went to Saint Denis, and the prince returned to his camp, feebly convinced of the ſincerity of his enemy, who very ſoon manifeſted his real ſentiments. Two days after he left the regent, he went to Paris, under pretence of procuring a ratification of the treaty; but, in fact, to renew his alliance with the rebels, and to leave them the troops he had brought with him. His plea for thus violating the ſacred engagement he had ſo recently contracted, was the conduct of the regent, in attacking and defeating a party of the Pariſians, who had made a ſally from the town; this, he pretended, was a breach of the treaty, and of courſe operated as a releaſe to him from the oath he had taken.

The troops were ſo diſpoſed as greatly to incommode the inhabitants of Paris. A bridge had been thrown over the Seine below Corbeil, by means of which a communication was eſtabliſhed that enabled detachments of the army to extend their incurſions along the river, and to prevent any ſupplies from entering Paris on that ſide†. Marcel, in order to inſpire the citizens with confidence, made a ſally from the town, at the head of twelve hundred men, and deſtroyed the bridge. Another ſally, which was made a few days after, under the conduct of the king of Navarre, proved leſs ſucceſsful. That prince contented himſelf with leading his men ſo near to the enemy as to hold a conference with ſome of the nobles, and then led them back again without making any attack.

* Chron. MS. du roi Jean. † Grande Chronique.; Spicil, Cont. Nang.

This conduct rendered him ſuſpected, and he thenceforth became an object of contempt to the citizens, whom he had prevented from ſignaliſing their courage; they imagined, too, that he maintained a ſecret correſpondence with the nobility, whom they regarded as their enemies. Having withdrawn their confidence, they next deprived him of the title of captain-general; and, finding his influence inſufficient to ſecure him the power he wiſhed to obtain, he left the capital in diſguſt, and retired to St. Denis.

At the inſtigation of queen Jane, the regent was weak enough again to liſten to propoſals of peace from that treacherous monarch, and his no leſs treacherous adherents, the chiefs of the ſedition. Conferences were holden near Vitry, and all the terms of accommodation were ſettled; but the faithleſs Pariſians laughed at the credulity of their prince, and diſmiſſed with threats and contempt the officers whom he ſent, agreeable to the treaty, to take poſſeſſion of the town.

Marcel and his accomplices now plainly perceived the impoſſibility of holding out much longer without effectual aſſiſtance from the king of Navarre, on whoſe protection alone they relied, not merely for the ſucceſs of their ſchemes but for the preſervation of their lives. With him, therefore, they held frequent conferences, in which they diſplayed the moſt abject ſubmiſſion, and earneſtly beſought him to extend his favour to them who had only become criminal in order to forward his intereſt, and promote his views. The king, ever profuſe of oaths and promiſes, replied "Certainly, my lords and friends, no "harm ſhall ever happen to you of which I will not partake. While you have "the government of Paris, I adviſe you to provide yourſelf with plenty of gold "and ſilver, ſince you may ſtand in need of it. You may place a confidence in "me, and ſend me all you collect to Saint Denis, where I will take good care of "it, and ſecretly employ it in the ſupport of men at arms, and companies of foot, "which will ſerve to defend you againſt your enemies." Marcel's fears, in this inſtance, overcame his avarice, and, flattering himſelf with having ſecured a powerful protection in Charles the Bad, he continued to ſend regularly twice a week two cart-loads of florins to St. Denis.

In vain did the provoſt of the merchants endeavour, by theſe precautions, to ward off the impending blow. His credit daily diminiſhed, and his partiſans began to loſe their courage with their hopes. An incident which occurred at this time tended to accelerate his ruin, by compelling him to have recourſe to the moſt dangerous expedients which rage and deſpair could ſuggeſt. Beſides thoſe troops which attended the king of Navarre, there were ſome other companies of Engliſh, which the inhabitants of Paris retained in their ſervice. The people diſcontented with the conduct of Charles the Bad, and of thoſe factious demagogues by whom they had hitherto ſubmitted to be governed, ſighed in ſecret for the return of their lawful prince. The ſight of the Engliſh reminded the citizens of their ſovereign's captivity; the calamities which deſolated the kingdom excited their indignation; unable any longer to ſuffer their enemies to triumph, as it were, in the midſt of the capital, they inſulted the Engliſh troops, who endeavoured to defend themſelves, but, overcome by ſuperiority of numbers, ſixty of them were killed; and though Marcel favoured the eſcape of the reſt, he was compelled to conſent to the impriſonment of one hundred and fifty. The king of Navarre having expreſſed his diſpleaſure at this outrage, the provoſt, obedient to his will, went next day to the Louvre, where theſe priſoners were confined, and effected their releaſe, notwithſtanding the reſiſtance of the Pariſians.

Theſe troops took revenge for the ill-treatment they experienced by committing the moſt dreadful devaſtations in the environs of the capital, whoſe inhabitants they dared to come forth and engage them. The Pariſians accepted the challenge, and the provoſt of the merchants was compelled to make a ſally at the head of twelve hundred men; but he was careful to divide them into two bodies, and to lead that which he commanded himſelf to a quarter where he was certain no enemy would be found; the other body fell in with the Engliſh near St. Cloud, and ſuſtained a total defeat; ſix hundred of them were killed, and the reſt purſued to the gates of Paris.

The king of Navarre remained a tranquil ſpectator of theſe diſaſters; and was pleaſed to ſee his reſentment againſt the Pariſians ſo completely gratified. He moreover flattered himſelf with the hope, that the inconveniences they experienced would, finally, induce them to reſign themſelves entirely to his diſcretion*. It was impoſſible that things could remain in their preſent ſituation; the confuſion was two great to continue; and the criſis was ſo violent that it muſt ſpeedily terminate in a complete revolution. Marcel, having forfeited all claims to mercy from the regent, being deteſted by the majority of that very people whoſe idol he had ſo recently been, and abhorred by all good citizens, was no longer under the neceſſity of keeping up appearances. His only alternative was to bury himſelf beneath the ruins of his faction, or elſe to abandon himſelf without reſerve to the king of Navarre, who held him in contempt, and only conſidered him as the vile inſtrument of his own wickedneſs. He now paid that monarch a private viſit, when they concerted ſuch a project, as might be expected from men ſo loſt to every principal of virtue, juſtice and humanity. It was agreed that the provoſt of the merchants ſhould ſurrender the capital to the king, whoſe troops, in conjunction with the rebels, after ſecuring the Baſtille, and the principal gates of the city, ſhould maſſacre all the friends of the regent, whoſe houſes were already marked for that purpoſe; and when by this means they ſhould have overcome every obſtacle to their wiſhes, Charles the Bad ſhould be crowned king of France. The new monarch would then have ceded to Edward ſuch provinces as lay contiguous to his own territories, and have done homage to him for the reſt of the kingdom.

The provoſt of the merchants having taken every precaution which he deemed neceſſary for ſecuring the accompliſhment of his ſcheme, ſent word to the king of Navarre that all was ready, and he had only to haſten the approach of his troops to the town; and, at a ſignal which they had agreed on, the gates were to be opened. Marcel accordingly repaired to the gate of St. Anthony, in the night of the laſt of July, and having diſmiſſed a part of the guard, and replaced them with ſuch as were devoted to his ſervice, he took the keys of the gate from the officer to whoſe care they were entruſted. Hitherto he had met with no obſtacle; and the town was on the point of being ſurrendered to Charles the Bad, when John Maillard, a loyal citizen—whoſe name merits a diſtinguiſhed place in the annals of France—arrived with a party of his friends, and ſeizing Marcel, ſaved his country. Firmly attached to his lawful ſovereign, he had only waited for a proper opportunity to diſplay his zeal; notwithſtanding the ſecrecy with which the ſchemes of Marcel had been conducted, he had found the means of detecting them. When he came up to the traitor, he exclaimed, "Stephen, "what are you doing here at this hour?" "John," ſaid Marcel, "what is "that to you? I am here to take care of the town, of which I am governor." "By heavens!" replied Maillard, "that is not the caſe, you are not here at "this hour for any good; and I will ſhew you," addreſſing himſelf to his companions, "that he has got the keys of the gate in his hand for the purpoſe "of betraying the city." "John, you lie!" ſaid the provoſt—"You are the "liar!" returned Maillard, in a tranſport of rage; then graſping his battle-axe he purſued Marcel, who attempted to fly, and with one blow laid him dead at his feet. His companions immediately attacked the troops who attended the provoſt, killed ſome of them and ſecured the reſt. Maillard then haſtened to the gate of Saint Honore, which was alſo to have been opened for the admiſſion of the Navarreſe, and, as he marched through the city, he awakened the inhabitants, and relating what he had done, called upon them to defend the common cauſe; when he arrived at the gate, he killed all ſuch as attempted to reſiſt, and led the reſt to priſon, whither moſt of the accomplices of Marcel, having been ſeized in their beds, were conducted before morning*.

The people rouſed by the cries of "Monjoye Saint Denis!" "Long live the "king and the regent!" aſſembled in crowds. The ſtreets were inſtantly filled with an armed multitude, who maſſacred all the partiſans of the provoſt and his faction that came in their way. Even thoſe who attempted to eſcape their fury, by keeping within doors, were forced from their habitations and thrown into priſon. One only of the moſt criminal eluded their vigilance; the biſhop of Laon, that ſeditious and turbulent prieſt, who had been the chief inſtigator of the preſent diſorders, eſcaped from the city, while the populace were engaged in wreaking their vengeance on the body of his accomplice, Marcel, who, with four of his partners in iniquity that had joined him in the aſſaſſination of the two mareſchals, was dragged through the ſtreet, and, covered with blood and dirt, thrown on the tombs of thoſe noblemen, and there expoſed, as expiatory victims, to the indignation of an enraged populace.

At dawn of day, Maillard aſſembled the people in the market-place, where he pronounced a pathetic harangue on the calamities to which the city had been expoſed ſince the commencement of the revolt; and explained the motives which had urged him to kill the provoſt of the merchants. His ſpeech was received with general applauſe; and all preſent called for the immediate puniſhment of the traitors who had conſpired againſt the ſafety of the town, the rights of the king, and the authority of the regent. The partiſans of Marcel were accordingly tried by a ſelect council of citizens, who ſentenced numbers of them to die, and previouſly to be applied to the torture.

The people, who, but a few days before, did notdare to pronounce the name of the regent, now ardently wiſhed for his return; all badges of party diſappeared; and the principal leaders of rebellion were either dead or in priſon. Among their miſguided adherents, were ſome reſpectable citizens, whoſe paſt lives had been irreproachable; but who were ſeduced, either by the example of their friends, the threats of the provoſt, or the intrigues of the king of Navarre, to take an active part in the ſedition. One of theſe unhappy men, an object of general eſteem, exclaimed, as they led him to the place of execution, "Wretch that I am! O, king of Navarre, would that I had never ſeen "nor heard you."

Simon Maillard, with two counſellors of the parliament, John Alphons, and John Paſtourel, were deputed to wait on the regent whom they found at Charenton*. They gave him an account of what had paſſed, and beſought him, in the name of the Pariſians, to complete, by his preſence, the reſtoration of tranquillity. Charles received them with kindneſs, promiſed to follow them as ſoon as poſſible, and deſired them to aſſure the inhabitants of the capital of his affection and mercy. A few days after, he entered Paris, accompanied by the mareſchal d'Andreghen, the lord of Roye, and a numerous retinue of knights and nobles. He was received by the people with every demonſtration of joy; and, the day after his arrival, he repaired to the town-hall†, when the ſtreets were crowded with the inhabitants, who invoked benedictions on his head, and made repeated proteſtations of ſubmiſſion and fidelity. At the town-hall, he publicly explained the particulars of the conſpiracy, which had been recently fruſtrated; he convinced the people that the deſign of Marcel, the biſhop of Laon, and their accomplices, was to ſurrender the town to the Engliſh and Navarreſe, to maſſacre all thoſe who were known to be attached to their ſovereign, and then to beſtow the crown on Charles the Bad. All theſe circumſtances had been collected from the confeſſions of the criminals, who had been applied to the torture, and from Thomas de Ladit, chancellor to the king of Navarre, who was apprehended, in attempting to make his eſcape in the diſguiſe of a monk; and executed ſome time after. The prince finiſhed his ſpeech by an aſſurance that he would bury in oblivion all paſt tranſactions, and ſimply confine the effects of his juſtice to the authors of the revolt, who, by their violence and intrigues, had corrupted the fidelity of their fellow-citizens.

As a proof that this promiſe implied no exceptions that could alarm ſuch as had been ſeduced to partake in the ſedition, he granted, at the ſolicitations of Gentien Triſtan, the new provoſt of the merchants, and of the aldermen and principal citizens, general Letters of Grace, excluding only thoſe who had been guilty of high-treaſon, which crime he explained to be an attempt to prevent the liberation of the king; a deſign on the life of the king and of the regent; or to keep them in perpetual impriſonment, and to declare the king of Navarre, king of France. The Pariſians, ſatisfied with this explanation of his intentions, vowed an inviolable attachment to him.

The night on which Marcel was to ſurrender the city, the king of Navarre preſented himſelf at the gate of Saint Anthony*; but, finding it ſhut, he began to fear that ſome unexpected event had fruſtrated his ſchemes; and the tumult he heard encreaſing his inquietude, he diſpatched meſſengers to diſcover the fact, who ſoon brought him a true account of the ſituation of affairs. He then attempted to remedy this diſappointment by an attack on the town; but, being repulſed with loſs, he retired to Saint Denis, tranſported with rage againſt the Pariſians; the effects of which were diſplayed in ravaging the environs of the capital. In a few days, he received the news that his treaty with the king of England was concluded; it was ſigned on the firſt of Auguſt†, the very day on which Marcel was to have given him poſſeſſion of Paris. By this treaty it was ſtipulated that the king of Navarre ſhould aſſiſt Edward with all his power in conquering France; that, in caſe they ſucceeded, Charles ſhould have the counties of Champagne and Brie; the county of Chartres, and the bailiwick of Amiens; and that all the other provinces ſhould belong to the king of England, with a permiſſion, however, to Charles, to eſtabliſh his pretenſions to the duchy of Normandy.

The king of Navarre, now firmly connected with England, from whence he expected to obtain effectual aſſiſtance, and having nothing farther to hope from the Pariſians, ſince the detection and puniſhment of his accomplices, no longer ſought to keep up appearances with the regent, whom he had hitherto amuſed with negociations and treaties, always violated as ſoon as formed. Before he left Saint Denis (which he pillaged in return for the ſhelter it had afforded him) he ſent him an open defiance*. He then marched to the town of Melun, into which he was admitted by his ſiſter, queen Blanche, to whom it belonged; but he could only obtain poſſeſſion of one part of the town, the other having been previouſly fortified and ſecured by the regent's troops. Philip of Navarre, at the ſame time, entered Normandy, and placed ſtrong garriſons in Mantes and Meulan, by which means he commanded the courſe of the Seine, and was enabled to make incurſions into the Chartrain, and even to extend his depredations to the vicinity of the capital. The Engliſh troops, too, joined the Navarreſe more openly than they had hitherto done; ſo that Edward, notwithſtanding the truce, continued hoſtilities under the name of the king of Navarre. He hoped, by this policy, to weaken the kingdom, by ſecretly fomenting the diviſions that preyed upon its vitals.

Every day was productive of ſome freſh calamity. The beſt fortified towns were not exempt from the general terror, and the utmoſt vigilance was requiſite to avert the evil effects of their groundleſs apprehenſions. It was at this period that a prohibition was iſſued to ring the bells of the churches in Paris, from the hour of veſpers till day-light, through fear of interrupting the attention of the centinels, who were poſted on the walls to give notice of the enemy's approach. The garriſons, ſtationed in the towns and fortreſſes, formed ſo many independent troops of marauders, who ſuffered no opportunity of pillage to eſcape. All communication, not only between the different provinces, but between the different towns of the ſame province, were ſtopped. The high-roads were covered with graſs and brambles; the caſtles, churches, monaſteries, in ſhort, every building which would admit of a fortification, was either filled with troops, or devoted to deſtruction by either party. The Engliſh and Navarreſe demoliſhed them from enmity; and the troops of the regent, that they might not afford ſhelter to the enemy. The convents were forſaken; the cities were filled with monks and nuns, who repaired thither for ſecurity againſt the horrors of war. The inhabitants of the country were expoſed to every kind of outrage; and, after paying tribute to the different troops, in order to preſerve their habitations from fire and pillage, they were finally conſtrained to renounce the cultivation of their lands; and the fields now became the receptacles of ſoldiers and banditti.

The principal object of the king of Navarre, was, to cut off all communication with the capital, in the hope of reducing it by famine. With this view he had ſecured all the paſſages of the different rivers by which proviſions might be conveyed thither. The poſſeſſion of Creil gave him the command of the Oiſe, Lagny made him maſter of the Marne, and he ſecured the Seine, both above and below Paris, by the garriſons of Melun, Mantes, and Meulan; while the fortreſſes of Argenteuil, Franconville, and Croiſſy, which he had reduced, enabled him to blockade the town on that ſide. The regent, in the mean time, aſſembled troops; and was obliged to enliſt in his ſervice ſeveral of thoſe companies of banditti which infeſted the kingdom. The ſtate of his finances not permitting him to pay them with regularity, they committed the moſt dreadful devaſtations in all the places where they were ſtationed; ſome of their leaders even engaged in a conſpiracy with the enemy, which was fortunately diſcovered. The puniſhment of theſe traitors cauſed their troops to deſert, and join the Navarreſe; ſo that Charles the Bad, who was enabled to pay them by the ſums he had received from Marcel, ſaw the number of his adherents daily encreaſe.

The towns of Picardy and Vermandois, on application from the regent, furniſhed a body of troops, under the command of the biſhop of Noyon, and the lords of Coucy, Ravenal, Chauny and Roye, who laid ſiege to the caſtle of Mauconſeil, a place from its ſituation important. John de Pecquigny, appriſed of the danger to which this fortreſs was expoſed, haſtened to its relief, at the head of the garriſon of Creil; and, entering, by favour of a fog, the camp of the beſiegers, took them by ſurpriſe, and put them to flight. Moſt of the noblemen were either killed or taken; among the laſt was the biſhop of Noyon. The enemy made a conſiderable booty, as well by the pillage of the camp, as the ranſom of the priſoners; and, ſuch as had not money to pay their ranſom, were compelled to ſerve, for a certain time, in the Navarreſe army.

The king of Navarre, who kept up a ſecret correſpondence in moſt of the towns which acknowledged the regent's authority, made an attempt upon Amiens, the reduction of which ſome of the citizens had engaged to facilitate. When every thing was prepared for the introduction of his troops, Pecquigny went thither by night, and took poſſeſſion of one part of the ſuburbs; but, neglecting to improve this advantage with ſufficient celerity, he gave the inhabitants of the town time to prepare for reſiſtance. The conſtable de Fiennes, and the count of St. Paul, arrived at this conjuncture, and entered the town on the oppoſite ſide; the troops they brought with them repelled the attacks of the Navarreſe, who were forced to retreat to the ſuburbs, which they abandoned, after having pillaged and ſet fire to it. Three thouſand houſes* were reduced to aſhes. Thoſe citizens who had been concerned in the plot, were arreſted the next day, and ſeventeen of them, among whom was the mayor, were executed. A ſimilar attempt was made, at the ſame time, on the town of Laon, which the biſhop wiſhed to ſurrender to the Navarreſe, but the conſpiracy was fortunately detected, though the prelate eſcaped the puniſhment he deſerved by a timely evaſion.

* It appears ſtrange that one of the ſuburbs of Amiens ſhould, at this period, have contained three thouſand houſes, when all the houſes in the four ſuburbs do not now amount to eight hundred. Yet all the chronicles of the fourteenth century agree in the number; and, as it is not written in cyphers, there can be no miſtake. Amiens, therefore, muſt have formerly been a city of much greater extent than it is at preſent. Villaret.

Even the capital itſelf was not exempt from conſpiracies; the regent having received intelligence of a plot for introducing the troops of Charles the Bad into Paris, ordered ſeveral of the citizens to be arreſted, and thrown into priſon. The people aſſembled and inſiſted that John Culdoe, provoſt of the merchants, ſhould ſolicit the prince to releaſe them, but that officer refuſed to comply with their requeſt. The next day the regent, attended by a numerous eſcort, went to the Place de Greve, where he harangued the people, and aſſured them, he had certain proofs that thoſe he had arreſted were partiſans of the king of Navarre. A citizen then preſent, who had himſelf been connected with Charles the Bad, having confirmed the truth of the prince's declaration by oath, the people were appeaſed; but the regent, wiſhing to conciliate their affection by acts of clemency, pardoned the culprits, after he had eſtabliſhed their guilt by a fair trial*.

The cardinals of Perigord and Urzel, who had been appointed by the pope to negociate an accomodation between the regent and the king of Navarret, were compelled to return to Avignon, without accompliſhing the object of their miſſion. Theſe eccleſiaſtics had been equally unſucceſful in their attempt to negociate a peace between the crowns of England and France, for which purpoſe they had made a voyage to London. The war continuing, a troop of Engliſh and Navarreſe, not exceeding one thouſand men, took Auxerre, though defended by a garriſon of one thouſand. The town was pillaged, and the booty was eſtimated at five hundred thouſand moutons of gold. The Navarreſe, after paſſing a week in the place, threatened to burn it, unleſs the inhabitants would conſent to pay a ranſom of forty thouſand moutons of gold, and forty pearls, eſtimated at a fourth of that ſum. Plundered of all they poſſeſſed, they were unable to furniſh the money; and were therefore obliged to give the plate and jewels belonging to the church of St. Germain, the only place that had eſcaped pillage, as a pledge to the enemy; engaging to pay an annual rent of three thouſand florins to the church in caſe they ſhould fail to redeem it. The Engliſh, notwithſtanding, remained in the town, the gates and fortifications whereof they demoliſhed, while ſome of the citizens were gone to Paris to ſolicit the regent's confirmation of the treaty, to which they had been conſtrained to ſubmit, and to obtain ſome pecuniary aſſiſtance. On their return, the money they had procured was forcibly taken from them.

* Villani, in his account of the conſpiracy, in which he involves the counts of Etampes and Rouſſy, (two noblemen who had given repeated proofs of their loyalty) ſays, that the regent cauſed the citizens to be executed, and pardoned the counts; but his teſtimony is poſitively contradicted by all the French hiſtorians. Villaret.

† Chron. de Saint Denis. Mem. de Littérature.

The courage diſplayed by the conſtable de Fiennes, and the count of St. Paul, in the defence of Amiens, had ſecured them the confidence of the troops who flocked to their ſtandard*. In a ſhort time they found themſelves at the head of two thouſand men at arms, and twelve thouſand militia, with which they formed the ſiege of St. Valery, which capitulated after a moſt vigorous defence. The French had ſcarcely taken poſſeſſion of the town, when Philip of Navarre, with the counts of Harcourt and Pecquigny appeared before it; but, finding the place already reduced, and the enemy ſtronger than they expected, they retreated with precipitation. The conſtable purſued them, and, but for the delay occaſioned by the refuſal of the inhabitants of St. Quentin to ſuffer his troops to paſs, they muſt certainly have been overtaken. That delay, putting a ſtop to the purſuit, the Navarreſe returned to Normandy, where they continued their uſual depredations.

A. D. 1359.] The regent diſplayed equal patience and perſeverance in ſurmounting the numerous obſtacles he had to encounter; while his mildneſs and moderation conciliated the affection of the people, and ſecured univerſal eſteem. Having no farther occaſion to conceal his real ſentiments, he reſolved to evince the generoſity of his mind, and the rectitude of his intentions†. He went to the parliament, and there publiſhed an ordonnance, by which he declared that he had ever conſidered, as faithful and affectionate ſubjects, the two and twenty officers whom the ſtates of 1357 had compelled him to diſmiſs; that the apprehenſion of ſtill greater misfortunes could not have induced him to yield to the importunities of the enemies of the government, if he had not entertained a hope that, in happier times, he ſhould be free to follow the dictates of juſtice; that the time was now arrived for reſtoring to their places, and clearing the reputation of thoſe officers who had only been perſecuted on account of their attachment to the real good of the public, and the honour of their ſovereign; that he, accordingly, reſtored them to their dignities and poſſeſſions, and ordained that their ſalaries ſhould be paid them in the ſame manner as if they had continued to diſcharge the duties of their reſpective offices. The prince concluded by expreſſing a deſire that this declaration might be communicated to the pope, the emperor, and the different towns of the kingdom, that, by ſuch an authentic teſtimony, every ſuſpicion which the diſmiſſion of thoſe officers might have excited to their prejudice, might be effectually removed.

This meaſure ſerved to ſtrengthen and confirm thoſe ſentiments of love and reſpect which the French were accuſtomed to entertain for their ſovereigns. It was not long before the prince received an unequivocal proof of the zeal and attachment of the nobility, and of the inhabitants of the principal towns‡. At an aſſembly of the ſtates general, holden at this time, the nobles, beſides the uſual ſubſidy, agreed to ſerve a whole month at their own expence; the city of Paris offered to maintain ſix hundred men at arms, four hundred archers, and one thouſand companions; the other cities, making proportionable efforts, furniſhed twelve thouſand men at arms. This was a very large ſupply, when we conſider the wretched ſtate of the country, the deſtruction and pillage of ſo many towns, and the neceſſity under which they all laboured to provide for their own private defence againſt the multitude of enemies which ſurrounded them on all ſides.

In order to profit by the preſent diſpoſition of the troops, it was reſolved to lay ſiege to Melun, which, from its ſituation on the Seine, enabled the Navarreſe greatly to incommode the capital*. It moreover contained within its walls, three ſovereign princeſſes; Jane, widow to Charles; Blanche, widow to Philip of Valois, and the queen of Navarre. It was at this ſiege that Bertrand du Gueſclin, who had lately entered the regent's ſervice†, firſt diſplayed his courage in the French army. The regent, who was preſent, witneſſed his intrepidity, in firſt mounting the walls of a tower, which he would have taken, had not the ladder on which he ſtood been cruſhed by a barrel of ſtones. The ſolidity of his armour ſaved his life, but he was thrown into the ditch, from whence he was taken ſenſeleſs and motionleſs. The prince, who had kept his eyes on him the whole time, haſtened to his aſſiſtance, and conceived the higheſt eſteem for him. As ſoon as du Gueſclin had recovered his ſenſes, he returned to the attack, ſlew ſeveral of the enemy with his own hand, and conſtrained the reſt to retreat behind the drawbridge. Night coming on, the aſſailants retired to their tents.

A freſh aſſault was to have been given the next day; but, during the night, the garriſon propſed terms of accommodation. Queen Jane and her council engaged to ſurrender the city, and the preliminary conditions of the new treaty of peace with the king of Navarre were agreed upon. The prince, in the mean time, withdrew his troops, and returned to Paris, fully relying on the queen's promiſe that the Navarreſe ſhould evacuate Melun.

While the agents of the two princes were employed at Vernon, in diſcuſſing the articles of peace, the regent was deſirous of given his ſubjects a proof of the confidence he placed in their affections. The members of his council repaired to the parliament, where the provoſt of the merchants was appointed to attend, with the principal citizens, in order to give their opinion of the treaty now in agitation. They were unanimous in adviſing the prince to accept the terms propoſed. The deputies of the king of Navarre were accordingly invited to come to Paris; and, when every thing was ſettled, the regent went to Pontoiſe, where Charles the Bad was to meet him, in order to ratify the treaty.

bon, Lewis of Harcourt, the lords of Montmorency and Saint Venant, William Martel, le Baudrain de la Heuze, the provoſt of the merchants, and two of the principal citizens of Paris, ſhould be delivered to him as hoſtages. He arrived with a guard of one hundred men at arms ; but, on perceiving the regent, who went out to meet him, he diſmiſſed a part of his attendants. The two princes, after reciprocal profeſſions of friendſhip, entered the town of Pontoiſe by the light of flambeaux. When they came to ſettle the terms of the treaty, ſuch objections were ſtarted by the king of Navarre as appeared to be inſurmountable ; and the regent actually ſent to inform him by the count of d'Etampes, that, if he perſiſted in refuſing the conditions he had propoſed, an accommodation was impoſſible, and he was ready to have him conducted in ſafety to the place at which he had received him.

All hopes of a peace thus ſeemed to be fruſtrated, when Charles the Bad ſuddenly changed his ſentiments, or rather his language, for his object was ſtill the ſame, though he found it neceſſary to alter the mode of attaining it. His profeſſions were now the very the reverſe of what they had hitherto been ; inſtead of advancing exorbitant claims, he diſplayed the moſt perfect diſintereſtedneſs. He ſent for the council of the regent, to whom he declared his reſolution of terminating the calamities of the ſtate, of becoming the friend of the king and his ſon, and of ſerving them to the utmoſt of his power*. He proteſted that he reſigned all pretenſions to a pecuniary ſatisfaction, or territorial grant, and only wiſhed to obtain the reſtitution of what lawfully belonged to him ; he added, that it was his intention to declare theſe ſentiments before the people.

The regent, agreeably ſurpriſed at this unexpected change, exclaimed, in a tranſport of joy, that " if the king of Navarre really thought as he ſpoke, he " muſt certainly have been inſpired by heaven." But Charles the Bad, more dangerous as a friend than formidable as an enemy, did not ſuffer him to remain long in an error. That ſame day, however, before the people of Pontoiſe, aſſembled for the purpoſe in the hall of the caſtle, he renewed the declaration he had made to the regent's council ; and farther promiſed to evacuate all the fortreſſes which either he or his allies had taken during the war. He kept his word with regard to ſome ; ſuch as Poiſſy, Chaumont en Vexin, Joui-la-Ville, and Chanville. But this apparent candour had its ſource in a principle which it is neceſſary to develope.

A great part of the troops which the king of Navarre had hitherto employed were compoſed of independent companies of Engliſh and other maurauders, who ravaged the kingdom. Moſt of the leaders of theſe companies, after they had ſtripped the provinces, were anxious to ſecure the fruits of their depredations in ſome place of ſafety. Several of them even ſold the towns they had ſeized without conſulting the king. The Engliſh, in particular, wiſhed to return with their wealth to their native iſle; and many of them were recalled by Edward, who was collecting forces for the execution of a project he then had in contemplation. What then did Charles the Bad riſk by concluding a peace? He got rid of a war which began to be onerous, at the ſame time that he reſerved to himſelf the advantages to be derived from it through the means of his brother Philip of Navarre, who refuſed to accede to the treaty, declaring that "the king of Navarre muſt be bewitched to accept an accommodation ſo "diſadvantageous to himſelf." The truce, too, with England, was expired; and, as Edward had been extremely circumſpect in granting him ſuccours, he hoped, by renewing the war at a future period, to be able to obtain better terms from that monarch; while his affectation of candour afforded him an opportunity of eſtabliſhing an intercourſe with the regent, that might facilitate the accompliſhment of his perfidious ſchemes. Such were the motives which influenced the conduct of Charles the Bad, who continued to inſinuate himſelf into the confidence and good graces of the regent, till the detection of a conſpiracy he had formed compelled him once more to throw off the maſk.

Although it had been expreſsly ſtipulated by the treaty that that part of the town of Melun, which was in the poſſeſſion of the Navarreſe, ſhould be ſurrendered, the place was not evacuated. The king of Navarre had converted the war into another ſpecies of depredation, attended with leſs danger, and productive of greater emolument. All the goods and merchandiſe which paſſed under the bridge of Melun to go to Paris, were made ſubject to enormous duties. A ton of wine paid ſix crowns of gold; a hogſhead of corn two crowns, and every thing elſe in proportion. The produce of theſe duties, it was pretended, was to pay the arrears due to the troops which the king of Navarre had ſtationed at Melun. At Mantes and Meulan the ſame impoſition was practiſed; ſo that, by commanding the navigation of the river, the king of Navarre found means to levy contributions on the capital without the expence of waging war.

The regent, at the ſolicitation of Charles the Bad, who had private reaſons for wiſhing to return to Paris, aſſembled the principal citizens in the chamber of the parliament*. After he had read the treaty, he told them that the king of Navarre was anxious to obtain permiſſion to return to the capital, but that he would not grant it contrary to the inclinations of the inhabitants. John Deſmares, an advocate, anſwered, in the name of the aſſembly, that the Pariſians were highly obliged to the regent for the peace he had concluded; and that they would not oppoſe the return of the king of Navarre, provided he would not bring with him certain traitors, whom he named, and the chief of whom was the biſhop of Laon. The prince replied, that the wiſhes of the aſſembly were perfectly conformable with his own; and that he had repeatedly refuſed to grant the pardon of thoſe traitors to the prayers and remonſtrances of the Navarreſe monarch.

But, notwithſtanding the late treaty, hoſtilities ſtill continued in different parts of the kingdom; the only difference was this, that a part of the ſame troops carried on the war under another name; Philip of Navarre was the oſtenſible enemy in Normandy, and Edward in the other provinces; while the chiefs of the companies, ſometimes ſerving one party, ſometimes the other, but, in fact, always fighting for themſelves, completed the gratification of their avidity, on the few remaining ſpoils of the kingdom.

Euſtace d'Auberticourt, one of the leaders of banditti, laid waſte the fine province of Champagne, at the head of ſeven hundred lances. Animated by love, his courage was enthuſiaſtic; and, had it been exerted to a laudable end, might have entitled him to a diſtinguiſhed place in the liſt of heroes. He had conceived a violent paſſion for Iſabella de Juilliers, daughter to the count of that name, and widow to the earl of Kent. The lady, flattered by the adoration of a warrior, whoſe achievments formed the theme of general commendation, returned his paſſion with equal ardour; and, after beſtowing on him repeated marks of her favour, and exhorting him to continue in the path of glory, or rather, in the path of plunder, ſhe gave him her hand. The devaſtations he committed called for the ſerious attention of the regent, who could find no other means of repreſſing them, than by oppoſing to him an adverſary of the ſame ſtamp.

Brocard de Feneſtrange, chief of the banditti of Lorraine, was the perſon he employed on this occaſion, and he promiſed him a conſiderable reward in caſe he executed his commiſſion with zeal and ſucceſs. Feneſtrange having aſſembled his troops, which amounted to five hundred men at arms, was joined by ſeveral noblemen and gentlemen from Burgundy and Champagne. He carried by aſſault the caſtle of Hans, which belonged to Auberticourt, whom he overtook near Nogent-upon-Seine. Feneſtrange, who was a man of experience, drew up his little army in three diviſions; he placed himſelf at the head of the firſt, aſſiſted by the biſhop of Troies; John of Chalons, and the count of Joui commanded the ſecond; and the third was entruſted to the count of Joinville. The combat was long and bloody; but, Euſtace d'Auberticourt, having received a dangerous wound from a lance which broke three of his teeth, ſuſtained a total defeat, and was compelled to ſurrender himſelf a priſoner to Feneſtrange.

But the calm which this victory reſtored to the provinces, proved of ſhort duration. Feneſtrange had been promiſed thirty thouſand crowns, which it was not poſſible to pay him. Diſappointed in his expectations of reward, he had the audacity to ſend a defiance to the regent, and to declare war againſt him, and the whole kingdom of France. He did not confine himſelf to threats, but ſoon proved himſelf an enemy more formidable than Auberticourt. He commenced hoſtilities by the reduction of Bar-upon-Seine, which he pillaged and reduced to aſhes; he then over-ran Champagne with fire and ſword; and, in his deſtructive progreſs, diſplayed greater inhumanity than any of his predeceſſors of the ſame deſcription. The weakneſs of the government prevented the regent from reſtraining theſe exceſſes, or puniſhing their authors; and he was finally compelled to purchaſe the forbearance of Feneſtrange, by paying him to the full extent of his demand.

Edward now thought the kingdom reduced to that ſituation which would juſtify any attempts to profit by circumſtances ſo favourable to his ambition. Hitherto he had never openly explained himſelf on the conditions he meant to impoſe. Since the king's captivity, many attempts had been made to conclude a treaty*; but Edward artfully prolonged the negociation, and rendered them all unſucceſsful. The truce being expired, hoſtilities and conferences for a peace were renewed at the ſame time. The archbiſhop of Sens, with his brother, the count of Tancarville, the count of Damartin, and the mareſchal d'Andreghen, who were priſoners in England, had made ſeveral journies to Paris, with the view to promote an accomodation, but all to no purpoſe.

John, in the mean time, notwithſtanding the efforts of his conquerors to ſoften his captivity, became impatient to recover his liberty. He flattered himſelf that he could obtain from Edward more advantageous terms if he treated with him in perſon, than if he employed an agent; but he was miſtaken in this idea; the matter was of too great importance to ſuffer any impulſe of generoſity to ſilence the dictates of policy. The king of England profited by his good fortune to preſcribe the moſt rigourous terms; and John, anxious to return to his dominions, conſented to all he propoſed. The treaty, ſigned by the two monarchs, by the prince of Wales, and the duke of Bourbon, was ſent to France for the regent's ratification. That prince regarded the conditions as too diſadvantageous to France to be complied with; but, apprehenſive that he might be accuſed of not ſhewing ſufficient anxiety for the releaſe of his father, he would not venture to give a refuſal, that might be ſubject to miſinterpretation, without the previous advice of the ſtates general, who were accordingly ſummoned to meet on the occaſion.

The aſſembly were unanimous in their advice to the duke to reject the treaty, and to continue the war, rather than make peace upon ſuch terms. When the regent heard this, he repaired to the palace, and, ſtanding on the ſteps in the court, ſhewed himſelf to the Pariſians, while William de Dormans, the advocate-general, read the treaty aloud. John agreed to cede to Edward the duchies of Normandy and Guienne, Xaintonge, Aunis, Tarbes, the Perigord, Quercy, the Limouſin, Bigorre, Poitou, Anjou, Touraine, the counties of

* Froiſſard. Chron. de St. Denis. Chron. MS.

Boulogne, Guines, and Ponthieu, Montreul-ſur-Mer, and Calais, without any obligation of homage or fealty, on the part of the Engliſh monarch; to whom he likewiſe ceded the ſovereignty of the duchy of Brittany, and engaged to pay four million crowns of gold, for his ranſom. The people burſt forth into a general murmur of indignation; and unanimouſly exclaimed, that they would never ſubmit to ſuch terms, but would continue the war againſt England. When the regent's anſwer was delivered to the two kings, John, who did not expect a refuſal, evinced the greateſt diſpleaſure; while Edward proteſted, that, before the winter was over, he would enter France with ſuch a formidable army, that the regent would be compelled to accede to any terms he ſhould chuſe to impoſe; and that he would not diſarm till France was totally ſubdued. He immediately made the neceſſary preparations for putting his threats in execution; and, on the twenty-ſeventh of October, ſailed for Calais with a fleet of eleven hundred ſail, on board of which were his four eldeſt ſons, all the principal nobility of England, and an army of one hundred thouſand men.

On the fourth day of November, the Engliſh began their march from Calais; five hundred men preceded the army in order to clear the roads; and the troops were attended with ſix thouſand waggons, which carried their baggage, proviſions, and artillery*. Edward had taken the precaution to provide them with portable ovens and mills, as well as with corn for their nouriſhment; for France was now deſolated by famine, and the continual depredations to which it had been expoſed, had deſtroyed all its reſources. The regent deemed it imprudent, with the ſmall force he was maſter of, to truſt the ſafety of the kingdom to the doubtful event of a battle; he therefore contented himſelf with ſtrengthening the fortifications of ſuch towns as would admit of defence, and with ſupplying them with ſtrong garriſons; abandoning the open country to the diſcretion of the enemy. Thus the king of England was enabled to purſue his march without oppoſition, through the provinces of Picardy and Artois, till he came to the city of Rheims, where he propoſed to be inveſted with the royal diadem of France; the archbiſhops of Lincoln and Durham attended him in order to perform the ceremony. The place, however, was vigorouſly defended by the archbiſhop of the dioceſe, John de Craon, aſſiſted by the count of Porcien and his brother Hugh, with the lords of Bone, Cannency, Dannore and Lore.

While Edward was engaged in the ſiege of Rheims, a conſpiracy was formed in the capital, which, had it ſucceeded, muſt have rendered him maſter of the whole kingdom. The king of Navarre, in concluding the late treaty, had only ſought to ſecure a free acceſs to the regent, with the view of obſerving on which ſide he might be attacked with the greateſt proſpect of ſucceſs. He lived on the moſt intimate terms with the prince; who conſulted him on all occaſions, though, at the ſame time, he kept a watchful eye on his conduct, and ſuffered none of his motions to eſcape his notice*. The regent had recently returned from an excurſion to Rouen, in order to be preſent at the nuptials of Catherine of Bourbon, ſiſter to his conſort, with John of Harcourt, ſon to that count of Harcourt who had ſuffered decapitation, which were celebrated at Paris. The king of Navarre, who attended the ceremony, had procured a ſafe conduct for the captal de Buche, his relation, who made uſe of it to reduce the caſtle of Clermont, in Beauvoiſis. Although it was certain that this enterpriſe had been formed in concert with Charles the Bad, yet the regent pretended ignorance of the matter; and, by continuing to treat him with the ſame marks of friendſhip and confidence which he had ever ſhewn him, ſince his reſidence at Paris, he encouraged him to hope that a diabolical plot he had projected would be crowned with ſucceſs. A citizen of Paris, named Martin Piſdoe, an old friend and accomplice of Marcel, was at the head of this conſpiracy. Though he had been included in the general amneſty, yet he had ever retained a deſire of revenging the death of the provoſt, which he could only hope to do by exciting a revolution. With this view he attempted to corrupt two other citizens, John le Chavenatier, and Denis le Paumier, who immediately appriſed the regent of his deſigns; when they received orders from that prince to diſſemble their reſentment, the better to diſcover the nature and extent of Piſdoe's intrigues. The plan, which he told Chavenatier had been concerted with the officers of the king of Navarre, was this; men at arms, in diſguiſe, were to be privately introduced at the different gates, and ſtationed in different parts of the city; when a ſufficient number had been collected they were to ſeize the regent, at the Louvre, maſſacre all that oppoſed them, and take poſſeſſion of the principal ſquares, in order to prevent the people from aſſembling; by this means, the conſpirators would have made themſelves maſters of the capital. The execution of the project was fortunately prevented by the vigilance of the regent; Martin Piſdoe was apprehended, and, being put to the torture, diſcloſed all the particulars of the conſpiracy; after which he ſuffered the puniſhment due to his crime; and his body, divided into quarters, was expoſed on the four principal gates of the city. The king of Navarre at firſt appeared wholly unconcerned, but, when he found that Piſdoe was to be tortured, he thought that Paris was no longer a place of ſafety for him; and the precipitation with which he fled ſerved to confirm his guilt.

A. D. 1360.] As ſoon as Charles the Bad reached Mantes, he threw off the maſk, declared war againſt the regent, and renewed hoſtilities by the capture of Rouboiſe, a ſtrong fortreſs on the Seine. Edward, in the mean time, was compelled to raiſe the ſiege of Rheims, after laying three months before the town. He then directed his march into Burgundy; the ſtates of which province agreed to pay him two hundred thouſand moutons of gold, at four inſtalments: in conſideration of which he granted them a truce for three years.

Edward, after the concluſion of this treaty, left Burgundy, and proceeded towards the Nivernois, which, ſaving itſelf by a ſimilar compoſition, he transferred his ravages to Brie and the Gatinois. After a long and deſtructive march, he arrived at the gates of Paris, on the laſt day of March; and, taking up his quarters at Bourg-la-Reine, extended his army to Long-jumeau, Mont-rouge, and Vaugirard. He tried to provoke the regent to hazard a battle, by ſending him a defiance, but could not induce that prudent prince to change his plan of operations. Paris was ſafe from the danger of an aſſault by its numerous garriſon, and the ſtrength of its fortifications, for which it was principally indebted to the rebel Marcel; and from that of a blockade by its well-ſupplied magazines.

A body of twelve hundred villagers from the vicinity of Chatres (now Arpajon) having taken refuge in a monaſtery, belonging to Saint Maur-des-Foſſes, and converted the church into a kind of fort, ſurrounded by a ditch, and ſupplied with warlike machines, were attacked by the Engliſh. The captain of this band finding himſelf expoſed to danger, retired, with a few regulars that he had with him, to a tower that lay contiguous to the church, leaving the peaſants to ſuſtain the aſſaults of the enemy. Theſe laſt, unable to defend themſelves, reproached him with his perfidy, and determined to ſurrender; to prevent which, the ſavage ſet fire to the church, and the wretched inhabitants all periſhed in the flames. He was ſoon, however, puniſhed for his cruelty; for, the fire reaching the tower, he experienced a ſimilar fate.

The inhabitants of Thoury, a place of ſome importance, between Etampes and Orleans, deſtroyed their habitations and carried all they poſſeſſed into wooden barracks which they had conſtructed round a ſtrong caſtle, that was ſituated in the middle of the town. When the enemy approached, they perceived that one houſe had, by chance, been left ſtanding; to this they ſet fire, and the wind blowing ſtrong towards the barracks, the flames were carried to the roofs, and ſpread with ſuch inconceivable rapidity, that not a ſoul had time to eſcape. The cries of men, women, and children were heard by the Engliſh, who were unable to afford them the ſmalleſt aſſiſtance; they all periſhed, and the whole town was reduced to aſhes. Montlhery and Long-jumeau were likewiſe burned; and the conflagration was ſeen from the ramparts of Paris.

The impoſſibility of procuring ſubſiſtence for ſuch a numerous army, in a country already waſted by foreign and domeſtic enemies, and left empty alſo by the precautions of the regent, compelled Edward to remove his quarters; and he led his troops into the provinces of Maine, Beauſſe, and the Chartraine, which were abandoned to the fury of their devaſtations. After refreſhing his army, it was his intention to proceed to Brittany, and to renew the ſiege of Paris early in the ſpring. But, while the war was carried on in this ruinous manner, the negociations for a peace ſtill continued; though the ſeverity of the terms Edward wiſhed to impoſe ſeemed to deſtroy all hopes of accommodation. Still the rage of neither party began to abate; France was reduced to the laſt extremity, and the Engliſh themſelves, fatigued with a toilſome march through provinces rendered ſterile by the calamities of war, and their ſtrength farther impaired by the hardſhips of a winter campaign, were anxious to obtain an interval of repoſe. Edward, too, could not but perceive that his immenſe army had procured him no other advantage, than that of ſpreading deſolation around him; while not a ſingle place of importance had acknowledged his power. Theſe reflections muſt have contributed not à little to incline him to lend a favourable ear to the exhortations of the pope's legates, and the remonſtrances of the duke of Lancaſter.

The duke inſiſted, that, notwithſtanding his paſt ſucceſſes, which muſt have greatly exceeded his hopes and expectation, he was now no nearer the accompliſhment of his object—if the acquiſition of the French crown was his object—than at the commencement of the war; or rather he was placed at a greater diſtance from it by thoſe very victories and advantages, which ſeemed to lead to it. That the claim of ſucceſſion had not, from the firſt, procured him one partiſan in the kingdom; and the continuance of theſe deſtructive hoſtilities had united every Frenchman in the moſt implacable animoſity againſt him. That though inteſtine faction had debilitated the government of France, it was abating every moment; and no party, even during the greateſt heat of the conteſt, when ſubjection under a foreign enemy uſually appears preferable to the dominion of fellow-citizens, had ever adopted the pretenſions of the king of England. That the king of Navarre himſelf, the only ally of the Engliſh, inſtead of being a cordial friend, was Edward's moſt dangerous rival, and, in the opinion of his partiſans, poſſeſſed a much preferable title to the crown of France. That the prolongation of the war, however it might enrich the Engliſh ſoldiers, was ruinous to the king himſelf, who bore all the charges of the armament, without receiving any ſolid or durable advantage from it. That if the preſent diſorders of France continued, that kingdom would ſoon be reduced to ſuch a ſtate of deſolation that it would afford no ſpoils to its ravagers; if it could eſtabliſh a more ſteady government, it might, from the chance of war in its favour, and, by its ſuperior force and advantages, be able to repel the preſent victors. That the regent, even during his greateſt diſtreſſes, had yet conducted himſelf with ſo much prudence, as to prevent the Engliſh from acquiring a ſingle foot of land in the kingdom; and it were better for the king to accept by a peace what he had in vain attempted to acquire by hoſtility, the ſucceſs of which had by no means been adequate to the expences; and that Edward, having obtained ſo much glory by his arms, the praiſe of moderation was the only honour to which he could now aſpire, an honour ſo much the greater, as it was durable, was united with prudence, and might be attended with the moſt ſolid advantages*.

Theſe remonſtrances, the wiſdom of which is manifeſt, could not fail to make a deep impreſſion on the mind of Edward; who is ſaid to have been farther diſpoſed to peace, by an accident which happened during his march. At the diſtance of about two leagues from Chartres, his army was overtaken by a dreadful ſtorm of hail, the ſtones of which was of ſuch a prodigious ſize as to kill ſix thouſand horſes and one thouſand men†. The king, frightened at the horrors of the ſurrounding ſcene, threw himſelf proſtrate on the ground; and, extending his arms towards the church of Chartres, made a ſolemn vow no longer to reject the offer of peace, if he could obtain it on reaſonable terms. Voltaire, alluding to this circumſtance, archly obſerves, that "ſeldom have the "will of ſovereigns, and the fate of kingdoms, been decided by a ſhower of "rain.‡" Be that as it may, a peace was concluded at Bretigny—a ſmall town ſituated about a league from Chartres—on the eighth of May, 1360. By the articles of this treaty (forty in number) it was ſtipulated that, excluſive of the abſolute ſovereignty of Guienne and Ponthieu, the following territories ſhould be ceded to Edward—the county of Poictiers; the fief of Thouars; the provinces of Poictou, Xaintonge, Agenois, and Perigord; the Limouſin, Quercy, Bigorre, Gavre, Angoumois, and Rouergue; Calais, Guines, and Montreuil; with the lordſhips of Merch, Sangate, Coulogne, Homes, Wall, and Oye. The full ſovereignty of all theſe provinces and territories was to be veſted in the crown of England; and France agreed to renounce all title to feudal juriſdiction, homage, or appeal from them. It was farther ſettled, by the fourteenth article, that the king of France ſhould pay Edward three millions of crowns of gold for his ranſom (equal to fifteen hundred thouſand pounds of our preſent money;) the firſt ſix hundred thouſand to be paid within four months from the arrival of John on the continent; and four hundred thouſand per annum, till the whole ſum was diſcharged. By the fifteenth article, John was to have his liberty after the firſt payment, and the reſtitution of Rochelle and the county of Guines, on delivering, as hoſtages to Edward, his ſon Philip; the counts of Eu, Longueville, Ponthieu, Tankerville, Joigny, Sancerre, Dammartin, Ventadour, Sallebruch, Ancœurs, and Vendome, with the lords of Craon, Derval, Odenham, and Aubigny; who had all been made priſoners at the battle of Poictiers;—likewiſe his two ſons, Lewis, count of Anjou, and John, count of Poictiers; his brother, Philip duke of Orleans; the duke of Bourbon; the counts of Blois, or of Alencon, or their brothers; the counts of Saint Paul, Harcourt, Portien, Valentinois, Brenne, Vaudemont, and Forez; the viſcount of Beaumont; the lords of Coucy, Fiennes, Preaux, Saint Venant and Garencieres; the dauphin of Auvergne; with the lords of Hangueſt, Montmorency, Craon, Harcourt, and Ligny. Beſides theſe noblemen, it was agreed, by the eighteenth article, that John, three months after he had recovered his liberty, ſhould deliver, as hoſtages, forty-two citizens, that is, four citizens of Paris, and two from each of the following towns—Rouen, Saint Omer, Arras, Amiens, Beauvais, Lille, Douay, Tournay, Rheims, Chalons, Troyes, Chartres, Touloufe, Lyons, Orleans, Compiegne, Caen, Tours, and the Bourges. In return for theſe important conceſſions, Edward agreed to reſign his claim to the French crown, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, Touraine and Anjou, which had been poſſeſſed by his anceſtors, as well as to the ſovereignty of Brittany. By the thirty-ſecond article, John renounced his alliance with the Scots, and Edward diſſolved his confederacy with the Flemings. By the twenty-firſt it was ſtipulated, that the diſputes relative to the ſucceſſion of Brittany, between the houſes of Blois and Mountfort, ſhould be left to the deciſion of arbiters, to be appointed by the two kings; but, ſhould every attempt to promote an amicable termination of them fail, either party was left at liberty to eſtabliſh his claims as he could, and his friends were allowed to aſſiſt him*. By the twelfth article of the treaty, it was ſettled, that the two kings ſhould agree between themſelves on the time and place for making their reciprocal renunciations.

Six Engliſh knights, deputed by Edward and the prince of Wales, repaired to Paris the day after the concluſion of the treaty†, to procure the regent's ratification of it. That prince ſent for the provoſt of the merchants, and the principal citizens of Paris, in whoſe preſence he ordered all the articles of peace to be read by John Deſmares; after which William de Melun, archbiſhop of Sens, celebrated maſs, in the hotel de Sens, where the regent reſided. During the celebration, the prince left his oratory; and, walking up to the altar, placed one hand on the miſſal, and the other on the holy ſacrament, and ſwore, in preſence of the Engliſh knights, to obſerve, inviolably, all the conditions of the treaty. As ſoon as he had taken the oath, an officer opened one of the windows of the duke's apartment, and announced the news of the peace to the people, who were aſſembled in the court-yard. The regent then went to the cathedral to return thanks to God for the reſtoration of tranquillity.

The prince of Wales took a ſimilar oath, in the cathedral at Louvres, in preſence of ſix deputies from the regent. After the treaty had received this confirmation, Edward and his ſon returned to England. On the eighth of July the king of France was brought over to Calais, whither Edward, alſo, ſoon after repaired; and there both princes ſolemnly ratified the treaty, on the twenty-fourth of October. Next day, John ſet out for Boulogne, and Edward accompanied him to the diſtance of a mile from Calais, where they parted with the moſt cordial profeſſions of mutual amity and eſteem. The regent had, in the mean time, begun to levy the ſubſidies which had been granted for paying the king's ranſom. The city of Paris ſupplied eight thouſand florins of gold for its part of the firſt payment, and opened a loan for one hundred thouſand nobles, which was filled by the nobility, clergy, and opulent citizens.

The ſame day on which the treaty of Bretigny was confirmed at Calais, an accommodation was concluded, through the mediation of Edward, with the king of Navarre, in conſequence of which John granted a general amneſty, as well to Charles the Bad, as to all his adherents. The king of Navarre was allowed the privilege of naming three hundred of his partiſans, to whom particular letters of grace were to be accorded by the French chancery, including a pardon for every ſpecies of crime*. The firſt on his liſt was Robert le Coq, biſhop of Laon, a prelate who merited the ſevereſt puniſhment which the offended laws of his country could inflict; though John had conſented to pardon him, he very properly inſiſted that his kingdom ſhould no longer be ſubject to the intrigues of ſuch a turbulent prieſt; Le Coq, therefore, retired into Spain, where he was promoted to the biſhopric of Calahorra. Charles the Bad engaged to ſwear fealty to the king, on condition of receiving twelve perſons of different diſtinction, as hoſtages for his ſafety. The places occupied by the Engliſh, in the dominions of the king of Navarre, were to be reſtored, and, if any one ſhould wage war againſt that monarch, John promiſed to obſerve a a ſtrict neutrality. All the articles, agreed upon by the duke of Normandy and queen Blanche, were confirmed by the preſent treaty, which was ratified by the oaths of Edward and John, in the preſence of the duke of Orleans, the biſhop of Terouane, the count of Tancarville, and the other plenipotentiaries of the French monarch, and of Philip of Navarre, the biſhop of Avranches, the captal de Buche, and the lord of Pecquigny, who attended on the part of Charles the Bad.

After a captivity of four years, John once more entered his capital, on the thirteenth of December. On this occaſion, the Pariſians ſeemed to have forgotten their paſt misfortunes; the preſence of their ſovereign eraſed them from their memory. The ſtreets and ſquares, through which he paſſed, were hung with tapeſtry, while the people were regaled with wine that flowed from numerous fountains. Before he re-aſſumed the reins of government, he confirmed all the acts of ſovereignty performed by the regent during his abſence from the kingdom*. This confirmation, which was then deemed indiſpenſably neceſſary, ſhews the material difference there was between a regency adminiſtered during the abſence or illneſs of the ſovereign and that which takes place during a minority. In the laſt caſe, the ratification of the prince, when he comes of age, is not deemed neceſſary; becauſe, being called to the government of the ſtate by the laws of the realm, thoſe ſame laws are ſuppoſed to confirm every act of power which he performs in conſequence of the authority delegated to him.

The miſery to which the people were reduced by the war, and by inteſtine commotions, rendered the execution of the articles of peace extremely burdenſome; it was ſcarcely poſſible to procure money for the payment of the king's ranſom. The pope had granted two tenths of the revenues of the clergy; moſt of the large towns had taxed themſelves; many of the adminiſtrators of the finances had been ſeized and impriſoned with a view to extort money from them; and, in ſhort, neceſſity had impelled the adoption of almoſt every expedient that could be thought of. The adulteration of the coin was the only reſource left unemployed at this juncture, when it would have been more excuſable than at any other period. It will, doubtleſs, appear ſtrange, that, ſo far from having recourſe to this expedient, a new coinage was iſſued, in weight and purity ſuperior to the laſt†; but the tenths and other impoſts were to be paid with this money; and the king of England would probably have refuſed it for the ranſom, had it been reduced below the proper ſtandard.

The Jews thought this was a favourable opportunity to procure their recal. Exiled and proſcribed in the preceding reigns, and even labouring under a ſimilar diſgrace ſince the acceſſion of the preſent monarch‡, their reſidence in the kingdom had rather been connived at than tolerated. During the king's captivity they had made ſeveral propoſals to the regent, who evinced a diſpoſition to grant them a favour which they offered to purchaſe at a very high price. Soon after his releaſe, John publiſhed a declaration, by which he permitted them to return, and to remain in the kingdom for twenty years§. Letters were annexed to the declaration, committing the care and conſervation of their privileges to the count d'Etampes, a prince of the blood, of the branch of Evreux. Beſides the ſum which this perſecuted people—who, though generally conſidered as outcaſts of ſociety, exert their induſtry with ſucceſs in the acquiſition of wealth—advanced for the permiſſion to return, every maſter of a family paid twelve Florentine florins of gold on his entrance into the kingdom, and ſix florins yearly for the liberty of reſiding there; and a general poll-tax was alſo levied on them of one florin per head. The king, thinking it neceſſary to put ſome check on their avarice, and to moderate the exorbitant intereſt which they exacted from his ſubjects, they were forbidden, in future, to take more than four deniers per livre, per week; ſuch flagrant uſury (by which the intereſt would, in fourteen months, amount to as much as the principal) authoriſed by an edict from the throne, affords a ſtrong proof of the wretched ſtate to which the kingdom was, at this period, reduced.

Six times had the Jews been baniſhed the kingdom; and, under Charles the Sixth, a ſeventh ſentence of baniſhment was iſſued againſt them; they ſtill, however, continued to be privately tolerated, though ſubject to inceſſant perſecutions, till the year 1615, when they were finally and abſolutely proſcribed by Lewis the Thirteenth. The Jews of Metz were alone excepted from the general proſcription. It appears to have been a matter of doubt whether this people were moſt uſeful or moſt dangerous to the nation. Their uſurious exactions were, in ſome meaſure, counterbalanced by their ſkill in the management of commerical affairs. The French, at this time, wholly neglected trade, and every occupation which called for exertions of induſtry; while they encouraged a taſte for awkward luxury, and unrefined diſſipation. The Jews enabled them to gratify this taſte by ſupplying them with money; and, by thus adminiſtering to their paſſions, accelerated their ruin. Every thing relating to the finances was imperfectly underſtood in France, which afforded an opportunity to the Jews, who were ſkilful calculators, and could, in an inſtant, perceive the advantages to be derived from any propoſal to purchaſe the revenues of the crown, to acquire great and rapid fortunes. They were the only bankers and money-lenders in the kingdom, till the Lombards came to partake with them thoſe lucrative profeſſions. But as trade encreaſed this deſcription of perſons encreaſed in proportion, and every country in Europe now abounds with native uſurers, equally rapacious and more dangerous than the unfortunate Jews.

The king, immediately after his return, began to take proper meaſures for fulfilling the obligations he had recently contracted. His miniſters, whoſe ſentiments of honour were leſs refined than his own, ſtrenuouſly urged him to elude the execution of a treaty ſo diſadvantageous to France. But John replied—"that though honour and good faith were baniſhed from every other place, "they ought always to find an aſylum in the boſom of princes;" a ſentiment which ſhowed him worthy his elevated ſtation, and which ought to be engraven in indelible characters, on every throne! Many of the French governors, however, ſtill refuſed, in oppoſition to the orders of their ſovereign, to evacuate the places entruſted to their command. The affection of the people for their king, which had long lain dormant, now burſt forth with renovated vigour;

the inhabitants of the provinces, ceded by the late treaty, and particularly the heads of many illuſtrious families, long refuſed to acknowledge the authority of the Engliſh monarch; and the moſt urgent ſolicitations and remonſtrances of John were neceſſary to perſuade them to ſacrifice their private inclinations to the public tranquillity.

It was at this time that John beſtowed the hand of his daughter on Iſabella on John Galeas Viſconti, ſon to the duke of Milan; the princeſs received as a dower the county of Sommieres in Languedoc, with an annuity of three thouſand livres*; the former was afterwards exchanged by Galeas for the county of Vertus, this is all we know, from authentic records, of the circumſtances of this marriage, which ſeveral hiſtorians have nevertheleſs preſumed to aſcribe to motives of avarice in the king, who bartered, they ſay, the hand of his daughter for a ſum of money, which he wanted to diſcharge a part of his ranſom. But aſſertions of this nature, unſupported by proof, muſt be rejected as calumnies, and the whole tenor of John's conduct ſerves to exculpate him from an imputation of ſo hienous a nature.

A. D. 1361.] But, while the king was careful to fulfil to the utmoſt the terms of the treaty of Bretigny, Edward is accuſed, by the French hiſtorians, of neglecting to enforce the poſitive orders he had given to his governors, to reſtore the places of which they were in poſſeſſion†; the ceſſion of which, they aver, John was compelled to purchaſe, at the expenſe of two millions of livers. Be that as it may, he at length obtained them. The kingdom, however, far from having recovered that tranquillity which it was expected the treaty would produce, was now expoſed to more ſerious calamities than during the war with England. The many military adventurers who had followed the ſtandard of Edward, being diſperſed in the ſeveral provinces, and poſſeſſed of ſtrong holds, refuſed to lay down their arms, or relinquiſh a courſe of life, to which they were now accuſtomed, and by which alone they could gain a ſubſiſtence‡. They aſſociated themſelves with the banditti, who were already enured to the habits of rapine and violence; and who, as we before have had occaſion to obſerve, aſſumed the name of the companies and companions, and became a terror to all the peaceable inhabitants.

Theſe new enemies firſt entered Champagne and Burgundy, where they were guilty of the moſt cruel exceſſes. They ſeized the caſtle of Genville, which they gave up, on receiving a hundred thouſand livers, after they had ravaged the environs of Verdun, Toul, and Langres, and levied contributions on the inhabitants. Beſancon, Dijon, and Beaune, experienced a ſimilar treatment; and their numbers having increaſed to ſixteen thouſand, they reſolved to attempt ſome enterpriſe of importance. The riches of the holy ſee induced them to bend their courſe towards the city of Avignon; directing their march through the Maconnois and the Comtat. Theſe provinces, being expoſed to the moſt dreadful depredations, addreſſed their complaints to the king's council; and France was threatened with a general deſolation, unleſs the progreſs of this banditti was ſpeedily checked.

But the difficulty of finding money and troops threw the government into the utmoſt conſternation. On this emergency the king had recourſe to James of Burbon, who was employed in ſurrendering to lord Chandos, whom Edward had appointed his lieutenant, the different places that were to be reſtored to England. This nobleman was highly eſteemed by his countrymen for the many amiable qualities he poſſeſſed; ſo that he had no ſooner ſignified the orders he had received from the king, than all the gentlemen of the neighbouring provinces flocked to his ſtandard. Followed by this choſen band he marched through the Lyonnois to the province of Foreſt, the count of which, who was recently dead, had married his ſiſter. Being joined by his nephews, and his army daily increaſing, he haſtened foward in purſuit of the enemy, who were then employed in ravaging the environs of Chalons-upon-Saone. The companies being appriſed of the approach of the French, called a council to decide on the propriety of waiting for them; and, having counted their troops, which were found to amount to ſixteen thouſand men, they determined to riſk an action. "If fortune favours us," ſaid they, "we ſhall all be enriched for a long "time, not only from the priſoners we ſhall take in the action, but from the "terror we ſhall inſpire, which will prevent any farther oppoſition;—if we "are beaten, we know the worſt."

As ſoon as they had taken this reſolution, they advanced to meet the French army. Quitting the Maconnois, and traverſing a part of the provinces of Foreſt and the Beaujolois*, which they laid waſte; they reduced the caſtle of Brignais, in the Lyonnois, ſituated on the ſmall river of that name, about three leagues from the Rhone. When James of Burbon heard they were ſo near him, he collected his troops, and offered them battle. Theſe companies, compoſed chiefly of veteran ſoldiers, and experienced leaders, had taken poſt on a hill, at the foot of which, though ſtrongly fortified by nature, they had thrown up ſome entrenchments that conſiderably encreaſed the difficulty of approaching it. They had alſo recourſe to a ſtratagem, by concealing their beſt-appointed troops behind the hill, ſo that it was impoſſible to form any juſt eſtimation of their ſtrength. This manœuvre had the deſired effect; the officers who were ſent to reconnoitre, brought word to James of Bourbon, that they did not amount to more than ſix thouſand men, all badly armed. In conſequence of this falſe report it was reſolved to force their intrenchments; the attack was conducted with ſpirit, but the French had no ſooner ſurmounted the difficulties that preſented themſelves at the foot of the hill, than the troops that were concealed behind it ruſhed forward, and, in a ſhort time, threw them into confuſion; the victory was complete; moſt of the noblemen, in the French army were either killed, taken or wounded; among the laſt was James of Bourbon, who died of his wounds, three days after the action; his ſon, Peter of Bourbon, did not long ſurvive him; and his nephew, the young count of Foreſt, alſo loſt his life. Regnaut de Forez, paternal uncle to the count; the count of Uſez, Robert de Beaujeu, and Lewis de Chalons, were made priſoners. Such was the event of the battle of Brignais, the loſs of which was more ſenſibly felt at this calamitous period, than it would have been at any other time.

After the victory, the companies continued to pillage, and ranſome the provinces of Lyons, Foreſt, and Beaujolois. One part of them, under the conduct of Seguin de Badefol, a gentleman of Navarre, took poſſeſſion of the fortreſs of Ence, about a league from Lyons; while the reſt, having appointed a leader, who ſtiled himſelf the friend of God, and the enemy of the whole world, renewed their firſt deſign of paying a viſit to the pope and cardinals. They took by ſurpriſe the town of Pont-Saint-Eſprit, which they pillaged, after maſſacring the greater part of the inhabitants, and committing the moſt dreadful diſorders. From this place they carried their incurſions to the gates of Avignon, laying waſte all the intermediate country.

When the news of the defeat at Brignais was received in France, a numerous band of adventurers, of different nations, the refuſe of Edward's army, evacuated the towns they had hitherto refuſed to ſurrender, and haſtened to join the companies. The reduction of Avignon, and the pillage of the whole country of Provence, were the objects they had in view. Theſe banditti, ſtimulated by the hopes of plunder, and familiariſed with every ſpecies of crime, committed the moſt horrid diſorders. They raviſhed the women, whether young or old, without diſtinction of age or condition, while they maſſacred the men and children;—their fury knew no bounds. Houſes and churches were levelled with the ground, and ſuch of their contents as could not be carried away, were conſigned to the flames. An emulation in vice prevailed among them; and the moſt cruel and moſt impious were holden in the higheſt eſtimation.

The pope and his court were thrown in the greateſt conſternation; in vain had his holineſs recourſe to his ſpiritual arms; the thunders of the church were of little avail with men who had ſet all kind of religion at defiance. A cruſade was preached, and abſolution promiſed by the pope to all who would take up arms in his defence. The cardinal of Oſbia was appointed chief of the cruſaders, and Carpentras was fixed upon as the place of rendezvous; where ſuch as wiſhed to ſave their ſouls, by obtaining a general remiſſion of their ſins, repaired to enliſt under the banners of the holy ſee. But the zeal of new cruſaders ſpeedily abated when they found that the cardinal could only pay them with indulgences: moſt of them returned home, ſome went into Lombardy, and not a few joined the companies.

Innocent and the prelates of his court were at a loſs how to avert the ſtorm that threatened them, when the marquis of Montferrat offered, for the payment of a conſiderable ſum, to draw off the objects of their fears into Italy, where he was engaged in a war with the duke of Milan. He accordingly negociated an accommodation with the companies, who agreed to follow him, on condition of receiving ſixty thouſand florins, and abſolution for their ſins, which the pope moſt cheerfully granted. The marquis found them of great ſervice to him, in the reduction of ſeveral towns and fortreſſes which he took from the enemy.

But, though the departure of theſe adventurers afforded ſome conſolation to the French, there ſtill remained ſufficient to haraſs the kingdom with their depredations*. Seguin de Badſol, after he had laid waſte the Lyonnois, entered Auvergne, where he took Brionde, which he retained upwards of a year, during which, he ravaged the circumjacent country, nor could he be induced to evacuate it, till he had been paid the ſum of one hundred thouſand florins. Loaded with the ſpoils of the kingdom, this leader of banditti, retired into Guienne with immenſe riches. On his evacuation of Brionde, he had engaged never more to bear arms againſt France; but the king of Navarre, who was now forming new projects of hoſtility, endeavoured, ſoon after, to allure him into his ſervice, by offering to give him a conſiderable property in land. Tempted by his offers, Seguin conſented to the propoſals of Charles the Bad; the only difficulty that occurred between them was this—the king inſiſted that the lands he meant to confer on him ſhould be in Normandy, and the other would have them in Navarre. But, as both of them were obſtinate, this difficulty could not be ſurmounted; and, as Seguin was acquainted with the ſecret intention of Charles, that prince determined to get red of him. When he had adopted this reſolution, he invited him to dinner, having previouſly taken the precaution to order one of his ſervants to place before him a diſh of preſerved oranges and pears: Charles himſelf preſented the fruit to Seguin, and boaſted of its excellence; but he had not long taſted them when he fell from his ſeat, and was ſeized with the moſt excrutiating pains. The king of Navarre, without any appearance of confuſion, coolly ordered him to be carried home, where he died in a few days.

The attempts to reconcile the rival houſes of Montfort and Blois, by propoſing a diviſion of the duchy of Brittany, had proved unſucceſsful: and war was on the point of breaking out, with renovated vigour, when the humane and friendly interference of the duke of Lancaſter produced a truce, which was afterwards prolonged till Michaelmas, 1363. Had that nobleman lived, a final accommodation might, perhaps, have been effected; but he was unfortunately taken off, ſoon after the peace of Bretigny, by a dreadful peſtilence which prevailed in London: his death was univerſally lamented by the people, who juſtly paid him that tribute of reſpect and eſteem which his numerous virtues ſo richly deſerved.

Some time after his return from England, the king invited the celebrated Bertrand du Gueſclin, a knight of Brittany, to enter his ſervice, and Bertrand accepted his invitation, and ſpoke to him with that frankneſs and candour which he diſplayed on all occaſions. "Sire," ſaid he, "war is my profeſſion; I have "obtained the friendſhip of many brave and worthy knights, my countrymen; "if you will enable me to maintain them, they will do you loyal ſervice." "I "deſire no other teſtimony of their valour than your own," replied the king; "I give you the command of an hundred lances, by which means you will "have it in your power to provide for them*." Du Gueſclin compoſed his company of gentlemen of Brittany, moſt of them his relations or friends, and all men of valour: they accompanied him in every expedition.

Several adventurers from Brittany, expecting the ſame honours as thoſe conferred on du Gueſclin, entered France, and committed depredations on Poitou, Anjou, and other provinces. The government refuſed to remedy theſe diſorders, and ſeemed to encourage them. When the citizens of Paris complained to the council, that theſe depredations extended even to the gates of the capital, they were forbidden to interfere, and told to conduct their own affairs as well as they could. In theſe diſaſtrous times, every thing ſeemed to conſpire againſt the happineſs of the people.

A variety of taxes had been impoſed, more burdenſome to the people than profitable to the ſtate. The want of ſimplification in the mode of collecting them gave riſe to heavy expences; to avoid which the king aboliſhed them all, and ſubſtituted in their place a tax of twelve deneirs per livre on all merchandiſe; a duty upon ſalt, of one-fifth of its price; and one on wines and other liquors of a thirteenth. Theſe taxes were farmed out to the Jews and Lombards. The king revoked all the grants of crown-lands, made ſince the reign of Philip the Fair, except the appanages of the princes of the blood, and the donations to the church.

While the French were lamenting the diſmemberment of their empire, by the loſs of thoſe provinces that were ceded by the treaty of Bretigny, their hopes were ſuddenly revived by the unexpected acquiſition of Burgundy. The young duke of Burgundy, Philip de Rouvre, died in the ſpring of 1361, in his ſixteenth year. He was one of the hoſtages delivered to Edward, who had permitted him to return to France. He had eſpouſed Margaret, daughter and heireſs to Lewis, count of Flanders; but the tender age of both parties had hitherto prevented the conſummation of the marriage.

This prince was ſon to Philip of Burgundy, who was killed at the ſiege of Aiguillon, in 1316; and whoſe widow, Jane of Burgundy, married king John. Eudes, duke of Burgundy, grandfather to Philip de Rouvre, ſurvived his ſon three years. Eudes had acquired, by his marriage with Jane of France, the counties of Artois and Burgundy, and the lordſhip of Salins. His ſon Philip married Jane of Boulogne, heireſs to William the Third, count of Boulogne and Auvergne. By theſe marriages, Philip de Rouvre inherited the firſt ſucceſſion in Europe, in point of opulence and extent, after the ſovereign princes. In him ended the firſt royal branch of Burgundy.

Philip, on his return from England, had made a will, by which he divided the ſucceſſion of his domains into three parts. Boulogne and Auvergne were bequeathed to John of Boulogne, uncle to queen Jane, the young duke's mother; Burgundy and Artois devolved to Margaret of Flanders; and the duchy of Burgundy, reverted to king John. But for the will left by Philip, the king of France's right might have been conteſted by the king of Navarre, whoſe grandmother, Margaret of Burgundy, was ſiſter to Eudes, and the elder ſiſter too; but to this pretenſion John oppoſed the advantage he had over the king of Navarre, of a degree of proximity, as huſband to Jane of Burgundy. The king took poſſeſſion of Burgundy, in virtue of his right of proximity, as he declared in the letters by which he re-annexed that province to the crown*. In thoſe letters, he enjoined his ſon and ſucceſſors never more to detach from the royal domains the provinces of Toulouſe, Champagne, Brie, and Normandy.

The king of Navarre did not fail to advance his claims, as being related to Philip de Rouvre; and he ſent deputies to demand juſtice from the king, who offered to refer the deciſion of the matter to the pope. Charles the Bad wiſhed to open a negociation, in the hope of embarraſſing the court, and of procuring ſome compenſation; but all his meaſures proved fruitleſs. Finding that there was no proſpect of ſucceſs, he was obliged to deſiſt; and this pretended refuſal to do him juſtice afterwards ſerved as a pretext to juſtify a war which, even now, he was ſecretly preparing.

A. D. 1362.] Immediately after the re-annexation of Burgundy, the king repaired thither in perſon, in order to take poſſeſſion of the province. He next repaired to Avignon, to perſuade the pope to oppoſe the projected marriage of Edmund, earl of Cambridge, ſon to the king of England, with Margaret of Flanders, widow to Philip de Rouvre, by which Edward would have acquired a farther extenſion of territory in the vicinity of France. In accompliſhing this object, John diſplayed a degree of political prudence which he ſeldom exerted; but, ſeduced by the example of the king of Cyprus, he received the croſs from the ſovereign pontiff, and engaged in two years, to march to the relief of the chriſtians in Paleſtine; a project which would have effectually completed the ruin of his kingdom.

A. D. 1363.] Edward, in the mean time, finding his new ſubjects on the continent ſtill averſe to the Engliſh government, placed them under the immediate command of the prince of Wales. The prince had lately married, by virtue of papal diſpenſation, his couſin Jane, daughter and ſole heireſs of Edmund Plantagenet, earl of Kent: when his father had conveyed to him the county of Poitou, with all the provinces in his poſſeſſion, from thence to the Pyrenees; Edward, now further inveſted him with the dignity of prince of Aquitaine, accompanied by a grant of part of Gaſcony, and of all other territories which he enjoyed in France, ſubject to feudal homage, and an annual tribute of an ounce of gold.

The prince of Wales fixed his reſidence at Bourdeaux, where he arrived in February, 1363. The nobles of that country immediately took the oath of fealty; and, by an equitable adminiſtration, he conciliated the affections of the people.

The dukes of Orleans, Anjou, Berry, and Bourbon, who had been delivered as hoſtages to Edward, gave him to underſtand, that, if removed to Calais, they might be able to defeat thoſe obſtructions which delayed the ſurrender of certain places, that had been ceded by the treaty of Bretigny. The king of England exacted from them ſuch terms as he thought would promote the object which they had engaged to accompliſh. He promiſed to releaſe them entirely, on condition, that, before the firſt of November, he ſhould receive two hundred thouſand florins, together with the territory of Belleville, and the county of Gaurre; that, in the mean time, the princes ſhould deliver to him, as a pledge, certain caſtles, with all the eſtates poſſeſſed by the duke of Orleans, in Poitou and Xaintonge, and the diſtrict of Beaurayn, in Ponthieu; and that, in caſe they ſhould fail to procure the ſurrender of Belleville and Gaure, they ſhould return to London, but the lands given as a pledge ſhould remain to Edward. The princes complying with theſe terms, were conveyed to Calais.

This convention had been ſigned during John's reſidence at Avignon. He confirmed it, but ſent it to the dauphin, whom he had appointed his lieutenant during his abſence. That prince, having taken the advice of the prelates, nobles, and members of his council, repreſented to his father, that it was impoſſible to accept a treaty ſo prejudicial to France, with the only view of procuring the liberation of the princes, who ought already to have been releaſed. This refuſal prevented the princes from complying with the terms of the convention. The duke of Anjou broke his parole, and eſcaped to Paris.

When the king was informed of his ſon's conduct, he reproved him, and reſolved to repair to England in perſon, to concert meaſures with Edward for the accompliſhing of the treaty. In vain did his miniſters repreſent to him the danger and imprudence of ſuch a ſtep*; he remained ſteady to his purpoſe. At this juncture, John inveſted his ſon Philip with the duchy and county of Burgundy.

The king, after he had put Philip in poſſeſſion of his new appanage, repaired to Amiens, where he had convened an aſſemble of the ſtates general of the Langue d'Oyl, as well for the purpoſe of regulating the mode of collecting the impoſt, that had been granted for the payment of his ranſom, as for the abolition of various abuſes that had crept into the kingdom, during the late calamities†. All princes, noblemen, towns, and communities were forbidden to levy, in future, any arbitrary tolls or duties, on goods and merchandiſe paſſing through their reſpective territories. This prohibition had become highly neceſſary, ſince all internal commerce was nearly deſtroyed, from the goods being liable to be ſtopped at every town, and at every bridge. As the king of Navarre was evidently preparing for hoſtilities, all private wars were forbidden throughout the kingdom. Soon after the prorogation of the ſtates, John repaired to London, where he arrived about Chriſtmas, 1363, and was received by Edward, and the nobility of England, with all the reſpect that was due to his rank and character.

But, though the motive which induced the king to quit his dominions was highly laudable, yet his preſence was never more neceſſary than at this period. He had been long appriſed of the hoſtile deſign of Charles the Bad. The captal de Buche, on whom the king of Navarre had conferred the title of his lieutenant, had engaged ſeveral of the companies in his ſervice, entered Touraine, and directed his courſe towards Normandy. His officers publicly boaſted that they were going to wage war with the king of France. The companies, which were left in Languedoc, hoiſted the ſtandard of Navarre, and commenced hoſtilities in the name of Charles the Bad. The irruption was ſuſpended by the illneſs of the captal, during which, a part of his troops diſbanded; but the king of Navarre purſued his plans with unremitting vigour.

A. D. 1364.] The duke of Normandy, who acted as lieutenant-general of the kingdom in the abſence of his father, did not behold with tranquillity the motions of Charles. He ſent John de Chalons, count of Auxerre, and Bertrand du Gueſclin, to attack the places belonging to the king of Navarre in Normandy‡. Du Gueſclin took the town of Mantes by ſtratagem, laid ſiege to the

And, it is certain, that but a ſmall portion of the ranſom had yet been paid; and alſo, as it appears from this very convention, that all the places agreed to be ceded had not yet been ſurrendered.

caſtle, and carried it by aſſault. Meulan being taken ſoon after, the navigation of the Seine, below Paris, was ſecured.

On the eighth of April, 1364, the day on which du Gueſclin took Mantes, John died, at London, in the Savoy; in the forty-ſixth year of his age*, and fifteenth of his reign.

John, at the commencement of his reign, was violent, impeteous and vindictive; the ſplendour of his power ſeems for a while to have dazzled his judgment; and his father had ſet him examples of cruelty and injuſtice which he was but too ready to follow. His diſpoſition experienced a moſt ſalutary change; and, during the latter years of his reign, he was meek, humble, and humane. His virtues ſhone forth in all their native luſtre; generous, frank, liberal, and pious; heroically brave; inviolably faithful to his word; conſtant in his attachment; the friend, in ſhort, of honour, truth, and juſtice. His conduct met its due reward, in the affection of his ſubjects, and the eſteem and reſpect of his enemies.

The funeral of John was celebrated with great ſplendour and ſolemnity by the Engliſh. The body was afterwards conveyed to France, and interred, with thoſe of his predeceſſors, in the abbey of St. Denis. John had, by his firſt wife, Bonne of Bohemia, four ſons and four daughters; Charles, who ſucceeded him in the throne; Lewis, duke of Anjou; John, duke of Berry; Philip, duke of Burgundy; Jane, queen of Navarre; Mary, ducheſs of Bar; Iſabella, wife of Galeas Viſconti; and Margaret, a nun at Poiſſy.

John was fond of literature, and extended his protection and bounty to its profeſſors†. He had cauſed a great part of the Bible and ſeveral other pious works, to be tranſlated into French. The firſt tranſlation of the decades of Livy into French was undertaken at his command. Saluſt, Lucan, and the commentaries of Cæſar were alſo tranſlated during this reign.

CHARLES,

SURNAMED THE WISE.

A. D. 1364.] BEFORE we enter on the events of the preſent reign, it may not be amiſs to take a ſlight view of the political and civil government of the kingdom. The principal ſtrength of the French armies conſiſted in their cavalry. Every ſoldier, by profeſſion, fought on horſeback. The knights were held in the higheſt eſteem: beſides all poſts in the army, and in adminiſtration, they held the principal places in the courts of law. Every poſſible honour was paid them; all games, plays, and feſtivals, had ſome relation to their inſtitution. Their privileges were innumerable, nor could they be degraded from their dignity, unleſs for ſome act of infamy. Even a knight who had taken holy orders was permitted to marry.

The ſpirit of chivalry aroſe from the ſtate of ſociety at this period. The feudal ſtate conſiſted of perpetual war, rapine, and anarchy. The weak and unarmed were continually expoſed to inſults or injuries. The power of the ſovereign was too limited to prevent theſe wrongs; and the adminiſtration of juſtice was too feeble to redreſs them. There was almoſt no protection againſt violence and oppreſſion, but what the valour and generoſity of individuals afforded. The ſpirit of enterpriſe which prompted ſo many gentlemen to take arms in defence of the oppreſſed pilgrims in Paleſtine, incited others to declare themſelves the patrons and avengers of injured innocence at home. When the final reduction of the Holy Land, under the dominion of infidels, put an end to theſe foreign expeditions, the latter was the only employment left for the activity and courage of adventurers. To check the inſolence of overgrown oppreſſors; to ſuccour the diſtreſſed; to reſcue the helpleſs from captivity; to protect, or to avenge women, orphans, and eccleſiaſtics, who could not bear arms in their own defence; to redreſs wrongs, and to remove grievances; were deemed acts of the higheſt proweſs and merit. Valour, humanity, courteſy, juſtice, and honour, were the characteriſtic qualities of chivalry. To theſe were added religion, which mingled itſelf with every paſſion and inſtitution during the middle ages; and, by infuſing a large proportion of enthuſiaſtic zeal, carried them to romantic exceſs. Men were trained to knighthood by a long previous diſcipline; they were admitted into the order by ſolemnities devout and pompous; every perſon of noble birth courted that honour; it was deemed a diſtinction ſuperior to royalty; and monarchs were proud to receive it from the hands of private gentlemen*.

The faults of knights were puniſhed with greater ſeverity than thoſe of other men. If they chanced to become the objects of judicial reprehenſion, more heavy fines were impoſed on them than on ſimple eſquires. Their military ſervices were double†. Ever in action, their lives ſeemed to be one continual combat; they engaged in any enterpriſe either uſeful or honourable; and the opportunities that occurred for ſignaliſing their courage, though frequent, were yet inſufficient to ſatisfy their thirſt for glory.

This inſtitution, in which valour, gallantry, and religion, were blended, was adapted to the taſte and genius of martial nobles; and its effects were ſoon viſible in their manners. War was carried on with leſs ſeverity, when humanity came to be deemed the ornament of knighthood. Some exceptions, indeed, will occur to this obſervation, in the military tranſactions of the times which we are delineating; but ſtill, in its general application, it will be found to be juſt. More gentle and poliſhed manners were introduced, when courteſy was recommended as the moſt amiable of knightly virtues. Violence and oppreſſion deereaſed, when it was eſteemed meritorious to check and to puniſh them. A ſcrupulous adherence to truth, with the moſt religious attention to fulfil every engagement, became the diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic of a gentleman; becauſe chivalry was regarded as the ſchool of honour, and inculcated the moſt delicate ſenſibility with reſpect to that point. Perhaps, the humanity which often accompanies operations of war, the refinements of gallantry, and the point of honour, the three chief circumſtances which diſtinguiſh modern from ancient manners, may be aſcribed, in a great meaſure, to this inſtitution. The ſentiments which chivalry inſpired had a powerful influence on manners and conduct during the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries. They were ſo deeply rooted, that they continued to operate after the vigour and reputation of the inſtitution itſelf began to decline*.

But though ſuch were the political and permanent effects of the ſpirit of chivalry, yet, long before the completion of that period during which its beneficial conſequences were moſt ſenſibly felt, many abuſes had crept into the inſtitution and many local and temporary inconveniences were experienced from it. One principal cauſe of its degradation and decline, was the ignorance to which its profeſſors habituated themſelves. The knights, in the primitive purity of their order, were compelled to ſtudy letters as well as arms; unfortunately, the former part of their education became inſenſibly neglected, and military exerciſes were ſuffered to form their only occupation. The moſt learned of them could ſcarcely read; any degree of literary knowledge was deemed incompatible with the character of a gentleman; and almoſt conſidered as a certain indication of plebianiſm. This neglect was productive of imprudence and indocility; and knights were ſoon led to reject all reſtraint, but what was impoſed on them by the conventional laws of their fraternity. Their religion degenerated into ſuperſtitious practices, degrading in their nature, and often prejudicial in their effects.

Diſſipation, alike produced by the extremes of ignorance and refinement, though not in an equal degree, ruined the fortunes of the knights, to repair which they had recourſe to every expedient not abſolutely repugnant to the rules of chivalry. A ſpirit of plunder thence became prevalent; and courage, which ſhould only proceed from principles of honour, was excited by avidity of gain.

* Robertſon.

Another cauſe of the decline of chivalry, was a deviation from its original inſtitution, in the facility with which knights came to be created, and in the numbers that by this means gained admiſſion into the order. It became cuſtomary to confer the honour of knighthood, in the field of battle, before the action began.

Theſe frequent abuſes had already rendered too common that title, which, in order to preſerve its original luſtre, ſhould have been beſtowed with circumſpection. The inſtitution of the order of the Star, conferred on whole cities, ſuch as Paris and Rochelle, and proſtituted to farce-players, buffoons, and minſtrels, greatly diminiſhed the ſplendour of knighthood in France.

One of the greateſt vices of chivalry was, the cuſtom introduced of making private excurſions into foreign countries, for the purpoſe of ſignaliſing their valour. It was chiefly ſuch as were newly admitted that ſallied forth in queſt of adventures. The avowed object of theſe knights-errant, whoſe wild exploits have been treated with proper ridicule, was, to protect innocence, to redreſs wrongs, and particularly to devote themſelves to the ſervice of the ladies. The ſuperior beauty of their miſtreſſes they offered to maintain againſt all ſuch as dared to diſpute it. Among theſe pilgrims, many made no ſcruple to profit by the reſpect in which their profeſſion was held. The hope of booty proved a powerful incitement to their courage. The horſes, arms, and whole ſpoils of the vanquiſhed became the prey of the victors. Thus ſtimulated, many gentlemen turned highwaymen, levied contributions on the inhabitants of the country, and plundered travellers. A few ſoldiers of fortune, and people of the lower claſs, in imitation of their ſuperiors, aſſumed the maſk, and encaſed themſelves with iron, in violation of the laws of chivalry, which forbade ſuch armour to all but knights. Theſe new plunderers formed aſſociations among themſelves, and ſoon became ſo formidable, that monarchs were forced to purchaſe their ſervices or forbearance. The honour of knighthood could not be refuſed to men who had ſuch means of enforcing reſpect.

The habits of independence in which the knights were educated, rendered them more fit for ſingle combats than for general actions, were ſucceſs depends as much on the unanimous co-operation of the whole, as on the courage of individuals. In battle, their valour was exerted leſs with the view to decide the victory in favour of their own party, than with that of achieving ſome ſignal exploit, or of taking ſome illuſtrious priſoner. To diſplay their courage, or to encreaſe their fortune, was then their only object. They were often ſeen to quit the ranks in order to attack ſome warrior more conſpicuous than the reſt; and, if they made him ſurrender, they immediately diſappeared, through fear of loſing their prey. To the perpetual diſorders occaſioned by theſe irregular motions muſt be added the confuſion cauſed by the eſquires who accompanied their maſters in the field, as quiet ſpectators of the battle, in order to carry their arms, to hold their horſes, and to aſſiſt them in remounting whenever they were unhorſed. When an army thus encumbered was once broken, the confuſion muſt have been dreadful, and an attempt to rally them fruitleſs.

The Engliſh had, in theſe reſpects, no advantage over the French, but the ſkill of their archers gave them a decided ſuperiority. To theſe troops, which the ſpirit of chivalry held in contempt, were they principally indebted for their victories of Crecy and Poictiers. The French archers were ſo unſkilful, that the nation choſe to hire foreigners. The Engliſh, on the contrary, encouraged archery as much as poſſible, and the archers had attained to a degree of excellence which it was difficult to ſurpaſs. The French were aware of their ſuperiority, and to evade it, they diſmounted their men at arms, who could not move without difficulty, ſinking as they were beneath the weight of their armour.

Such was the ſtate of the French troops in the fourteenth century; it is needleſs to mention the militia, who were all raw troops, undiſciplined, and almoſt unarmed. They marched into the field under the banners of their reſpective pariſhes, and were almoſt certain of being cut to pieces by the enemy.

The offenſive arms were nearly the ſame as had been uſed for a long time; ſuch as the lance, the ſword, the poignard, the battle-axe, the club, the bow, the croſs-bow, &c. Shields of different dimenſions formed the chief defenſive arms. Halberts had fallen into diſuſe. No material change had taken place in the attack or defence of towns. Though gunpowder and cannon were known, they were ſeldom employed, from a want of ſkill to uſe them with effect, or from attachment to more familiar weapons.

France was better peopled in thoſe times, than in the preſent age. At the commencement of the reign of Philip of Valois, there were no leſs than two millions five hundred thouſand hearths, in the king's demeſnes only, which were ſubject to the tax. Theſe demeſnes did not conſtitute near a third of that ſpace which formed the late kingdom. It may be affirmed, without exaggeration, that France, at that period, contained eight millions of hearths; ſo that, reckoning three perſons to each hearth, there muſt have been twenty-four millions of inhabitants, without counting the ſecular and eccleſiaſtical lordſhips, which were not included in the enumeration. When to theſe exceptions are added the ſerfs, the clergy, conſiſting of an immenſe multitude of eccleſiaſtics, nuns, and friars; the univerſities; and the whole body of nobility, all of whom were exempted from the tax, the human ſpecies will appear to have diminiſhed in the ſpace of four centuries.

Much pains had been taken, during the late reigns, to correct abuſes and to reform errors, by many ſalutary edicts, and prudent regulations, yet the kingdom was not in a more flouriſhing ſtate than before. Juſtice appears to have been tolerably adminiſtered by the parliaments, but the inferior juriſdictions were not famous for their attention to the rules of law and principles of equity.

In the preceding reigns, the value of money had undergone innumerable variations*. The monarchs, tempted by the facility of this reſource, had too frequent recourſe to it, ever promiſing that each change ſhould be the laſt. The king always fixed the price of gold and ſilver, by a royal edict. Thus, if a new coinage were ordered when the mark of ſilver was worth eight livres five ſols, and the old money received at the mint, at the rate only of ſeven livres the mark, the king had a profit of twenty-five ſols. In one year there were no leſs than eleven new coinages; ſo that the king muſt have gained thirteen livres fifteen ſols per mark, on all the money that was coined throughout the kingdom. Numerous inconveniences attended this deſtructive mode of raiſing money; ſuch as the ſudden augmentation or diminution of the value of the current coin; the malverſation of officers, and the frequent adulteration, the ſecret of which was confined to the maſters and workmen of the mint, who were bound to obſerve it under the ſevereſt penalties. Such continual breeches of faith deſtroyed all credit, public and private; annihilated commerce; and encouraged coiners. Foreigners introduced falſe coin into the kingdom, and enriched themſelves with the ſpoils of France. Money diſappeared, the people became poor, and, by a neceſſary conſequence, the ſovereign partook of their indigence.

While the new monarch repaired to Rheims to celebrate his coronation, his troops, under du Gueſclin, reduced the caſtle of Rouboiſe, which opened the communication by water between Rouen and the capital. The king of Navarre, in the mean time, ſent for the captal de Buche, who arrived in Normandy, and put himſelf at the head of his troops: while Charles diſpatched a body of men at arms, to reinforce du Gueſclin, who had now the command of twelve hundred; a force which determined him to go in queſt of the enemy. The captal, being equally eager to engage, kept along the left ſide of the river Eure, and drew up his troops on a riſing ground, not far from Cocherel.

Du Gueſclin extended the front of his little army, to make it appear more numerous than it really was; for which reaſon, the captal reſolved to wait for a reinforcement of four hundred lances, which were on their march to join him. The French were expoſed to the heat of the ſun, and in great want of proviſions, while the Navarreſe, ſhaded by a wood, had abundance of every thing. Du Gueſclin, ordered a retreat to be ſounded; and, ſending the baggage over the river, put his troops in motion. The enemy, concluded that victory was their own; and, rejecting the advice of their leader, who ſaw through the ſtratagem, haſtened into the plain, where the French ſuddenly turned about; and, as it was impoſſible to recover their ſtation, a general action enſued. Du Gueſclin, animated his men by his exhortations and example; and the captal diſplayed equal courage and prudence, in attempting to remedy what he had been unable to prevent. Attacked, however, by thirty knights of Gaſcony, who had aſſociated for the purpoſe of taking him priſoner, he was ſurrounded; and, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, compelled to ſurrender. The capture of their leader diffuſed a general conſternation throughout the Navarreſe army, who were ſeverely puniſhed for their want of ſubordination. This battle was fought on the nineteenth of May, 1364, three days before the coronation of Charles.

Charles, on his acceſſion to the throne, confirmed the appanage beſtowed by his father on his youngeſt brother Philip, of the duchy of Burgundy; that prince accordingly did homage to him for that territory, and, at the ſame time, reſigned the duchy of Touraine, with which he had been inveſted three years before.

The authority of the courts of juſtice ceaſed the moment that the king died; and the magiſtrates could not re-aſſume their functions without the conſent of the new monarch; Charles, therefore, as ſoon as he was informed of his father's death, haſtened to confirm all the judges and other officers of juſtice in their reſpective ſtations. By an edict, iſſued ſoon after his acceſſion, all advocates and attornies were expreſsly enjoined to aſſiſt the poor with their advice, and to plead for them, without requiring any fee; and the officers of the court of requeſts were ordered to carry on, gratis, the cauſes of ſuch as were unable to pay the expences of a law-ſuit. It was impoſſible to carry ſuch an edict, into practice.

Charles ſettled the county of Longueville on du Gueſclin and his heirs, on condition of maintaining fifty men at arms, during the war. The new count went ſoon after to take poſſeſſion of his lordſhip, by force of arms; the Navarreſe were ſtill maſters of the caſtle of Longueville, which he reduced. When du Gueſclin ſet out on this expedition, he aſſured the king that he was determined to clear the kingdom of all its enemies; and particularly of thoſe bands of adventurers which ſtill continued to infeſt it. But he encouraged his own troops to commit depredations in Normandy, and to levy contributions, indiſcriminately, on friends and enemies*.

As the late king had ſubmitted the pretenſions of the king of Navarre to the duchy of Burgundy, to the arbitration of the pope, Charles gave inſtructions to his ambaſſadors, at the court of Avignon, to conform to the intentions of his father, and to aſſure his holineſs, that his brother Philip would abide by his deciſion. He ſent that prince, in the mean time, into Normandy, with five thouſand men at arms, which the duke of Burgundy divided into three bodies; the firſt, and the moſt conſiderable, he reſerved for himſelf, and the two others he entruſted to du Gueſclin, and John Bureau de la Riviere, the king's favourite, and adminiſtrator of the finances.

* Villaret, t. x. p. 43.

While the duke of Burgundy was employed in the reduction of ſeveral other places occupied by the Navarreſe; la Riviere laid waſte the diſtrict of Evreux, and du Gueſclin ſpread terror throughout the Cotentin*. The caſtle of Valognes was the only place that made the ſmalleſt reſiſtance. Du Gueſclin battered the walls with all the machines that were then in uſe, but could make little impreſſion; the garriſon, at length, conſented to capitulate. But, as they were marching out, with their baggage and effects, agreeably to the terms of capitulation, they were reviled and inſulted by the French. Eight Engliſh knights, who were with the garriſon, enraged at this illiberal treatment, reentered the fort, to defend it to the laſt extremity: they diſplayed the moſt deſperate courage in reſiſting the attacks of the beſiegers; but, at laſt, they were conſtrained to yeild, when du Gueſclin cauſed them all to be beheaded.

The rapidity with which the French purſued their conqueſts appeared to promiſe a ſpeedy termination to the war; but the king was prevented from improving the advantages he had gained, by two unexpected events†. The count de Montbelliard, having entered Burgundy, Philip was compelled to leave Normandy, in order to defend that duchy from inſult; and, about the ſame time, the preſence of du Gueſclin was required in Brittany, where the conteſt between the rival houſes of Blois and Montfort was renewed, with additional fury. At length, a peace was made between the parties. It was agreed, that both the competitors ſhould enjoy the title and prerogatives of the duke of Brittany; and that Rennes and Nantes ſhould be the capitals of their reſpective territories. Hoſtages were interchanged; peace was proclaimed; and joy was thus diffuſed throughout the province.

The counteſs of Penthievre, ſpouſe to Charles of Blois, was exaſperated at this treaty. By her inſtigation, Charles, inſtead of his ratification of the treaty, ſent his retractation to Montfort, who loudly complained of this breach of faith. He reſtored, however, all the hoſtages, except du Gueſclin, who ſoon found means to eſcape to France; whence he was ſent into Normandy, and achieved thoſe conqueſts we have related above.

Both parties prepared once more to decide their quarrel by arms. At the expiration of a ſhort truce, which had been concluded between them, they both took the field. Montfort, after he had reduced ſome fortreſſes, inveſted Auray; and Charles, being appriſed of the danger to which that place was reduced, aſſembled his troops, with a view of forcing his rival to raiſe the ſiege.

Montfort, by the advice of the nobles of his party, ſent a herald to Charles, to demand the execution of the late treaty, and to proteſt, that he ſhould think himſelf juſtified, before God and men, with regard to any evils which a refuſal, to comply with a demand ſo reaſonable, might produce. Charles of Blois diſmiſſed the herald without an anſwer, and pitched his camp within ſight of the enemy.

The two armies were ſeparated by a meadow, interſected by a rivulet. The lord of Beaumanoir made a laſt effort to promote an accommodation, but it proved fruitleſs, and each ſide prepared for action. Charles's army was left to the conduct of du Gueſclin; the right wing of which was commanded by that nobleman, the left by the counts of Auxerre and Joigny, and the centre by Charles himſelf. The diſpoſition of Montfort's army being left to lord Chandos—who had been ſent to his relief by Edward, with a ſmall body of Engliſh archers and men at arms—he placed Sir Robert Knolles oppoſite to du Gueſclin; oppoſed Oliver de Cliſſon to the count of Auxerre; put Montfort at the head of the main body; and entruſted the corps-de-reſerve to the conduct of ſir Hugh Calverly. Chandos ſtationed himſelf near Montfort, but took no particular command, that he might be the better enabled to ſuperintend the motions of the whole body. The army of Montfort conſiſted of ſixteen hundred men at arms, and from eight to nine hundred archers; that of his opponent, of two thouſand five hundred men at arms, and from a thouſand to twelve hundred archers*.

When the two armies were on the point of engaging, Montfort ordered the treaty of the Landes to be read aloud, requeſting all the noblemen of his party freely to decide on the equity of his claims, and declaring that he would immediately renounce all his pretenſions, if it were there opinion that he ought ſo to do. He was interrupted by a general acclamation; and the whole army proteſted they would fight for him to the laſt. After thanking them for this proof of their affection, he threw himſelf on the ground, and addreſſed a fervent prayer to heaven.

On the twenty-ninth of September, 1364, was the fate of Brittany decided, by the battle of Auray. But, though greater fury was never diſplayed in any battle, no troops were ever leſs eager to engage. The nobles were fatigued with a war, as tedious in its progreſs, as fatal in its effects. Montfort offered to purchaſe a peace by ceding one half of his claims, and Charles of Blois would willingly have acepted the propoſal, had not his affection for an ambitious wife overcome every other conſideration.

The two armies awaited, in ſilence, the ſignal. Lord Chandos prevented his troops from advancing the firſt; and Montfort, reſtraining his native impetuoſity, followed the advice of the Engliſh general. Du Gueſclin could not obtain the ſame influence over Charles of Blois; that prince, led away by his courage, was deaf to the ſuggeſtions of prudence; he put the body which he commanded in motion, and, paſſing the rivulet, compelled the reſt of his army to follow him. Montfort ſeeing him approach, advanced to meet him, but ſlowly and in good order. As the troops were ranged very cloſe together, and covered with their ſhields, the archers could do little or no execution with their arrows; and, after the firſt diſcharge, they retired into the ranks, and mingled with the men at arms. The action then became general; the whole line of either army being engaged at the ſame inſtant. Where Montfort and Charles commanded in perſon, the battle raged with uncommon fury; thoſe princes, indeed, had the moſt powerful motives for exertion, as not only their fortunes but their lives depended on the event of that day; for the Bretons had come to a reſolution to ackowledge for their duke whichever ſhould prove victorious, and to terminate the war by putting the vanquiſhed to death. Montfort made one of his attendants wear armour exactly ſimilar to his own; Charles, deceived by his appearance, attacked him with impetuoſity, laid him dead at his feet, and exclaimed aloud—That his rival was dead! Montfort ſoon convinced him of his error. Charles, however, renewed his attack with ſuch vigour, that the ſtandard of his rival was beaten down, and his main body compelled to retire. At that moment Calverly, purſuant to the directions of Chandos, advanced; and, by giving a ſeaſonable check to the enemy, afforded Montfort an opportunity of rallying his diviſion, which being effected, the former retired to his firſt ſtation. Chandos and Cliffon, in the mean time, ran from rank to rank, animating their troops by exhortation and example; while du Gueſclin ſought to counteract their meaſures, by the moſt ſignal exertions of valour and ſkill. Victory long remained doubtful; but the count of Auxerre being wounded and taken priſoner, the body he commanded was thrown into confuſion; and Oliver de Cliffon, attacking them with great fury, put moſt of them to the ſword, and drove the reſt off the field. Calverly then made a circuit, and fell upon the flank of the main body, which was ſpeedily routed and diſperſed; Charles, in vain, endeavoured to rally them. At length an Engliſh knight plunged his ſword into his throat; his laſt words were—"I have long waged war againſt my conſcience."—His natural ſon, John of Blois, was ſlain at his ſide.

The news of Charles's death was ſpeedily circulated throughout either army; the partiſans of Montfort redoubled their efforts; while thoſe of his unfortunate competitor felt their ardour relax, from deſpair of ſupporting a party that had now loſt its chief. Du Gueſclin, though covered with wounds, and weakened with loſs of blood, continued to fight, till lord Chandos approached and exhorted him to ſurrender. The battle then ceaſed.

The loſs on Montfort's ſide is ſaid not to have exceeded twenty men; but, when the fury of the combatants be conſidered, ſuch an aſſertion appears incredible.

The noblemen, who were attached to Charles of Blois, being liberated, by his death, from their obligation of fealty, reſigned themſelves to the triumph of his rival. The governor of Vannes, opened its gates to him; and the whole province inclined to ſubmit to the conqueror. By the mediation of the king of France, and the advice of the king of England, a treaty was ſoon ſigned.

By this treaty the widow of Charles of Blois renounced her pretenſions to the duchy of Brittany; in return ſhe was permitted to retain the county of Penthievre, and viſcounty of Limoges; and a penſion of ten thouſand livres tournois to her and her heirs, together with a life-annuity of three thouſand livres, were ſettled on her*. In conſequence of this renunciation the duchy of Brittany was adjudged to the count of Montfort and his heirs male. In default of poſterity, it was to deſcend to the houſe of Penthievre; with an expreſs excluſion, however, to females, as long as there were males capable of ſucceeding. Montfort farther engaged to procure the releaſe of John, ſon to Charles of Blois, who was then in England; to give him his ſiſter in marriage; and to furniſh a hundred thouſand livres for his ranſom, to be raiſed by taxes on the people of Brittany; but this laſt article was never fulfilled. The treaty was guaranteed by the kings of France and England, the prince of Wales, and the duke of Anjou.

Montfort ſent Oliver de Cliſſon to Paris, to deſire that the king would permit the ceremony of performing homage to be deferred till the enſuing Midſummer; when it took place with all the uſual forms. Soon after, the new duke of Brittany, who had buried his firſt wife, Mary, daughter to Edward, by whom he had no children, married, with the conſent of that monarch, Jane, daughter to the princeſs of Wales, by her firſt huſband, Sir Thomas Holland.

A. D. 1365.] The grand diſpute, with regard to the ſucceſſion of Brittany, being thus brought to a concluſion; the only enemy whom Charles had now to encounter was the king of Navarre. The widows of Charles the Fair, and Philip of Valois, ſtill interpoſed their good offices in his favour†; and the captal de Buche ſucceſsfully exerted, in his ſervice, the credit and influence that he derived from the friendſhip and eſteem with which he was honoured by the king. After ſeveral conferences, the conditions of peace were at length ſettled. All the places which had been taken by the French in Normandy were reſtored; the renunciations of the ancient claims of the houſe of Evreux, on Champagne and Brie, were renewed and confirmed; and the diſcuſſion of the rights of the king of Navarre to the duchy of Burgundy was referred to the pope. By one of the articles it was ſtipulated, that the captal de Buche ſhould be releaſed without a ranſom: the king, anxious to retain that gallant leader in his ſervice, beſtowed on him the lordſhip of Nemours; but the captal, by the advice of his friend and patron, the prince of Wales, reſtored the gift, and, at the ſame time, retracted the homage he had done for it.

The general peace had been attended, as uſual in thoſe times, with an evil not leſs alarming than the calamities of war. The kingdom was again expoſed to the depredations of a deſperate banditti, whoſe numbers were prodigiouſly encreaſed; to France they gave the name of their chamber, becauſe it was the uſual place of their reſidence; and it was no eaſy matter to diſlodge them, as the battle of Brignais had ſufficiently demonſtrated the folly of oppoſing raw recruits—and France could now furniſh no other—to veteran troops, regularly trained to the profeſſion of arms, which formed the ſole occupation of their lives, and the only means of their ſubſiſtence.

Different expedients had been tried, without ſucceſs, for removing this alarming evil. Lewis, king of Hungary, would have allured theſe companies into his ſervice, as he was then at war with the Wallachians, Tranſylvanians, Croats, and Tartars. With this view he wrote to the pope, the king of France, and the prince of Wales, who propoſed the expedition to their principal leaders, with a promiſe to ſupply them with money, and every thing requiſite for their journey. But, after deliberating among themſelves, they rejected the propoſal. The attempt to engage them in a cruſade to Paleſtine, projected by the king of Cyprus, proved equally unſucceſsful.

The evil, in the mean time, far from diminiſhing, daily acquired freſh force. The companies were no longer compoſed merely of thieves and adventurers; they were now joined by a vaſt number of knights and gentlemen, and even by noblemen of the firſt diſtinction, who were not aſhamed to degrade their rank and character by deeds of violence and outrage. The miſtaken policy of ſovereigns had contributed, in no ſmall degree, to perpetuate this evil. They had been long accuſtomed to grant penſions to military men, for ſupplying them with a certain number of men at arms, when they might, at leſs expence, have maintained regular bodies of troops, more uſeful in war, and leſs dangerous in peace. As ſoon as a man at arms had acquired a reputation for valour, he ſet up his ſervices to ſale, became the chief of a company, which he diſpoſed of at his pleaſure, and acquired the privilege of fighting for whichever party would pay him beſt. No commiſſion was requiſite to enable him to raiſe or augment his troop; ſuch levies not being made in the king's name, it was not in the power of the ſovereign to diſmiſs them at his will.

After pillaging Champagne, the Barrois, and Lorraine, the companies penetrated into Alſace, and extended their depredations even to the frontiers of Germany. They then returned the ſame way, and prepared to carry their incurſions into the heart of the kingdom. Charles found himſelf reduced to the neceſſity of making application to the king of England, who, by one of the articles of the treaty of Bretigny, was bound to aſſiſt him. Edward made immediate preparations for an expedition into France; but Charles, alarmed at the number of his forces, and fearing that, inſtead of affording him protection, they might be employed for purpoſes of hoſtility, ſent him word that his aſſiſtance was no longer neceſſary. Edward, though juſtly offended at a meſſage which betrayed ſuſpicions of his honour, diſbanded his army*. The embarraſſment, in which the king and his council were involved, was fortunately removed by the arrival of Henry, count of Tranſtamare.

Pedro, king of Caſtile, had incurred the univerſal hatred of his ſubjects, by a continued repetition of violent and barbarous actions. Three natural ſons of Alphonſo the Eleventh had periſhed by his hand; he had laviſhed the blood of his nobles; and there was ſcarcely a duty, either moral or religious, that he had not frequently violated. Inſtigated by Mary de Padilla, he confined his wife, Blanche de Bourbon, ſiſter to the queen of France, in the caſtle of Xeres, and ſoon after poiſoned her, that, by her death, he might be at liberty to marry his miſtreſs.

Henry, count of Tranſtamare, his natural brother, took up arms againſt him; but, being foiled in the attempt, he took refuge in France, and propoſed to the king to conclude the treaty which had been projected in the laſt reign, by which he offered to enliſt all the companies in his ſervice†. This propoſal was gladly accepted by Charles; and Bertrand du Gueſclin, who was ſtill a priſoner at war was appointed to command theſe deſperate adventurers. Lord Chandos required a hundred thouſand livres for his ranſom, forty thouſand of which were paid by the king and the pope, and the Caſtilian prince furniſhed the reſt.

The care of engaging the companies, who then lay encamped in the environs of Chalons-upon-Saone, to the amount of thirty thouſand men, to paſs into Spain, was entruſted to du Gueſclin, who undertook, for a certain ſum, to make them all leave France. He ſent a herald to aſk a ſafe-conduct from their leaders, and the moment he received it he haſtened to their camp. To have employed the arts of negociation with men who were ſolely actuated by preſent intereſt, would have been uſeleſs. Gueſclin, therefore, contented himſelf with expatiating, with the blunt frankneſs of a ſoldier, on the diſorders of their life. "Both you and I," ſaid he, "have done ſufficient to damn our ſouls, and you may "even boaſt of having done more than me; it is now time, therefore, to honour "God, and leave the devil!" This laconic exhortation was accompanied by arguments more perſuaſive; he allured them by the proſpect of plunder: held out to their view the treaſures of the Caſtilian monarch, delivered to their diſcretion; and made them an offer of two hundred thouſand livres, to be immediately paid by the king of France: he concluded his harangue by announcing his intention of conducting them to Avignon, to pay a viſit to his holineſs, before they entered on the Spaniſh territories. Theſe temptations were too powerful to be reſiſted. The treaty was immediately concluded; and the chiefs of the companies repaired to Paris to pay their reſpects to the king, who paid-them the ſtipulated ſum, treated them with magnificence, and loaded them with preſents at their departure.

As ſoon as the projected expedition to Spain was made public, the companies were joined by ſeveral knights and noblemen. The young count de la Marche, John de Bourbon, was appointed by the king to command the expedition, but he was only the nominal general, as he had orders, to follow, in every thing, the advice of du Gueſclin.

Du Gueſclin took the road to Provence. Pope Urban had no reaſon to expect this viſit; and, when the army drew near to Avignon, he ſent a cardinal to menace them with excommunication, unleſs they immediately left the territories of the church. The cardinal was told, by du Gueſclin, that his ſoldiers muſt firſt have abſolution, and two hundred thouſand livres; the prelate anſwered that they might have as many pardons as they choſe; but, as for money, that was a different affair. Bertrand replied, that his men preferred gold to abſolution, and that he would do well to bring the ſum required without delay. The pope then extorted the money from the inhabitants of the city, and neighbourhood, and offered it to du Gueſclin; but, being informed in what manner it was raiſed, exclaimed "It is not my purpoſe to oppreſs innocent people. The "pope, and his cardinals, can themſelves well ſpare me that ſum from their own "coffers. This money, I inſiſt, muſt be reſtored to the owners; and, ſhould "they be defrauded of it, I ſhall myſelf return from the other ſide of the Pyre-"nees, and oblige you to make them reſtitution." The pope paid him the two hundred thouſand livres from his treaſury*; after which the army proceeded on their expedition.

A. D. 1366.] Du Gueſclin led his troops through Languedoc, and the ſouthern provinces of France, into Arragon, where they ſpeedily reduced the places which had been taken by the king of Caſtile from the Arragonian monarch†. Being joined by Henry of Tranſtamare he entered Caſtile, where the ſubjects of Pedro crowded to the ſtandard of his enemies. Pedro found himſelf totally forſaken; he had ſcarcely time to ſecure himſelf, his family and treaſure at Corunna; from whence he fled with precipitation to Bourdeaux, leaving Henry in poſſeſſion of his dominions: and that prince was crowned king of Caſtile, and acknowledged as ſuch by all the cities and nobility in the kingdom.

A. D. 1367 to 1369.] Pedro, on his arrival at Bourdeaux, applied for aſſiſtance to the prince of Wales. The prince, having obtained his father's conſent, gave a general invitation to the military adventurers of every country, who flocked to his ſtandard. Even the companies who had enliſted in the ſervice of Henry of Tranſtamare, in obedience to his ſummons, deſerted that prince, and repaired by thouſands to Bourdeaux. From theſe troops, Edward ſelected an army of thirty thouſand men, with which he ſet out on his enterpriſe. He was accompanied by his younger brother, John of Gaunt, created duke of Lancaſter, on the death of the good prince of that name, who died without any male iſſue, and whoſe daughter, an heireſs, he had married. He was likewiſe attended by the kings of Caſtile and Majorca, and by a ſplended train of Engliſh and Gaſcon nobles, at the head of whom was the gallant lord Chandos. But, as the kings of Arragon and Navarre, who ſtill adhered to the intereſts of Henry of Tranſtamare, barred his paſſage into Caſtile, it was deemed expedient to ſend ambaſſadors to the latter monarch, Charles the Bad, who perſuaded him to a conference with Pedro and the prince of Wales at Bayonne; where, in conſideration of a large ſubſidy, and the ceſſion of Guipuſcoa, Vittoria, Alava, Logrogno, Guduzen, Calahorra, and Alfaro, he not only renounced his engagements with Henry, but undertook to aſſiſt Pedro with three hundred men, and to grant him a free paſſage through his dominions.

While Pedro was occupied in his attempts to recover his crown, Henry de Tranſtamare adopted every precaution that could poſſibly tend to maintain his acquiſition. His extreme munificence to the Caſtilians had already obtained him the epithet of Liberal; and his continued exertions of benevolence effectually ſecured the love and eſteem of his new ſubjects. From theſe advantages he was enabled to bring one hundred thouſand men into the field. Encouraged by a ſuperiority of numbers, apparently ſo deciſive, Henry reſolved to come to action with all poſſible ſpeed, in oppoſition to the advice of du Gueſclin, and all his principal officers, and particularly to that of the mareſchal d'Andreghen, who ſtrenuouſly urged him to ſecure the paſſage of the Ebro, and by that means, cut off the enemy's proviſions.

The two armies met on the third of April, 1367, between Najara and Navarette, when a deſperate engagement took place, in which the conduct and courage of the prince of Wales were attended with their uſual ſucceſs. Henry ſuſtained a total defeat; twenty thouſand of his troops were left dead on the field, beſides five thouſand gentlemen. The priſoners were not leſs numerous; and among them were, du Gueſclin, the mareſchal d'Andreghen, the grand prior of the order of Saint Jago, the grand-maſter of Calatrava, and two thouſand French and Spaniſh knights. The loſs of the Engliſh was inconſiderable.

Pedro, in compliance with a ſavage impulſe of revenge, would have put all the priſoners to the ſword, had he not been reſtrained by the remonſtrances of the prince of Wales; who farther prevailed on him to publiſh a general offer of pardon, to ſuch of his ſubjects as would immediately return to their obedience. This offer was univerſally accepted; and Pedro replaced on his throne without farther trouble.

Though Edward had added to his military fame by this expedition, he ſoon found reaſon to repent his connection with a tyrant like Pedro; who, not leſs ungrateful than cruel, refuſed the ſtipulated pay to the army that had reſtored him to his dignity; and the prince, having paſſed the whole ſummer in Caſtile, finding his troops daily periſhing by the exceſſive heat of the climate, and his own health conſiderably impaired, was compelled to return to Bourdeaux, without receiving ſatisfaction.

The barbarities exerciſed by Pedro over his unfortunate ſubjects, whom he now regarded as vanquiſhed rebels, revived the animoſity of the Caſtilians, and determined them to effect his deſtruction. Henry de Tranſtamare, accordingly, prepared to ſecond their endeavours; and, raiſing a new army, again entered Caſtile, reduced Calahorra and Burgos, and threatened the whole kingdom with a ſpeedy ſubjection. Du Gueſclin, in the mean time, was kept priſoner at Bourdeaux; and, as the prince of Wales had refuſed to releaſe him, it was inſinuated to him, that his refuſal was ſuſpected to proceed from his fear of a man whoſe ſuperior courage and prudence had rendered him formidable. Edward, piqued at this reproach, ordered the warrior to be brought into his preſence. "Mr. Bertrand," ſaid he, "it is pretended that I dare not releaſe "you, becauſe I am afraid of you!" "There are people who ſay as much," replied du Gueſclin; "and I think myſelf highly honoured by the opinion they "entertain of me*". The prince immediately told him to fix his own ranſom, when he named the ſum of one hundred thouſand florins, which he ſaid he could eaſily obtain from the kings of France and Caſtile, the duke of Anjou and the pope. The princeſs of Wales, who was then at Bourdeaux, being anxious to ſee du Gueſclin, invited him to dinner; and, as an unequivocal proof of the eſteem ſhe entertained for him, on account of his valour ſhe offered to pay twenty thouſand livres towards his ranſom. Du Gueſclin, bending his knee before her, ſaid, "Madam, I have ever thought myſelf the ugliеſt knight that "the world could produce, but I now find that I no longer ought to hold myſelf "in ſuch low eſtimation." Edward was pleaſed with the liberality of his conſort; lord Chandos, too, offered his purſe to du Gueſclin, and moſt of the general officers evinced the ſame friendly diſpoſition towards him. Edward permitted him to go upon his parole, in ſearch of money; but, though he received twenty thouſand livres from the duke of Anjou, and as much from the pope†, he returned without a ſou. The king of France, however, relieved him from his embarraſſment, by ſending him a ſufficient ſum to make up, with what he had received from the princeſs of Wales, the ſtipulated ſum.

The firſt uſe which du Gueſclin made of his liberty, was, to raiſe a body of two thouſand men at arms, with whom he haſtened to the aſſiſtance of Henry of Tranſtamare, whom he found engaged in the ſiege of Toledo. Before that city a league offenſive and defenſive was formed between Henry and the king of France, who had diſpatched ambaſſadors to him for that purpoſe. By this treaty, the Caſtilian engaged to aſſiſt his ally with the whole naval force of his kingdom, and always to ſupply double the number of ſhips which Charles himſelf ſhould equip.

Pedro attempted to ſtop the progreſs of Henry; and, being defeated in battle, he fled to the caſtle of Montiel. In his attempt to eſcape from thence he was ſeized by a French officer, who conducted him to his tent, where he was murdered by his brother. Henry, again mounted the throne of Caſtile, which he tranſmitted to his poſterity. During theſe tranſactions, the king of France had been employed in recruiting his finances, and in regulating the internal police of his kingdom; the continuation of the taxes, after the cauſe for which they had been impoſed was removed, had excited an inſurrection of the citizens of Tournay. Charles ſent Edward de Renty, a knight of Picardy, to reduce them to ſubjection; and, having quelled the revolt, he puniſhed the inſurgents by depriving the city of its municipal rights. At the expiration of three years, its privileges were reſtored.

The pope having been induced, at the inſtigation of king John, to oppoſe the marriage of the earl of Cambridge, ſon to Edward of England, with the heireſs of Flanders, Charles now procured the hand of that princeſs for his brother, the duke of Burgundy. Although Lewis, count of Flanders, had never openly evinced a repugnance to the alliance of his daughter with the ſon of Edward, from the apprehenſion of diſpleaſing the Flemings, whoſe commercial intercourſe with the Engliſh very naturally led them to prefer that connection, yet he was always ſecretly inclined to favour France. When the pope had publicly declared his determination never to grant a diſpenſation to the Engliſh prince, Lewis liſtened to the king's propoſals in behalf of his brother. Urban granted the neceſſary diſpenſations for this marriage, the conditions of which were ſettled at Ghent, by deputies from the king and the count of Flanders. Charles, on this occaſion, ceded to the count the diſtricts of Lille, Douay, and Orchies, on condition that they ſhould revert to the crown, in default of heirs male of the bodies of Margaret and Philip*. By granting ſuch an augmentation of territory to his brother, who, by his alliance with Margaret, was about to become one of the moſt powerful princes in Europe, Charles ſeems to have deviated from his uſual ſyſtem of policy; but we are told†, that this ceſſion, made with the view of ſatisfying the count of Flanders and his ſubjects, was only colluſive; ſince he ſtipulated, by a private treaty, with the duke of Burgundy, that, on the count's death, theſe diſtricts ſhould be immediately reſtored. But Charles dying firſt, the duke eluded the treaty during the minority of his nephew. About this time the queen was brought to bed of a ſon, who was named Charles; and, as he was the firſt male heir, his birth was celebrated with great rejoicings.

The prince of Wales, in the mean time, began to feel the effects of thoſe troubles, in which he had involved himſelf, by his ſplendid, though imprudent, expedition into Caſtile. He had not only exhauſted his treaſury in levying and paying the army which he had led into Spain, but had contracted an immenſe debt, which he knew not how to diſcharge. In this emergency, the biſhop of Rodez, whom he had appointed chancellor of Guienne, adviſed him to levy, with the conſent of the ſtates, an impoſt of one livre upon every hearth in his dominions, for five years only. The deputies from Poitou, the Limouſin, Xaintonge and Rouergue ſubmitted to the tax; but it was oppoſed with great violence by many of the Gaſcon nobles, who embraced this opportunity to revive the ancient prejudice of the people againſt the Engliſh government. The counts of Armagnac, Cominges, Albret, and Perigord, with many others, repaired to Paris, and publicly appealed to Charles, as lord paramount of Guienne, though they well knew that the feudal ſuperiority of France over that principality had been formally given up by the treaty of Bretigny. In this appeal, Charles, who was unwilling to forfeit his pretenſions to political wiſdom by imitating the virtuous conduct of his father, artfully replied: "Certainly, my lords, it is our wiſh always to maintain the juriſdiction of the French crown, but we have ſworn to obſerve certain articles into which we will examine." The matter was accordingly diſcuſſed by the council, who, as might be expected, decided agreeably to the wiſhes of the ſovereign; or, to ſpeak more properly, who implicitly obeyed the will of a maſter whoſe ambition they dared not to thwart. The appeal of Edward's ſubjects was received by the court of peers: and that prince was cited to appear at Paris, on the firſt of May, 1369. Edward returned an anſwer, that, ſince Charles requeſted his company at Paris, he would repair thither at the head of ſixty thouſand men. But, before we proceed to relate the conſequences of this conduct on the part of the king of France, it will be neceſſary to examine ſome proviſions of the treaty of Bretigny and to conſider the juſtice of the accuſations preferred againſt Edward for his non-obſervance of that treaty.

By the twelfth article of the treaty of Bretigny, it is ſtipulated, "That the "king of France, and his eldeſt ſon, ſhall expreſsly renounce all kind of ſove-"reignty and right which they have or may have in all thoſe territories which "by this treaty ought to belong to the king of England. And, in like manner, "he (Edward) and his eldeſt ſon, ſhall expreſsly renounce all their pretenſions "to the kingdom of France, and to the title of king of France, and to the ho-"mage and ſovereignty of the duchies of Normandy and Touraine, the coun-"ties of Anjou and Maine, the duchy of Brittany, and the county of Flanders; "and the two kings ſhall agree, at Calais, on the time and place for making "their reſpective renunciations." But, when the treaty was confirmed at Calais, this article was omitted. Du Tillet, and ſome other writers, are of opinion that the omiſſion was a ſtroke of policy in Charles (then duke of Normandy) who wiſhed for an excuſe to annul a treaty ſo diſadvantageous to the kingdom; but father Daniel judiciouſly remarks, that ſuch an omiſſion could not have eſcaped the attention of Edward and his miniſters. Thus theſe hiſtorians are evidently of opinion, that, if any colluſion took place it muſt have been to the diſadvantage of the Engliſh monarch.

But though the twelfth article of the treaty was omitted, yet Villaret ſtill acknowledges the neceſſity of a mutual renunciation; and he tells us, that a day was actually appointed for receiving it at Bruges, but that Edward never appeared, nor even ſent his renunciation, though frequently cited by John ſo to do; and hence he infers, that the treaty became void. The true ſtate of the caſe, however, is this—that it was found neceſſary to defer the mutual renunciations for ſome time, as Edward was not yet in poſſeſſion of all the territories ceded to him by the treaty of Bretigny; and it was agreed that the parties, meanwhile, ſhould make no uſe of their reſpective claims againſt each other*. It is certain, that the failure in exchanging theſe renunciations had proceeded from France†, and that apologies had been made to Edward, who was juſtly ſuppoſed to be the only perſon who could be injured by ſuch delay. The Engliſh monarch, notwithſtanding, quitted the title of king of France immediately after the treaty was ſigned, and ceaſed to quarter the arms of France with thoſe of England.

Again, Edward is accuſed, of having violated the treaty, by neglecting to employ force in expelling the garriſons from thoſe places which he had agreed to ſurrender‡. It is acknowledged that he gave the moſt poſitive orders for that purpoſe; and he would willingly have enforced them by arms, had John wiſhed him ſo to do; ſince, at a ſubſequent period, we have ſeen him inſtantly obey the ſummons of Charles, on a ſimilar emergency. It is evident, therefore, that John, probably at the inſtigation of his ſon, preferred bribing the troops to evacuate the towns and fortreſſes, to the introduction of an Engliſh army into his dominions.

A third accuſation is preferred againſt Edward by Villaret. By creating the duchy of Aquitaine into a principality, ſays that author‖, the king of England performed a premature act of ſovereignty, which amounted to a formal breach of the treaty of Bretigny, ſince he had not yet put himſelf in a ſituation to receive John's renunciation of the ſovereignty of that territory—conſequently he could have no right to diſpoſe of it. The delay in exchanging the renunciations was occaſioned by John himſelf; this charge, conſequently, falls to the ground; beſides, did not the king of France, by the very act of ſurrendering the ceded provinces to Edward, renounce their ſovereignty? The French writers themſelves acknowledge that John ſtrictly fulfilled all the conditions of the treaty; he, therefore, muſt have renounced the ſovereignty of Guienne, Aquitaine, &c. If the erection of Aquitaine into a principality had been deemed an infraction of the treaty, John, who was then alive, would certainly have reſented it; but he well knew that Edward was authoriſed to diſpoſe of that territory as he pleaſed, and he had too much honour to deſcend to the meanneſs of equivocation. The exaction of a ranſom from ſome of the hoſtages is advanced as another violation of the treaty. The fact is, that the hoſtages were bound to remain in England till the terms of the treaty were wholly fulfilled; but ſome of them, anxious to regain their liberty, made propoſals to Edward to releaſe them on certain conditions; the duke of Orleans procured his freedom by granting ſome lands to Thomas of Woodſtock, one of Edward's ſons; the duke of Bourbon offered twelve thouſand crowns for his liberty; and Guy de Blois purchaſed his by the ſurrender of Soiſſons. But theſe were voluntary offers on the part of the hoſtages, which Edward had certainly a right to accept, as by releaſing them he weakened the only ſecurity he poſſeſſed for the payment of John's ranſom.

It has been aſſerted*, that ſufficient reaſons for ſetting aſide the treaty of Bretigny might be deduced from the conſtitution of the monarchy, which forbids the diſmemberment of any part of the ſovereignty, and inceſſantly recalls ſuch parts as are forcibly detached for a time, to the main body. If this aſſertion has any ſignification it muſt mean, that the king, when three parts of his dominions have been wreſted from him by an enemy ſuperior in ſtrength, or favoured by fortune, muſt ſooner riſk the loſs of the remaining fourth, however unable to maintain the conteſt, than conſent to purchaſe the reſtitution of what had been conquered by ceding a portion of it, however ſmall. The whole hiſtory of France tends to prove that an idea ſo prepoſterous had never been adopted; ſince it exhibits, both before and after the time of Charlemagne, a perpetual variation in the extent of the empire, ſucceſſively enlarged by conqueſts, and contracted by defeats. Moſt of the provinces, ceded by the treaty of Bretigny, had formerly belonged to the anceſtors of Edward, who poſſeſſed them, not deſpotically, by the right of conqueſt, but, lawfully, by that of inheritance.

Such are the pleas, which have been urged in juſtification of Charles's conduct. Never was any treaty more explicit than that of Bretigny; nothing was left open to future diſcuſſion; and the greateſt pains were taken to avoid equivocation. Charles could not be deceived; he muſt have been fully aware of the conſequences; yet did he conſent to ratify the treaty, in the moſt ſolemn, in the moſt ſacred manner, and to bind the obligation he had contracted by all that was awful in religion. On the altar, and (according to his ideas) in the actual preſence of his God, were his vows made to maintain it inviolate;—yet could he coolly and deliberately reſolve to break oaths thus ſtrongly confirmed†.

* Villaret, tom. ix. p. 447.

† Though a ſtrict regard for truth compels us to juſtify Edward from charges ſo unfounded as thoſe which have been preferred againſt him by the French hiſtorians, with regard to the treaty of Bretigny;

The prince of Wales prepared to put his menaces in execution, and retained the companies which he had brought with him from Spain, and which were now diſperſed along the banks of the Loire, in his ſervice; but a general inſurrection of the Gaſcons prevented him from advancing againſt his enemy, with that alacrity which he wiſhed.

Charles obtained exact information of the ſtate of the prince's health, which had been gradually declining ſince his return from Spain; and he was, by this time, ſo weak as to be unable to ſit on his horſe. The phyſicians were of opinion that it was incurable, and that it would infallibly terminate in a dropſy. Charles rejoiced at the illneſs of a foe whom he did not dare to face in the field. He ſummoned the peers to aſſemble; and that proſtituted court, ſanctioned, with their approbation, the perjury of their ſovereign. War was accordingly declared againſt England, and a meſſenger diſpatched to convey the news to Edward.

A. D. 1370.] Charles, conſcious that his addreſs was ſuperior to his courage, relied chiefly on intrigue for the ſucceſs of his ſchemes. All the arts of corruption were exerted with ſucceſs; the governors of ſeveral towns and fortreſſes both in Ponthieu and Guienne, were bribed to violate their oaths, and to betray the intereſts of their lawful ſovereign. The citizens of Abbeville opened their gates to the French; thoſe of St. Valory, Rue and Crotoy, followed their example; the gallant lord Chandos was ſlain in a ſkirmiſh, on the bridge of Leuſac near Poitiers, on the firſt of January 1370; and, the prince of Wales being unable to head his troops, the French purſued their advantage with aſtoniſhing rapidity.

This ſucceſs made the people cheerfully contribute to the ſupport of the war. The ſtates-general being aſſembled at Paris, the cardinal de Beauvais, chancellor of France, aſked, in the king's name, their advice with regard to the preſent conteſt; they reſolved to maintain it, and granted the neceſſary ſupplies for that purpoſe. It was decreed, that the impoſt of twelve deniers per livre, and the ſalt-tax, ſhould be ſet apart for the ſupport of the king's houſhold; and that a tax of four livres upon every hearth in the towns, and thirty ſols in the country, ſhould be levied for defraying the expences of the war. A new duty upon wines was impoſed at the ſame time, the common wines, commonly called French, only paid one half of the duty that was levied on Burgundy; while the wines of Beaune and Saint Pourcain paid triple.

The king ſoon after held a bed of Juſtice, at which Edward and his ſon the prince of Wales were declared rebels; and, in conſequence of their felony, the duchy of Guienne, and the other territories which they poſſeſſed in France, yet his ambitious conduct, in preferring a frivolous and abſurd claim to the French crown, calls for the ſevereſt reprobation; and he may juſtly be charged with all the calamities conſequent thereon, and with the vaſt effuſion of blood which his unprincipled attempts to enforce his pretenſions occaſioned.

were confiſcated to their ſovereign; this ſentence was pronounced by Charles himſelf, who could diſplay greater reſolution in the cabinet, than in the field*.

The duke of Anjou, and his brother the duke of Berry, prepared to enforce the ſentence by entering Languedoc and the Limouſin at the ſame time. Du Gueſclin, who had lately been recalled from Caſtile, inſpired the troops with a degree of confidence, and their ſucceſs was proportioned to it. The towns of Moiſſac, Agen, Porte-Sainte-Marie, Thonnins-upon-Garonne, and Montpezat, opened their gates at their approach. Sir Walter Manny, governor of Aguillon, was unable to ſuſtain a ſiege of five days, in a place, which, in the reign of Philip of Valois, had withſtood, for ſix months, the attacks of an army of ſixty thouſand men, commanded by the duke of Normandy. Theſe rapid conqueſts alarmed the Engliſh; the prince of Wales no longer thought himſelf in ſafety in Angouleme; and, hearing it was to be inveſted, he repaired to Cognac, which he fixed upon as the general rendezvous of his troops. The captal de Buche, ſhut up in Bergerac, was left to cover Guienne on that ſide. By his reſolution and preſence of mind he ſaved the town of Linde, which Thomas de Badeſol, had agreed to ſurrender to the enemy. Juſt as the gates were about to be opened to the French, the captal arrived; and, ſeizing upon Badeſol, exclaimed, "Ah "traitor! this is the laſt attempt at perfidy thou ſhalt ever commit!" He plunged his ſword into his body; and the French, finding their plot detected, retired.

While the Engliſh were thus preſſed in Guienne, the duke of Berry was equally ſucceſsful in the Limouſin, where he was attended by the principal nobility of the kingdom. Having overrun the province, he laid ſiege to Limoges, the capital, whoſe inhabitants revolted, and, at the inſtigation of their biſhop, ſurrendered the town to the French. The prince of Wales, having expended a conſiderable ſum in fortifying this city, was greatly enraged at the loſs of it; and he ſent word to the inhabitants that, if they did not return to their duty without delay, and expel the enemy, he would level the place with the ground, and put all the citizens to the ſword. The prince collected a body of forces; and, placing himſelf in a litter, being unable to ride, conducted them to Limoges, and laid ſiege to the city; but, ſenſible that the place was ſufficiently ſtrong to reſiſt any attempts to take it by aſſault, he prudently began by undermining the walls; and having by that means effected a practicable breach, he entered it at the head of his troops, and maſſacred the whole garriſon, together with three thouſand of the inhabitants. As Edward was gentle and humane, this inſtance of cruelty was the more aſtoniſhing. He was prevailed on to ſpare the life of the biſhop, who, having been the primary cauſe of the revolt, ought to have been the firſt victim of his own perfidy.

A. D. 1371.] The reduction of Limoges was the laſt military achievment of this gallant prince, who, finding his ſtrength inadequate to ſuſtain the fatigues of war, firſt retired to Bourdeaux; but, being led by his phyſicians to believe that his native air would greatly facilitate his recovery, he determined to quit the continent. Accordingly, having exacted a promiſe from all the nobels who ſtill preſerved their loyalty, that they would pay obedience to his brother, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, he embarked for England in the month of January, with his only ſurviving ſon, Richard, and arrived ſafe at Southampton.

A. D. 1372.] Du Gueſclin, who had lately received the conſtable's ſword, from the hand of Charles, now purſued his conqueſts without interruption; the departure of the prince of Wales proved fatal to the Engliſh, and all their attempts to recover the places that had been taken from them proved unſucceſsful. The duke of Lancaſter having reſigned his command in Guienne, the earl of Pembroke was appointed to ſucceed him; but, on his voyage to Rochelle with a fleet of forty ſail, he was intercepted by a Spaniſh ſquadron of ſuperior force, fitted out by Henry, king of Caſtile, who had warmly eſpouſed the intereſt of Charles. The two fleets met on the morning of the twenty-third of June, when the action immediately commenced, and continued, with unremitted ardour, till night put an end to the combat, which was, however, renewed on the enſuing morn with equal fury. The victory was at length decided in favour of the Spaniards, who, beſides being ſtronger, had the advantage of cannon, with which the Engliſh were wholly unprovided. The earl of Pembroke, and ſeveral other officers of note, were made priſoners, and moſt of his ſhips were taken or ſunk.

The conſtable, in the mean time, took Montmorillon by aſſault, and put the garriſon to the ſword; he then reduced Chauvigny on the river Creuſe, Lenſac, and Montcontour. St. Severe was obliged to capitulate, and Poictiers was ſurrendered by its inhabitants. But the Engliſh ſuſtained a ſtill greater loſs in the capture of the captal de Buche, who was taken priſoner in a ſkirmiſh. He was conveyed to Paris, and thrown into priſon. Charles, who, deſtitute of valour himſelf, could only reſpect it in another when exerted in his own ſervice, having in vain attempted to corrupt his fidelity, conſigned him to perpetual confinement. All the offers of Edward to ranſom him were rejected, and, after a captivity of five years, he fell a prey to laſſitude and grief.

The caſtle of Soubiſe, and Taillebourg, were reduced by the French. Xaintes was ſurrendered by the inhabitants; Rochelle was betrayed by the mayor; moſt of the towns in Aunis, Xaintonge, and Poitou, experienced a ſimilar fate. Benon, and ſeveral other fortreſſes were taken by aſſault, or ſurrendered. Part of the garriſon of Benon were put to the ſword, and ſuch as fell into the hands of the French were hanged; becauſe David Olegrane, governor of the place, had cut of the noſes and ears of ſeveral of the citizens of Rochelle, who happened to be at Benon when Rochelle was betrayed by the inhabitants. The reſt of the garriſon retired to the caſtle, but were reduced to ſurrender at diſcretion. Cliſſon, who was preſent at the ſiege, deſired that the priſoners might be left to his diſpoſal; and his requeſt being granted, he placed himſelf at the gate of the tower, and maſſacred the Engliſh as they came out; ſwearing, that he would ſerve all their countrymen in the ſame manner, wherever he ſhould meet with them. The firſt fifteen he clove down the ſkull with his battle-axe; whence he acquired the appellation of Butcher.

To complete the entire reduction of Poitou, Thouars alone remained to be ſubdued. It was a place of great ſtrength; and all the Poictevin nobility, who ſtill preſerved their allegiance to Edward, had taken refuge there; but, it being inveſted by a powerful army under the command of du Gueſclin, who battered the walls with cannon, the garriſon were reduced to the neceſſity of capitulating; and their offer to ſurrender, if not relieved by the king of England, or one of his ſons, before Michaelmas was accepted. Edward, appriſed of this circumſtance, determined to haſten in perſon to the relief of Thouars, with an army which he had aſſembled for an invaſion of France on the ſide of Picardy; but the elements warred in favour of Charles: the Engliſh monarch, having been detained nine weeks, by contrary winds, was obliged to forego his enterpriſe, and return to England. After the reduction of Thouars, the army ſeparated, and the princes and general officers repaired to Paris, to ſettle the plan of operations for the enſuing campaign.

Charles employed this interval of tranquillity, in taking proper meaſures for reſtraining the licentiouſneſs of the troops. All ſoldiers were ſtrictly enjoined to return quietly to their habitations, without committing any diſorders on the road; and every officer was prohibited from raiſing companies in future, without obtaining an expreſs commiſſion from the king, the princes of the blood, or the commander in chief; the commanders of companies were made reſponſible for the conduct of their ſubaltern officers, and private men; each company was to conſiſt of a hundred men at arms; and the commanders of ſuch companies were to receive a hundred livres a month.

Charles made, about this period, the acquiſition of the county of Auxerre; which he purchaſed from John de Chalons, count of Tonnere, for thirty thouſand livres of gold. The king united that county to the royal demeſnes.

A. D. 1373.] The enſuing campaign was opened by ſir Robert Knolles, who, with thirty thouſand men, marched from Calais, and extended his ravages to the gates of Paris. But Charles baffled every attempt to bring his troops to a deciſive action; and reſtrained the native impetuoſity of the French, to which were principally owing the defeats at Crecy and Poictiers. The Engliſh continued their march to the provinces of Anjou and Maine, which they laid waſte; but a part of his troops having revolted and forſaken him, Knolles was defeated by du Gueſclin. The ſmall remains of the Engliſh forces, inſtead of reaching Guienne, were compelled to take ſhelter in Brittany.

A ſimilar attempt was afterwards made by the duke of Lancaſter, who marched from Calais, with an army of equal force, on the 20th of July, 1373; and, having ravaged Artois and Picardy, purſued his route through Champagne, Burgundy, Beaujolois, Forez, and Auvergne, into Guienne; and arrived at Bourdeaux about Chriſtmas, with barely one half of his army, without having beſieged a ſingle town, or fought a ſingle battle.

The duke of Brittany, in the mean time, having evinced a diſpoſition to favour the intereſts of Edward, the nobles, ſeduced from their duty by the intrigues of Charles, threatened to renounce their allegiance, and diſown him. This tendency to revolt confirmed Montfort in his deſigns; and he admitted Engliſh garriſons into his principal towns, to preſerve them from the attempts of his ſubjects. The nobility made application to the king of France, and entreated him to ſend troops into Brittany in order to prevent the felony of their duke*. While their meſſengers were at Paris, they openly hoiſted the ſtandard of rebellion. The duke attempted to ſtem the torrent of revolt, and, with a ſmall body of troops inveſted Saint-Mahe; but while he was engaged in the ſiege of that place, he daily received intelligence of ſome new defection.

The king lent a favourable ear to the application of the inſurgents; but before he commenced hoſtilities he ſummoned the duke of Brittany to fulfil the duties of a vaſſal of the crown, by refuſing a paſſage to the troops of his enemies, by abſtaining from receiving them into the towns and fortreſſes of Brittany, and by aſſiſting his ſovereign in the war againſt England. To this the duke replied, that he would, in future, refuſe a paſſage to the Engliſh troops, but that it was impoſſible for him to aſſiſt the king of France, againſt his ally the king of England. He ſanctioned this refuſal by a private article in the treaty of Bretigny, which exempted him from bearing arms againſt Edward; and he offered to produce letters, ſigned by the king, and the dukes of Berry and Burgundy. But Charles, without deigning to liſten to the excuſe, gave orders to the conſtable to enter Brittany with the troops under his command.

Du Gueſclin prepared to ravage his native country with fire and ſword. He was received at Rennes by the lord of Laval, and received a conſiderable acceſſion of force by the junction of all the leaders of the revolt. The duke diſplayed a degree of courage and generoſity that did honour to his heart. Having collected a body of about ſeven hundred men at arms, he kept the field for ſome time, though oppoſed by an army greatly ſuperior in numbers. The moſt prudent members of his council adviſed him to avert the threatening ſtorm, obſerving that, by pretending to renounce his alliance with England, he would take away all pretext from the king of France to attack him, and from the nobles of Brittany to perſiſt in their revolt. Had Montfort's honour been like that of Charles, he might have profited by this advice; but, he rejected the perfidious council†.

* Argentré. † Hiſt. de Bretagne.

The expences which the duke had been obliged to incur for reſiſting the attacks of the French, rendered it neceſſary to impoſe new taxes on his ſubjects; which gave the nobles an opportunity of exciting the people to revolt. Thus deſtitute of money and troops, and ſurrounded by enemies on all ſides, he reſolved to embark for England; with this view he conducted his conſort to Auray the governor of which place was almoſt the only officer in his ſervice on whoſe fidelity he could rely; he then repaired to Concq, where he took ſhipping, and landed ſafe at Portſmouth, having left Sir Robert Knolles in the capacity of lieutenant-general of Brittany.

The duke's departure was followed by the reduction of moſt places which ſtill acknowledged his authority. The conſtable laid ſiege to Hennebonne. The walls were battered with cannon, and the conſtable reſolved to carry the place by aſſault. The Engliſh garriſon, aſſiſted by the inhabitants, defended themſelves with courage and vigour. Du Gueſclin, having approached ſufficiently near to the walls to be heard from the ramparts, thus addreſſed the citizens: "Hark ye, friends, it is certain we ſhall conquer you all, and ſup in the town "this very night; but, if any one of you ſhall dare to throw a ſtone or any "thing elſe, by which the meaneſt of our men or boys ſhall be ſlain, I vow to "God that I'll put you all to death." The inhabitants forbore all farther reſiſtance; and the defence of the town was left entirely to the Engliſh, who were unable to guard the fortifications, which were very extenſive; they were repulſed in every part, and put to the ſword.

From Hennebonne the conſtable repaired to Breſt, which was defended by a ſtrong garriſon, under ſir Robert Knolles. Cliſſon, at the ſame time, formed the ſiege of Roche-upon-Yon, in Poitou. Breſt made ſuch a vigourous reſiſtance that the French deſpaired of taking it by aſſault; and, to make a diverſion, they laid ſiege to Derval, which was the property of Knolles, who, as they hoped, would fly to its defence, while the rebel nobles of Brittany inveſted Becherel. After the reduction of Roche-upon-Yon, Cliſſon joined the French troops before Derval, and the garriſon fearing it would be impoſſible to hold out much longer, conſented to ſurrender the place, if not relieved before the expiration of two months; the governor delivered hoſtages for the performance of his promiſe.

During the ſiege of Breſt, the conſtable went to Nantes, expecting to meet with no more oppoſition than he had experienced in moſt of the other towns; but the inhabitants ſhut the gates againſt him, and refuſed to receive the French on any other terms than as guardians of the city, which was to be ſurrendered to the duke as ſoon as he ſhould effect an accommodation with the king of France. They farther required that the public revenue ſhould be ſequeſtered in the hands of the citizens, till their ſovereign ſhould come to claim it. The terms were accepted.

The ſiege of Derval had the deſired effect upon Knolles, who, anxious to preſerve a fortreſs which belonged to himſelf, agreed to ſurrender Breſt, if not relieved by a ſuperior army in forty days. Theſe terms were the more readily accepted by the French, as they knew that there were not troops ſufficient in Brittany to annul the treaty. Knolles, freed from the care of attending to the ſafety of Breſt, haſtened to Derval, with a determination not to comply with the terms to which the governor had, in his abſence, conſented. Moſt of the French troops were then ordered by Charles to leave Brittany.

Du Gueſclin waited with patience till the expiration of the limited time for the ſurrender of Breſt; but lord Saliſbury fruſtrated his hopes by landing a body of troops ſuperior in number to the French. That nobleman left a ſupply of men and proviſions in the town, and then ſet ſail. As ſoon as Knolles arrived at Derval, he ſignified to the duke of Anjou, and the conſtable, who were at Nantes, that he did not think himſelf bound to obſerve the engagement contracted by his officers, who, by promiſing to ſurrender the place, had exceeded the bounds of their authority. The duke immediately repaired to Derval; and, having waited till the term had expired, he ſummoned Knolles to give up the caſtle; and, on his refuſal, threatened to put the hoſtages to death. Knolles treated his threats with contempt, and replied, that he was reſolved to keep the fortreſs; and that, if the duke ſacrificed the hoſtages to his reſentment, he would retaliate on the French knights who were in his power, and for whoſe ranſom he had refuſed one hundred thouſand livres*. Oliver de Cliſſon told the duke of Anjou, that he would lay down his arms if he did not order them to be executed, adding, that the ſiege of Derval had coſt upwards of ſixty thouſand livres, and that it was juſt their enemies ſhould be puniſhed for their diſloyalty. The duke told Cliſſon to do what he pleaſed with the hoſtages; he accordingly ordered the unfortunate victims to be led to the caſtle walls, where they were beheaded, in the ſight of the garriſon. The executioner had no ſooner performed his taſk, than a ſcaffold, which had been previouſly prepared, appeared, projecting from one of the windows of the fortreſs, and three knights and one eſquire were beheaded, and their heads thrown among the beſiegers. This bloody ſcene was followed by a vigorous ſally, in which the French were repulſed with great ſlaughter, and Cliſſon received a dangerous wound. The ſiege was ſoon after raiſed, and the French troops were recalled to defend the kingdom from the attacks of the duke of Lancaſter.

A. D. 1374.] The Engliſh, having now loſt all their continental poſſeſſions, except Bayonne, Bourdeaux, and Calais, liſtened to the mediation of the pope: conferences were accordingly opened at Bruges for the purpoſe of effecting an accommodation; and, on the eleventh of February, 1374, a truce was concluded, which was to continue till Eaſter; but, before its expiration, it was prolonged to the firſt of May, 1375. Previous to the concluſion of this truce, the duke of Brittany, having received a ſupply of money from Edward, collected a body of two thouſand men at arms, and three thouſand archers; and, accompanied by the earl of Cambridge, and ſeveral of the Engliſh nobility, embarked at Southampton, and landed at Saint-Mahe. As he carried the citadel by aſſault, and put the garriſon to the ſword, the town immediately ſurrendered. He then took and ſacked Saint-Paul de Leon. The duke, purſuing his conqueſts, formed the ſiege of Saint Brieuc, which had been newly fortified by Oliver de Cliſſon, and was defended by a numerous garriſon. Cliſſon, and the lord of Laval, commanded in Brittany after the departure of the conſtable, and were then at Lamballe. Kimperlay, a town of conſiderable importance, being greatly incommoded by a neighbouring fortreſs, which John of Evreux, one of the duke's officers, had recently repaired, the garriſon ſent to Lamballe for aſſiſtance. Cliſſon and Beaumanoir accordingly joined them, and they were on the point of reducing the fortreſs, when the duke of Brittany, being appriſed of their motions, raiſed the ſiege of Saint-Brieux, and haſtened to its relief. Cliſſon was employed in giving orders for an aſſault, when news was brought him that the Engliſh had advanced within two leagues of his camp. He fled with precipitation to Kimperlay; he was purſued by the duke, who inveſted the place, and took every precaution to prevent his eſcape. The ſiege was preſſed with vigour; Cliſſon and his aſſociates, knowing their ſituation to be deſperate, defended themſelves with intrepidity; but, deprived of all hopes of relief, they at length aſked to capitulate. The duke, inſiſted on their ſurrendering at diſcretion, and granted them a ceſſation of arms for a week. This ſhort armiſtice was on the point of expiring, when two noblemen arrived in the duke's camp with news of the truce, concluded at Bruges, in which Brittany was expreſsly included; he therefore raiſed the ſiege, and Cliſſon eſcaped.

During this interval of peace, Charles paſſed an edict, fixing the majority of the kings of France at their entrance into their fourteenth year, contrary to the regulation of Philip the Hardy, which continued their minority till they had attained fourteen complete*. His conſtitution was impaired by inceſſant attention to buſineſs, but ſtill more by the effects of the poiſon which had been adminiſtered to him by the king of Navarre, while he was dauphin. The tender years of his eldeſt ſon Charles gave him ſerious inquietude, as he was alarmed at the idea of leaving him expoſed to the mercy of the dukes of Anjou, Berry, and Burgundy, with the dangerous extent of whoſe ambition he appears to have been perfectly acquainted.

The majority of the kings of France had, ſince the firſt eſtabliſhment of the monarchy, experienced ſeveral variations. The period of their majority was determined by their ability to ſupport the fatigues of military ſervice. The arms of the early Franks were extremely light, and they always fought on foot; their children, of courſe, were able to bear them when very young; hence their majority was fixed at the completion of their fifteenth year. Childebert the Second was not older, when Goutran declared him of age by putting a javelin in his hand, according to the cuſtom of the times, in preſence of the national aſſembly. The mode of waging war changed during the ſecond race; the armies were almoſt wholly compoſed of cavalry, and the complete armour worn by the men required the ſtrength of maturity to ſupport it; the majority, therefore, was protracted till the age of twenty-one. This cuſtom ſubſiſted when the king paſſed his edict; but he knew that a monarch might govern his kingdom without fighting.

In this year, the appanage of Lewis, the king's ſecond ſon, was fixed at twelve thouſand livres a year*, in land, in addition to which he was to receive, when at age, the ſum of forty thouſand livres, for the eſtabliſhment of his houſhold. The king, at the ſame time, ſettled the marriage-portions of his daughters. The eldeſt, the princeſs Mary, was to have one hundred thouſand livres, beſides furniture, clothes, and jewels, ſuitable to her rank. The other princeſſes were to have, each of them, ſixty thouſand livres, with furniture, &c.

When he had thus ſettled his family affairs, Charles took neceſſary meaſures for the ſafe government of the kingdom at his death. He conferred the office of regent on his elder brother the duke of Anjou; and, in caſe of his death or abſence, on the duke of Burgundy; no notice whatever was taken of his ſecond brother, the duke of Berry, with whoſe conduct the king was diſpleaſed. The powers of the regent received certain modifications; he was prohibited from alienating the domains of the crown, under any pretext whatever. The duke ſwore to obſerve all the conditions impoſed on him.

As the regent was exempted from giving any account of his adminiſtration, when his power expired, the king entruſted the guardianſhip of his children, and the care of the public revenue to the queen, aſſiſted by the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon; and, in caſe of her death, the two princes were to take that important truſt upon themſelves; he ordered, at the ſame time, that the ſurplus of the revenue, after defraying all the neceſſary expences, ſhould be depoſited in the hands of Bureau de la Riviere, the firſt chamberlain, to be paid to the king, as ſoon as he ſhould come of age. A council was appointed to aſſiſt the queen and the two princes. This council, compoſed of the principal men of the three orders of the ſtate, was well calculated to balance the power of the regent, in caſe he ſhould incline to abuſe it. The queen, princes, nobility, prelates, and chief officers of the ſtate, ſwore to obſerve theſe regulations.

A. D. 1375 to 1377.] Some farther attempts were now made to effect a peace between France and England; but the pretenſions of the rival monarchs were ſo widely oppoſite, that it was impoſſible to reconcile them. Charles demanded the reſtitution of fourteen hundred thouſand livres, which had been paid towards his father's ranſom, and the demolition of the citadel and fortifications of Calais. Edward inſiſted that the treaty of Bretigny ſhould be fully enforced. The king declared theſe conditions inadmiſſible, being directly contrary to the oath which he had taken on his acceſſion to the throne. All, therefore, that the pope's legates could obtain, was a farther prolongation of the truce to the firſt of April, 1377.

* When the difference in the prices of every article of conſumption be conſidered, which, by the beſt computation, appears to be as five to one, the prince's ſettlement was equal to ſix hundred thouſand livres, or about twenty-five thouſand pounds ſterling.

All the taxes which had been impoſed during the war ſtill continued to be levied; and Charles having, by this means, filled his coffers, began to provide for the future ſecurity of the kingdom, by encreaſing his navy, which had been almoſt wholly neglected, ſince the reign of Saint Lewis. The advantage of a powerful fleet had been demonſtrated in the late conteſt, when that of Spain fruſtrated the plans of the Engliſh for recovering their continental poſſeſſions. A number of veſſels were conſtructed on the coaſt of Normandy; and edicts were publiſhed for preſerving the foreſts, which ſupplied timber for building them.

The demeſnes of the crown were encreaſed by the death of Philip, duke of Orleans, who expired in September, 1375*. This prince, the king's paternal uncle, had married Bianche of France, poſthumous daughter of Charles the Fair. Charles immediately re-annexed the duchy of Orleans to the crown, and took every means in his power to prevent its future alienation; but his commands, on this occaſion, were no more regarded than his other arrangements, with reſpect to the regency.

At this period the Engliſh ſuſtained an irreparable loſs in the death of their favourite the prince of Wales; who, after a lingering illneſs, died at Weſtminſter, on the eighth of June 1376, in the forty-ſixth year of his age, to the inexpreſſible ſorrow of his father, and the ſincere regret of the whole nation. The death of Edward was lamented even by his enemies; Charles honoured his memory with every mark of reſpect; he ordered a funeral ſervice to be performed in the chapel belonging to his palace, at which he aſſiſted, accompanied by all the great men of the kingdom. The king of England ſurvived his ſon about a year, when he expired at Shene, in Surry, on the twenty-firſt of June, 1377; leaving his throne to Richard ſon to the Black Prince, who was crowned in leſs than a month after the death of his grandfather. As the truce was now expired, Charles thought the conjuncture highly favourable for renewing the war with England. He ſet five armies on foot at the ſame time; and his troops purſued their conqueſts, almoſt without oppoſition, while a French fleet, under the command of John de Vienne, admiral of France, ravaged the Engliſh coaſts, burnt the towns of Rye, Haſtings, Portſmouth, Dartmouth, and Plymouth, and defeated a body of men whom the prior of Lewes had haſtily aſſembled to ſtop their depredations.

The French had hitherto made little progreſs in naval affairs; the navy flouriſhed during the reign of Charlemagne, but was neglected by his ſucceſſors. The firſt monarchs of the third race, poſſeſſing but few maritime provinces, had no occaſion for naval forces; little attention, therefore, was paid to ſhip-building till the time of the cruſades. The almoſt inceſſant wars which afterwards broke out between France and England compelled the French to make efforts for diſputing the empire of the ſea. Numerous fleets iſſued from their ports; but they were chiefly trading veſſels, the owners of which lent them to the king in time of war, for a ſtipulated ſum. Beſides this reſource, the Caſtilians and Genoeſe, then deemed the moſt ſkilful mariners in Europe, were called to their aſſiſtance. The French and Engliſh courted the alliance of theſe powers; and the ſquadrons of Genoa fought alternately for both nations. Charles was the firſt French monarch of the third race who formed a plan for a fleet of his own. With this view, he ordered a great number of veſſels to be built in the ports of Normandy, ſolely for the purpoſe of war. They were larger than thoſe which were generally uſed; though not to be compared, either for ſize or convenience, with the ſhips of the preſent times. Indeed, a modern veſſel, of a middle ſize, could not have entered the beſt harbour the French then poſſeſſed*. The largeſt veſſels were called gallies; they were worked with oars and ſails†, and ſupplied with low towers, whence ſtones and other miſſile weapons were thrown on the enemy; they had alſo machines neceſſary for grappling and boarding. To the prow was fixed a long thick poſt, caſed with iron, for the purpoſe of cruſhing the ſides of the enemy's ſhips. Other veſſels, though ſmaller in bulk, ſtood higher in the water; theſe were never worked with oars unleſs when it was attempted to gain the wind in time of action; large ſhips were uſed for tranſporting the men at arms, called huiſſiers, from the huys, or door, through which the horſes were admitted.

An army aſſembled by the duke of Burgundy, on the frontiers of Picardy, formed the ſiege of Ardres, which capitulated after an obſtinate defence; as did the fortreſs of Ardiwich, and the caſtle of Vauclingun. The reduction of theſe three places reſtrained the depredations of the garriſons of Calais and Guines, which had been accuſtomed to extend their incurſions to the gates of Boulogne.

The duke of Anjou was equally ſucceſsful in the ſouthern parts of the kingdom, where he reduced all the towns and fortreſſes which ſtill remained in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, except Bayonne and Bourdeaux; while Cliſſon completed the ſubjection of Brittany, leaving only to its lawful ſovereign the ſingle town of Breſt, which was likewiſe inveſted by the French. During theſe operations the king of France received in his capital the emperor Charles the Fourth, and his ſon Wenceſlaus, king of the Romans. The emperor created the dauphin vicar-general of Dauphiny, and ceded to him the caſtle of Pompet, in that province.

* Villaret. † Hiſt. de la Milice Francoiſe, t. 2.

Soon after the departure of his uncle, Charles loſt his queen, Jane of Bourbon, who, after giving birth to a princeſs, had the imprudence, contrary to the advice of her phyſicians, to bathe; ſhe had no ſooner entered the bath, than ſhe was ſeized with a diſorder that terminated her exiſtence in a few days. While the king was indulging his ſorrows for the death of this princeſs, he was alarmed by ſecret intelligence of a deſign againſt his own life. Suſpicions immediately fell upon Charles the Bad. On the apprehenſion of his chamberlain, who was then at the French court, the ſuſpicions were confirmed, and it appeared on the trial, that that monarch had endeavoured to bribe a Jewiſh phyſician, named Angel to poiſon the king; but the Jew, refuſing to be concerned in ſuch a plot, he cauſed him to be thrown into the ſea. He then ordered a ſubtle poiſon to be prepared, under his own inſpection, by a female Jew; and entruſted it to a valet-de-chambre, who was to gain acceſs to the palace, by means of a relation who held a poſt in the king's kitchen, and there to wait for a favourable opportunity to adminiſter it. On the diſcovery of this plot, Charles gave orders to ſeize all the places belonging to the king of Navarre, in Normandy; and, at the caſtle of Bernay, one of that monarch's ſecretaries was taken and brought to Paris. His name was Peter du Tertre; he underwent a cloſe examination, but though privy to all the political manœuvres of his maſter, he perſevered in declaring his total ignorance of the plot. As a priſoner of war, Charles could poſſibly have no other pretext for bringing him to trial; he was, however, condemned, together with the chamberlain, and they were beheaded in the market-place at Paris.

A. D. 1378.] While the duke of Anjou was depriving Charles the Bad of all the places he poſſeſſed in Languedoc, the duke of Burgundy and the conſtable du Gueſclin went to ſeize his Norman poſſeſſions; and, as the Navarreſe governors made an obſtinate reſiſtance, the king himſelf went to Rouen to ſuperintend and direct the military operations. All his towns and fortreſſes were reduced and diſmantled, except Cherbourg, which he delivered to the Engliſh, for a ſmall ſupply of troops which they agreed to furniſh him.

The Engliſh had not been long in poſſeſſion of Cherbourg before it was inveſted by du Gueſclin. But the ſtrength of its fortifications, and its numerous garriſon, reſiſted every attack. Though the ſiege was preſſed with all poſſible vigour, the conſtable was unable to make the ſmalleſt impreſſion. In a ſucceſsful ſally, the beſiegers took his brother, Oliver du Gueſclin, priſoner. He was compelled to conduct his troops into winter quarters.

During theſe tranſactions in Normandy, the duke of Lancaſter had fitted out a fleet, and ſailed with a body of troops to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Brittany. He laid ſiege to Saint Malo, a place of great ſtrength, and, after remaining ſome time before the town, perpetually haraſſed by the garriſon on one ſide, and by the French on the other, he was forced to return to England. He was followed by the duke, who concluded a treaty with the court of London, and obtained a promiſe of more effectual aſſiſtance, on condition of delivering Breſt to the Engliſh. They now poſſeſſed the four principal ports in the kingdom, Calais, Cherbourg, Breſt, and Bourdeaux.

For the reduction of this laſt place, the king had permitted the duke of Anjou to levy a general tax upon the inhabitants of Guienne. The duke received the produce of the tax, which he appropriated to his own uſe. The inhabitants of Montpellier, incenſed at this oppreſſion, revolted, ſeized the duke's officers, and put them to death. Eighty perſons are ſaid to have fallen victims to the rage of the populace. The duke, collecting a body of troops, haſtened to quell the inſurrection; but the tumult had ſubſided before he reached the town, and the citizens implored his mercy. He condemned them to loſe their privileges, their univerſity, their archives, and municipal juriſdiction; to forfeit one half of all their property; to pay a fine of one hundred and twenty thouſand livres; to found a church; and to demoliſh the gates, walls, and fortifications of the town. Two hundred citizens were condemned to be beheaded; two hundred to be hanged; two hundred to be burnt; and their poſterity was doomed to ſervitude and perpetual infamy. From the execution of this inhuman ſentence the duke was diſſuaded, though with great difficulty, by the cardinal d'Albani, and a Dominican friar. All the puniſhments were remitted except the pecuniary fine, and a farther exaction of ſix thouſand livres, for expences.

Towards the end of this year, the king ſent a reinforcement of troops to all the fortreſſes in the vicinity of Cherbourg, and ordered William de Bordes to enter the Cotentin, and keep the garriſon in awe. Des Bordes, fixed his quarters at Montbourg, and ſcoured the neighbouring country. About the ſame time, ſir John Harleſton ſailed from Southampton, with three hundred men at arms, and the ſame number of archers, and landed at Cherbourg, where, being joined by a part of the garriſon, he took the field, and meeting with des Bordes a deſperate action enſued. The two commanders, each armed with his battle-axe, diſplayed equal bravery; victory long remained doubtful; Harleſton was once thrown to the ground, but, having recovered his arms, he obtained, after an obſtinate conqueſt, a complete victory: every one of the French was either killed or taken. Des Bordes was among the priſoners.

The king, when informed of this diſaſter, ſent a freſh body of troops to take poſſeſſion of Montbourg. But the Engliſh maintained the ſuperiority they had acquired; and, as Charles had another project in view, he ſoon ordered his troops to evacuate the Cotentin; the inhabitants expoſed, by this means, to the mercy of the Engliſh, left their houſes, and, taking their families with them, fixed their reſidence in ſome other part of the kingdom. The Cotentin, one of the moſt fertile diſtricts in the province, became wholly depopulated. Charles, had long been anxious to obtain Brittany, and the enmity of the duke, whom he had conſtantly perſecuted, was deemed a ſufficient plea for that meaſure. The treaty of Guerrande was as little reſpected as that of Bretigny; having ſecured, as he imagined, the attachment of the Breton nobility, he thought that the mere ſignification of his intent was ſufficient to annex that duchy to his crown. On the twentieth of June, 1378, Montfort was cited to appear before the court of peers, to anſwer againſt the charge of rebellion. The forms of juſtice were neglected; the citation was not ſerved upon the duke, nor even ſent to Breſt, the only town that ſtill acknowledged his authority.

The fourth of December was the day appointed for the trial; and, on the ninth of the ſame month, the king held a bed of juſtice, at which all the peers of France were ſummoned to attend. Charles pleaded his own cauſe; and, after ſtating the accuſations againſt Montfort, he propoſed that that prince ſhould be declared guilty of leſe-majeſty and incur the puniſhment due to ſuch a crime; and that, in conſequence thereof, the duchy of Brittany, and all other territories which he poſſeſſed in France, ſhould be confiſcated and annexed to the crown. The peers, who aſſiſted at this bed of juſtice, pretended that they ought to be the ſole judges in a cauſe in which one of their body was the defendant, and not the king, who was a party in the cauſe; and they required, in caſe they proceeded to condemn the duke of Brittany, that Charles ſhould grant them letters-patent, declaring that this trial ſhould never be conſidered as a precedent prejudicial to their ancient rights. The king promiſed the letters, but never kept his word.

As Charles had ſome reaſon to miſtruſt the zeal of his ſubjects in the proſecution of a war which was generally conſidered as unjuſt, he ſtrengthened himſelf by forming connections with foreign princes and noblemen. To moſt of theſe he granted annual penſions, for which they were to perform military ſervice, and to furniſh a ſtipulated number of men. In the treaſury of the chartres at Paris, there are an infinite number of written obligations of this nature, ſigned by warriors of all ranks from crowned heads down to ſimple knights, who were allured, by the gold of France, from the frontiers of Flanders, from Brabant, from the banks of the Rhine, and from the interior parts of Germany. This cuſtom, which had long obtained, offered but a feeble and precarious reſource to the ſtate, while the penſions occaſioned a heavy and certain expence. Thoſe whoſe penſions were made chargeable on the treaſury did homage for them; but little reliance could be placed on theſe vaſſals. The introduction of pecuniary fiefs could only be uſeful when confined within the limits of the kingdom. William, duke of Julliers and Gueldres, acknowledged himſelf vaſſal of the king, to whom he did homage, ſwearing to ſerve him againſt all men, in conſideration of a perpetual penſion of ſeven thouſand livres; and his two ſons followed the example of their father, for an annual gratification of two thouſand livres*.

The news of the proceedings againſt the duke was not received by the Bretons ſo favourably as the court had imaginedt. The people had begun to murmur, when Charles, who had never loſt ſight of his project, ſent orders to the conſtable, de Cliſſon, Rohan and Laval, to repair to Paris. When they arrived, the king explained his conduct as to Montfort, ordered the ſentence by which he was condemned and the duchy confiſcated, to be read in their preſence, and declared his intention of ſending an army into Brittany. All this the Breton noblemen had expected, but the king told them, that he hoped they would ſurrender the fortified places in Brittany which they had in their poſſeſſion, that he might defend them from the Engliſh. They replied, "that they would do all which was "poſſible to ſerve him." Cliſſon was the only one of the four, who could be prevailed on to ſecond the intentions of the king. His implacable hatred to Montfort overcame every other conſideration, and induced him to make the promiſe required of him.

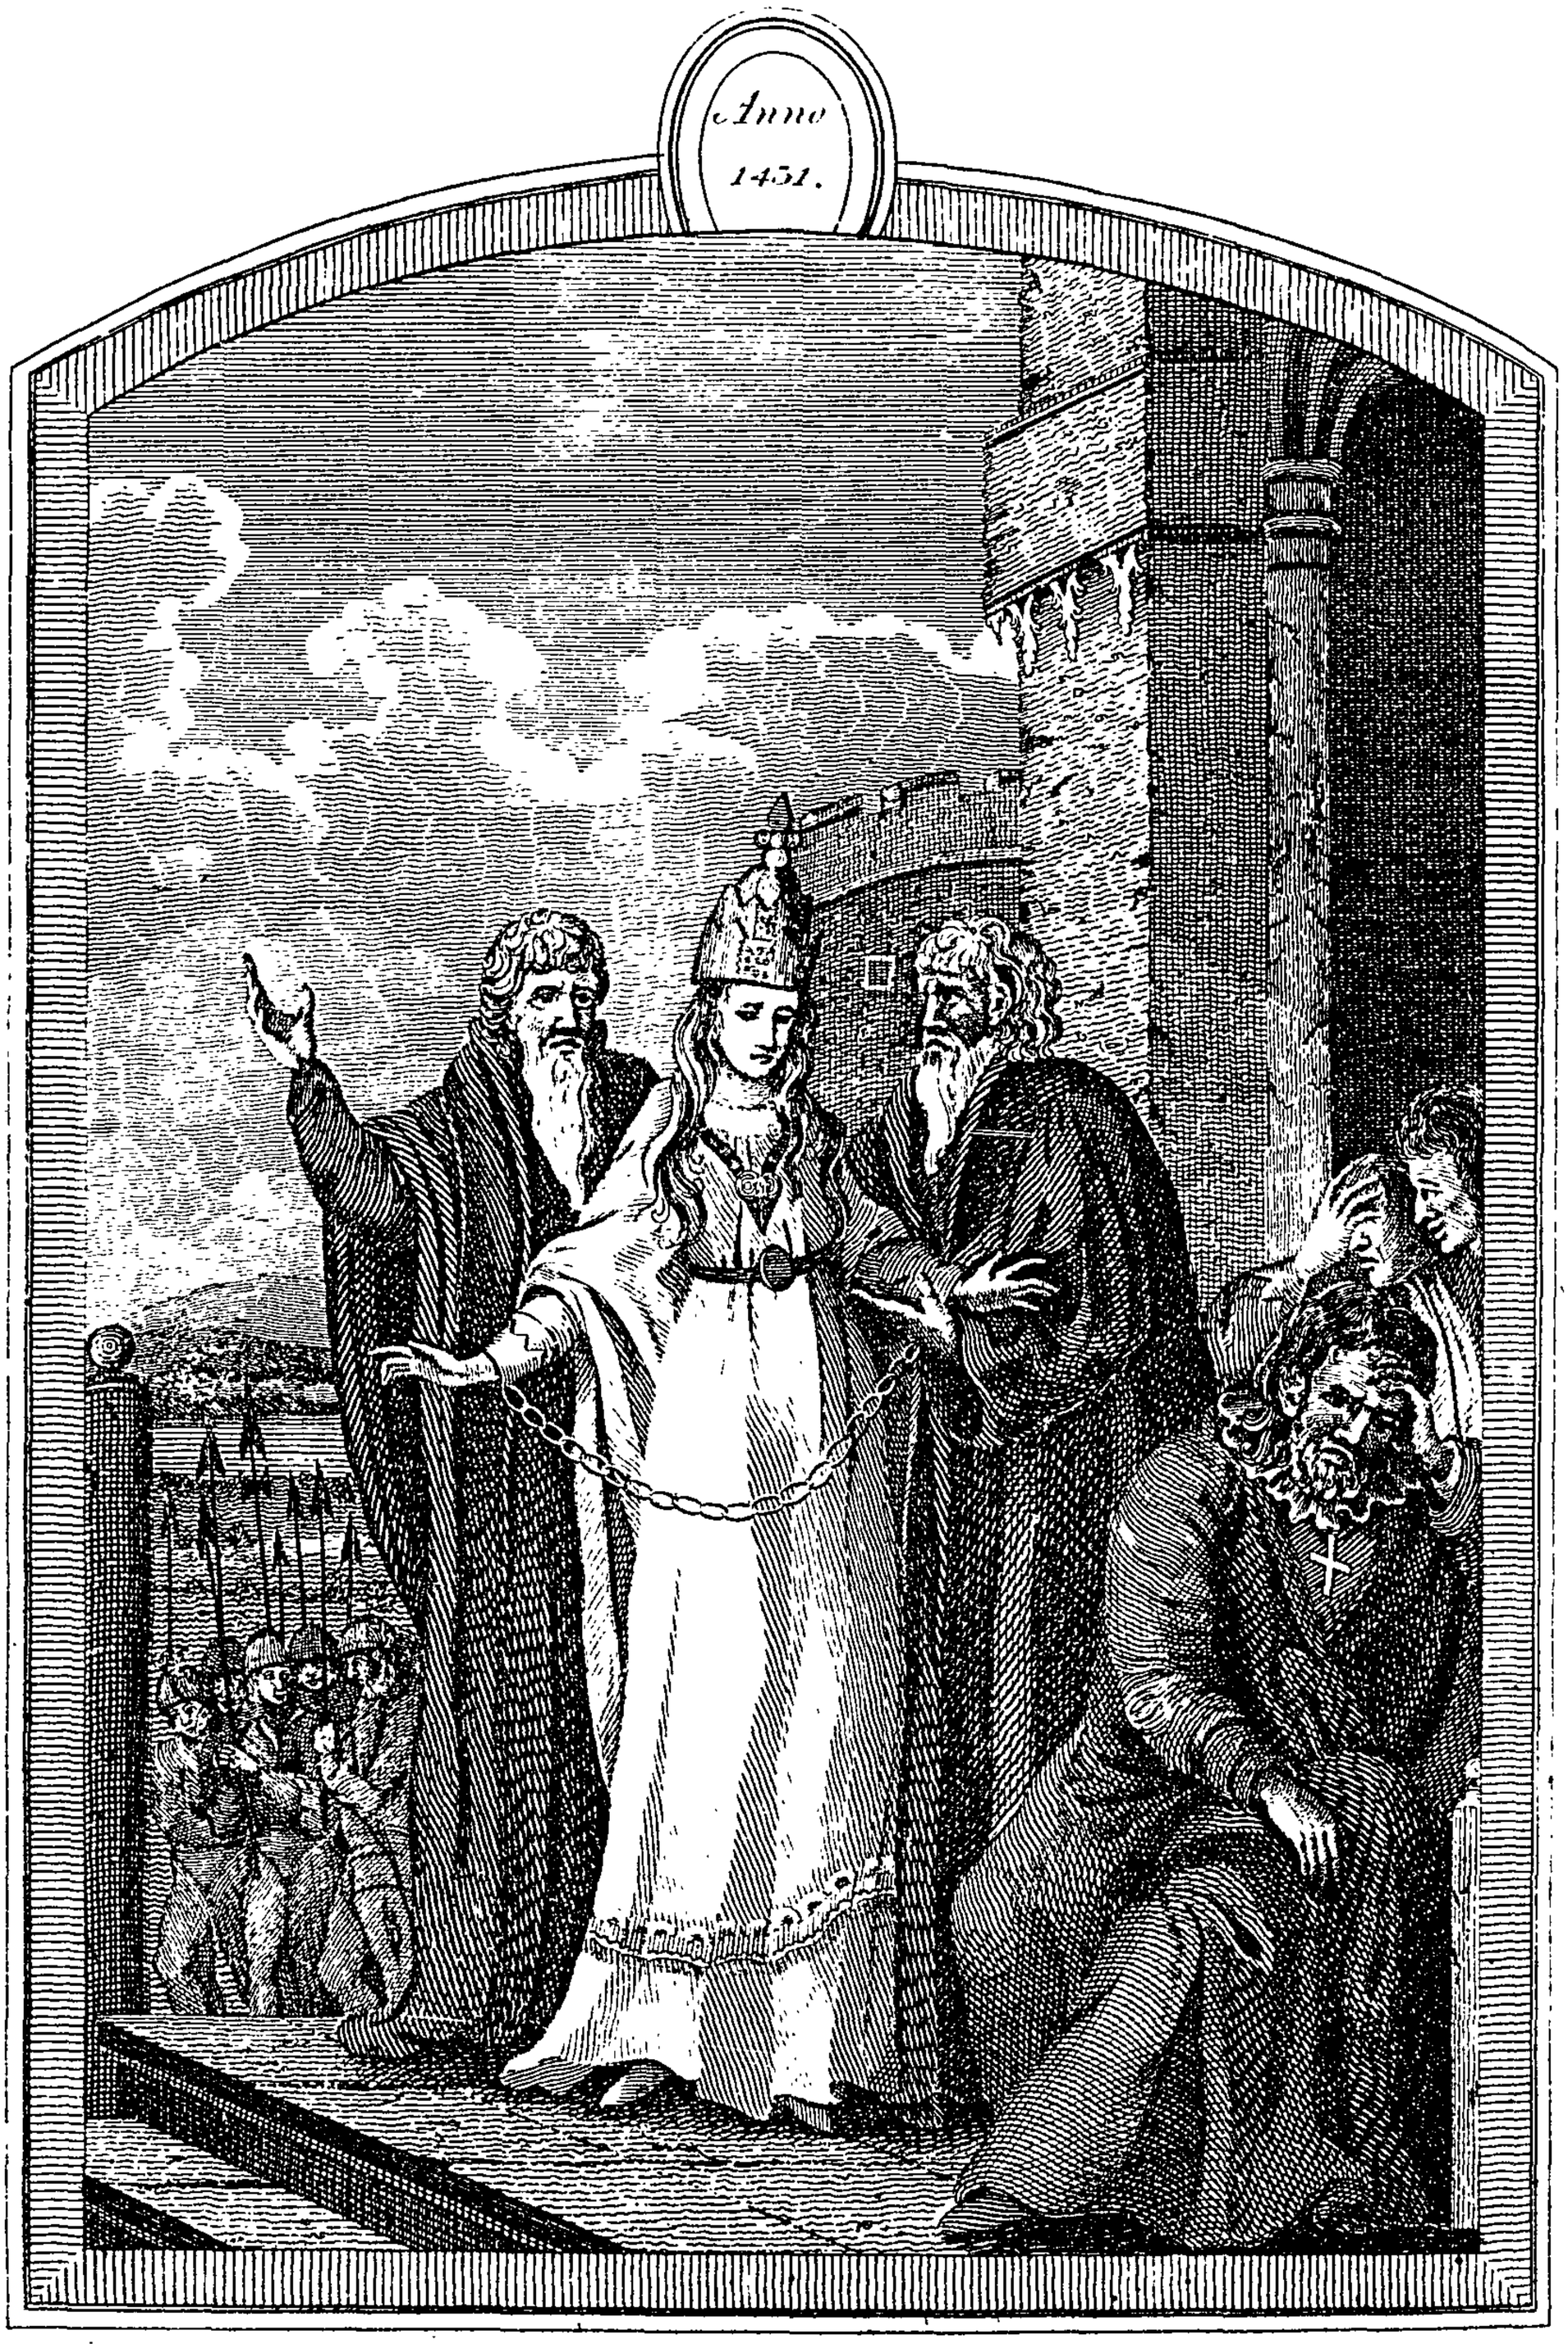
A few days after this conference, Laval convened an aſſembly of the Breton nobility at his own houſe, when, after expreſſing his ſurpriſe at the king's propoſals, he proteſted that it was his intention to oppoſe the deſign to the utmoſt of his power, and that neither he nor any that belonged to him ſhould incur the reproach of having betrayed his country, his kinſman, or his lord. This ſpeech was applauded by the company. Du Gueſclin had not been invited to attend, not becauſe they doubted his fidelity, but the office of conſtable which he held was deemed ſufficient to exclude him from ſuch an aſſociation. Having taken a vow to remain true to their country, they ſeperated, with a determination to retire from court, leſt an attempt might be made to ſecure their perſons. They left Paris the next day, and repaired to Brittany.



After the failure of this firſt attempt, it was eaſy to perceive that if the court of France could not engage ſuch of the nobles of Brittany as had been moſt favoured by the king, to ſecond their views, thoſe who had no ſuch motives for attachment would be ſtill leſs favourably diſpoſed. In fact, the king's reſolution was no ſooner made public, than confederacies were formed in all quarters, as well of the people, as of the nobility; the members of which bound themſelves by an oath to preſerve inviolate the ducal right, againſt all who ſhould attempt to take poſſeſſion of the duchy, without any other exception of perſons, than of him who was, by birth, the lawful ſovereign thereof. Meaſures were taken for a vigorous reſiſtance, in caſe of attack; a tribute of twenty ſols upon every hearth was levied to pay the troops; and general officers were appointed to command them. The public revenue was ſequeſtered in the hands of adminiſtrators; and the Bretons, not contented with providing for the ſafety of the province, reſolved to recal their duke. It was with concern they obſerved, that thoſe of the nobility who had engaged to ſupport the intereſts of the king againſt Montfort, had, at the ſame time, deprived the province of the preſence of its ſovereign. Thus Charles, by an ambitious deſire of extending his domains, loſt, in a moment, the friendſhip of moſt of the partiſans which his policy or munificence had acquired; and this defection effectually deprived him of thoſe ſervices, which, on other occaſions, he had a right to expect from them. Even the counteſs of Penthievre herſelf, though ſhe was attached to France by the firmeſt ties; though ſhe had the moſt powerful reaſons for hating Montfort, who had ſupplanted her family; though ſhe was mother-in-law to the duke of Anjou, and was ſtill more connected with that prince by friendſhip than affinity; exerted her utmoſt efforts to diſconcert the projects of Charles.

Three envoys were appointed to wait on the duke, and engage him to return to his dominions. Montfort did not place an implicit reliance on theſe firſt aſſurances of repentance and fidelity. He received the deputies with thoſe marks of kindneſs and diſtinction which the news of a change ſo happy and unexpected deſerved; but, taught by experience, he declared, that notwithſtanding the confidence he repoſed in the affection of his ſubjects, which he conſidered as an infallible ſecurity for his ſpeedy re-eſtabliſhment, and his conviction of the ſincerity of their promiſes, he was nevertheleſs determined to await till he ſaw a greater degree of certainty in the execution of ſo laudable a project. He charged them at their departure to exhort his ſubjects to perſevere in their good intentions; adding, that by their future conduct alone he ſhould judge of the ſincerity of their attachment; and that he flattered himſelf, if their return to their duty was as ſincere as they wiſhed to perſuade him it was, they would be anxious to make their actions correſpond to their profeſſions.

The deputies returned to Brittany with this anſwer; and found the people already in motion in different parts of the duchy. The king had deferred the execution of his project till the ſpring; and the court, in the mean time, were ignorant of what was paſſing in Brittany; they had only received information that various meetings were held, the reſult of which was kept a profound ſecret.

A. D. 1379.] The lord of Bourbon, in the mean time, with the mareſchal de Sancerre, John de Vienne, and la Riviere, had, in obedience to the king's orders, joined the duke of Anjou, to whom the chief management of the enterpriſe was committed. The king's favourites exerted their influence to prevent the conſtable from being appointed commander in chief, a poſt which, in this inſtance, he evinced no anxiety to obtain. He was ſent therefore into Brittany, with a very ſmall body of troops, to guard thoſe towns which had embraced the party of France; he accordingly fortified Saint-Malo, where he remained during the commencement of the campaign. Whether Charles imagined that he ſhould meet with but little reſiſtance, or whether he wiſhed to ſound the diſpoſition of the people before he ſeriouſly embarked in an enterpriſe which he, probably, began to conſider as hazardous; his efforts were greatly diſproportioned to the importance of the undertaking. He muſt certainly at this period, have been under the influence of infatuation; for, inſtead of attempting to conciliate the affections of the Bretons, by a mild and moderate conduct, he already treated them as a conquered people, by ſubjecting their country to the ſalt-gabelle, and other onerous exactions, from which Brittany was wholly exempted. Theſe exactions, the attempt to impoſe which, had been one of the principal cauſes of Montfort's diſgrace, were juſtly conſidered as ſtill more intolerable, on the part of a prince, whom the people regarded as a foreigner.

The Bretons being determined to reſiſt theſe efforts, new aſſociations were daily formed; troops were levied on all ſides; and deputies were again ſent to Montfort, from the nobility and principal towns, to preſs his immediate return to Brittany. Montfort, therefore, took leave of the Engliſh court, and embarked at Southampton, accompanied by ſir Robert Knolles, ſir Hugh Caverly, ſir Thomas Percy, and ſome other knights, with one hundred men at arms and two hundred archers. With this trifling force, but with the promiſe of more effectual aſſiſtance, he ſailed from England, and entered the mouth of the river Rance, near St. Malo, on the third of Auguſt, 1379.

As ſoon as the news of his intended return was made public, an immenſe crowd of people, from all parts of Brittany, flocked to the banks of the Rance, and even plunged into the water, as if anxious to haſten the moment that was to reſtore to them a prince whom they cheriſhed and eſteemed. He aſſured the people of his affection, exhorted them to perſiſt in the ſame ſentiments, and told them they would ſoon find the difference between the mild government of a lawful prince, and the oppreſſive ſway of an uſurper.

Every thing now ſeemed to combine in favour of Montfort; he had ſcarcely entered the Rance, when a part of the Spaniſh fleet appeared off St. Malo. The Caſtilians endeavoured to intercept the tranſports, on board of which was a conſiderable ſupply of proviſions and ammunition, beſides the duke's treaſure; and they were on the point of accompliſhing their object, when ſir Hugh Calverly, having firſt ſeen the prince in ſafety, compelled the pilot of his own ſhip to turn her head towards the enemy. The Spaniards, ſurpriſed at an attack they had ſo little reaſon to expect, were thrown into confuſion, and ſoon abandoned the purſuit of the tranſports, which took that opportunity of haſtening into port, while the Engliſh archers engaged the attention of the enemy, by pouring in upon them a ſhower of arrows. As ſoon as Calverly ſaw his little fleet in ſafety he retreated in good order, and went to receive the thanks and congratulations of Montfort, who never forgot this important ſervice.

The duke repaired to Dinan, where he received offers of ſervice, from the principal nobility of the duchy. The conſtable of Rennes joined him with a body of troops. The viſcount of Rohan, formerly one of the moſt zealous partiſans of Charles of Blois, haſtened to his aſſiſtance, at the head of four hundred lances. The counteſs of Penthievre had an interview with Montfort, whom, till then, ſhe had regarded as an uſurper; they conferred frequently together; and ſhe partook in the joy which his return had occaſioned. Theſe favourable ſymptoms engaged the duke to declare, at the firſt aſſembly that was held at Dinan, his intention of anticipating the French, by attacking them firſt; a declaration received with unanimous applauſe. The nobles then ſepa-rated, to make the neceſſary preparations. Vannes was fixed upon for the rendezvous of the troops.

Charles now perceived that he had alienated the affections of the Bretons, whom nothing but force could reduce to acknowledge his authority; but pride continued the conteſt which ambition had begun; and the duke of Anjou received orders to approach the frontiers of Brittany, while the conſtable returned from St. Malo to Pontorſon, where he endeavoured to collect a body of troops. But the duke of Anjou was more intent on a reconciliation than on hoſtilities. Du Gueſclin felt a ſecret repugnance in diſcharging the duties of his office, as conſtable of France. He obeyed, however, the orders he had received, though the king ſoon put it out of his power to ſerve him with effect. The good fortune of du Gueſclin in attaining to the firſt dignity of the realm, had allured to his ſervice a prodigious number of noblemen, moſt of whom were his relations or friends, and all of them his countrymen. Many of theſe, as ſoon as war was declared againſt their ſovereign, reſigned their commiſſions in the French army, and haſtened to join their native ſtandard. The king, piqued at their deſertion, publiſhed an ordonnance enjoining all the Bretons, who would not eſpouſe his cauſe, and take up arms againſt Montfort, immediately to quit his dominions. The conſtable, by this means, found himſelf abandoned by a great number of brave warriors, and officers of merit. Cliſſon, indeed, remained; but he himſelf was forſaken by thoſe partiſans whom he imagined moſt firmly attached to him. The firſt proof of this defection he experienced, on a ſecond attempt which he made to get poſſeſſion of Nantes. Cliſſon, having been refuſed admittance into Guerrande, and finding the whole province in arms, went to join the conſtable at Pontorſon, where the French troops, that were deſtined for the invaſion of Brittany, had aſſembled, with the dukes of Anjou and Bourbon at their head.

The rendezvous of the Breton army had been appointed at Vannes. When the troops had aſſembled, they advanced to meet the enemy at Pontorſon. But, on the news of their approach, the French army diſbanded, and the duke of Anjou propoſed a truce for a month, which was accepted by Montfort. It was agreed that this interval of peace ſhould be employed in bringing about an accommodation, the terms of which were left to the arbitration of the duke of Anjou, the count of Flanders, the lords of Laval, Rohan, Montafilant, and Beaumanoir. This compromiſe was ſigned by the counteſs of Penthievre, her ſon Henry, and the Breton lords*. The duke of Anjou engaged to procure the king's conſent to ſubmit to the deciſion of the arbitrators. His promiſe was guaranteed by Charles of Navarre, the duke of Bourbon, and the conſtable, but the king thought proper to diſavow it.

La Riviere accuſed the conſtable of having ſecretly favoured the duke of Brittany; Charles gave credit to the accuſation, and wrote an inſulting letter to du Gueſclin, reproaching him with infidelity; on the receipt of which that nobleman reſigned his ſword of office. His diſgrace was no ſooner known, than a murmur of indignation was heard throughout the kingdom; the nation appeared ſenſible that to his ſervices France had been indebted for her preſervation and glory. The princes of the blood, and all the principal nobility, who had witneſſed his military exploits, remonſtrated with the king on the loſs which the ſtate was about to ſuſtain. Charles, convinced of his error, haſtened to repair it; he diſpatched the dukes of Anjou and Bourbon to Pontorſon: and thoſe princes, with great difficulty, prevailed upon du Gueſclin to reſume his dignity.

The conſtable was now recalled from Brittany, and ſent with a body of troops into the ſouthern parts of France, which were much harraſſed by the incurſions of the Engliſh.

Du Gueſclin entered Guienne, and reduced ſeveral places. At the commencement of the enſuing campaign he croſſed the Bourbonnois, and, entering Auvergne, laid ſiege to a ſmall fortreſs ſituated a few leagues from Mende. The conſtable preſſed the ſiege with extraordinary vigour, when he was attacked with a diſorder that was judged to be mortal. He beheld the approach of death with that firmneſs and intrepidity, which never forſook him. On the news of his death, a general affliction prevailed throughout the camp; both officers and men deplored the loſs of their leader, their father, and companion; even the enemy, who admired his courage, did juſtice to his memory. The garriſon had promiſed to ſurrender the place to the conſtable, if not relieved within a ſpecific time. The Engliſh governor, followed by the whole garriſon, repaired to the tent of du Gueſclin, and bending before the coffin, laid the keys of the fortreſs at the feet of the dead warrior.

During this time the war had been renewed in Brittany, and though Charles had, at length, conſented to ſubmit to the deciſion of the count of Flanders, he took advantage of a treaty which Montfort had concluded with the Engliſh, to excite, once more, a ſpirit of revolt among his ſubjects. He alſo inſtigated pope Urban to threaten with excommunication ſuch of the Bretons as ſhould admit the Engliſh forces into their towns or fortreſſes; and the people, thus awed by a prieſt, conſented to violate the oath of allegiance they had ſo recently confirmed.

A. D. 1380.] At length the ſuccours from England arrived at Calais, under the command of the duke of Buckingham, who began his march about the end of July, and proceeded through the Boulonnois to the river Somme, which he paſſed at Clery: then traverſing the Vermandois, the Laonnois, and the Soiſſonnois, the Engliſh entered the fertile province of Champagne, and committed the moſt dreadful devaſtations in the environs of Rheims; where, in one week, they are ſaid to have reduced to aſhes ſixty villages. But theſe ravages did not induce Charles to deviate from that cautious policy which ever led him to avoid a decisive action. The town of Vertus was next burned, and the enemy pursuing their march, forded the Seine, and presented themselves in order of battle before the city of Troyes, where the duke of Burgundy awaited their arrival with two thousand knights. This prince, however, refused to accept a challenge sent him by the duke of Buckingham, who continued his route through the Gatinois and la Beausse, with the intention of crossing the province of Maine to Brittany. The English were pursued by a superior army, under the command of the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, who daily dispatched couriers to Charles to entreat his permission to bring them to action. Irritated, at length, by the repeated refusals of that monarch to grant their request, they determined to disobey his orders, and to engage the English before they had passed the river Sartre, which seperates Anjou from Maine; but the news of the king's illness diverted them from their plan, by calling their attention to objects more interesting to their ambition.

The last advice of Charles to the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon was, to proceed to the coronation of his son; to strengthen the alliance with Germany, by uniting him in marriage to a princess of that country; to terminate the war with Brittany, and to conciliate the affections of the Bretons, from whom he acknowledged to have received the most essential services; and lastly to abolish the imposts, for the more speedy accomplishment of which he ordered an edict to be drawn up, which he signed the very day of his death*.

As a friend to the arts, as a patron of the sciences, as the promoter of many useful regulations of internal police, Charles is entitled to praise; at his death, his treasure amounted to seventeen millions of livres, equal in value to one hundred and seventy millions of the present money†, and in effect, to eight hundred and fifty; or, upwards of thirty-five millions sterling! When we consider that, on his accession to the throne, the kingdom was greatly impoverished, and that this enormous sum was saved during a long and expensive war, we may conclude, that the necessity of consulting the happiness of the people formed no part of his political creed.

Charles left three children, by Jane of Bourbon: Charles, the dauphin, who succeeded him in the throne; Lewis, duke of Orleans; and Catharine of France, married to John of Berry, count of Montpensiere, second son to the duke of Berry. The funeral obsequies of Charles were not performed till the fourth of October.

Besides the territorial acquisitions already noticed during this reign, the king acquired the isles of Oberon and Re, which he annexed for ever to the crown‡: he obtained from the count of Savoy, for sixteen thousand florins of gold, the ceſſion of all the caſtles and domains in his poſſeſſion, on the French ſide of the river Iſere. That river was thenceforth conſidered as the limit which ſeparated Savoy from Dauphiny.

The times were unfavourable for the encouragement of commerce, yet it was not wholly neglected. There were ſeveral manufactures in France, which, had not luxury introduced a taſte for foreign productions, might have ſufficed for the conſumption of the kingdom. Coarſe cloths were fabricated at Paris, Rouen, Amiens, Tournay, Rheims, Carcaſſonne, Marvejols, Saint Omer, Dourlens, Chalons, Terouane, Beauvais, Louviers, and at ſeveral other places. The mode of preparing wool, indeed, as practiſed in Flanders was unknown; and all the fine cloths, worn by the nobility and gentry, were brought from Bruſſels. Fine ſilks were imported from Italy, though ſilk-worms had been long introduced into the ſouthern provinces of France.

The tradeſmen and artiſans in the great towns had long been united in communities, diſtinguiſhed from each other by their particular privileges, cuſtoms, and ſtatutes. The ſingularity of ſome of theſe cuſtoms is a ſure proof of their antiquity. In the laws of the draper's company at Paris, is a clauſe, by which it is ordained, that a diſh ſhall be provided for the king, at all public feaſts*; whence it is probable that the French monarchs uſed formerly to attend theſe meetings.

The metropolis continued almoſt daily to encreaſe in ſize. As the king, the princes of the blood, and the chief nobility, had made it their principal reſidence, the number of its inhabitants experienced a prodigious augmentation, which induced Charles to extend its limits. But, as the people were ſtill crowded together in houſes ill conſtructed, and of a great height, while the ſtreets were extremely narrow, Paris became very unwholeſome; and the air was farther corrupted by the uncleanlineſs of the inhabitants. An attempt was made to remedy this laſt evil by ſubjecting to a ſmall fine ſuch citizens as neglected to clear the filth from before their doors once a week; but the ſeverity of the edict was loudly complained of, and as much pains were taken to elude it, as to avoid the payment of an oppreſſive tax, ſo that the ſtreets were frequently impaſſable. To this muſt be aſcribed moſt of thoſe epidemic diſorders which were ſo prevalent in thoſe times. Inſtead of deſtroying the ſource of the diſorder, the people were accuſtomed to apply for relief to ſome particular ſaint, who thenceforth became the patron of that contagion he was ſupplicated to remove. Hence "the Divine, or Sacred fire," "the fire of the Holy Virgin," "the fire of St. Ambroiſe," &c.—St. Anthony's fire had long been known. In the eleventh century a gentleman of Dauphigny, named Gaſton, founded an order of perſons deſtined to attend on thoſe who were afflicted with it; the diſtinctive mark of this order was a T, affixed to the dreſs.

As Charles was fond of literature, he extended his protection to all who cultivated the ſciences. The taſte for ſtudy, which had been encouraged by Charlemagne, ceaſed under his deſcendants, and was but juſt revived. The literary monuments of that age, which are ſtill extant, give us no very favourable idea of the wiſdom of the clerks, ſo highly eſteemed by Charles; they only appear to advantage when compared with the more ſtupid productions of preceeding ages. The king had ſpared no expence to procure the beſt collection of books that could be had; and, as the art of printing was not yet invented, not only a very great expence, but great trouble alſo, muſt have been incurred in collecting even a ſmall library. In fact, a manuſcript was a precious thing; and often bequeathed as a conſiderable part of the ſucceſſion. Margaret of Sicily left a breviary to her father, the king of Sicily*. It was common to ſee a breviary carefully preſerved in the churches, in an iron cage, for the convenience of prieſts who had no books of their own: it was placed in a part of the church where there was moſt light, that ſeveral prieſts might recite their office at the ſame time.

The preſident Henaut ſays, that Charles may be juſtly conſidered as the true founder of the royal library†. John had not more than twenty volumes; but his ſon encreaſed them to nine hundred; a collection then juſtly conſidered as immenſe. Under the regency of the duke of Bedford, the nine hundred volumes were valued at two thouſand three hundred and twenty-three livres, four ſols; but that prince bought them for twelve hundred livres, and ſent them to London. Some of theſe volumes, however, are ſtill to be ſeen in the king's library at Paris; theſe muſt either have been at ſome of the royal manſions, at the time of the purchaſe, or elſe have been ſince bought up in England, and ſent over to France. Such was the commencement of the royal library, which was conſiderably augmented by Lewis the Twelfth and Francis the Firſt; but it was principally indebted to Lewis the Fourteenth and Fifteenth for that degree of magnificence, which renders it one of the moſt extenſive and valuable collections in Europe.

Among the books collected by Charles was a number of treatiſes on judicial aſtrology, which, during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was regarded as the climax of human knowledge. Charles cauſed all the books which had any relation to it to be tranſlated. This ſcience was held in ſuch high eſtimation, that every phyſician became an aſtrologer. The father of the king's phyſician had a wonderful knowledge of the influence of the ſtars on the diſeaſes of the human body, and on all the affairs of this world. "A learned maſter-aſ-" "tronomer" had foretold that the dauphin "would have much to do in his youth," "and would eſcape great dangers and adventures:" a prediction which made the king very uneaſy on his death-bed. Charles founded a college for the ſtudy of phyſic and aſtrology, in favour of Gervaſe Chretien, who was a great adept in theſe ſciences. The college was plentifully provided with aſtrolabes, quadrants, ſpheres, and other neceſſary inſtruments.

Had Charles confined his encouragement of the ſciences to the protection of judicial aſtrology, the nation would have been little indebted to his taſte; but, following the example of his father, he cauſed ſeveral of the ancient claſſics to be tranſlated into French. The chief of theſe were Suetonius, Valerius Maximus, and Joſephus; with a new and more correct tranſlation of Livy. The ethics and politics of Ariſtotle were tranſlated by Nicholas Oreſmus, and his problems by Evrard de Contis, phyſician to the king. John of Antioch tranſlated Cicero's Rhetoric, and the biſhop of Meaux undertook the Metamorphoſes of Ovid, at the requeſt of Jane of Bourbon, wife to Charles. St. Auguſtine's "City of God" was alſo tranſlated during his reign; as were the bible, the homilies and dialogues of pope Gregory, the decretals of the popes, and the inſtitutes of Juſtinian. The ſtatutes of different monaſteries were "done into French verſe," for the convenience of monks who did not underſtand Latin, though that language was taught not only in the univerſities, but even in ſome monaſteries. Elizabeth, daughter to Charles count of Valois, taught Latin in the convent of Dominican nuns at Poiſſey*.

Moſt of theſe tranſlations were faithleſs and incorrect. A contemporary writer repreſents the original authors as complaining of the ignorance of their tranſlators, who made them ſay things which they had never thought of. He then adds, "Oh, "how happy would have been the fate of books, had there been no tower of "Babel; for then there would have been but one language on the earth, and "no word would have ſtood in need of tranſlation†!"

The library of Charles contained many geographical charts‡, illuminated with different colours, according to the taſte of the times. The knowledge of the loadſtone had enabled French navigators to undertake long voyages. The inhabitants of Dieppe traded on the coaſt of Guinea, ſo early as the fourteenth century. A Dominican miſſionary, who had paſſed the line, addreſſed his diſcoveries to Philip of Valois; but, the ignorance in which the nations of Europe were then plunged, prevented this firſt diſcovery of a new world from attracting attention. The monk affirmed that the chriſtians did not form a twentieth part of the inhabitants of the globe, and alſo the exiſtence of the antipodes. The contrary opinion ſtill continued to prevail, and thoſe were treated as heritics, who believed that the globe could be equally peopled. Although geographical knowledge would have been of great utility to Charles in his aſtronomical reſearches, it made but little progreſs during his reign. Such a diſpoſition then prevailed to confound moral with phyſical objects, that the univer[illegible] of Paris, in ſome remonſtrances they made to the pope, obſerved that [illegible] ſhould not be conſidered as a part of Europe, becauſe it was a ſchiſmat[illegible]

* Bibl. Chart. Mém. de Litt. † Richard de Bury, Philobibl [illegible]

The multitude of chronicles compoſed in this century, moſt of which are ſtill extant in the libraries of France, prove, that the ſtudy of hiſtory was not neglected, though it does not appear that the hiſtorians of thoſe times profited from the examples afforded them by the writers of Greece and Rome. Froiſſard was the only one whoſe works were at once pleaſing and inſtructive; notwithſtanding their barbarous ſtyle, they are ſtill intereſting. They contain numerous miſtakes and miſrepreſentations. Froiſſard was a poet as well as an hiſtorian. He compoſed ſeveral poems on ſubjects that but ill-accorded with his profeſſion as a prieſt; ſuch as—"The Paradiſe of Love;" "The Temple of "Honour;" "The Daiſy;" "The Priſon of Love;" "The Roſe and the Vio-"let;" and a variety of amourous paſtorals, ballads, and roundelays. But the poems of Froiſſard, like all ſimilar productions of that age, were deſtitute of genius, taſte, and invention. Chronicles and private hiſtories in verſe were much in vogue; but reaſon was ſo entirely ſacrificed to rhime, that they had neither ſenſe, decency, nor truth, to recommend them. The ſacred poems were, if poſſible, ſtill more diſguſting, as they were more ſtrongly tinctured with the ignorance and vulgarity of the age in which they were written*.

The painters of this age were not more ſkilful than the poets; their chief merit conſiſted in repreſenting birds, inſects, trees, and flowers, in ſo brilliant colours, as ſtill to retain their original luſtre. When they painted human figures they exerted all their ſkill in preſerving, with the utmoſt preciſion, the dreſs, and the form of the hair; but they had no idea of expreſſing the paſſions, or, in ſhort, of giving the ſmalleſt degree of animation to the perſon or countenance. That their meaning, however, might not be ſubject to miſtake or miſrepreſentation, they had recourſe to written deſcriptions, explanatory of the ſubject. This curious expedient, which was long in vogue in France, originated in the following circumſtance: a friend of Bufamaleo, a painter of Florence, conſulting him on the beſt mode of giving expreſſion to his pictures, was adviſed to put words in the mouths of his figures, by means of labels, on which might be written what he wiſhed them to ſay. The ignorant artiſt followed his advice; he met with admirers as ignorant as himſelf, and his example was ſoon imitated. This ridiculous invention, being introduced into France, was adopted with avidity by the French painters. Nothing was then ſeen but pictures by queſtion and anſwer, and, for greater ſafety, they were careful to inſcribe on every figure the name of the perſon whom it was intended to repreſent. Some of theſe performances are ſtill extant; particularly in old tapeſtry. Water-colours alone were in uſe at this period; painting in oils was not introduced till the following century.

Villaret aſſerts† that the ſculptors of this period were equally ignorant with the painters; and that, except in ſome few of their baſſo relievos, and other decorations of the churches, they diſplayed a total want of taſte, intelligence, and order; that their productions were neither marked by ſimplicity, nor diſtinguiſhed for elegance; and that they were entirely ignorant of that connection which ſhould ever be preſerved between the different objects of repreſentation. Father Montfaucon is of a different opinion; he declares that the art of ſculpture had made a rapid progreſs; and that the ſculptors of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries greatly excelled their predeceſſors*. The few ſtatues and ſculptures which ſtill remain in England, of thoſe that were executed in France at this period, tend to confirm the truth of this declaration†.

The Gothic ſtyle of architecture was ſtill in uſe in France, as in other parts of Europe; and it ſeems to have been particularly calculated for religious buildings. The majeſty and magnificence of the Gothic ſtructures impreſs the mind with enthuſiaſtic awe; and what modern churches gain on the compariſon by neatneſs and elegance, they loſe in grandeur and ſublimity. With regard to other edifices, in their conſtruction neither comfort nor convenience appears to have been conſulted. In moſt private houſes, light was admitted through an aperture, defended only from the weather by a wooden ſhutter, a few ſheets of paper, or by canvas. Glaſs was an object of luxury reſerved for the habitations of the rich, the manſions of the nobility, and the palaces of kings. Theſe laſt were buildings of great extent, conſiſting of a ground-floor, a firſt-floor, divided into apartments of an immenſe ſize, and low garrets above. The furniture was as plain as the edifice. The king, and all the royal family, except the queen, ſat on wooden benches or joint-ſtools; the queen had chairs made of ſome pliant wood, embelliſhed with red leather, ſilk fringe, and gilt nails‡. Though there were chimnies to the palaces, a kind of ſtove was frequently uſed. The beams were decorated with fleurs-de-lys, made of gilt tin. There were two ſorts of beds, the one, called couchette, were not more than ſix feet ſquare: the other, called couches, were ſometimes twelve feet in length and eleven in breadth. The ſtate-apartments were richly decorated; the beds and alcoves were adorned with cloth of gold and ſilver, velvet, damaſk, ſatin, and tapeſtry. Glaſs mirrors were very ſcarce at this period; thoſe of poliſhed metal were generally uſed. The apartments occupied by the royal family were covered with tiles or ſlates; all the other parts of the building were thatched.

The favourite reſidence of Charles was the Hotel de St. Paul, which he built himſelf. The garden belonging to it covered twenty acres of ground; it extended along the banks of the Seine, from the ſpot were St. Paul's church now ſtands, to the Port au Platre‖. It contained a variety of plants, flowers, and vegetables, indiſcriminately mixed with yews and limes; and ſhady bowers. There were fruit-trees of almoſt every ſpecies; but they were all ſtandards; dwarfs and eſpaliers were not yet known. The king ordered one hundred pear-trees, one hundred and fifteen apple-trees, eleven hundred and twenty-five cherry-trees, and one hundred and fifty plumb-trees*, to be planted at one time. Theſe fruits were deſtined for the different tables of the royal family, and the great officers of the crown; the inferior officers were only allowed nuts. There was alſo a great number of fiſh-ponds in the garden well ſtocked for the twofold purpoſe of uſe and pleaſure. Adjoining to the palace was a menagerie, in which lions and wild boars were kept; and aviaries filled with birds of all kinds.

Moſt officers of the houſhold, who were very numerous, had apartments in the palace while on duty. In the kitchen, beſides the cooks and their aſſiſtants, were four pages, whoſe buſineſs it was to blow the fire conſtantly "that the king's ſoup might not be ſuffered to cool." A clerk was kept for buying cloth for the king and queen; which the taylor cut out in the preſence of witneſſes. The king's fool was one of the moſt important perſonages of the houſhold. Charles had two fools. There is a monument ſtill extant, which was raiſed to the memory of one of them, who is repreſented in marble and alabaſter, arrayed in the habit, and decorated with the attributes of folly, extended on a ſuperb mauſoleum†.

Whenever the king left home he was attended by a guard, compoſed of two huiſſiers, and eight ſerjeants-at-arms, with quivers. His carriage, as well as the queen's, was a waggon, drawn by five horſes; but he moſt commonly rode on horſeback; ſometimes, indeed, he walked from one palace to another‡.

The king's children were attended by the officers of the houſhold, till ſuch time as they received their appanage. The princeſſes were allowed a chevalier d'honneur, two female attendants, and a clerk to teach them to read.

The little progreſs which ſcience had hitherto made muſt not be aſcribed to any want of the neceſſary eſtabliſhments for cultivating it with ſucceſs. Several French monarchs, and Charles in particular, had been anxious to promote it. Many towns, ſuch as Montpelier, Orleans, and Poitiers, had univerſities endowed with valuable privileges. The univerſity of Paris was frequented by men of all nations. On the deciſion of a queſtion relative to the extinction of ſchiſms in the papacy, ten thouſand of its members voted; and, as graduates alone were admitted to that privilege, the number of ſtudents muſt have been great indeed‖. On this univerſity alone upwards of twenty colleges depended, in different parts of the kingdom.

Such was the eſtimation in which Ariſtotle was held, that, if any author ventured to deviate, in the ſmalleſt degree, from his ſyſtem, he took care to inform the public, that he did not mean to contradict the Grecian philoſopher, but only to comment on his works*.

Judicial aſtrology formed an obſtacle to the progreſs of medicine, by the falſe opinions with which it embarraſſed that ſcience. We learn from the capitularies of Charlemagne, that the ſtudy of medicine was cultivated in the reign of that emperor: it even appears that there was a part of the palace, appropriated to the reception of medical ſtudents; though there is no evidence that it ſubſiſted under his ſucceſſors. No public ſchools of medicine were eſtabliſhed till near the end of the twelfth century: thoſe of Salernum and Montpelier are regarded as the moſt ancient. The inſtitution of the faculty of medicine at Paris is placed under the reign of Philip Auguſtus. The ſtudents were, at firſt, compelled to undergo a courſe of ſtudy, which laſted nine years, before they were ſuffered to practiſe. The deſire of acquiring an art ſo eſſential to life, induced people of all profeſſions to engage in the ſtudy of phyſic. The monks and ſecular prieſts were forbidden to frequent the ſchools; but they tranſgreſſed the prohibition, or elſe obtained a diſpenſation; ſince it appears that numbers of the clergy paid a regular attendance. Celibacy was preſcribed to the agents of the faculty, and this reſtraint continued till the fifteenth century. The faculty had frequent diſputes with the ſurgeons, whoſe encroachments they endeavoured to repreſs, while theſe laſt were as often at war with the privileged barbers†, who practiſed to their prejudice. The apothecaries were, at this time, ſubject to the viſits of the faculty, before whom they were ſworn. They were obliged to keep a book, in which the quality of their medicines was marked. But the celebrity of their own ſchools did not prevent the French from giving a preference to foreign phyſicians; the Jews, in particular, were held in high eſtimation, nor did their credit diminiſh till the ſixteenth century. Francis the Firſt, being attacked by a diſorder which is ſaid to have baffled all the efforts of his own phyſicians, requeſted Charles the Fifth to ſend him a Jew of that profeſſion; the emperor accordingly diſpatched a converted Iſraelite to the court of France: but, when the king found that he had been converted to chriſtianity, he diſmiſſed him, not believing it poſſible that his cure could be effected by a chriſtian phyſician. An orthodox Jew was then ſent for, from Conſtantinople, who reſtored Francis by the uſe of aſſes' milk.

The rapidity with which the knowledge and ſtudy of the Roman law ſpread over Europe is amazing. The copy of the pandects of Juſtinian was found at Amalphi, in the year 1137. Irnerius opened a college of civil law at Bologna, a few years after‡. It began to be taught as a part of accademical learning in different parts of France before the middle of the century. Vaccarius gave lectures on the civil law at Oxford, ſo early as the year 1147. A regular ſyſtem of feudal law, evidently formed in imitation of the Roman code, was compoſed by two Milaneſe lawyers, about the year 1150. Peter de Fontains, who tells us that he was the firſt who had attempted ſuch a work in France, compoſed his Conſeil, which contains an account of the cuſtoms of the country of Vermandois, in the reign of St. Lewis. Beaumanoir, author of the Couſtumes de Beuvoiſois, lived about the ſame period. The "Eſtabliſhments" of St. Lewis were publiſhed by the authority of that monarch. As ſoon as men became acquainted with the advantages of having written cuſtoms and laws to which they could have recourſe on every occaſion, the method of collecting them became common*.

The civil law was taught in all the ſchools throughout the kingdom, till the commencement of the thirteenth century, when pope Honorius forbade lectures on the civil law to be read in the univerſity of Paris. This interdiction aroſe from the apprehenſion that the ſtudy of the law might ſuperſede that of divinity. Notwithſtanding the efforts that were made to renew thoſe lectures, the utility of which had been experienced, the prohibition continued to operate for upwards of three centuries. Thoſe who wiſhed to gain inſtruction in the civil juriſprudence, were obliged to have recourſe to other univerſities. The liberty of teaching it was not fully reſtored to that of Paris, till the reign of Lewis the Fourteenth, who publiſhed an ordonnance for that purpoſe, in the year 1679.

The eſtabliſhment of the various impoſts which the wants of the ſtate had rendered indiſpenſable, required the publication of edicts, either to explain the nature, or to regulate the collection of them. Theſe edicts required to be interpreted, to facilitate their execution, to prevent miſtakes, and to correct abuſes. The interpretation and collection of the different regulations with regard to the finances began to form a new ſpecies of juriſprudence, which might have been denominated the revenue-code. The adminiſtration of the public revenue has, in all times, determined the actual force of a nation; it therefore forms one of the moſt eſſential objects of government; a truth, of which Charles fully convinced himſelf; but, the meaſures he was led to adopt were not attended with all the ſucceſs he had reaſon to expect from them. The inſatiate avarice of thoſe who took the taxes to farm, was diſplayed in a thouſand plans for ruining both prince and people. The exertions of the ſovereign and his council to fruſtrate their machinations proved ineffectual; no ſooner was one abuſe corrected than another ſprang up to replace it. A part of the myſteries, to which the induſtry of avarice gave birth, may be diſcovered from a peruſal of the ordonnances paſſed at this period: men, equally deſtitute of property and principle, were ſuffered to farm the taxes, the produce of which was frequently received and not accounted for; ſometimes it was appropriated to other purpoſes than thoſe for which it was deſtined; imaginary expences were charged for the conveyance of money which had never quitted the hands of the perſon who received it; falſe receipts were given, and delays in payments obtained on faiſe pretences. In ſhort, nothing was omitted which intereſted ingenuity could ſuggeſt for defrauding the prince; though theſe frauds were trivial, when compared to thoſe which were committed on the people. It ſeemed as if theſe ſubaltern tyrants, united by intereſt, had agreed to divide between them the ſpoils of the kingdom. Adjudicators, receivers, comptrollers, viſitors, all, in ſhort, who had any concern with the revenue, had their fixed ſhare of the general plunder. They made the people pay the ſame tax twice. They uſed the moſt rigourous means for enforcing the payment before it was due, in the view of profiting by the exaction of uſurious intereſt; they had the audacity to levy impoſts invented by themſelves. Such as were unable immediately to ſatisfy their demands, were compelled to abandon their habitations to theſe rapacious vultures. Even the loweſt officers of the revenue thought themſelves authoriſed to oppreſs the public. Wherever this privileged banditti appeared, deſolation attended their ſteps. They always found ſome pretence for entering private houſes; and, ſuch was the terror which their preſence inſpired, that the inhabitants paid them for retiring; even thoſe who had paid the taxes with the utmoſt punctuality were equally ſubject to their viſits, nor had they any means of defence againſt men who were at once plaintiffs, judges, and executioners: in vain did they produce their receipts, they were obliged to ſatisfy the arbitrary demands of theſe wretches. Ordonnance was paſſed after ordonnance, and the moſt ſevere injunctions were iſſued, but they were ſcarely ſufficient to remove a ſmall part of theſe flagrant abuſes, while the culprits were ſcreened from puniſhment by the protection of thoſe in power.

The oppreſſors of the people purchaſed impunity by ſupplying their powerful patrons with the means of ſupporting their extravagance. The apologiſts for luxury have vainly aſſerted that it is a ſure proof of wealth in a great kingdom, though it may accelerate the ruin of a ſmall one. Neceſſarily productive of effeminacy, confuſion of ranks and conditions, neglect of duty, and corruption of manners, it is equally deſtructive to both, with this difference only, that the ruin of a ſmall republic is more rapid than that of a vaſt empire; as the flames conſume a buſh ſooner than a foreſt. The government had long been conſtrained to prohibit the citizens from uſing Cars; to regulate the price of ſtuffs according to the rank of thoſe who wore them; to fix the difference of furs uſed in dreſs, by the ſame ſtandard; to prevent, as much as poſſible, the introduction of foreign cloths, in order to encourage the manufactures; in ſhort, to attempt the reſtoration of plenty by the eſtabliſhment of moderation. The vigilance of the laws was eluded by the invention of vanity: as ſoon as one faſhion was ſuppreſſed another was adopted, perpetual variations occurred, and the ingenuity of the people ſurpaſſed the rigour of government.

Gaming was one of the prevailing vices of the age; and though it had been proſcribed by the ſevereſt edicts, it ſtill continued to thrive with undiminiſhed vigour. Games of dice appear to have been moſt in vogue; and the nobility gave themſelves up ſo completely to this deſtructive paſſion, that many of them were reduced to a ſtate of poverty the moſt degrading. It was the only amuſement to which military men, devoted their leiſure hours; ignorant and unlettered, their minds were not ſuſceptible of more rational recreation. Even the princes of the blood were not uninfected by the general diſorder. James, count of la Marche, having received from Charles the Sixth conſiderable ſums, for defraying the expenſes of a projected invaſion of England, diſſipated them all, and returned without accompliſhing the object he had in view. "He ſpent all "he had received," ſays an ancient chronicle*, "in ſtupid prodigality, on wo-"men and dice." On his return through Orleans, from this curious expedition, the ſcholars aſſembled in a body on the road, and ſaluted him by ſinging Mare videt et fugit.—He ſaw the ſea, and fled.

Muſic and dancing have always formed the characteriſtic amuſements of the French nation. At this time they were held in high eſteem, and all who taught them experienced encouragement. Charles was paſſionately fond of muſic. In Paris, as in moſt great towns, the muſicians formed a company under the direction of a chief, who was called the "The King of the Fidlers;" and whoſe buſineſs it was to keep the corps in order, and to enforce the obſervance of the laws by which they were governed. Theſe laws were framed by themſelves, and not unfrequently confirmed by the king. The muſicians were invited to all feaſts, and the poets often aſſociated with them, in order that their productions might derive additional luſtre from the accompaniment of muſic. When the actors, muſicians, and rhymers united, they were diſtinguiſhed by the general denomination of jugglers. They frequented the palaces of the great, and the private habitations of the wealthy. They often exhibited their performances on ſcaffolds erected in the market-places, and endeavoured to attract the attention of the vulgar by the repreſentation of indecent farces. The government, wiſhing to repreſs this licentiouſneſs, publiſhed an ordonnance, forbidding the jugglers, under pain of impriſonment and an arbitrary fine, to recite, repreſent, or ſing, in the public ſtreets, or elſewhere, any thing offenſive to modeſty. Such was the rude commencement of theatrical exhibitions, which, under the ſucceeding reign, began to aſſume that form which they ſtill retain.

One of the moſt uſeful diſcoveries of the fourteenth century was the invention of ſpectacles: but the name of the inventor has not been preſerved. It appears that he was anxious to keep the ſecret to himſelf, but, that it was divulged, not-withſtanding his care to conceal it; for an ancient chronicle relates that a monk, named Alexandro de Spina, made ſpectacles and gave them away, while the perſon who invented them refuſed to let the public partake of the advantage of his diſcovery*. This invention facilitated the progreſs of aſtronomy; and, by the introduction of teleſcopes, gave the aſtronomers of that age an advantage over the ancients.

This period is farther remarkable for the introduction of paper-manufactories, into France, at a time, when they were peculiarly acceptable; ſince men, having recently emerged from a ſtate of ignorance the moſt profound, were ſeized with a rage for writing. The Romans wrote their books either on parchment, or on paper made of the Egyptian papyrus. The latter, being the cheapeſt, was the moſt commonly uſed. But, after the Saracens conquered Egypt, in the ſeventh century, the communication between that country and the people ſettled in Italy, or in other parts of Europe, was almoſt entirely broken off, and the papyrus was no longer in uſe among them. They were obliged, on that account, to write all their books upon parchment; and, as the price of that was high, books became extremely rare, and of great value. We may judge of the ſcarcity of the materials for writing them from one circumſtance. There ſtill remain many manuſcripts of the eighth, ninth, and following centuries, written on parchment, from which ſome former writing had been eraſed, in order to ſubſtitute a new compoſition in its place. In this manner, it is probable, that ſeveral works of the ancients periſhed. A book of Livy or of Tacitus might be eraſed, to make room for the tale of a ſaint, or the prayer of a miſſal†. P. de Montfaucon affirms, that the greater part of the manuſcripts on parchment which he has ſeen, thoſe of an ancient date excepted, are written on parchment from which ſome former book had been eraſed. As the want of materials for writing, is one reaſon why ſo many of the works of the ancients have periſhed, it accounts likewiſe for the ſmall number of manuſcripts of any kind, previous to the eleventh century, when the means for encreaſing them were ſupplied. Many circumſtances prove the ſcarcity of books during theſe ages. Private perſons ſeldom poſſeſſed any books whatever. Even monaſteries, of conſiderable note, had only one miſſal. Lupus, abbot of Ferriers, in a letter to the pope, A. D. 855, beſeeches him to lend him a copy of Cicero de Oratore, and Quintilian's inſtitutions; "for," ſays he, "although "we have part of thoſe books, there is no complete copy of them in all France." The price of books became ſo high, that perſons of a moderate fortune could not afford to purchaſe them. The counteſs of Anjou paid, for a copy of the homilies of Haimon, biſhop of Halberſtadt, two hundred ſheep, five quarters of wheat, and the ſame quantity of rye and millet. Even ſo late as the year 1471, when Lewis the Eleventh, borrowed the works of Raſis, the Arabian phyſician, from the faculty of medicine in Paris, he not only depoſited in pledge a conſiderable quantity of plate, but was obliged to procure a nobleman to join with him as ſurety in a deed, binding himſelf under a great forfeiture to reſtore it. When any perſon made a preſent of a book to a church or a monaſtery, in which were the only libraries during theſe ages, it was deemed a donative of ſuch value, that he offered it on the altar pro remedio animæ ſuæ, in order to obtain the forgiveneſs of his ſins. In the eleventh century, the art of making paper from rags was invented; by means of which not only the number of manuſcripts encreaſed, but the ſtudy of the ſciences was wonderfully facilitated*. But, whether the art was but imperfectly underſtood, or whether this new invention did not meet with the encouragement it deſerved, no veſtige of it is to be met with in France earlier than the reign of Saint Lewis; even after that time it was but little uſed, and it was, moreover, brought from Lombardy, till the fourteenth century, when ſeveral manufactories of paper were eſtabliſhed in the kingdom; the firſt of which were thoſe of Eſſonne and Troyes†.

The art of clock-making had been greatly neglected ſince the famous Gerbert had, about the tenth century, invented clocks that moved by wheels. This neglect ſuffices to prove with how little ardour the diſcoveries of genius were purſued. During the day the ſun, or elſe an hour-glaſs, ſerved for a clock; and in the night a wax-light, marked at different diſtances to indicate the hours anſwered the ſame purpoſe: the firſt large clock that was introduced into France, was the work of a German, named Henry de Vic, who was invited to Paris by Charles. This clock, which ſtruck the hours, was placed in the tower of the king's palace. Some years after another was put up at the cathedral of Sens, when the king paid one half of the expence of a wooden caſe in which it was encloſed. The town of Dijon is ſtill in poſſeſſion of a clock made at this period, which the duke of Burgundy brought from Courtrai, when that town was taken by the French, at the commencement of the reign of Charles the Sixth.

The ingredients of gunpowder, and the art of making it, were known to the celebrated Roger Bacon‡, an Engliſh monk, who was born near Ilcheſter in the year 1214. But that capricious philoſopher, ſo tranſpoſed the letters of the Latin words which ſignify charcoal, as to render the whole obſcure and unintelligible.—"Sed tamen ſalis petræ, luru mope can ubre, (carbonum pulvere,) et "ſulphuris; et ſic facies tonitrum et corruſcationem, ſi ſcias artificium." By this means he rendered it difficult for any one to diſcover the fatal ſecret by the peruſal of his works, and ſecured to himſelf the honour of the invention, if it ſhould be diſcovered by any other perſon. This accordingly happened not long after Bacon's death, which occurred in 1292; Barthold Schwartz, otherwiſe called the Black Monk, or Conſtantine Ancklitzen, a native of Fribourg in Germany, having put ſome ſaltpetre, ſulphur, and charcoal into a mortar, for ſome chymical preparation*, a ſpark of fire accidently flew into it; when the mortar was rent aſunder by the ſudden exploſion. The monk, who, eſcaped with his life, had no ſooner recovered from his fright, than he began to make experiments, which, by moderating the effects of this dreadful compoſition, taught him how to uſe it as a ſure engine of deſtruction.

The exact period when gunpowder and fire-arms were firſt employed by the French is not aſcertained with preciſion. The following article appears in the accounts of the treaſurer of war, in the year 1338—"To Henry de Faumichan, "for gunpowder and other things neceſſary for the cannon at the ſiege of Puy-"Guillaume†." In 1340, the Engliſh were compelled to raiſe the ſiege of Eu, at which artillery was employed by the garriſon: this artillery conſiſted of two large "iron boxes," which they loaded with round pebbles. It was conſidered as a remarkable inſtance of good fortune, that theſe pieces had ſuſtained no damage; which proves, that the art of managing them with effect was then unknown, and this was probably one of the reaſons which ſo long prevented them from being generally uſed‡. But we are told by Froiſſard‖, that when the Engliſh laid ſiege to St. Malo, in 1373, they had four hundred cannon with them, which they muſt have known how to manage, or they would never have encumbered themſelves with ſo many. It is evident, indeed, that moſt of theſe muſt have been a ſmaller kind of fire-arms, called hand-cannons, one of which was carried by two men, and fired from a reſt fixed in the ground§. Theſe portable fire-arms were not introduced into France till the reign of Charles the Sixth. Their introduction gave a fatal blow to chivalry, and effected a total alteration in the art of war. The braveſt warrior could no longer rely on his perſonal proweſs, or the excellence of his arms, as means of defence againſt an adverſary, who, though deſtitute of courage, might, with ſucceſs attack him at a diſtance. A tranquil intrepidity, accuſtomed to give and to receive death without deſign as without fear, was now ſubſtituted in the room of that active valour which had hitherto been deemed the chief ſupport of hoſtile armies. By this new mode of fighting every man was rendered fit for the purpoſes of war. Armies were more numerous, and nations exhauſted their reſources in augmenting their military forces.

From this ſhort ſketch of the laws and cuſtoms of the French in the fourteenth century, it muſt appear that there was nothing in their general knowledge, in their arts, nor in their pleaſures, worthy of imitation or regret.—But do their virtues form a juſt object of envy to their poſterity? The recital of their actions, and the events they produced, will afford the beſt ſolution of the problem.

CHARLES THE SIXTH.

A. D. 1380.] THE funeral of Charles had been retarded by the miſunderſtanding which prevailed between the princes of the blood. They had ſurrounded the bed of the dying monarch, with the ſemblance of affection; but he no ſooner breathed his laſt than his body was abandoned to the care of his attendants. The dukes of Burgundy, Berry, and Bourbon, haſtened to ſecure the perſons of the young princes, who were then at Melun, while the duke of Anjou hurried to Paris, to ſeize ſuch treaſures of the late king as were there depoſited. The gold and ſilver coin, amaſſed by the economy of Charles, had been melted, formed into ingots, and lodged in a ſtrong room in the palace. The exact amount of this property has never been aſcertained; whatever it was, the duke of Anjou ſeized it all, and never accounted for it to the ſtate. This theft proved the ſource of moſt calamities with which the kingdom was, in the ſequel, afflicted.

The princes, who had hitherto been reſtrained by reſpect for their deceaſed ſovereign, now began to purſue without diſguiſe their projects of ambition. Each aſſembled his friends and dependants, and exerted every effort to augment their number. The court was divided; and military men haſted to range themſelves under the ſtandards of the different parties. Already various bodies of troops approached the metropolis; Paris was inveſted, and the commencement of hoſtilities was announced by the depredations committed on the ſurrounding country. The people rejoiced at this appearance of confuſion, and reſolved to encreaſe the general anarchy, without reflecting, that it was their intereſt to adopt that line of conduct which muſt tend to the preſervation of peace and order.

Of the brothers of the late king, the duke of Anjou had the leaſt claim to reſpect; though adorned with every grace of perſon, endued with wit, eloquence, and courage, his accompliſhments were greatly over-balanced by his vices; he was ambitious, inflexible, avaricious and cruel. The duke of Berry was equally deſtitute of virtue, and would have poſſeſſed all the glaring defects of his brother, had they not been tempered and modified by his exceſſive indolence; in one point, however, they eſſentially differed; the latter was a cautious miſer, the former an undiſcerning ſpendthrift. The duke of Burgundy was endowed with qualities to excite admiration and to command eſteem; in youth he had given unequivocal proofs of his courage, and it never forſook him at the lateſt period of his life; though his mind was not ſhut againſt ambition, it was open to generoſity; his affability, his inſinuating manners, and liberal ſoul, ſecured the affections of all who approached him. He would have been juſtly eſteemed the moſt accompliſhed prince of the age, had he not been ſurpaſſed in merit by the duke of Bourbon, maternal uncle to the youthful monarch, who joined to all the advantages which reſult from the beſt qualifications of head and heart, the ſplendour of virtue. But he was, unfortunately, placed by his birth in a ſubordinate ſtation, where his talents and integrity had leſs room for exertion. Such were the four arbiters of the fate of France.

Though the late king had, when he ſettled the buſineſs of the regency, entruſted the care of his children to the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, the duke of Anjou, inſiſted that the government of the kingdom, and the care of the princes, ſhould alike veſt in himſelf. Theſe pretenſions were of courſe reſiſted by his brothers, and a civil war was on the point of breaking out, when the four dukes agreed to refer the deciſion of the matter to arbitration; four arbiters were accordingly appointed, whoſe names have not been preſerved in hiſtory.

The umpires took a ſolemn oath, to be guided only by a ſtrict regard for the welfare of the king and kingdom*. After ſome deliberation, they ſubmitted their judgment to the princes, by whom it was ſolemnly confirmed, at a bed of juſtice convened for the purpoſe; at which were preſent, the duke of Anjou, as regent; the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon; Meaux and Chartres, beſides many of the nobility, prelates, and barons. The reſult of the arbitration was, that the king, though he had not yet attained the age required by the laws, ſhould be crowned at Rheims, and take upon himſelf the government of the realm, under the guidance and direction of his uncles. It was farther privately agreed between the princes, that the education of the young monarch and his brother ſhould be entruſted to the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, who were appointed ſuperintendants of the royal houſhold; and that the duke of Anjou ſhould keep the regency till the king's coronation, which was fixed for the end of October. This laſt prince was induced to withdraw thoſe ambitious claims which he had at firſt advanced, on being permitted to appropriate to his own uſe all the furniture, plate, and jewels belonging to his deceaſed brother, except ſuch as were immediately neceſſary for his ſon and ſucceſſor. A private fund was ſet apart for the ſupport of the young princes, ariſing from the revenues of particular provinces; and the remainder of the public revenue, after all expences had been paid, was to be placed in the royal treaſury, there to remain till the king ſhould have attained the age of majority, and hence have acquired the right to diſpoſe of it.

Paris was ſtill ſurrounded by troops, who laid waſte the neighbouring country; expelled the inhabitants of the villages from their habitations, and forced them to take refuge in the walled towns. They infeſted the public roads, and ſtripped the paſſengers, in order, they ſaid, to procure payment of their wages, which they were unable to obtain from the regent. Theſe diſorders occaſioned continual diſputes in the council, where the duke of Burgundy preſſed his brother to pay the troops, moſt of whom were under his own command, with the money which he had ſeized. But, inſtead of complying with this requeſt, the regent determined to diſband all the regular companies which had been embodied by Charles, except thoſe of the count of Sancerre and Oliver de Cliſſon. He was unable to put this expedient in execution, and the attempt multiplied the cauſes of diſcontent.

The people, who had waited with impatience for the abolition of the taxes, as ordered by the late king, began to murmur at the delay. Their complaints grew louder, when, inſtead of finding their burdens removed, they ſaw themſelves more haraſſed than before; not only by an augmentation of the impoſts, but, by the oppreſſive manner in which the receivers, who were themſelves preſſed by the regent, urged them to pay their arrears. They, at firſt, threatened; and then proceeded to open inſurrection. The officers for receiving the taxes were plundered at Compiegne, and ſeveral towns in Picardy. The contagion, ſpreading by degrees, ſoon reached the capital. About two hundred of the populace aſſembling, compelled John Culdoe, provoſt of the merchants, to place himſelf at their head, and conduct them to the palace. He led them to the regent, to whom he preſented their requeſt; the inſurgents exclaimed with one voice, that they would no longer pay any taxes, and that they would ſooner die than ſubmit to ſo many exactions. The duke of Anjou had neither equity to examine the demands of the people, nor firmneſs to repreſs their firſt efforts. He in vain endeavoured to appeaſe them by vague promiſes; all he could obtain was an aſſurance that they would proceed no farther till the king's return to the capital. They retired with the reſolution of perſiſting in their pretenſions, and proud of having made the authority of the regent bend before them. This ſucceſs increaſed their inſolence, and cemented their union; their numbers daily augmented.

The duke of Anjou was leſs anxious to avert the threatened attack on the ſovereign power, than to profit by his own ſtation, which he was ſo ſhortly deſtined to reſign. For a valuable conſideration he confirmed the privileges which the Jews had obtained during the preceding reign; prolonged the time of their reſidence in the kingdom, by adding five years to the term preſcribed by Charles; exempted ſeveral of the moſt opulent from the neceſſity of wearing a badge of diſtinction; and gave them a general abſolution for all the crimes which they had committed againſt the ſtate or the king.

Meanwhile the neceſſary preparations for the coronation were carried on; and the court were actually on the road to Rheims, when the apparent calm that ſubſiſted between the princes was ſuddenly interrupted. The ſeizure of the treaſure, the furniture, plate, and jewels of the late king, had not ſatisfied the avidity of the duke of Anjou. Informed, by the officers of the guard, that Charles had depoſited a treaſure in the caſtle of Melun, he queſtioned Philip de Savoiſy, one of his chamberlains, on the ſubject; and that nobleman, eluding his queſtions, and deſpiſing his threats, the regent ſent for the executioner, who was ordered to put him inſtantly to death, unleſs he revealed the ſecret. By this means he diſcovered the object of his ſearch, conſiſting of a quantity of ingots of gold and ſilver, which Charles had carefully concealed in the walls, and which his brother now carried off.

The confuſion occaſioned by this violent exertion delayed the coronation for ſome days; ſo that the young monarch did not make his public entry into Rheims, till the third of November. The ceremony was performed in preſence of the king's uncles; and moſt of the principal nobility of France. At the feaſt which ſucceeded the coronation, the diſhes were placed on the table, and the gueſts were waited on by Oliver de Cliſſon, and ſome other nobles arrayed in cloth of gold, and mounted on ſuperb courſers.

When the court returned to the capital, care was taken to avoid all the towns on the road, that the people might have no opportunity of applying for a repeal of the taxes. The king entered Paris amidſt the acclamations of the inhabitants. His acceſſion to the throne was celebrated by public rejoicings.

But the Pariſians, emboldened by the ſucceſs of their laſt application to the duke of Anjou, thought themſelves ſufficiently formidable to enforce any requeſt they might be induced to prefer. Moſt of the reputable citizens, however, condemned the ſeditious commotions; the tumult was excited by men in deſperate circumſtances, with which every great city abounds. John Culdoe, provoſt of the merchants, endeavoured to avert the impending ſtorm, by calling a meeting of the principal citizens; but the populace repaired in crowds to the appointed place, and baffled all attempts to enforce obedience to the laws. A cobler acted as orator for the people; in his ſpeech he attacked not only the princes and nobility, but even many reſpectable citizens, whom he accuſed of forſaking the popular cauſe. The people drew their ſwords and ſurrounding the provoſt, compelled him to lead them to the palace. When they arrived, they called for the duke of Anjou. That prince appeared. The provoſt of the merchants had a difficult part to ſupport; ſince he was equally fearful of offending the duke, and of irritating the people: while he expatiated on the public miſery, and the neceſſity of immediate relief, he inſinuated, in cautious terms, the inability of the people to pay the taxes, and their reſolution to ſacrifice every thing to obtain a repeal. The duke of Anjou was equally circumſpect in his reply; and, when he had ſomewhat calmed the minds of the populace, the chancellor addreſſed them, and adviſed them to return peaceably home, promiſing that their requeſt ſhould be taken into immediate conſideration, and a deciſive anſwer given on the morrow. The inſurgents retired.

The queſtion was diſcuſſed in the council; where the neceſſity of appearing to yield to the inſolence of an infatuated populace, was enforced. The demands of the people were juſt, but the mode of preferring them was culpable. Thoſe who held the reins of government had neither penetration to diſcover, nor courage to adopt ſuch meaſures as were moſt conformable to reaſon, and to the majeſty of the throne. While the chief members of the council were involved in a ſtate of uncertainty, the inſurgents aſſembled, and the revolt becoming general, the court was intimidated. By this indeciſion the princes had loſt the opportunity of granting as a favour, what they were now compelled to accord through fear. The chancellor was ordered to announce the abolition of the impoſts, and the neceſſary letters for that purpoſe were publiſhed the next day*.

It was imagined that this act of condeſcenſion would reſtore tranquillity; but the chancellor had no ſooner finiſhed his ſpeech, than a general clamour was heard. The people inſiſted on the expulſion of the Jews; the chancellor replied, that he would ſpeak to the king on the ſubject, who, he doubted not, would give them the ſatisfaction they required. The council did not ſuppoſe that this new demand would be productive of any ſerious conſequences; but the inſurgents, aſſembled the next day, at the inſtigation, it is ſaid, of certain noblemen who had borrowed conſiderable ſums from the Jews. The houſes of the public receivers, moſt of whom were Jews or Lombards, were broken open, the cheſts in which the money was depoſited were ſeized upon, and their contents emptied in the ſtreets; while the regiſters and all other papers, not forgetting bonds and other ſecurities for money lent, were deſtroyed. In one ſtreet alone thirty houſes were pillaged, and the furniture became the prey of the populace. The Jews endeavoured to preſerve their lives by flight; but moſt of them were intercepted and maſſacred, while the few that eſcaped fled for refuge to the dungeons of the Chatelet. Their wives, in deſpair, attempted to follow their huſbands, with their children in their arms; but the mob forced the children from them, and carried them to be baptized†. The government was too weak to inflict on the inſurgents the puniſhment which they deſerved; the council, indeed, re-eſtabliſhed the Jews in their habitations, and iſſued an order for every one to reſtore, under pain of death, whatever he had taken from them; but the order was treated with contempt. The Jews, after being deſpoiled of their property, were expoſed to proſecution from thoſe who had placed pledges in their hands; but an ordonnance was paſſed to exempt them from the conſequences, on taking an oath that the property, which was the object of the action, had been taken from them during the tumult.

The harmony between the princes was inceſſantly on the point of being interrupted, by the intervention of ſome new ſubject for diſpute. The duke of Berry, who had hitherto evinced no ambitious deſires, ſuddenly awoke from his lethargy, and demanded the government of Languedoc, which was granted him, and with ſuch extenſive powers, that he was rather ſovereign than governor of the province*. The duke of Burgundy obtained the government of Normandy on the ſame conditions. By continuing thus to diſmember the kingdom, it would ſoon have been reduced to the ſame ſtate in which it was under the laſt kings of the ſecond race.

In November, Oliver de Cliſſon was promoted to the dignity of conſtable, which had remained vacant ever ſince the death of du Gueſclin, and at the ſame time the ſtates of the Langue d'oyl aſſembled at Paris, to ſettle the form of government. It was probably at this aſſembly of the ſtates, that the dukes of Anjou, Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon, agreed between themſelves, that, in future, every thing ſhould be decided in the council, by them, or two or three of them; that they ſhould chuſe twelve perſons to compoſe the council; that they ſhould diſpoſe of all places whatever; that the adminiſtration of the finances ſhould be ſubject to their controul; that the demeſnes of the crown ſhould only be alienated for life; that a regular account of the produce of the revenue ſhould be kept, to be delivered to the young king, when of age; and that the care of the king and his brother ſhould ſtill be entruſted to the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon.

The princes, far from obtaining, from the ſtates, the re-eſtabliſhment of the taxes which had been recently aboliſhed, were obliged to confirm the letters of ſuppreſſion†. Nor were the deputies contented with the ſimple abolition of the impoſts; feeling their ſuperiority they went farther. In times of trouble and confuſion the ſame conduct was invariably obſerved; the nation inſiſted that the ancient form of government ſhould be reſtored, without reflecting that circumſtances being changed, and a material alteration effected in the political ſyſtem, the ſame rule of adminiſtration could no longer be followed. Thoſe who were able to enforce theſe objections, wanted the neceſſary credit to procure them a favourable reception; while thoſe who were at the head of affairs were too much occupied in conſulting their own intereſts to attend to thoſe of the king or people. The ſtates, therefore, obtained their demand. In conſequence of the complaints preferred by the three orders a declaration was drawn up, by which the king aboliſhed all innovations introduced into the government ſince the reign of Philip the Fourth, and reſtored to the nation its franchiſes, liberties, privileges, and immunities, renouncing for himſelf and ſucceſſors, all prerogatives hoſtile thereto. By this means the ſovereign found himſelf reduced to ſubſiſt on the produce of his own demeſnes, which was, indeed, ſufficient for his ſupport, had not ſo many alienations been made, but which was no longer adequate to defray the additional expences of the ſtate, augmented by the number of regular troops kept in conſtant pay, and the ſenſible diminution, and inutility of feudal ſervice. This reform, adopted by the ſtates, and publiſhed in pompous terms, inſtead of a public good, which it profeſſed to have in view, was productive of evil. The impoſſibility of reducing it to practice ſupplied a freſh ſubject for diſcontent to the people, whom neither mildneſs could ſoothe nor ſeverity intimidate; and it proved an endleſs ſource of diviſion between the prince and his ſubjects. It is neceſſary to be circumſtantial in detailing the firſt events of this reign, as the revolutions by which they were ſucceeded were the conſequence of the imprudent conduct of thoſe who then exerciſed the ſovereign power.

The troubles which now began to appear in the capital alarmed government. The number of its inhabitants daily encreaſed. The licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiery, who committed devaſtations in the country, compelled the farmers and peaſants to quit their habitations, and take refuge in the walled towns. In Paris, all whom profligacy or idleneſs had reduced to a ſtate of poverty, all the refuſe of the nation, in ſhort, flocked together, and held nocturnal aſſemblies, in which they meditated the deſtruction of the wealthy citizens, whoſe opulence they envied; and of the government which they deteſted. Compelled to procure ſubſiſtence by unlawful means, they committed depredations which it was difficult to repreſs.

The government of Paris, which conferred the title of Captain on the perſon who poſſeſſed it, had, for a long time, been united to the Provoſtſhip. But it was now thought proper to divide theſe offices; and that of captain of the city of Paris, was accordingly conferred on Maurice de Treſiguidy. The duties of this magiſtrate nearly reſembled thoſe of an Engliſh juſtice of the peace. His ſalary was, at firſt, ſix hundred livres, but it was doubled a few days after his appointment.

A. D. 1381.] After the duke of Anjou had left the army, on the news of his brother's illneſs, the troops ranged themſelves along the banks of the Sartre, which the Engliſh were obliged to paſs. To obſtruct their paſſage, the French had ſtuck piles in the bottom of the river, the tops of which reached the ſurface of the water, and on the oppoſite ſide they had thrown up entrenchments. When the duke of Buckingham approached, he became ſenſible of the danger of his ſituation; and, had the French troops been careful to guard the paſſages of the river, it is probable that, encloſed as he was in an enemy's country, he would ſoon have been reduced, by famine, to the neceſſity of capitulating. But the death of Charles threw the whole army into confuſion; the paſſages were left unguarded; and the duke, diſmounting his men at arms, made them enter the water and remove the piles: this they were ſuffered to do without oppoſition; the Engliſh then forded the river, and, after a tedious march, arrived ſafe in Brittany.

The duke of Brittany, who at this time reſided at Hennebonne, was wholly at a loſs how to act. The defection of a great part of the duchy, ſince he had determined to have recourſe to England, had at length convinced him that he would never enjoy his dominions in tranquillity, ſo long as he had the enmity of France to encounter. The Bretons were averſe from the French, but they deteſted the Engliſh. Beſides, Charles who had perſecuted the duke, was now dead; and he might hope to obtain, by a treaty with the new government, an advantage which the chance of war rendered uncertain. But as he had invited the Engliſh to his aſſiſtance, he found it neceſſary to treat them with ſome degree of civility; he therefore ſent the biſhop of Laon, and ſome other of the nobility, to congratulate the duke of Buckingham on his arrival, and to aſſure him that he would join him without delay.

The Engliſh general, though ſurpriſed at this coolneſs, continued his march; but, when he arrived at Vannes, the inhabitants ſhut the gates of the city againſt him, and he was compelled to lodge his troops in the ſuburbs. After waiting there a fortnight, without receiving any intelligence of the duke, he moved onwards, ſending before him a detachment of one thouſand men, under the conduct of ſir Thomas Percy, ſir Thomas Trivet, and ſir Robert Knolles. Montfort, informed of their approach, went to meet them; and, it was agreed that the Engliſh ſhould lay ſiege to Nantes, and that Montfort ſhould join them in a fortnight. But, when he attempted to collect his troops for that purpoſe, the officers, almoſt unanimouſly, refuſed to obey his orders.

Thus abandoned by his ſubjects, the duke of Brittany was, at length, compelled to treat with France; but before he opened the negociation, he privately ſent for an apoſtolical notary, in whoſe preſence he diſavowed all treaties which he might conclude with the new king of France, as far as they ſhould be inconſiſtent with the engagements that he had previouſly contracted with the Engliſh. The negociations were ſoon brought to a concluſion, and a peace was ſigned on the fifteenth of January, 1381, by which the duke engaged to renounce his alliance with England; to ſend home the Engliſh army; and to hold his duchy of the crown of France.

The duke of Buckingham had, in the mean time, been compelled to raiſe the ſiege of Nantes, and to retire into winter-quarters at Vannes, and the neighbouring towns. Nothing could exceed his indignation when he heard of this treaty; Montfort, however, pleaded in his defence the ſupreme law of neceſſity, and endeavoured to appeaſe the duke by promiſing that he would never join the French againſt the Engliſh, a promiſe which he procured to be ſigned by the principal nobility of Brittany; he then produced the ſecret proteſt, which he had made before the notary, previous to the treaty. The duke was obliged to acknowledge the validity of his reaſons; and with his troops ſoon after, returned to England.

The war in Brittany was thus brought to a happy termination; the ſucceſs of the French arms in Guienne; the inability of England to repair the loſſes ſhe had ſuſtained; and the new alliance which had been recently concluded with the king of Caſtille; ſeemed to promiſe a happy and a proſperous reign. But ambition, avarice, and a reſtleſs ſpirit of independence, prevented both the nobles and people from profiting by theſe advantages. The kingdom was farther haraſſed by the ſchiſm which prevailed in the papacy, and the manuvres of the rival pontiffs. Urban and Clement appeared to have attached the fate of Chriſtendom to the validity of their election. Whoever acknowledged their authority diſcharged every obligation, human and divine; but oppoſition, or doubt, was the height of ſacrilege and impiety. The property of the church was appropriated to the purpoſe of venal attachment. France was particularly affected by theſe ſhameful proceedings, ſince it was almoſt the only reſource left to Clement. He laid claim to half the revenues of the clergy, to ſupport himſelf and his court. An abbot at Rheims, was appointed to levy this contribution, and to threaten the poſſeſſors of livings with depoſition, in caſe they refuſed to comply with the will of his holineſs. The ſacred college of Avignon then conſiſted of three and thirty cardinals, whoſe agents and emiſſaries, armed with proviſions, were ſpread over the different provinces, hunting after vacant livings. Cathedrals, collegiate churches, conventual priories, commanderies, in ſhort, any kind of preferment, was eagerly graſped at: the only thing they enquired into was the amount of the net revenue it produced; and that the inevitable expence attending the performance of duty, the collection of rents, &c. might be diminiſhed as much as poſſible, they let theſe benefices to farm, and the leaſes were ſometimes let at ſo high a price, that the leſſees found themſelves obliged to give them up. On the death of a biſhop, the collectors of the apoſtolic chamber ſeized, in the pope's name, all his effects and poſſeſſions, without reſerving the ſmalleſt part, either for repairing the church, or for paying the debts of the deceaſed*.

Conduct like this could not fail to excite complaints. The univerſity, which had well-founded pretenſions to a ſhare in the patrimony of the church, took no pains to diſſemble its indignation. Several conſultations were held, and it was finally determined that the only mode of repreſſing this ſpirit of plunder, was by convening a general council, in which the rights of the two popes might be decided†. John de Ronce, doctor of divinity, having been appointed to preſent to the king the reſolutions adopted by the univerſity, was arreſted during the night, and confined in a cloſe priſon, till he promiſed to acknowledge Clement. All thoſe who maintained the neceſſity of calling a general council were declared guilty of leſe-majeſty, and treated with the utmoſt rigour. The perſecution became ſo violent, that the ſchools were deſerted by moſt of the profeſſors and ſtudents.

The protection afforded to Clement, by the duke of Anjou, made it dangerous to advance any thing to his prejudice. He had inſinuated himſelf into the good graces of the duke by the gratification of his avarice; he had granted him a tenth part of the revenues of the French clergy, and of all other eccleſiaſtics who acknowledged his authority, under the pretence of enabling that prince to arm againſt Urban and his adherents. Clement had alſo deſtined for the duke of Anjou, a part of the Italian provinces, which depended on the holy ſee, to be held, as a fief, of the ſovereign pontiffs, under the appellation of the Adriatic kingdom. This new monarchy was meant to comprehend the March of Ancona, Romandiola, the duchy of Spoleto, Bologna, Ferrara, Ravenna and Perouſe*. When the duke was adopted for her ſucceſſor by Joan, queen of Naples, the pontiff, not only confirmed the adoption, but augmented his privileges, and enabled him to double the taxes on the clergy; he was alſo the firſt to ſolicit the inhabitants of Provence to declare in his favour. Theſe ſervices the duke could not forget.

The provoſt of Paris had attracted the enmity of the univerſity, which occaſioned his ruin†. Hugh Aubriot was born in Burgundy, of obſcure parents; but he had found means to inſinuate himſelf into the good graces of the duke of Anjou. Being a man of ſenſe and extenſive knowledge, he was ſoon noticed by Charles. Raiſed to the dignity of provoſt of Paris, he proved himſelf worthy of that important office. He was ſtudious to promote ſuch improvements as were calculated to contribute to the embelliſhment of the city, and to the convenience of its inhabitants. Paris ſtill contains numerous monuments of his zeal and ability. He was the firſt who contrived to purify the air, and to diſencumber the ſtreets of the metropolis, by the invention of common ſewers, for removing and carrying off the filth. All thoſe who had no viſible means of ſubſiſtence, found employment in the various works he undertook, ſo that he converted dangerous enemies of the ſtate into uſeful members of it.

Nothing which could diſturb the public tranquillity eſcaped the vigilance of this magiſtrate. The ſtudents of the univerſity, preſuming on their privileges, committed flagrant diſorders, and gave themſelves up to every kind of exceſs: the citizens were expoſed to continual inſults; tumults were daily excited in the ſtreets, and not unfrequently attended with bloodſhed; their inſolence had arrived at a pitch of extravagance, which called for effectual reſtraint and exemplary puniſhment. Aubriot accordingly ordered his ſerjeants to apprehend them, whenever they ſhould find them engaged in raiſing a riot, and to conduct them to the dungeons of the Petit Chatelet, which he had purpoſely prepared for their reception. This conduct rendered all the members of the univerſity his irreconcileable enemies. His ruin was reſolved, and no meaſures neglected which malice could deviſe to effect it. His public conduct was irreproachable: an enemy to perſecution, he had, indeed, opened the doors of the Chatelet to the oppreſſed Jews, and procured, by his ſolicitations, the reſtitution of their children; but this it was not thought prudent to urge as an object of public accuſation. They were therefore reduced to the neceſſity of inveſtigating, with malignant curioſity, his family concerns, and of ſelecting, from his private life, ſuch actions as they thought fitted to anſwer the purpoſe of oppreſſion. When the members of the univerſity had obtained or forged ſufficient proofs, they cited Aubriot to appear before the eccleſiaſtical tribunal. Secure in the protection of the court, he, at firſt, deſpiſed their threats; but the credit of his adverſaries proving more powerful than the favour of his patrons, he was arreſted and thrown into priſon. The ſame ſpirit of injuſtice which had commenced the proſecution, preſided at the trial, and dictated the ſentence; the witneſſes—ſuch as they were (ſays an ancient chronicle*)—were examined; and the provoſt was declared to be a bad catholic, a libertine, a debauchee, a keeper of bad women, particularly of Jeweſſes; and laſtly, a Jew and a heretic. Accuſations thus vague and indefinite could not eaſily be confuted, and, but for the interference of the court, he would have been conſigned to the flames. A ſcaffold was erected oppoſite to the cathedral; the provoſt was compelled to aſcend it, and, on his knees, to aſk pardon, in the preſence of a crowd of ſpectators, and to promiſe to ſubmit to the puniſhment that ſhould be inflicted on him. The biſhop of Paris, arrayed in his pontifical robes, expatiated on the criminality of his conduct; and finiſhed his harangue, by condemning the priſoner to paſs the remainder of his life in confinement, with no other nouriſhment than bread and water. But he was releaſed, the following year, by that ſame populace who now exulted in his diſgrace. It was from Hugh Aubriot that the appellation of Hugonots was given to the proteſtants of France.

A more certain mode of alienating the affections of the inhabitants of Languedoc could not have been adopted, than the appointment of the duke of Berry to the government of the province. The people highly reſented the nomination, and Gaſton, the former governor, conceiving himſelf injured, aſſembled the ſtates, who ſent a deputation to the duke to aſſure him that they would never ſubmit to part with their governor. It was determined in the council, that the ſpirit of revolt ſhould be immediately checked, and an army was accordingly aſſembled; but the duke of Burgundy, who had other projects in view, cauſed the enterpriſe to be laid aſide. The duke of Berry, however, reſolved to take poſſeſſion of his government, collected the troops belonging to his appanage, and being joined by the count of Armagnac, marched into Languedoc; engaging with Gaſton, he ſuſtained a total defeat ; but the count reſigned his government in the moment of victory, and, after he had concluded an advantageous treaty, returned to his own territories.

A. D. 1382.] The council were at this time ſolely employed in attempts to repeal the ſuppreſſion of the taxes. This was the only means which the duke of Anjou could now deviſe for augmenting his treaſures ; ſince he had already ſecured all the fruits of his brother's economy. The chancellor's journal, which is ſtill extant in the royal library at Paris, is a laſting monument of his avidity. Every day he formed ſome new demand : having ſeized a part of the late king's plate and jewels, he found means to obtain the reſt. Not content with having procured a grant of the produce of all the taxes that were levied in his appanage, he obtained an extenſion of that privilege to other parts of the kingdom, and thereby became intereſted in the re-eſtabliſhment of the impoſts. His efforts to induce the Pariſians to ſecond his ſchemes proved fruitleſs. The people declared that they ſhould conſider as enemies to the ſtate all thoſe who attempted to renew the impoſts ; they flew to arms, fixed chains acroſs the ſtreets, and appointed officers, created by themſelves, to guard the different gates of the city*. The example of the Pariſians was followed by the inhabitants of ſeveral provincial towns. At Rouen, the populace choſe a mercer for their king. This monarch was conducted to a throne which his ſubjects had prepared for him. When ſeated a petition was preſented to his majeſty, beſeeching him to ſuppreſs the impoſts ; this being complied with, the collectors of the revenue were maſſacred and their houſes plundered. The abbey of St. Ouen, having juſt gained a law-ſuit againſt the town, the inſurgents broke open the monaſtery, and, entering the tower where the archives were depoſited, tore them all into pieces. After committing a thouſand acts of violence, they made a formal attack upon the old palace, a fortreſs which greatly incommoded them ; but the garriſon eaſily repelled their attacks.

The court removed to Rouen to chaſtiſe the rebels ; the king ordered the gates to be thrown down, and entered the town through the breach, accompanied by his uncles, and a ſtrong body of troops. The citizens were diſarmed, the leaders of the inſurrection executed, and the taxes re-eſtabliſhed.

This inſtance of well-timed ſeverity inſtead of intimidating the Pariſians increaſed their inſolence. An impropriety of conduct on the part of the council, tended to produce the diſorders which now occurred. The duke of Anjou, cauſed the produce of the taxes to be expoſed to ſale in a private houſe, and ſeveral purchaſers attended. But it was ſtill neceſſary to publiſh the renewal of the ſuppreſſed impoſts ; the man who undertook this commiſſion, repaired, on horſeback, to the market-place, where the people aſſembled round him in crowds. He began by giving notice that a quantity of plate had been ſtolen from the king; and ſeized the opportunity when but few could hear him, to announce that the next day the taxes would be levied in the ſame manner as before the publication of the edict by which they were ſuppreſſed. The moment he had given this notice he clapped ſpurs to his horſe, and gallopped off at full ſpeed. News immediately ſpread through the town; and the people flying to arms, ſwore that they would maſſacre all who ſhould make the attempt.

* Recueil des Ordon, Chron, MS. ; Hiſtoire de Paris,

Next day the collectors went to market, when one of them, having demanded payment of a poor woman, was inſtantly ſeized by the populace, and torn to pieces*. This was the ſignal of revolt. A body of five hundred men, armed with ſticks, forks, and whatever weapons they could lay hold of, attacked the collectors, compelled them to fly, and maſſacred ſuch as they were able to overtake. The ſtreets were preſently filled with inſurgents, and the cry of, "To arms!" "Liberty!" was heard from either extremity of the metropolis. The collectors and other officers of the revenue were all put to death wherever they were found. The number of inſurgents hourly encreaſing, they burſt open the doors of the town-houſe, where a large ſupply of arms had been depoſited in the preceding reigns, and proceeded to pillage and demoliſh the houſes of thoſe whom they had murdered. The doors of the priſons being forced, the inſurgents gained a freſh acceſſion of ſtrength, by the junction of their inhabitants. Perceiving they wanted a chief, they releaſed Hugh Aubriot from confinement, and compelled him to place himſelf at their head. They mounted him on a mule, and conducted him to the houſe which he had occupied previous to his impriſonment. He took advantage of this event to retire ſecretly from the capital, which he left that very night; and, paſſing the Seine, fled to Burgundy, his native country, where he paſſed the reſt of his days in tranquil obſcurity.

Paris, in the mean time, was reduced to the ſituation of a town taken by aſſault. Theft, rapine, and murder, marked the progreſs of a deſperate rabble. They ran from houſe to houſe, taking away whatever was portable, and deſtroying what they were unable to carry off. They broke open the cellars, drank as much wine as they could, and threw the reſt into the ſtreets. Being informed that ſeveral of the Jews and financiers had taken refuge in the abbey of Saint Germain-des-Pres, they haſted to attack it; but it was able to reſiſt their efforts. The reſpectable citizens trembled for their lives and property; ten thouſand of them were embodied by the municipal officers; and the town was now divided into two parties, both ſeemingly reſolved to proceed to extremities.

During the night, the inſurgents only ſuſpended their rage to riot in intemperance. At dawn of day, they repaired to Aubriot's houſe, and were ſurpriſed to find that he had eſcaped. They then left the town, with a view of deſtroying the bridge at Charenton; but the fear of being intercepted by the regular troops which were ſtationed in the neighbouring country, induced them to return with precipitation. Every effort that could tend to the reſtoration of tranquillity, was employed by the inhabitants; but no one exerted himſelf ſo ſucceſsfully as the advocate general, Deſmarets. At the commencement of the riots, the biſhop of Paris, the magiſtrates, and moſt of the people of diſtinction, had left the town; Deſmarets alone had the courage to remain; and his preſence ſerved to appeaſe the ſtorm. His eloquence was admired; his virtues were reſpected; he had grown grey in the ſervice of four ſucceſſive ſovereigns; and he enjoyed that eſteem which was due to his talents and integrity. He now exerted his influence to calm the minds of the people.

The news of this revolt being carried to Rouen, where the king ſtill reſided, the council immediately diſpatched a body of troops towards the capital, with the reſolution to make the Pariſians undergo the ſame puniſhment which the inhabitants of Rouen had juſt experienced. But this was a taſk not eaſy of accompliſhment: although the ſedition was apparently quelled, the principle which had occaſioned it ſtill ſubſiſted. The Pariſian inſurgents, inſtructed by the example of thoſe at Rouen, were determined to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity, and to reject every propoſal for an accommodation, of which the renewal of the impoſts ſhould form the baſis; with this view they had ſtationed guards in all the principal parts of the town, and at the different gates*. The citizens of Paris endeavoured to avert the ſtorm which threatened them; the univerſity went forth in a body to meet the king. They preſented to him the petition of the Pariſians, the prince was affected on peruſing it. He confirmed the ſuppreſſion of the impoſts, and granted a general amneſty. This indulgence was publiſhed, the ſame day, at Paris. John Deſmarets, though ſo far oppreſſed with age and ſickneſs as to be unable to walk, was carried on a litter to the place where the people had aſſembled; but he had the mortification to find them inſenſible to the proffered indulgence, and more inclined to renew the revolt than return to their duty. The provoſt of Paris having ſeized ſeveral of their leaders, was conveying them to the place of execution, when he was openly oppoſed by the populace. Their puniſhment was ſuſpended by order of the court, and the moſt criminal were put into ſacks, and thrown into the river, in the night.

Twice had the council been compelled to aboliſh the impoſts, though the neceſſity of renewing them continued. Prayers, threats, and negociations had been alternately employed for the purpoſe of procuring money. Except ſome trifling hoſtilities in Guienne, the kingdom had no war to ſuſtain. The expences of the king's houſhold, though conſiderably reduced during his minority, were not paid with regularity. At an aſſembly of the ſtates-general, where the young monarch was preſent, the firſt preſident, repreſented to the members, that the king, finding it impoſſible to effect any greater diminution of the expences, to which the revenue was inadequate, it was neceſſary that the people ſhould pay the ſame ſubſidies as in the preceding reign. The deputies retired without making any poſitive promiſe. The members for the province of Sens alone conſented to renew the impoſts, and they were diſavowed by their conſtituents*.

This oppoſition from the provinces was fomented by the reſiſtance of the Pariſians. But all rational and moderate men deplored the dangerous miſunderſtanding which ſubſiſted between the prince and the people; and hoping that the preſence of the ſovereign would tend to re-eſtabliſh tranquillity, they appointed a deputation of the principal citizens to wait on him, and requeſt he would return to the capital. The council agreed, on condition that the Pariſians ſhould not come to meet him in arms; that he ſhould enter the town accompanied by his troops; that the gates ſhould remain open during his reſidence in the metropolis; that the chains ſhould not be placed acroſs the ſtreets in the night; and, that none ſhould bear arms except the native inhabitants of Paris, and ſuch as had property to loſe. Three days were allowed for conſidering theſe propoſals; but the populace became furious, and threatened to maſſacre the principal families, if they dared to accept them. Six citizens who were ſent to appriſe the king, met with a cool reception, as it was believed that they exaggerated, in order to extort more favourable terms from Charles. The lord of Villiers was diſpatched to Paris for the purpoſe of verifying the fact; and he had orders, in caſe he ſhould find it impoſſible to obtain the renewal of all the taxes, to propoſe that a part of them ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed. Villiers, unable to fulfil his commiſſion, haſted back to the king, and informed him that the rage and obſtinacy of the people even exceeded the repreſentation of the citizens.

The duke of Anjou, who was impatient to commence his projected expedition to Italy, and reſolved, at all events, to procure money from the Pariſians, determined to have recourſe to the moſt violent meaſures. He collected a powerful body of troops, which he ſtationed in the environs of Paris, and there ſuffered them to live at diſcretion. Every kind of exceſs was allowed; the only reſtraint impoſed on their conduct, was a prohibition from ſetting fire to the houſes, and murdering the inhabitants. The people were but little moved at an evil which only affected the opulent citizens, who ſaw their lands laid waſte, and their property expoſed to pillage. The conferences were renewed, and an accommodation terminated. It was agreed that a general amneſty ſhould be paſſed, and that the city ſhould make the king a preſent of one hundred thouſand livres. The day after this agreement was ſigned, the young monarch made his entry into Paris, amidſt the acclamations of the people. When the time came for paying the money, ſome diſputes aroſe on the ſubject between the inhabitants and the clergy; the former inſiſting that the latter ought to pay their part. The greateſt part of this ſum was ſeized by the duke of Anjou; it was, however, the laſt of his exactions, as he ſet out for Provence immediately after, to prepare for his expedition to Naples.

* Villaret, tom. xi. p. 293. This circumſtance tends to eſtabliſh a fact of ſome importance in the parliamentary hiſtory of France, viz. that the members of the ſtates-general were always conſidered as the mere organs of the people, whoſe mandates they were bound to receive, and to whoſe inſtructions it was their duty literally to adhere.

By the departure of the duke of Anjou, the principal ſhare in the government became veſted in the duke of Burgundy. This prince, beſides the duchy of Burgundy, was in poſſeſſion of the lordſhips of Bethel and Nevers, on which the duke of Brittany had ſome claims; but the matter having been left to arbitration, it was decided in favour of the former. He enjoyed the county of Burgundy as a gift from the emperor, Charles the fourth*; and he had purchaſed the town and territory of Verdun, for one and twenty thouſand florins. He was on the point of joining to thoſe extenſive poſſeſſions, the dominions of Lewis de Male, count of Flanders, his father-in-law; who, being engaged in a war with his ſubjects, entreated the duke of Burgundy to perſuade the French to aſſiſt him in reducing the rebels to ſubmiſſion.

In a prior revolt, in the year 1378, the duke had with great difficulty effected an accommodation between the Flemings and their prince, but the mutual animoſity made either party anxious to ſeize every opportunity for renewing the diſpute. An abuſe of power on the one ſide, and a licentious ſpirit of independence on the other, proved an invincible bar to a ſincere reconciliation. The artiſans of Ghent, having formed themſelves into companies, diſtinguiſhed by particular badges, the count repaired to that city with the view of compelling them to lay aſide thoſe marks; but, failing in the attempt, he retired†. His revenge was cruel and unmanly; he cauſed ſeveral tradeſmen of Ghent to be ſtopped on the Scheld, and, after putting out their eyes, permitted them to purſue their voyage. In this ſituation they arrived at the town, where their preſence inſpired their fellow-citizens with horror and indignation. They immediately flew to arms, appointed officers to command them, and, marching out of the city, attacked Oudenarde, took it by aſſault, and demoliſhed the fortifications. The nobility having joined the count, their houſes were pillaged and deſtroyed. A new treaty put a ſtop to theſe hoſtilities; and Oudenarde was reſtored. But the conteſt was ſoon renewed, and moſt of the towns of Flanders evinced a diſpoſition to join the inhabitants of Ghent. A general inſurrection was on the point of breaking out. The Flemings, apprehenſive that the count muſt apply for aſſiſtance to the court of France, had addreſſed themſelves to the council; and their remonſtrances, ſeconded by the duke of Anjou and pope Clement, were favourably received; the count therefore was, for ſome time, left to bear the whole burden of the war, with no ſupport but his own nobility.

The moſt horrid cruelties were committed during this conteſt. Bruges was was divided into two factions; that which favoured the count proving moſt powerful, Lewis took poſſeſſion of the city, and put to death five hundred of the inhabitants. At Ypres, where he met with no oppoſition, he ordered ſeven hundred of the citizens to be beheaded. This conduct, far from depreſſing the ſpirits of the people, encreaſed their fury. Having ſuſtained a defeat at the gates of Ypres, which they aſcribed to the miſconduct of their leader, John Boule, they retired to Courtray, and literally tore him in pieces. From thence they returned to Ghent, which the count haſted to inveſt. This city was then deemed the ſtrongeſt place in Europe; it was defended by eighty thouſand combatants; and two hundred thouſand were requiſite to inveſt it completely. During the ſiege, ſix thouſand of the inhabitants ſallied from the town, and taking Aloſt by ſurpriſe, firſt pillaged and then reduced it to aſhes. This ſucceſs gave freſh ſpirits to the inſurgents, who ſucceſsfully repelled every attack on the place, ſo that the count was unable, during the whole campaign, to obtain any advantage over them. But, at the commencement of the following year, they ſuſtained a defeat, and loſt two of their leaders; one of them, John de Lannoy, had taken refuge in the ſteeple of a church to which the troops had ſet fire; he called out aloud—"Ranſom, ranſom!"—ſhewing his garment, which was full of florins; his cries were diſregarded; he threw himſelf into the midſt of the enemy, who tore him in pieces, and caſt his body into the flames.

The citizens of Ghent, finding that the war was likely to continue, perceived the neceſſity of chuſing a leader, who ſhould be able to keep the multitude in awe. Peter Dubois, with whom this idea originated, fixed his choice on Philip d'Artevelle, ſon to that James d'Artevelle, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf during the former commotions. The Flemings haſted in crowds to the reſidence of Philip, whom they conducted to the market-place, and took the oath of fealty and allegiance to him, as to their ſovereign. He commenced his reign by executing twelve of the men who had been concerned in the death of his father. The inſurgents under their new leader, believed themſelves invincible. The count inveſted Ghent a ſecond time, and was again conſtrained to raiſe the ſiege. An accommodation was talked of, and deputies from the principal towns were appointed to confer on the ſubject with the agents of the count. The envoys from Ghent conſented to certain articles, which they communicated to their fellow-citizens. One condition was, that two hundred of the principal inhabitants ſhould be delivered to the count. Artevelle and Dubois, convinced that they muſt infallibly be compriſed in the number, maſſacred the envoys in preſence of the people, who now rejected all hopes of peace.

The ſiege of Ghent was formed, for the third time, by the count; who, by the reduction of Grammont, and moſt neighbouring places, cut off their ſupplies, and reduced the inhabitants to the laſt extremity. As they evinced a diſpoſition to ſurrender, the duke and ducheſs of Brabant, the count of Hainault, with the inhabitants of Tournay, and ſeveral of the nobility, employed their intereſts with the count to procure them favourable terms; but Lewis refuſed to liſten to any propoſals, unleſs all the inhabitants, between the ages of fifteen and ſixty, would conſent to preſent themſelves before him, without ſhoes, ſtockings, or any outward garments, in the ſupplicating poſture of criminals, ſubmiſſive to the ſentence which he might pleaſe to pronounce.

Theſe conditions were rejected with ſcorn; and the inhabitants of Ghent reſolved on ſome act of deſperation. Five thouſand, under the command of Artevelle, offered to march to Bruges, where the count then held his court. The count informed of their arrival, ſallied forth from the town, with forty thouſand men; but he was attacked with irreſiſtible fury. In a ſhort time his troops ſuſtained a total defeat, and the count was compelled to re-enter the town with precipitation, cloſely followed by the inhabitants of Ghent. He threw aſide his arms, and, changing his dreſs, ſought refuge in the cottage of a poor woman, to whoſe loyalty he was indebted for a ſafe protection till night, when he eſcaped to Lille. The day after this event, Artevelle and his followers, began to plunder the houſes, and inflict vengeance on their enemies. They conducted themſelvs with a degree of regularity and order, which could ſcarcely have been expected. All the foreign merchants, great numbers of whom were then at Bruges, were treated with reſpect; even a part of the citizens was exempted from the effects of their reſentment, which was confined to the companies of tradeſmen and artiſans, who had ſignalized, in a particular manner, their enmity to the inſurgents. Twelve hundred of theſe were conducted to the market-place, and maſſacred in cool blood; their families were deſtroyed, and their property was ſeized. The ſpoils of Bruges were carried to Ghent, with the news of the victory. All Flanders, except Terremonde and Oudenarde, affected by this event, embraced, either from choice or compulſion, the party of the inſurgents. Oudenarde was ſoon inveſted by an hundred thouſand Flemings.

Artevelle, inflated with the victory he had obtained, aſſumed all the power and ſplendour of a ſovereign prince. Endued with the courage, but not the genius of his father, he became intoxicated with ſucceſs, and loſt the ability to profit by the revolution which his arms had effected.

The count, expelled from his dominions, applied for protection and aſſiſtance to the duke of Burgundy, his ſon-in-law, and intended ſucceſſor. At an interview which took place at Bapaumes, it was agreed that all the forces of France ſhould be employed in reducing the Flemings to ſubjection. The authority poſſeſſed by the duke at this time was almoſt abſolute; and the propoſal he made to his nephew for waging war againſt the Flemings, was eagerly embraced. The council was aſſembled. In vain did ſome of the members attempt to diſſuade Charles from taking the field in perſon; and repreſented to him the lateneſs of the ſeaſon for the commencement of ſuch an enterpriſe.

Artevelle and the other leaders of the Flemings ſought to avert the ſtorm which threatened them, by ſending an envoy to the court of France; but he was treated with contempt, and, for ſome time, confined in priſon. Their application to England was not more ſucceſsful, for the unſettled ſtate of the Engliſh government rendered it highly imprudent to engage in a foreign war.

Every preparation was now made in France for aſſiſting the count of Flanders. As apprehenſions were entertained, that, during the abſence of the court, ſedition would again break out in the capital, the duke of Burgundy aſſembled the principal inhabitants, and exhorted them to perſiſt in the fidelity which they owed to their ſovereign.

The troops having aſſembled on the frontiers of Picardy and Artois, directed their march towards Lille. The approach of the French army did not deter the Flemings from purſuing the ſiege of Oudenarde, as they deemed themſelves ſufficiently ſecure from attack, in being maſters of the paſſages of the Lys. They had juſt driven the count's troops from the bridge of Comines, and had ſtationed ten thouſand men to defend it. This was the very paſſage which the conſtable Cliſſon, who led the van-guard, undertook to force. Four hundred men at arms forded the river above the bridge. The Flemings, thus attacked on both ſides, defended themſelves for ſome time; but Cliſſon, having repaired that part of the bridge which they had broken down, obliged them to retreat; the defeat was general, and four thouſand of them were left dead on the field.

Next day the whole army paſſed the Lys; and, continuing their march, reduced ſeveral towns. Ypres was the firſt to open its gates to the French, who levied a contribution of forty thouſand florins on the inhabitants. Flanders was, at this time, the centre of commerce. Its numerous manufactories gave eaſe and opulence to an active and induſtrious people. The ſoldiers, laden with the ſpoils of this fertile province, diſdained all inferior booty, and would only content themſelves with rich furniture, coſtly trinkets, and ſtuffs of gold. The inhabitants of the towns, alarmed at the approach of the troops, haſtened to avert their rage by a ſpeedy ſubmiſſion. Gravelines, Furnes, Dunkirk, and others, ſent deputies to meet them, accompanied by their governors in chains. Theſe men, who had been entruſted by Artevelle with the care of thoſe places, were beheaded, and the ſubmiſſion of the inhabitants was accepted, on paying a ſmall contribution.

When Artevelle was informed of theſe diſaſters, he left his camp before Oudenarde, and repaired to Ghent, where, having embodied all ſuch as were able to bear arms, he joined them to a part of the troops that were employed in the ſiege, and determined to hazard a battle. It was now the month of November; the weather was very ſevere, and, had they contented themſelves with acting on the defenſive, the French would have been obliged to quit the field. But the Flemings, and their leader, inflated with the eaſy victory they had obtained at Bruges, were confident of ſucceſs. They had ſworn to give no quarter, but to maſſacre all except the king. This exceſs of confidence proved their deſtruction. The French were not leſs imprudent in expoſing an infant ſovereign, the flower of the nobility, and the hopes of the ſtate, to the uncertain event of a campaign, begun at the opening of winter, without even ſecuring a retreat in caſe of misfortune; for they neglected to fortify the bridge of Comines, which gives us no very favourable idea of the military talents of the conſtable.

During the abſence of the court, the Pariſians again revolted, and were on the point of demoliſhing the royal palaces*; but they were diverted from the accompliſhment of their ſchemes, by Nicholas Flamand, a citizen, who perſuaded them to wait the event of the war in Flanders. "If the people of "Ghent," ſaid he, "ſucceed, as we truſt they will, it will be then time "enough to do this; let us not begin a thing which we may afterwards have "cauſe to repent." The Pariſians, in the mean time, prepared for war; they ſent for arms from all quarters, and ſet all the workmen in the town to make helmets and cuiraſſes. This epidemic ſedition ſpread over the provinces; Chalons, Rheims, Orleans, and Blois, evinced the ſame rebellious diſpoſition with the capital. The inhabitants of the country threatened to renew the diſorders which prevailed in the time of the Jacquerie. The kingdom appeared on the eve of a general revolution. On the event of the war in Flanders the ſafety of the ſtate depended.

It was in the plain between Roſbec and Courtray that the rival armies met. That of the Flemings, almoſt wholly compoſed of artiſans, was drawn up in order of battle, according to their different trades, the ſymbols of which were diſplayed on their banners. The conſtable divided the French into three bodies; the firſt of which he commanded himſelf, aſſiſted by the mareſchals of Sancerre and Blainville, and the admiral John de Vienne. Before the battle began, the king created four hundred and ſixty knights.

The Flemings were encamped between a deep ravine and a thick wood, with a ditch in front ſtrengthened by an intrenchment; a poſt which it was almoſt impoſſible to force. But they were ſo imprudent as to give up this advantage, in order to take poſſeſſion of a ſmall hill, called The Golden Mount, whence they imagined they could attack the French with greater impetuoſity. As ſoon as the conſtable perceived this motion, he made ſure of the victory. The battle commenced by the ſecond diviſion where the king was poſted, which by that means became the centre diviſion, while the two other diviſions, forming the wings, attacked the enemy in flank, who preſerved no other order than that of keeping cloſe together, that they might occupy leſs ground. The Flemings, at firſt, fought with a degree of fury that balanced the ſuperior diſcipline of their adverſaries, and rendered victory doubtful; but the latter at length recovered its uſual advantage, and turned the tide of ſucceſs. Far, however, from ſeeking to retreat, they continued to preſs forward, ſo that, in the end, they were ſo encumbered with the dead bodies, that they could not poſſibly act. The victory was complete, and the ſlaughter dreadful; five-and-twenty thouſand*, or, according to ſome writers, forty thouſand† of the Flemings, periſhed in the action, while the French are ſaid not to have loſt a hundred men. Froiſſard tells us, on the authority of a gentleman who was preſent, that the battle was won in leſs than half an hour. The body of Artevelle, being found among the dead, was ſuſpended on a tree. Such was the fate of the battle of Roſbec, where the Flemings were guilty of the ſame error which had proved ſo fatal to the French at Crecy and Poictiers: in this caſe, indeed, the error was more glaring, ſince they had not the ſame temptation for attacking their adverſaries, their army only conſiſting of fifty thouſand undiſciplined troops, whereas that of the French was compoſed of twenty thouſand men at arms, and ſixty thouſand infantry‡. The king wrote from the field of battle to the parliament of Paris, to inform them of his ſucceſs. They immediately ſent for the principal citizens, to whom they read the letter, and, at the ſame time, ordered them to communicate its contents to the people, that they might evince their zeal by public rejoicings:—but, no appearance of joy was to be ſeen.

The news of this defeat ſpread ſuch a conſternation through the province, that had the French marched directly to Ghent, the gates of that city would have been opened to them, and the war finiſhed by the total ſubjection of Flanders. But, inſtead of improving the advantage they had acquired, they repaired to Courtray, which had ſurrendered immediately after the battle of Roſbec. There the king paſſed ſome days, during which time he received deputies from the inhabitants of Bruges, who reſcued their city from pillage by a contribution of one hundred and twenty thouſand florins. It was hoped that this example would be followed by the people of Ghent, but, having recovered from their firſt alarm, and being encouraged by the preſence and exhortations of Peter Dubois, they refuſed to ſubmit. Such was the inveteracy of their hatred to the count, that they offered to acknowledge the authority of the king of France, on condition that he would annex the city of Ghent to the demeſnes of the crown; but the fear of offending the duke of Burgundy, prevented the council from accepting their propoſals.

The Flemings had, in the mean time, raiſed the ſiege of Oudenarde; and the ſeaſon was too far advanced to permit the French to form that of Ghent. The king and his uncles only thought of returning to France with their troops, who were laden with the ſpoils of that province which they came to reſtore to its lawful prince: no ſooner had the king left Courtray, than, in return for its voluntary ſubmiſſion, the ſoldiers began to maſſacre the inhabitants, without diſtinction of age or ſex; with cruelty inſatiate as their avarice, they did not ceaſe to pillage and murder, till neither people nor property remained; they then ſet fire to the town, and reduced it to a heap of aſhes. Froiſſard, who lived at the time, expreſsly affirms, that the maſſacre took place in conſequence of the king's orders, who rejected all the entreaties of the count of Flanders to ſpare the town and its inhabitants. Some hiſtorians have affirmed, that ſeveral letters were found at Courtray, from the Pariſians, which proved that a ſecret intelligence ſubſiſted between the inſurgents of the capital, and thoſe of Flanders. This diſcovery, whether real or pretended, was uſed as a pretext for inflicting vengeance on thoſe ſeditious inhabitants of Paris, whoſe conduct had long merited puniſhment.

Not only the towns which had revolted were affected by the preſence of the troops; the inhabitants of many places which had preſerved their allegiance to the count were impriſoned, under pretence that they had embraced the party of pope Urban, and were compelled to purchaſe their liberty by levying contributions. The king paſſed his Chriſtmas at Tournay, and from thence went to Arras, which place the ſoldiers evinced a ſtrong diſpoſition to pillage. But the conſtable and the mareſchals deterred them from their purpoſe, by promiſing that all their wages ſhould be paid on their arrival at Paris. The towns of Picardy teſtified their zeal by public rejoicings, and by ſending preſents to the king, who repaired to Compiegne.

The troops would have been immediately diſbanded, but for the reſolution which had been adopted of inflicting an exemplary chaſtiſement on the Pariſians. This, however, appeared no eaſy matter, when the extent of the city, and the numbers and diſpoſition of its inhabitants, were conſidered. The court had advanced as far as Louvres, undetermined how to accompliſh the object they had in view. For the purpoſe of ſounding the minds of the people, the princes and nobility had ſent their ſervants before them to prepare their houſes, and to circulate the report that the king might be daily expected. The Pariſians, on receiving this intelligence, reſolved to meet their ſovereign on the road; and they accordingly diſpatched twenty thouſand citizens completely armed, who arranged themſelves in order of battle, on the plains of Saint Denis. The king was at Bourget, when he heard of their approach; the nobles who attended him exclaimed, "Had this inſolent rabble been thus forward to ſerve the "king when he was going to Flanders, they would have done well; but they "were then employed in praying to God that not a ſoul of us might ever re-"turn."

As this armed multitude ſtill kept their ſtation, it became neceſſary to adopt ſome deciſive meaſure. The conſtable, the lords of Albret, Coucy, and Tremoille, and the admiral, John de Vienne, determined to remonſtrate with them, in order to perſuade them to return to Paris. With this view, they ſent to aſk for a ſafe conduct, but the Pariſians aſſured the heralds that they might ſafely approach them, ſince they had only armed themſelves for the purpoſe of obeying the king's orders, and of ſhewing him what forces the city of Paris could muſter, whenever their ſervices were required in defence of the ſtate. On receiving this aſſurance, the noblemen went to them and ordered them, in the king's name, to retire, which they immediately did. The ſtorm, which had excited their apprehenſions, being thus averted, the court prepared to make their entry into the metropolis.

The king, however, firſt viſited the church of Saint Denis, at this place he received a deputation from the city of Paris, conſiſting of the provoſt of the merchants, and ſome of the principal citizens, who attempted to moderate his anger; but he refuſed to explain his intentions, and would only tell them what day he meant to enter the metropolis. At the appointed time the troops were under arms, and advanced in three diviſions*. The conſtable and the mareſchal de Sancerre, at the head of the firſt diviſion, advanced towards the gate of Saint Denis, which they ordered to be pulled down. All the men at arms were diſmounted, and the troops entered the town in the ſame order as if they were taking poſſeſſion of a conquered place. The young monarch, ſurrounded by his uncles, the princes of the blood, and his courtiers, repaired to the cathedral, without deigning to liſten to a freſh deputation, and from thence to the palace.

An univerſal alarm prevailed through the city: the people, accuſtomed to paſs, from inſolence to deſpair, waited in ſilent conſternation, the puniſhment of their faults. The ſtrict orders that were iſſued to commit no violence, under pain of death, ſomewhat revived their ſpirits. The ſoldiers haſtened to the quarters aſſigned them; and the only interruption of the general tranquillity proceeded from the execution of two of the inhabitants, who were hanged at their own windows, for making uſe of ſome ſeditious language.

The dukes of Berry and Burgundy paraded the city at the head of their men at arms. The chains were taken from the ends of the ſtreets and carried to Vincennes; the inhabitants delivered up their arms which were depoſited at the Louvre, and were found to be ſufficient to equip a hundred thouſand men. When the city was thus deprived of all means of defence, the executions began. The priſons were filled with criminals, many of whom put an end to their exiſtence in order to avoid a more cruel death. The ducheſs of Orleans interceded for the people, and her humane interference was ſeconded by the univerſity, who carried their ſupplications to the foot of the throne†. The univerſity would probably have ſucceeded in their attempts, had not the duke of Berry been preſent at the audience. The execution of Nicholas le Flamand was, doubtleſs, an act of neceſſary ſeverity. But one of a far different deſcription ſoon followed; twelve priſoners were brought forth and chained together in one cart, to be conveyed to the place of execution. Seated upon a plank, placed in an elevated ſituation, appeared the advocate-general, John Deſmarets; that venerable magiſtrate had paſſed his ſeventieth year; the organ of the laws, honoured and beloved by his fellow-citizens, he had incurred no other reproach than that of having rendered innumerable ſervices to his country. Far from being an accomplice in the diſorders which had prevailed in the metropolis, he had ever loudly condemned ſuch violent proceedings, and had exerted his utmoſt efforts to remedy or prevent them. The people, the nobility, even thoſe who promoted his deſtruction, were convinced of his innocence. Condemned without a trial, he was led to the ſcaffold. He uttered no complaints againſt his perſecutors, but pronounced, in a firm voice, theſe words of David, "Judge me, O God, and diſtinguiſh my cauſe from that of the ungodly." When he arrived at the place of execution, he was preſſed to aſk pardon of the king. "Maſter John," exclaimed the officers of juſtice, "cry for mercy to the king, "in order that he may pardon you." But he replied, "I have ſerved his "great grandfather, king Philip; his grandfather, king John; and his father, "king Charles; neither of the three would have aſked me to cry mercy; nor "would this, had he attained to the age and knowledge of a man; to God alone "will I apply for mercy." He received the fatal blow with a firmneſs which did not belie the integrity of his life. The true cauſe of his death was the hatred which the dukes of Berry and Burgundy bore him.

The court began to be aſhamed of theſe numerous executions; numbers, whom they had marked for deſtruction, were, therefore, tied up in ſacks, and thrown into the Seine, during the night. Some were permitted to purchaſe their lives, and the money they raiſed amounted to four hundred thouſand livres, which was chiefly appropriated to the uſe of the king's uncles, and miniſters.

This, however, only ſerved as a prelude to the meaſures which thoſe princes had in contemplation. On the ſteps of the palace a throne was erected, on which the young monarch took his ſeat, accompanied by his uncles, the noblemen who compoſed his court, and the members of his council. A crowd of people attended. Peter D'Orgemont, the chancellor, made a violent ſpeech, in which (addreſſing himſelf to the inhabitants) he expatiated on their paſt faults, omitting no circumſtance which could render them more deſerving of puniſhment. He next adverted to the executions which had already taken place, and obſerved that there were more to come, there being a great number of criminals yet to puniſh. He then turned to the king, and aſked him if he had not rightly explained his intentions; Charles anſwered yes. He had no ſooner pronounced this fatal affirmative, than his uncles fell at his feet, and beſought him to have pity on his people; the women of Paris with diſhevelled hair and ſtreaming eyes, enforced the ſame petition, while the men proſtrated themſelves before him, and called aloud for mercy. The king then ſaid, that he pardoned the Pariſians, and converted the puniſhment of death, which was due to their crimes, into a pecuniary fine. This degrading commutation had been imagined by thoſe in power, who, to gratify their own avarice, did not ſcruple to expoſe their ſovereign to the deteſtation of his ſubjects.

The fines were exceſſive; thoſe who experienced the moſt favourable treatment were compelled to pay one half of their property. Somewhat leſs than a third of theſe immenſe ſums was paid into the royal treaſury; the reſt was divided among the nobility. The conſtable and the mareſchals claimed a part for the payment of their troops, whom they engaged to diſband, without ſuffering them to commit any act of violence or outrage. But they kept the money, and left the ſoldiers to pay themſelves by depredations on the country through which they paſſed, on their return home. John de Vienne went to Rouen, where the inhabitants experienced the ſame treatment as the Pariſians. Several other towns were ſubjected to ſimilar oppreſſion.

As the privileges and authority enjoyed by the magiſtrates of Paris had frequently been rendered ſubſervient to the purpoſes of faction, it was now reſolved by the government, to aboliſh all municipal offices. By the ſame edict*, the king ſuppreſſed the office of provoſt of the merchants, the duties whereof were united to thoſe of the provoſt of Paris. The ſpirit of the people was ſo humbled by theſe repeated ſeverities, that all the taxes which had been aboliſhed, were now renewed without the ſmalleſt oppoſition.

A. D. 1383.] The victory of Roſbec, and the rapid progreſs of the French arms, had, at length, opened the eyes of the Engliſh council, who began to repent their refuſal of aſſiſtance to the inhabitants of Ghent. As the popular commotions which had prevailed in that kingdom, immediately after the acceſſion of Richard the Second, were now ſuppreſſed; the parliament, which met in the month of February, determined to ſend over a body of troops, to cooperate with the Flemings, under the command of the biſhop of Norwich, a martial prelate, who had ſignaliſed his courage during the late inſurrections. This politic general found means to intereſt religion in his cauſe, by procuring the appointment of leader for pope Urban, who had publiſhed a cruſade againſt all ſuch as acknowledged the authority of his rival. This laſt character was of great advantage to the biſhop, as it furniſhed him with the means of raiſing and paying his troops. The military men flew to his ſtandard in order to gain the pardon of their ſins, which was promiſed to all who engaged in this pious enterpriſe; even the ladies of England, who eſpouſed the cauſe of Urban, contributed liberally, both in money and jewels, to the expence of the expedition†. The biſhop ſailed for Calais, with his army, in the month of May, and, after refreſhing his troops, marched to attack Gravelines, which he took by aſſault. He next engaged and defeated an army of thirty thouſand French and Flemings, under the command of the count of Flanders, near Dunkirk, and made himſelf maſter of that place; after which he continued his ſucceſsful progreſs through great part of Flanders, taking Nieuport, and other places. He next laid ſiege to Ypres, but there his career was ſtopped.

On the firſt news of this irruption, the king aſſembled an army of ſixteen thouſand men at arms, beſides a numerous infantry. The duke of Brittany joined him, in perſon, with two thouſand lances. It was on this occaſion that ſtate-letters were firſt uſed, which ſuſpended all actions commenced againſt military men, during the campaign. The arriere-ban having been publiſhed, all gentlemen and ſuch as poſſeſſed noble fiefs, were obliged to take arms. The king exempted from military ſervice, ſeveral officers of the ſuperior courts, and, among others, all the magiſtrates belonging to the chamber of accompts. Before the troops marched, the French miniſtry had recourſe to an expedient which had never before been adopted; they contracted with a citizen of Paris, to ſupply corn for a hundred thouſand men for four months. As ſoon as the French army approached, the Engliſh raiſed the ſiege of Ypres, and retired with precipitation. One part of them marched to Bourbourg, under the command of ſir Thomas Trivet, and the remainder retreated with the biſhop of Norwich, to Gravelines. The French immediately inveſted Bourbourg, and obliged the Engliſh to ſurrender the place, on condition of being allowed to march, with their arms, horſes and baggage (including all the ſpoils they had taken in the courſe of their incurſions) to Calais*. They then laid ſiege to Gravelines; and, the biſhop of Norwich, having no proſpect of relief from England, was reduced to the neceſſity of capitulating; after which he embarked the ſhattered remains of his army, and returned to England.

A. D. 1384.] The campaign was terminated by conferences which were opened at Lelinghen, between the plenipotentiaries of the two courts. The French inſiſting on the reſtitution of Calais, Cherbourg, and Breſt, theſe negociations were only productive of a truce, from January the twenty-ſixth, 1384, to Michaelmas†, in which the inhabitants of Ghent were included. But the Engliſh are ſaid to have violated the truce, by reducing ſeveral places in Guienne, and attacking the mareſchal de Sancerre, whom they compelled to retire from that province‡. During the negociations, died Lewis, count of Flanders. He was ſucceeded by Philip, duke of Burgundy, who, by uniting his own appanage to the dominions of his father-in-law, became one of the moſt powerful princes of Europe. The duke of Berry retired to his government of Languedoc, where he ſoon rendered himſelf odious to the people by his tyrannical and oppreſſive conduct. The reſources of that province proved inſufficient to ſupport his prodigality. At Beziers, the inhabitants flew to arms, but they were ſoon defeated and diſperſed by the troops that were ſent to oppoſe them; ſuch as fell into the hands of the conquerors were executed, and obedience was once more reſtored by the dread of puniſhment.

Theſe commotions in Languedoc were but the prelude to a more dangerous revolution, with which Auvergne and Poitou were threatened at the ſame time*. Theſe provinces alſo belonged to the duke of Berry. Almoſt all the peaſants and farmers forſook their work, and aſſembled in bodies, with the avowed reſolution of "delivering the country from the burden of taxes, and "of reſtoring its ancient liberty." Gentlemen, eccleſiaſtics, tradeſmen, opulent citizens, all, in ſhort, who were exempted from their poverty, were expoſed to their rage. Slaughter and conflagration marked their deſtructive progreſs. Thoſe who wiſhed to eſcape their fury were obliged to aſſume the dreſs of a peaſant, but ſeveral who had recourſe to this ſtratagem were diſcovered; for the inſurgents examined the hands of all they met, and if they diſcovered no ſymptoms of ruſtic labour, they maſſacred them. The duke of Berry collected all his forces, and marched againſt the inſurgents, who immediately diſperſed; but being purſued by the troops a dreadfnl ſlaughter enſued; the greater part of them either periſhed by the ſword, or were thrown into the rivers; while the few that eſcaped returned to their uſual occupations.

The military men, being left without employment, by the concluſion of the truce, undertook a cruſade againſt the infidels on the coaſt of Africa. The duke of Bourbon was at the head of them, accompanied by the count of Harcourt, the lord of Tremoille, and ſeveral other knights and noblemen, compoſing a body of eight hundred men at arms. The chriſtians landed in Africa, and fought ſome few battles; but, deſtitute of proviſions, and perpetually harraſſed by the moors, they were ſoon compelled to regain their ſhips, and return to France, after an abſence of ſix weeks.

The ſame year in which this inconſiderate expedition to Africa was undertaken, intelligence was received in France of the failure of another enterpriſe, more important in its object. The duke of Anjou, who, for ſome time, had appeared wholly engroſſed with the gratification of his avarice, at length prepared to execute his projects of ambition. He left Paris, laden with the ſpoils of the kingdom. He took the road to Provence, the inhabitants whereof he wiſhed to ſecure in his intereſt before he entered Italy. But the people refuſed to acknowledge him for their ſovereign till ſuch time as he had proved himſelf worthy of that title. He was therefore compelled to renounce the title of king of Naples which he had imprudently aſſumed, and content himſelf with that of duke of Calabria, and heir to the kingdom of Naples. While he was waſting his time in preparatory meaſures and fruitleſs negociations, a rival appeared to diſpute that crown which he was ſo anxious to obtain. Charles di Durazzo, miſ-named The Peaceable, having been called to the throne of Naples, by pope Urban, had marched from Hungary at the head of a powerful army. Beſides the ſupport of this pontiff, and the more effectual aſſiſtance of his troops, he had a right of inheritance, which the adoption of the queen was incompetent to annihilate. Like her, he was deſcended from the firſt houſe of Anjou, to which the throne of Sicily had been given, with an unlimited right of ſucceſſion, to the lateſt poſterity of the brother of St. Lewis. Charles entered Italy, and after being crowned at Rome, by Urban, advanced towards the territories of which he had juſt received the inveſtiture. As ſoon as he approached, a part of the kingdom declared in his favour; Naples opened her gates to him; in vain did Otho of Brunſwick, huſband to Joan, attempt to impede the progreſs of his arms; he was taken priſoner in a ſkirmiſh, and his defeat proved the ruin of his party. The queen, who had taken refuge in a fortreſs which was deemed impregnable, was ſo imprudent as to ſurrender herſelf to the diſcretion of her enemy, after having long waited in anxious expectation, for the promiſed ſuccours of her adopted ſon, the duke of Anjou. The Genoeſe ſent ambaſſadors to Naples to effect an accommodation between Joan and Charles, but the captivity of this princeſs deprived her of every reſource, and left her wholly expoſed to the mercy of her conqueror.

It was the duty of Charles to treat his illuſtrious priſoner with reſpect. She had taken care of him in his infancy; ſhe had adopted him for her ſon, in happier times; ſhe was his relation and his ſovereign. But the dictates of gratitude, juſtice and humanity were ſilenced by the calls of ambition. The unfortunate princeſs was ſtrangled in the caſtle of Averſa. The profligacy of her youth had been expiated by the virtues ſhe diſplayed in the latter part of her life, by the mildneſs of her government, and by the love which ſhe bore to her ſubjects.

Clement, the pope, who reſided at Avignon, had, in the mean time, pronounced, in a full conſiſtory, a ſentence of excommunication againſt his competitor, Urban, and againſt Charles di Durazzo; a ſentence which the new duke of Calabria promiſed to enforce by arms. At Rome, a ſimilar ſentence was iſſued by Urban, againſt Clement and his adherents. The duke embarked at Marſeilles, amidſt the acclamations of the people, who made the ſhores reſound with the cries of "Long live pope Clement!—Long live queen Joan!—Long "live the duke of Calabria!" The count of Geneva, brother to the pope, accompanied the duke; the count of Savoye, in return for the ceſſion of Piedmont, ſupplied him with two thouſand men at arms; and, by a treaty with Bernardo Viſconti, he ſecured a paſſage through the duchy of Milan. His army conſiſted of ſixty thouſand of the beſt troops in Europe, who were attended by three hundred mules, and an infinite number of carts laden with money.

After paſſing the Alps, the duke entered Lombardy, and traverſed with rapidity the duchies of Parma, Modena, and Tuſcany, and the eccleſiaſtical territories. Had he preſented himſelf before Rome, that city would have opened her gates to him; but as he was more anxious to gain poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, than to ſupport the intereſts of Clement, he continued his march. When he came to the province of Abruzzo, he was informed of Joan's death, and immediately aſſuming the title of king of Sicily, was crowned at Aquila. Although this invaſion had been expected, all the provinces he attacked made but little reſiſtance; Charles, indeed, had adopted the wiſe policy of ſtanding wholly on the defenſive, in the hope that this formidable army would ſoon be reduced to the neceſſity of quitting the field.

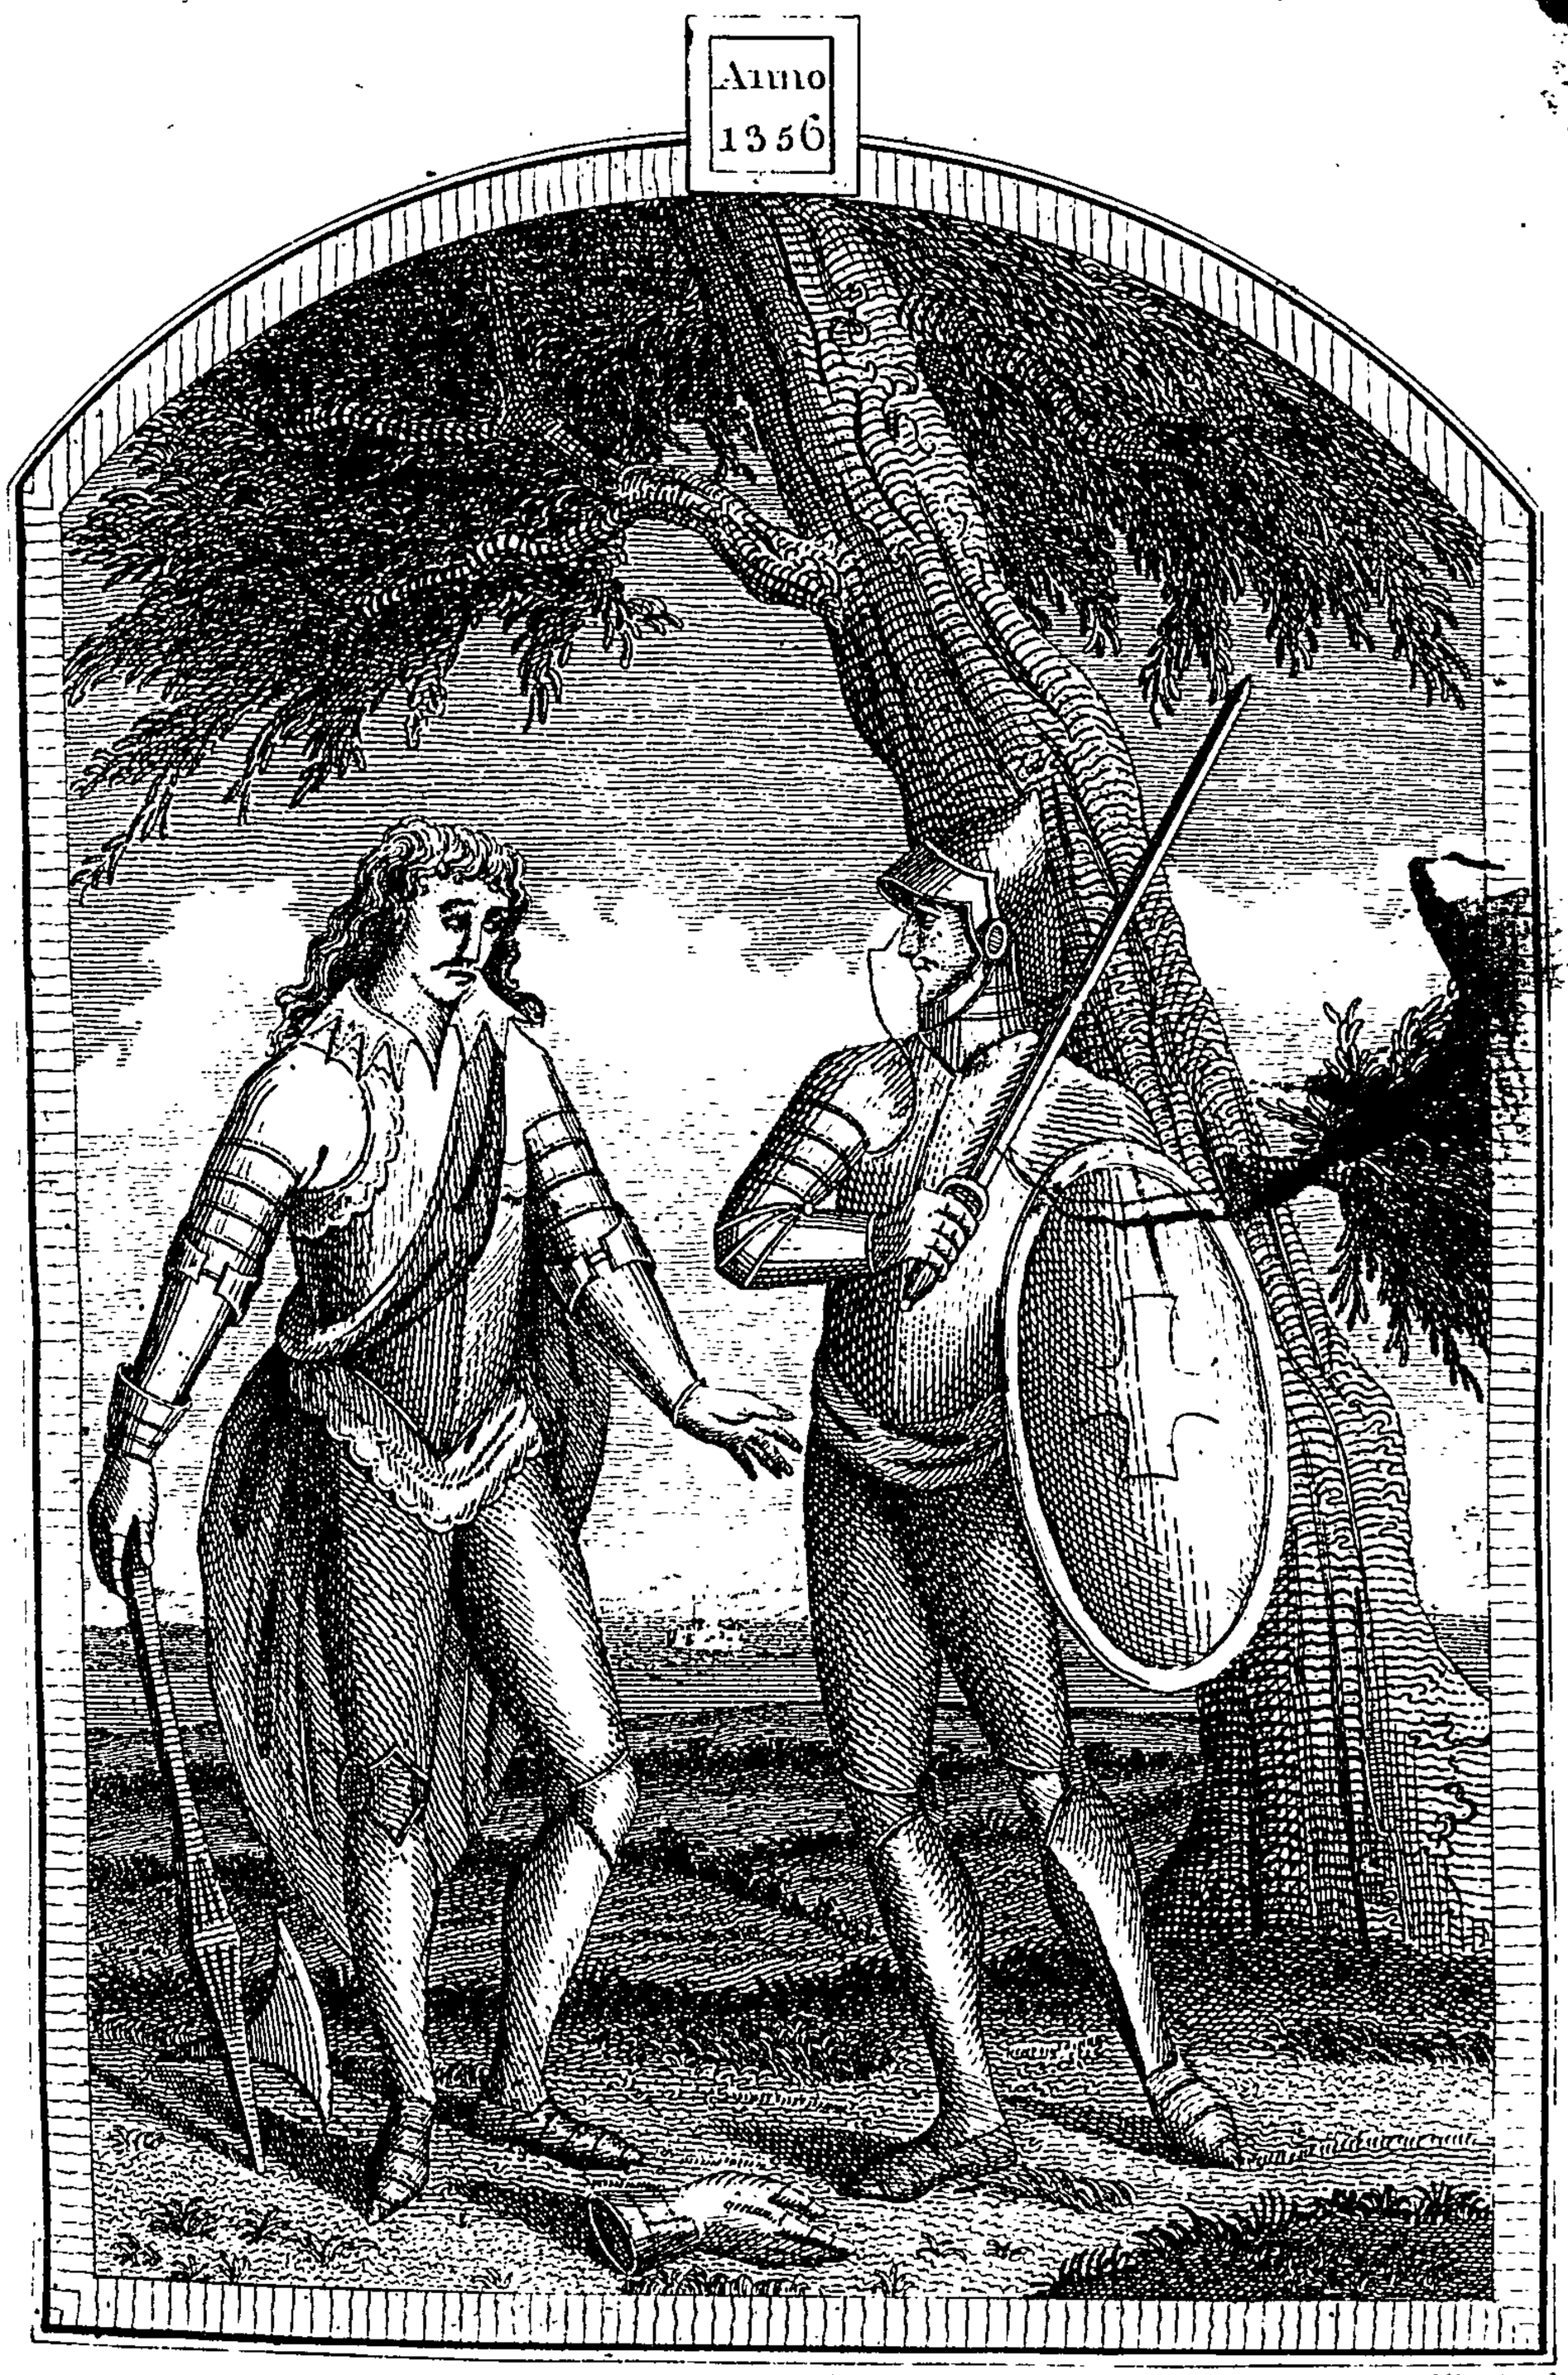
In fact, the duke, on his entrance into Italy, had loſt ſeveral of his troops in ſucceſſive ſkirmiſhes, and a part of his money had been ſeized by the mountaineers. The only means of keeping the troops in his ſervice, was by liberal donations to their leaders, which ſoon exhauſted the immenſe treaſure he had collected from the ſpoils of France. In this emergency he diſpatched Craon to the ducheſs of Anjou, who paid him conſiderable ſums, but that nobleman betrayed the confidence that was repoſed in him, and ſpent the whole in debauchery at Venice. This treachery reduced the duke to the laſt extremity; he had parted with his equipages, his plate, and even his crown, to purchaſe proviſions; and was at laſt obliged to content himſelf with a daily meal of barley-bread, procured with difficulty. His cavalry were all diſmounted; and his troops, reduced by famine and ſickneſs, daily periſhed without fighting. Surrounded by enemies, ſtriving in vain againſt the intemperance of the climate, the inconſtancy or perfidy of the inhabitants, and the moſt wretched indigence, his difficulties every moment encreaſed. Urged by deſpair he preſſed forward to Barletta, where his rival was ſtationed, and dared him to battle. Charles, however, prudently refuſed to engage an enemy whom he could reduce without the danger of an action; enraged at his diſappointment the duke decamped, and, at ſome diſtance from Barletta, meeting with a body of troops advantageouſly poſted, he endeavoured to force their entrenchments; but his attack was ſucceſsfully repelled, and being wounded in the attempt, he was conveyed to the caſtle of Biſeglia, near Bari, where he expired. After his death, the army diſperſed; and ſcarcely a tenth part of the troops returned to France. The noblemen and knights, who had engaged in this unfortunate expedition, were ſeen, almoſt naked, on the public roads of Italy, with no other defence than a ſtick, begging the means of returning to their native country. The lord of Coucy had juſt entered Italy with a body of twelve thouſand men; but when he heard of the duke's death, he was ſo fortunate as to effect his retreat without oppoſition or loſs. Such was the ſucceſs of the ambitious projects of the duke of Anjou; to ſupport which the kingdom had been drained of its wealth. But unfortunately the calamities which reſulted to the nation from this enterpriſe did not terminate with the life of that prince; it was productive of future diſgrace and misfortunes, which, in the courſe of this hiſtory, will frequently render it neceſſary to advert to its origin. The faithleſs Craon returned to France, and had the audacity to appear at court in a moſt ſplendid equipage,

The duke of Berry, ſeeing him enter the council-chamber, could not reſtrain his indignation—"Ah, falſe and diſloyal traitor!" exclaimed the prince, in a tranſport of rage, "you were the cauſe of my brother's death; let him be "ſeized, and led to puniſhment." No one appearing to execute this order, Craon retired with precipitation: he was afterwards ſentenced to pay a hundred thouſand livres to the ducheſs of Anjou; a puniſhment greatly inadequate to his crime.

At the time when intelligence of the duke of Anjou's death was received in France, the dukes of Berry and Burgundy were engaged in a conference with the duke of Lancaſter, at Boulogne. But this conference, at which plenipotentiaries from the kings of Caſtile and Scotland aſſiſted, proved as inefficacious as the laſt; it terminated in a prolongation of the truce, till the firſt of May, 1385.

As the treaſury had been exhauſted to gratify the avarice, or ſupport the ambition of the duke of Anjou, the government determining to recruit it, had recourſe to the deſtructive means of a new coinage, preceded by a proſcription of the old. This proſcription was ſo rigorouſly enforced, that a total ſtop was put to commerce, all payments were ſuſpended, and a general murmur of indignation was heard throughout the kingdom. It then became neceſſary tacitly to acknowledge the error they had committed, by renewing the circulation of the ancient coin. The value of ſilver experienced ſeveral variations in the courſe of this year, which tended to augment the price of this metal, one ſixth. The object of this augmentation which was enforced by government, was to favour the new coin, which was much leſs pure than the old; thus ſeeking to remedy one abuſe by the eſtabliſhment of another, equally prejudicial to the fortunes of individuals, and the confidence of the public. The duke of Burgundy tried a ſimilar expedient in Flanders, but with no better ſucceſs. The commercial intercourſe which ſubſiſted between the Flemings and Engliſh, rendered the conſent of the latter neceſſary before any alteration in the coin could take place. Thus, when the duke neglected this precaution, the new coinage no ſooner made its appearance, than it was proſcribed by the Engliſh miniſtry.

The court of England had particular reaſons for wiſhing to thwart all the ſchemes of the duke of Burgundy. The marriage of the count of Nevers, ſon to the duke, with Margaret of Hainault, had juſt been concluded. The duke of Lancaſter, who had expected to procure the hand of this princeſs for his ſon, ſent ambaſſadors to the count of Hainault, to know whether it was true that he had promiſed his daughter to the count of Nevers. The count, very properly, replied, that if the duke was about to marry his own children, he ſhould not preſume to interfere, and therefore he had no right to enquire into the affairs of his family, nor to aſk when, or to whom, he meant to marry his daughter. The nuptials were celebrated with great magnificence at Cambray.



A. D. 1385.] While the court reſided at Cambray, meaſures were taken by the miniſtry for procuring a ſuitable alliance for the king himſelf, who had juſt entered his ſeventeenth year. It was ſome time before they could fix their choice, which, at length, fell upon Iſabella, daughter to Stephen, duke of Bavaria, a princeſs of fourteen, who was eſteemed one of the greateſt beauties of the age. The princeſs was taken to France, under the pretext of performing a pilgrimage. Amiens was the place appointed for the interview. As ſoon as Iſabella appeared, her charms excited ſuch powerful emotions in the boſom of the king, that he aſſured the duke of Burgundy, he could not ſleep till he had married her. The duke informed the ducheſs of Brabant, and the other ladies, who had accompanied the princeſs, of the monarch's impatience, adding, "To-morrow we will find a remedy for his diſorder." Next day the young couple received the nuptial benediction at the cathedral of Amiens; when Iſabella, with the crown upon her head, was conducted to the church in a covered waggon, richly decorated.

The rejoicings occaſioned by the marriage of the king, were interrupted by the news of an advantage obtained in Flanders by the inhabitants of Ghent*. Francis Attremen, one of their leaders, had left the town, at the head of ſeven thouſand men, with a reſolution to achieve ſome enterpriſe of importance. While he was meditating on the means of accompliſhing his deſigns, he received intelligence from his ſpies, that the governor of Dam, had imprudently left that town, relying for its defence on the valour and vigilance of the inhabitants. Attremen immediately reſolved to take advantage of his abſence, and marching to Dam, he eſcaladed the walls in the night, and took poſſeſſion of the place while the inhabitants were in their beds. Beſides the property belonging to the town which was conſiderable, he found immenſe riches belonging to the principal citizens of Bruges, who, dreading an inſurrection of the populace, had brought them to Dam, as to a place of ſafety. Attremen conducted himſelf, on this occaſion, with a generoſity that did him honour. In the midſt of theſe tumults and horrors, which inevitably occur where a town is taken by aſſault, he ordered the women to be reſpected. To this precaution were ſeveral ladies of diſtinction, who had repaired to Dam, according to the cuſtom of the times, to attend the governor's wife in her lying-in, indebted for the preſervation of their lives and honour.

About this time ambaſſadors arrived at Paris, from the nobles of Hungary, to propoſe the marriage of the daughter of their late king with the young count of Valois. The propoſal being accepted, envoys were ſent to Hungary, who married the princeſs in the count's name. "John de la Perſonne," one of the envoys, "laid himſelf down on the bed, by the ſide of the princeſs," and returned with the marriage-contract properly authenticated†. Soon after, Charles the Peaceable entered Hungary, and ſeized the crown, but being aſſaſſinated at a feſtival, it returned to the lawful heir, the princeſs Mary, whom the Hungarians, from the vigour of her mind, diſtinguiſhed by the appellatiou of king Mary. Towards the concluſion of this year the count of Valois prepared to join his intended bride; but juſt as he had taken leave of his brother, he was prevented from purſuing his journey, by the news that Sigiſmond, ſecond ſon to the emperor, Charles the Fourth, had entered Hungary with a powerful army, and compelled the queen to give him her hand. The count therefore was deprived of all hopes of a crown, and was compelled to reſign the title of king of Hungary, which he had prematurely aſſumed.

As all attempts to eſtabliſh a ſolid peace between the rival powers of France and England had proved fruitleſs, a vigorous renewal of hoſtilities was reſolved on by the former. The duke of Burgundy propoſed, in the council, to make a deſcent upon England; and, as the ſcheme was highly pleaſing to the martial diſpoſition of Charles, his propoſal was inſtantly adopted, and the neceſſary preparations were ordered to be made. The general rendezvous of the troops was appointed in Artois, while a prodigious fleet was collected in the harbour of Sluys. To defray the expence of this armament, recourſe was had to loans from the people and clergy; for the repayment of the ſums thus borrowed the king's word was pledged*. A liſt of the opulent citizens, and an account of the ſums which each of them were able to advance, were preſented to the council, and by them delivered to the perſon who was entruſted with the collection of the loans. A term was then fixed for the repayment of the money, but without intereſt. At the ſame time, all the taxes were doubled, and levied with the utmoſt rigour. During theſe preparations, the Scots having made application to the court for aſſiſtance, John de Vienne, the admiral, was ſent with fifteen hundred men at arms to ſupport them in their incurſions on the Engliſh territories.

The Engliſh, appriſed of the intentions of the French court, were kept in a ſtate of continual alarm, and their preparations for defence were, of courſe adequate to the magnitude of their apprehenſions: but the diviſions which prevailed in the French councils reſcued them from the impending danger. The troops were aſſembled, and on the point of embarking, when an incident, which ought to have haſtened the execution of the enterpriſe, was employed as a pretext for laying it aſide. Francis Attremen, who had reduced the town of Dam, conceived the bold deſign of burning the French fleet, in the harbour of Sluys; and, with a view to forward his plan, he had engaged ſome of the inhabitants of Sluys in his intereſt, who promiſed to admit him into the place; but the plot was diſcovered, and his accomplices were ſeized and executed. The duke of Burgundy, who wiſhed to employ the troops in the reduction of Flanders, urged this as a ſufficient reaſon for deferring the expedition till the enſuing ſeaſon. The king accordingly formed the ſiege of Dam, which, after a vigorous reſiſtance, was taken by aſſault, pillaged, and reduced to aſhes. The troops then extended their incurſions to the very gates of Ghent, laying waſte the country with fire and ſword. The priſoners that were taken were maſſacred in cool blood.

As ſoon as the campaign was finiſhed, the king diſmiſſed his troops and returned to Paris. Before he left Flanders, the duke of Burgundy had obtained from him the ſovereignty of the town of Sluys. He farther ſought to profit by the terror with which the French arms had inſpired the inhabitants of Flanders, for whoſe reduction he threatened to employ more powerful efforts, at the commencement of the enſuing campaign. The citizens of Ghent were exhauſted by the expences of the war, which fell entirely upon themſelves. The Engliſh, contented with acting on the defenſive, appeared to be wholly occupied in making proviſion for their own ſafety. The duke of Lancaſter, intent on aſſerting his claims to the throne of Caſtile, was preparing to embark for Portugal; and, in ſhort, the intereſts of either kingdom ſeem to have been ſacrificed to the private views of thoſe who were entruſted with the reins of government.

All the Flemiſh towns were anxious to put an end to the war, which tended to ruin their commerce; and ſeveral of them ſent deputies to the king to requeſt that he would effect an accommodation. Even the citizens of Ghent began to be aware that, without foreign aſſiſtance, they would be unable to reſiſt the united forces of their ſovereign, and his nephew, the king of France; and that, conſequently, their ruin muſt be inevitable, unleſs averted by a treaty*. The duke of Burgundy was equally deſirous of putting a ſtop to the deſolation of an opulent province, which had become the patrimony of his houſe. When both parties were thus favourably diſpoſed, conferences were opened at Tournay, at which the duke and ducheſs of Burgundy aſſiſted in perſon. Peace was ſoon concluded; the citizens of Ghent ſubmitted to the duke, and that prince had, at length, the ſatisfaction of being acknowledged for count of Flanders by all the towns in his dominions. The citizens of Ghent renounced the alliance they had contracted with the Engliſh, and took the oath of allegiance to their ſovereigns†.

When the duke of Burgundy found that tranquillity was re-eſtabliſhed in his new dominions, he thought he ſhould meet with no difficulty in perſuading his ſubjects to renounce pope Urban, and acknowledge his rival Clement; but he was miſtaken, the Flemings had fixed their choice, and were neither to be moved by threats nor entreaties. Indeed, the ſhameful exactions of Clement daily augmented the number of his enemies. In France, the people were loud in their complaints of the pontiff and his partiſans; and the evils encreaſed ſo rapidly, that the interference of government became neceſſary to avert their effects.

For almoſt nine years had Clement exacted a tenth of all the eccleſiaſtical revenues in the kingdom; but even the immenſe ſums that were collected by this means proved insufficient to gratify his avidity. The rapacious ingenuity of his ministers was exerted in the invention of new taxes, in the creation of unknown rights*. Disdaining all subaltern means of extortion, Clement imposed a general impost upon all ecclesiastical benefices. The abbot of St. Nicaise was appointed to levy this tax. Threats, seizures, censures, and excommunications were all employed. The provinces were over-run with the collectors of the apostolical chamber. The holders of benefices, in order to raise the sum required, were frequently obliged to sell the books, the sacred vases, and the ornaments of the churches: the collectors even constrained them to unroof the churches, that the tiles and other materials might be exposed to sale. For giving greater authority to their exactions, they had obtained letters from the king, the dangerous abuse whereof the council had not foreseen. Their eyes, however, were at length, opened by the general complaints of the people, which induced the king to revoke the permission he had granted, to distrain the goods of the clergy, in consequence of actions commenced against them by the collectors and sub-collectors of the pope. This revocation was soon followed by a second ordonnance, providing for the security of ecclesiastical property, the support and repairs of churches, and the validity and execution of wills made by abbots and prelates, against the pursuits of the agents employed by the pope and cardinals. The abbot of St. Nicaise, was ordered to quit the kingdom in three days. Arnaud de Corbie, first president of the parliament, was sent to Avignon, to apprise the pope of these regulations. Clement acknowledged the justice of them, and promised to conform to the intentions of the king and his council. The university of Paris had been chiefly instrumental in persuading the council to repress the depredations of the court of Avignon.

A. D. 1386.] Though the people were burdened with taxes, the king determined to renew his preparations for an invasion of England. The port of Sluys was again fixed on as the general rendezvous of the fleet and army. Fifteen hundred vessels were accordingly collected, destined for the embarkation of a hundred thousand men, to be headed by the king in person, accompanied by the princes of the blood, and all the nobility of the kingdom. The expence of the fleet amounted to three millions of livres. Independent of the ships collected by the king, many of which had been purchased in the ports of Holland and Zealand; the constable de Cliffon had equipped seventy-two sail at his own expence. He had also caused a singular edifice to be constructed of prodigious magnitude: this was a town of wood, three thousand paces in diameter, fortified with towers and entrenchments, and capable of containing a whole army. It was intended to serve as a secure retreat for the troops after they had landed in England; and was so constructed that the different parts of it might be united in a very ſhort ſpace of time. It was embarked on board a ſecond fleet, which the conſtable had prepared for the purpoſe in the ports of Brittany. The French regarded the conqueſt of England as a matter of certainty.

It is extraordinary, that while the Engliſh were expoſed to ſuch danger, the duke of Lancaſter ſhould leave the kingdom with twenty thouſand of the beſt troops it contained. That prince ſailed from Portſmouth in the month of May, in order to join the Portugueze, who were at war with the Caſtilians; and having, in his paſſage, raiſed the ſiege of Breſt, which was beſieged by the duke of Brittany, he arrived at Corunna in the month of Auguſt.

The troops in the mean time repaired to Sluys, and its environs, from all parts of France. The diſorders they committed on their march, are thus deſcribed by Froiſſard, who was then on the ſpot. "The poor farmers, who "had got in their corn, were only ſuffered to keep the ſtraw for their labour; "if they ventured to remonſtrate on the violence they ſuſtained, they were ei-"ther beaten or killed; the fiſh-ponds were let dry; and the houſes pulled "down to ſupply the ſoldiers with fuel: had the Engliſh entered France, they "could not have made greater deſtruction than the French troops. After rob-"bing people of their property, they ſaid—We have no money now, but we "ſhall have plenty on our return, and then we will pay you!"

At length the king arrived at Sluys, attended by a ſplendid train of nobles. His preſence encreaſed the ardour of the men; in a ſhort time every thing was ready for the embarkation; and the troops only waited the arrival of the duke of Berry and the fleet from Brittany. The conſtable had ſet ſail, but meeting with a ſtorm in the channel, his ſhips were diſperſed, and many of them were wrecked on the Engliſh coaſt; among theſe were ſeveral which had part of his wooden town on board. Cliſſon, after the ſtorm was over, collected the ſhattered remains of his fleet, and directed his courſe to Sluys, where they haſtened to repair the damages it had ſuſtained. The king impatient to embark, daily ſent meſſengers to the duke of Berry to haſten his departure, but the anſwers he received were evaſive. In the mean time the ſeaſon was far advanced; the troops had conſumed the proviſions and forage; the ſurrounding country was laid waſte by their excurſions; a ſcarcity prevailed; and, ſuch was the dreadful depredations which had taken place in the finances, the troops were not paid; of two months' pay that were due to them, they could with difficulty obtain one week's. Yet had immenſe ſums been levied on the people: ſo oppreſſive, indeed, were the burdens impoſed on them, that no man paid leſs than one-fourth of his income; and many, from inability to ſatisfy the demands of the collector, were compelled to quit their habitations, and abandon their property to his diſcretion.

The duke of Berry did not arrive at Sluys till the ſeaſon was too far advanced for engaging in an expedition of ſuch importance. A council was held; at which it was determined to defer the invaſion of England till the following year: and the troops were accordingly diſmiſſed. A great part of the fleet was deſtroyed by a ſtorm. The court returned to Paris, to form new plans for the enſuing campaign. Towards the end of this year, Charles the Bad, king of Navarre, finiſhed a life, which had exhibited one continued ſeries of criminal actions. He had juſt ordered a contribution of two hundred thouſand florins to be levied on his ſubjects; and deputies from the principal towns of Navarre had waited on him to procure the ſuppreſſion or diminution of this impoſt; enraged at their preſumption, Charles is ſaid to have harboured the deſign of putting them to death*. Soon after the death of the king of Navarre, Charles inſtituted a ſuit againſt him, with the view to the confiſcation of his poſſeſſions in Normandy. He was ſummoned to appear in court, as if he had been alive, and the ſame forms were obſerved as if the party accuſed had been preſent. Sentence was pronounced againſt the dead culprit, and it remained with Charles to enforce it when he ſhould think proper.

A. D. 1387.] Notwithſtanding the ill ſucceſs of the two laſt armaments, the court were ſtill determined to render England the theatre of war; preparations were, for the third time, ordered to be made. The management of the expedition was entruſted to Cliſſon; and the admiral, the count of Saint Paul, and the lord of Coucy, aſſembled troops and veſſels, in the ports of Normandy, to join the forces which the conſtable was collecting in Brittany. The quarrel in England, at this period, between the king and parliament, ſeemed to afford flattering hopes of ſucceſs to Charles. But his projects were again thwarted by an unforeſeen obſtacle.

The duke of Brittany had, for the ſecond time, formed the ſiege of Breſt, which the Engliſh again compelled him to raiſe†. But his eagerneſs to obtain poſſeſſion of this place, could not remove the ſuſpicions of the people, who made no ſcruple to affirm, that he was ſecretly attached to the Engliſh; their ſuſpicions acquired freſh force from an incident that occurred at this time. Of the two ſons of Charles of Blois, who had ſo long been kept priſoners in England, the youngeſt had recently died; while John, the eldeſt, hoped, in vain, to procure his liberty by the interpoſition of his family, or the generoſity of the enemy. By the laſt treaty of Guerrande, the duke of Brittany had engaged to obtain the liberation of theſe princes, but when preſſed to perform his engagement, he replied that he could afford them no farther aſſiſtance than his recommendation. But when John of Blois began to think himſelf doomed to perpetual captivity, ambition came to his relief. The conſtable caſt his eyes on this prince as a huſband for the youngeſt of his two daughters, the eldeſt being already married to the viſcount of Rohan. This alliance being accepted by John of Blois, Cliſſon applied to the duke of Ireland, the favourite of Richard, who obtained from his ſovereign the diſpoſal of the priſoner. The conſtable agreed to pay the duke for his ranſom one hundred and twenty thouſand livres, half of which ſum was to be advanced immediately, and the remainder as ſoon as the prince ſhould arrive at Boulogne. When this negociation was communicated to the duke of Brittany, it revived his animoſity againſt the conſtable; but he concealed his reſentment the more effectually to ſecure its gratification.

The duke, for the accompliſhment of his project, convened the ſtates at Vannes, where the nobility of the province attended. He carried his diſſimulation ſo far, as to be preſent at a feaſt given by Cliſſon. As he knew that the conſtable was about to leave the place, to forward preparations for the invaſion of England, he entered into converſation with him on the ſubject of the expedition, and invited him to viſit the caſtle of l'Hermine. Cliſſon accepted the invitation; and, when arrived at the caſtle, the duke conducted him to the principal tower, requeſting his opinion of it; he made ſome difficulty in aſcending the ſtair-caſe before the prince, till Montfort told him that he wanted to ſpeak with the lord of Laval. The conſtable then proceeded to the ſecond ſtory, without perceiving that the door was ſhut upon him, when ſeveral men ruſhed out, loaded him with irons, and conveyed him to a dungeon. The place in which they confined him was ſo cold, that he was almoſt frozen, though it was in the midſt of ſummer; and, but for the compaſſion of a poor eſquire, who threw his robe to him, he muſt probably have periſhed. The lord of Laval, who was engaged in converſation with the duke, ſeeing him turn pale, the moment the door of the tower was ſhut, began to ſuſpect the truth. Beaumanoir coming up, in the mean time, aſked for the conſtable; "Do you wiſh to experience the ſame "fate?" ſaid the duke, and that noblemen replying in the affirmative, he drew his dagger, and exclaimed, in a tranſport of rage, "Since you wiſh it, I'll put "out one of your eyes, and then you'll be like him!" He was deterred from executing his threat; but Beaumanoir was ſeized, and conducted to the tower.

Laval in vain had recourſe to prayers and remonſtrances, to awake the duke to a ſenſe of honour. As ſoon as he had left him, Montfort called the governor of the caſtle, John de Bavalan, and ordered him to encloſe the conſtable in a ſack, and, in the night, to throw him into the ſea. This officer threw himſelf at the feet of his maſter, and entreated him to forego a deſign ſo pregnant with diſhonour; the duke was reſolute; he told the governor that he had received his orders, and that his head ſhould pay the forfeit of his diſobedience.

In the middle of the night the duke awoke; and began to reflect on his conduct; he deplored his error, and lamented the impoſſibility of repairing it. The entrance of Bavalan into his chamber, at the dawn of day, with the news that his orders had been executed, converted his ſorrow into deſpair. He ſhut himſelf up in his apartment, ordered that no one ſhould be admitted to his preſence and refuſed all ſuſtenance. Bavalan was reproached for having executed the commands impoſed on him, but he pleaded the preciſion of the duke's orders, as an excuſe for obeying them. At night, however, he again entered Montfort's apartment, and relieved him from his diſtreſs, by an aſſurance that Cliſſon was ſtill alive. The duke was unable to contain the tranſports of joy and gratitude with which his boſom was agitated. He ſeized the knight in his arms, extolled his fidelity, and called him the guardian of his honour.

The duke, however, refuſed to releaſe the conſtable, till he had engaged to purchaſe his liberty by the payment of one hundred thouſand livres, and the ſurrender of four fortified places in his poſſeſſion. But the moment Cliſſon was releaſed, he haſtened to Paris, where he threw himſelf at the king's feet and demanded juſtice for the violence he had ſuſtained; while the noblemen attached to his ſervice, retook the places which he had been compelled to cede. The king was enraged at the affront offered to the firſt officer of the crown; and his indignation was encreaſed when he reflected that, by this means, his project of a deſcent upon England had, for the third time, been rendered abortive. Charles reſolved to make the duke of Brittany feel the weight of his reſentment, but the dukes of Berry and Burgundy induced him to forego his deſign.

Charles reſolved to procure ſome ſatisfaction for the affront offered to his favourite, and with that view diſpatched ambaſſadors to the court of Brittany. The duke, in the mean time, had ſtrengthened the fortifications of his principal towns and fortreſſes, and had perſuaded ſeveral of the former to receive Engliſh garriſons. The earl of Arundel, with an Engliſh fleet, was cruiſing off the coaſt of Brittany; and by puſhing Montfort to extremities there was reaſon to apprehend that he would open his ports to the public enemy. The new king of Navarre, whoſe ſiſter the duke had lately eſpouſed, might, it was feared, take advantage of this conjuncture, to aſſert his claim to his father's poſſeſſions in Normandy. The duke of Brittany was aware of theſe motives of forbearance, and, therefore, refuſed to give any ſatisfactory anſwer to the French ambaſſadors. At length by the perſuaſions of the lord of Montbourcher, he repaired to the French court, where he engaged to repay, by inſtalments, the money extorted from Cliſſon.

Charles was now at leiſure to ſatisfy his reſentment againſt the duke of Gueldres, one of the vaſſals whoſe military ſervices Charles the Wiſe had purchaſed, towards the concluſion of his reign. This prince, having received more advantageous offers from the Engliſh court, had withdrawn his homage, and ſent a formal defiance to the king*. The neceſſary preparations being completed, Charles placed himſelf at the head of his troops; but as he was about to enter the imperial territories, it was neceſſary to ſend ambaſſadors to Winceſlaus, to explain the motives of his conduct and the object of his expedition. The emperor replied, that he was acquainted with the intentions of his couſin, the king of France, but he could not conceive it neceſſary that ſo powerful a monarch ſhould aſſemble all his forces, and incur ſo great an expence, for an enterpriſe of ſuch little importance; he added, that had he been ſooner appriſed of the circumſtance, he would have ſaved the king the trouble of ſo long a journey, by compelling the duke of Gueldres to liſten to reaſon. The ambaſſadors returned thanks to the emperor, and aſſured him that the king of France, when his honour was concerned, neither regarded trouble nor expence. When the ambaſſadors returned with this anſwer, the army were already on their march; application had been made to the ducheſs of Brabant to allow them to paſs through her territories; but, although her ſubjects were at war with the duke of Gueldres, the nobility requeſted ſhe would deſire the king to take another road, as they were not leſs afraid of the troops of their allies, than of thoſe of their enemies. It became neceſſary to take a circuit; and the army, having traverſed Champagne, the Ardennes, and Luxembourg, preceded by three thouſand workmen, who were employed in levelling the roads, arrived on the frontiers of Juliers, after a long and toilſome march. The duke of Juliers, whoſe territories lay open to the depredations of the troops, threw himſelf at the king's feet, and beſought him to pardon his ſon. He experienced a favourable reception from Charles, whoſe troops extended their incurſions into the duchy of Gueldres. The duke of Gueldres then ſued for peace, and obtained it*, on condition that he ſhould ſubmit his diſpute with the ducheſs of Brabant to the deciſion of the king; that if, in future, he ſhould find occaſion to ſend a defiance, it ſhould be couched in terms of greater politeneſs than the laſt, and preceded by a warning given a year before.

To ſupport theſe extraordinary expences, recourſe was had to the uſual means of raiſing money in thoſe ages. Conſiderable ſums were exacted from the Jews, either for the new privileges they obtained, or for the renewal of ſuch as they had before enjoyed. Among the infinite number of conceſſions†, all contrary to exiſting laws, that were now granted to this people, one of the moſt ſingular, was the permiſſion to exact from their debtors compound intereſt.

The authority enjoyed by the dukes of Berry and Burgundy had long excited the jealouſy of the courtiers; and, on the violence offered to the conſtable by the duke of Brittany, that jealouſy had manifeſted itſelf in a peculiar manner. The expedition of Gueldres had ſuſpended the effects of this miſunderſtanding; but thoſe who wiſhed to deprive the princes of any ſhare in the government, had not ceaſed to inſtil into the mind of the king, ſuſpicions of their fidelity, which their conduct was calculated to confirm. Charles now began to regard his uncles as troubleſome tutors, to whoſe authority he was reſolved no longer to ſubmit. He had attained to an age impatient of reſtraint; and nothing could pleaſe him better than to take the government into his own hands. On his return from Gueldres, he convened an aſſembly at Rheims, which was attended by the princes of the blood, many of the nobility and dignified clergy, and by all the members of the council. It was here ſubmitted to the aſſembly, whether it was not time for the king to reign alone, as his underſtanding appeared to be fully developed; and as he ſaw his uncles, and their agents, more intent on their own private intereſt, than on the promotion of the public good? The dukes of Burgundy and Berry were preſent while the queſtion was diſcuſſed. The chancellor called upon the cardinal de Laon for his opinion. That prelate declined ſpeaking firſt; but, the king inſiſting, he was forced to obey. After obſerving that the king was old enough to ſway the ſceptre, ſince he had completed his twentieth year, he ſaid, that the good of the ſtate required that he ſhould immediately take the government into his own hands, to remove all cauſe for envy and diſcontent between the nobles of the realm; whence great inconveniences had ariſen, and ſtill greater might be reaſonably expected. The cardinal, who at firſt had ſeemed fearful of entering into an open explanation of his ſentiments, grew bolder, as he advanced in his ſpeech, and expatiated largely on the abuſes which had crept into the government. Although the two princes were greatly diſſatisfied with the conduct of their nephew, they did not venture to expreſs their diſcontent at his reſolution.

Some days after the diſſolution of this aſſembly, the cardinal de Laon fell dangerouſly ill; and, from the ſymptoms of his diſorder, he was convinced that ſome ſecret enemy had haſtened the period of his exiſtence. He died, with ſentiments truly chriſtian; his laſt breath ſpoke the language of forgiveneſs, and he earneſtly requeſted that no attempt might be made to diſcover the author of his death*. The king was extremely afflicted at his loſs: he ordered the body to be opened, and the diſcovery of poiſon, then reduced to a certainty, what before was but doubt. The prelate's laſt requeſt, however, was complied with, and the puniſhment of the atrocious deed was left to the ſevereſt of all judges, a guilty conſcience.

A. D. 1388.] The dukes of Berry and Burgundy now retired to their reſpective appanages, while the king entered on the duties of his ſtation. He found the finances in dreadful diſorder. The royal houſhold, inſtead of the ſplendour of royalty, exhibited an appearance of want. The king, at the time the dukes took leave of him, had few jewels, and little plate, tapeſtry, and furniture, while his uncles diſplayed a degree of pomp that eclipſed the luſtre of the throne.

A total change took place at court; where thoſe who had been connected with the princes were diſmiſſed, and replaced by the creatures of the new miniſtry. The government was entruſted to Le Begue de Vilaines; the lord of la Riviere; John de Mercier, lord of Noviant; and John de Montagu: theſe noblemen were ſupported by the credit and authority of the conſtable. The duke of Bourbon ſtill preſerved, with the king and council, that influence and power, to the poſſeſſion of which he had every claim that illuſtrious birth, magnanimity of mind, and unſhaken integrity could confer. Charles, when he diſmiſſed his paternal uncles, particularly requeſted that this prince would continue to aſſiſt him with his advice. His virtues were known to every one; he loved the king for himſelf; and all his views were directed to the good of the ſtate. He was equally eſteemed by the ſovereign, the nobility, and the people, and contemporary writers unite in giving him the beſt of characters.

The people flattered themſelves that their new governors would ſignaliſe the commencement of their adminiſtration by diminiſhing the weight of impoſts*: but the only relief which they obtained was a repeal of the additional tax, which had been levied for defraying the expences of the war. All the other taxes and ſubſidies continued to be levied as before. Six generals of the finances were appointed, who conſtituted the court of aids, which regulated all matters of finance, and took cognizance of all cauſes relating to the public revenue. A new council of ſtate was formed at the ſame time, conſiſting of the conſtable, the two mareſchals, and nine other members.

After enforcing ſome regulations for promoting cleanlineſs in the metropolis, and for reducing the number of judges in parliament, the miniſtry applied themſelves to the concluſion of a peace with England: and, though no immediate accommodation was the reſult of their negociations, a tacit ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities took place till the following year, when a truce was ſigned, for three years, in which all the allies of both crowns were included†.

The marriage of the duke of Touraine with Valentina of Milan, daughter to Galeazzo Viſconti by Iſabella of France, ſiſter to Charles the Wiſe, was celebrated about this time at Melun, in preſence of the king and his whole court. The rejoicings laſted ſeveral days. Beſides the county of Aſt, and an eſtate of thirty thouſand livres per annum, the princeſs of Milan brought her huſband a conſiderable ſum of money, amounting, according to Froiſſard, to more than a million of livres, equal, in value, to four hundred thouſand pounds ſterling of our preſent money, and, in effects to upwards of two millions. A part of this money was employed in the purchaſe of eſtates, which produced a conſiderable augmentation of the prince's appanage.

The next ſubject of rejoicing which occurred, was the queen's public entry into Paris, which had been deferred till the preſent year. The king, wiſhing to be preſent (incognito) at the proceſſion, mounted behind one of his courtiers; they both paraded the ſtreets in diſguiſe, and were beaten by the ſerjeants, who were ſtationed to keep off the mob; an incident which amuſed Charles. Next day the queen was crowned in the chapel belonging to the palace. The preſents made, on this occaſion, by the citizens of Paris to the queen, were carried to her apartment by two men, one of whom was diſguiſed as a bear, and the other as an unicorn. The plate preſented to the ducheſs of Touraine, on her marriage, was likewiſe carried by two men, with their faces blacked, and dreſſed like Moors. Theſe preſents coſt the city ſixty thouſand crowns of gold. The Pariſians had flattered themſelves with the hopes that this teſtimony of their zeal would be the means of affecting ſome diminution of the taxes; but, on the departure of the court, their hopes all vaniſhed. The duty on ſalt was encreaſed; and an alteration of the coin gave them freſh ſubject of diſcontent. People were forbidden to receive the old coin under pain of death; and, as this prohibition extended to every ſpecies of money, it produced the greateſt inconvenience to the public. As the kingdom was now at peace, the truce with England being concluded, there could be no excuſe for ſuch oppreſſive exactions.

About this time the king undertook a journey to Avignon, to confer with Clement, who exhorted him to profit by the troubles which prevailed in Italy, to ſecure to Lewis of Anjou the crown of Naples. The pontiff received the king with the honours due to his rank, and was prodigal in ſuch favours as were beſt fitted to pleaſe Charles and his court. Among other proofs of liberality, he granted him the diſpoſal of four biſhopricks and ſeven hundred and fifty benefices. Two days after the arrival of the court, Lewis of Anjou received the crown of Naples and Sicily from the hands of his holineſs.

While the king was at Avignon, intelligence arrived of the death of Urban competitor of Clement. It was at firſt hoped that his death would put an end to the ſchiſm in the church; but thoſe hopes vaniſhed. The prelates who had been attached to the pontiff of Rome filled the pontifical chair. The conclave, compoſed of fourteen cardinals, elected Boniface the Ninth*.

When Charles left Avignon he repaired to Beziers. The inhabitants of Languedoc, oppreſſed by the government of the duke of Berry, carried their complaints to the throne. A Bernardine monk, had undertaken to repreſent to the king the deplorable ſtate of the province. The people experienced every ſpecies of oppreſſion. The towns and villages were equally expoſed to exactions the moſt unjuſt: impoſitions innumerable had been levied on them, and repeated five or ſix times in one year. When unable to pay, their goods were ſeized, their perſons arreſted, and the ſmalleſt reſiſtance experienced rigorous puniſhment. Such were theſe depredations, that upwards of forty thouſand families were compelled to abandon their country and take refuge in Arragon, or ſome of the neighbouring provinces; this abuſe of power converted one of the fineſt countries in France almoſt into a deſart.

Betizac the chief miniſter of the duke of Berry, had acquired an abſolute aſcendancy over the mind of his maſter. He had a fertility of invention, in expedients pregnant with deſtruction. In other reſpects, his ignorance was extreme, and could only be exceeded by his vices. The king, moved by the repreſenta-tions of the monk, which were made in preſence of the duke of Berry, promiſed to remedy the evils of which the province complained. The duke imagined that this promiſe would ſoon be forgotten, and that the king would be contented with the orders which he ſent to his miniſter to moderate the taxes in Languedoc. But the reſolution was taken not only to deprive him of the government, but to inflict exemplary puniſhment on ſuch of his miniſters as had made improper uſe of authority. Moſt of the duke's officers were diſmiſſed. Betizac was thrown into priſon, and preparations were made for his trial that ſoon cauſed him to tremble for his life. Commiſſioners were appointed to examine him, who aſked him by what means he had amaſſed the immenſe treaſures found in his poſſeſſion? To which he replied, "My lord of Berry wiſhes his ſervants to be rich." This defence was rejected as unſatisfactory; but the proceedings of the commiſſioners were ſtopped by the arrival of two knights, with letters from the duke of Berry, who acknowledged that Betizac, in his adminiſtration, had done nothing without his expreſs orders. Such a juſtification ought to have procured the immediate releaſe of the priſoner; but the council reſolved to accompliſh by ſtratagem what could not be effected by law. A perſon was ſent to viſit Betizac in priſon, under the maſk of friendſhip, who informed him that his execution was fixed for the next day, and that the only means of averting the fate which awaited him, was by acknowledging the commiſſion of ſome crime cognizable only by the eccleſiaſtical judge, in which caſe he would be conducted to Avignon, where the duke of Berry had ſufficient influence to procure his abſolution. Betizac gave credit to this intelligence; and, next day ſending for his judges, he confeſſed to them that he neither believed in the doctrine of the Trinity, nor in the incarnation. This was ſufficient for their purpoſe; they haſtened to the king and informed him of what they had heard. Charles exclaimed, that Betizac was a wretch who deſerved to periſh, and that all the remonſtrances of the duke of Berry ſhould not ſave him from the flames.

When brought before the eccleſiaſtical judges, Betizac perſiſted in the declarations he had previouſly made. He was then delivered up to the civil juriſdiction, and conducted, without delay, to the place of execution. The duke of Berry vowed to revenge the death of his favourite on the conſtable and his aſſociates, by whoſe means it had been promoted. Though this rapacious miniſter was, doubtleſs, deſerving of the ſevereſt puniſhment, yet the artifice, by which his deſtruction was effected, reflected the higheſt diſgrace on the council. The nation ſeems to have derived little advantage from the change of its governors. Cliſſon, indeed, had ever diſplayed a ferocious and ſanguinary diſpoſition; any act of cruelty in him, therefore, cannot excite ſurpriſe. La Riviere and other miniſters were, on this occaſion, wholly influenced by the conſtable. Farther, to irritate the duke of Berry, they not only deprived him of the government of Languedoc, but John Harpedenne, nephew to Cliſſon, was choſen to carry to the prince the order of his diſmiſſion.

A. D. 1390, 1391.] Although the duke of Bourbon had been requeſted by the king to remain at court, and aſſiſt him with his advice, that prince had a very ſmall ſhare in the government. His advice was too diſintereſted to be followed by a monarch deſtitute of experience, and ſurrounded by rapacious courtiers, who barred all acceſs to the throne. Every body murmured at the conduct of the preſent adminiſtration, and the people were almoſt tempted to regret the diſmiſſion of Berry and Burgundy. Bourbon, and the few noblemen truly zealous to promote the welfare of the ſtate, deplored, in ſecret, the preſent diſorders, and the fatal conſequences of thoſe diviſions which already began to appear. They were ſilent; and their ſilence tended to augment the audacity of thoſe who directed the government. Cliſſon, la Riviere, Noviant and Montagu had become arbiters of the kingdom.

The duke of Bourbon ſeized the firſt opportunity that occurred for abſenting himſelf with honour at leaſt for a time. The arrival of ambaſſadors from the republic of Geneva, who came to implore the aſſiſtance of France againſt the African corſairs, furniſhed him with a pretence*. Being declared chief of the expedition, he repaired to Genoa, with fifteen hundred men at arms, where he was joined by the earl of Derby, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Lancaſter, a prince of the greateſt courage. Theſe troops, joined to the Genoeſe, landed on the coaſt of Africa, in ſight of the infidels, who were drawn up on the ſhore, but who, on the approach of the chriſtians, fled with precipitation. The chriſtians laid ſiege to Carthage, and made ſeveral fruitleſs efforts to take that city by aſſault; foiled in this attempt they made a furious attack on the enemy, who were entrenched in a fortified camp; they forced the entrenchments, and routed the infidels with great ſlaughter. Their army, in the mean time, diminiſhed from the intemperance of the climate. They were on the point of re-embarking, when the king of Tunis propoſed an accommodation. A treaty was concluded, by which that monarch agreed to reſtore all the chriſtian ſlaves in his dominions; to pay ten thouſand ducats of gold towards defraying the expences of the war; and engaged, in future, to impoſe no reſtraint on the freedom of commerce. This laſt article was but ill-obſerved. The chriſtian merchants were expoſed, more than ever, to the exactions of the infidels. All the commerce of the Levant was monopolized by the Venetians, the Neapolitans, and the Genoeſe, but principally by the latter. Genoa was then conſidered as the emporium of the eaſt and weſt, and the intereſt of that republic had been alone conſulted in the expedition to Africa. The Genoeſe flattered themſelves, that, by obtaining poſſeſſion of Carthage, they would exempt their veſſels from paying the tribute exacted by the mahometans, on their approach to the coaſt of Barbary. But, after this expedition, the Africans made them pay ſuch heavy duties, that, for a long time, all the commodities of the eaſt, and particularly ſpices, ſold at a moſt enormous price.

* Chron. MS. No. 10279; Juvenal des Urſins; Le Laboureur; Chron. de St. Denis.

The noblemen and knights who accompanied the duke of Bourbon, made themſelves amends for the failure of their enterpriſe by the recital of their adventures. The king, heated by the deſcription of theſe martial achievements, formed the project of attacking the infidels, either by repairing to the coaſt of Africa, or by marching againſt Bajazet, emperor of the Turks, who had juſt ſucceeded his father, Amurath the Firſt. Charles accuſtomed himſelf to give way to his inclinations. His miniſters had recourſe to a ſtratagem, to make him abandon, or at leaſt ſuſpend the execution of this project; they gave him to underſtand that he could not render a greater ſervice to religion, than by effecting the extinction of the ſchiſm which prevailed in the papacy; that it was neceſſary to eſtabliſh harmony in the church, before he took up arms in her defence. The king reliſhed this advice. He determined to march into Italy, and compel the Romans to ſubmit to the authority of Clement. He recollected that, on his departure from Avignon, he had promiſed that pontiff to eſpouſe his cauſe with effect.

This expedition being reſolved on, an account was drawn up of the number of troops deſtined to paſs the Alps. The king was to lead four thouſand lances; the dukes of Berry and Burgundy each of them two thouſand; the duke of Bourbon, one thouſand; the conſtable, two thouſand; and the lords of Coucy and Saint Paul one thouſand. The duke of Brittany was appriſed of the king's departure for Italy, and invited to accompany him, but he laughed at the idea; obſerving, that Charles would ſoon have other buſiueſs to occupy his attention. In fact, a party was already formed againſt the government. The king was blind to every thing; the weakneſs of his mind began to diſplay itſelf; and his miniſters, elated with the favour they enjoyed, took no pains to avert the ſtorm which hovered over their heads. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy ſeemed to approve the king's reſolution, from the conviction that they could deter him from carrying it into execution.

Although the conſtable was protected by the king, he had not been able to conſtrain the duke of Brittany to fulfil the terms of the laſt accommodation; wherefore he exerted his influence with the council to make the nation a party in his private diſputes*. The duke had plauſible grounds of recrimination againſt Cliſſon and his ſon-in-law, the count of Penthievre, who had hitherto refuſed to pay him that homage to which he was bound by the treaty of Guerrande. Hoſtilities had commenced, and ſeveral places been reduced. Deputies were ſent by the court of France into Brittany, for ſettling new terms of pacification. When they had concluded a treaty; they returned; but they had no ſooner left the province, than the duke took poſſeſſion of Chantonceaux, a place belonging to the conſtable. This incident rekindled the flames of diſcord. The duke ſent ambaſſadoas to France, for whom he was under the neceſſity of applying for ſafe-conducts, in the apprehenſion that they would be ſtopped by Penthievre and Cliſſon.

To engage the duke of Brittany in a quarrel with France, the conſtable accuſed him of invading the prerogatives of the crown, by coining money in his own dominions; and of being guilty of rebellion, by prohibiting the officers of his courts of juſtice from receiving the citations of the parliament of Paris. The ſovereigns of Brittany had, at all times, enjoyed the privilege of coining money. It was recorded in all the ancient regiſters, and had never been given up. With regard to the citations, the duke properly obſerved that they could not have effect in Brittany, unleſs in thoſe particular cauſes, in which the feudal laws admitted of appeals to the ſuperior lord, and in the caſe of a refuſal of juſtice. He juſtified himſelf from the complaints preferred againſt him for receiving the oath of fealty from his vaſſals, accompanied by a promiſe to ſerve him againſt all men whatever, without any exception of perſons; ſuch being the form of the oath which had, for time immemorial, been exacted. The ſchiſm in the papacy afforded another ground of complaint. The duke, on the death of Urban, had declared in favour of Clement, merely in hope of ſeeing tranquillity reſtored to the church; but, on the election of Boniface, he adhered to the ſyſtem he had formerly adopted, and obſerved a ſtrict neutrality. The king diſapproved of his conduct; but the duke, in his defence, alledged that this was a queſtion merely ſpiritual, which could have no poſſible relation to his feudal duties; and that he thought himſelf obliged, in ſo delicate an affair, to be guided by the dictates of his conſcience, in preference to all human conſiderations.

Such were the principal ſubjects of diſcontent, which the conſtable and his partiſans were inceſſantly repeating to the king; while the princes, who favoured the duke of Brittany, threw all their influence into the oppoſite ſcale. At length it was reſolved that the king, the conſtable, and his ſon-in-law, ſhould repair to Tours, and that the duke ſhould meet them there, to bring about a final accommodation. The duke of Berry went to Brittany to prepare Montfort for the interview, and he was accompanied by envoys diſpatched by the council for the ſame purpoſe. Theſe ambaſſadors, in fulfilling their commiſſion, diſplayed ſo much pride, and ſo little regard to decency, that the duke would have thrown them into priſon, but for the intervention of his wife. He therefore diſmiſſed them, with a promiſe to attend the conference at Tours.

While theſe proceedings kept the minds of the public in ſuſpence, a court intrigue, which, at the time, excited but little attention, firſt ſet in motion thoſe ſecret ſprings which produced the greateſt calamities to the kingdom*. Amongſt the crowd of idle people who frequented the court was Peter de Craon, whoſe criminal neglect haſtened the diſgrace of the duke of Anjou. Supported by the protection of the young duke of Touraine, he braved the reproaches which his conduct had merited; while the ſplendour of his birth, and his immenſe riches, encreaſed that conſideration which the friendſhip of the prince had procured for him. Craon had, for ſome time, carried on a ſecret correſpondence with the duke of Brittany, to whom he was related, but his imprudence ſoon deprived him of the means of ſupporting it. He had the indeſcretion to reveal to the ducheſs of Touraine, an affair of gallantry, which the duke had imparted to him in confidence. The ducheſs immediately ſent for the lady, and threatened her with inſtant death, unleſs ſhe renounced all future connections with her huſband: ſhe then informed the duke of the perfidy of his confident; and he immediately prefered a complaint to the king againſt Craon, who was baniſhed from the court, without being informed of the cauſe of his diſgrace. He had retired to Brittany ſome time before the interview at Tours. The duke perſuaded him that Cliſſon was the author of his diſgrace; Craon reſolved to be revenged on his enemy, and waited a favourable opportunity to gratify his reſentment.

The court, in the mean time, arrived at Tours, whither the duke of Brittany repaired, attended by a retinue of fifteen hundred perſons, and by five veſſels manned and armed. Notwithſtanding the eagerneſs with which this interview had been promoted, the duke was compelled to wait a long time before he could procure an audience. The miniſters, indeed, ſeem to have ſtudied every means which they thought could induce him to break off the conferences. His people were inſulted, and his arms, which he had placed over the door of his manſion, were covered with mud. The king informed of theſe inſults, doubled the guards, and attempted to appeaſe the duke. At this juncture, when an open rupture was hourly expected, the conſtable arrived with the duke de Penthievre. Cliſſon's retinue, in numbers and magnificence, exceeded thoſe of the princes of the blood. The aſcendancy which this miniſter had acquired over his maſter deſtroyed all hopes of reconciliation. He adviſed him to return to Paris, and from thence to march into Brittany, at the head of a powerful army; this advice Charles had actually adopted, but the ſpirited interference of the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, prevented him from putting it in execution, and induced him to renew the negociations with the duke of Brittany, by propoſing a double marriage between the infant ſon of that prince, and a daughter of Charles; and a ſon of the count of Penthievre, with a daughter of the duke. This project, by which the duchy of Brittany would be enſured to a princeſs of France, diſconcerted Cliſſon and his partiſans. Montfort was prevailed on to accept this propoſal. The count of Penthievre accordingly paid homage to the duke, ratified the treaty of Guerrande, and promiſed to lay down the arms and ducal title of Brittany, which he had aſſumed. The diſpute between the duke and the conſtable was ſettled with equal facility. The court then returned to the capital, and Montfort to his duchy, with the full reſolution of evading what he had, in a manner, been compelled to ſign. He had no ſooner arrived at Rennes, than he ſet a new enquiry on foot, the reſult of which was a complete confirmation of thoſe claims which he had been obliged to relinquiſh, their validity having been conteſted by the council.

Immediately after the king's return from Tours, the queen gave birth to a prince. This event proved a ſource of infinite ſatisfaction, as his two firſt children had died in infancy; and as a hermit had, three years before, predicted that he would be the laſt of his race, unleſs he aboliſhed the taxes. The hermit's prediction had a great effect upon Charles, but the dukes of Burgundy and Berry, being leſs credulous, and more avaricious than their nephew, diſſuaded him from enforcing the reſolution he had adopted, to ſuppreſs thoſe impoſts.

A. D. 1392.] At the commencement of this year, the dukes of York and Lancaſter repaired to Amiens. They were received by the king with every mark of attention. The object of their embaſſy was, a renewal of the negociations for a peace between France and England; but all they could effect was a prolongation of a truce for a year.

Soon after the departure of the Engliſh princes, the king was attacked by a dangerous diſorder, during which the firſt ſymptoms appeared of that delirium which embittered the remainder of his days. As he was in the bloom of youth, the ſtrength of his conſtitution might, with the aſſiſtance of a proper regimen, have, probably, enabled him to have ſtopped this infirmity in its origin; but thoſe faithleſs miniſters, by whom he was ſurrounded, tended to promote the growth of an evil, which it was their duty to eradicate. The queen was addicted to pleaſureable purſuits; and it muſt be ſuppoſed that her conduct had an irreſiſtible influence over that of the court.

But amidſt the pleaſures of the table, the princes of the blood were not deaf to the calls of ambition or intereſt. The duke of Touraine obtained from the king, his brother, the duchy of Orleans, in exchange for that of Touraine; with a penſion of four thouſand livers*. He made a farther acquiſition of territory, by the purchaſe of the county of Bloist, much againſt the will of the duke of Berry, whoſe daughter, widow to the only ſon of Guy, count of Blois, had a part of her dower payable from the revenues of that county. The price of the county was fixed at two hundred thouſand livres, which the duke of Orleans paid out of his wife's fortune.

During theſe tranſactions, Craon had eſtabliſhed his reſidence in Brittany, where he had been employed in deviſing means of revenge againſt Cliſſon. He ſecretly ſent arms to his houſe in Paris, and aſſembled about forty of his dependents. He repaired to the metropolis himſelf, where he lay concealed till the time arrived for putting his ſcheme in execution. On the feſtival of the holy ſacrament, Cliſſon had ſtaid at the Hotel de Saint Paul till night was far advanced; on his return home, with only eight attendants, all of whom were unarmed, he was ſuddenly attacked by a body of ruffians, with Craon at their head. So ſure was that nobleman of effecting his purpoſe, that he called out to Cliſſon to let him know whom he had to encounter, and what he had to expect. The conſtable defended himſelf; but, being overpowered by numbers, he was diſmounted, and left motionleſs on the ground. Craon, thinking that he was dead, retired with precipitation, and moſt of his accomplices effected their eſcape. But the wounds which Cliſſon had received, though numerous, proved to be ſlight; and the ſurgeons aſſured the king, on the firſt dreſſing, that he would be able to mount his horſe in a fortnight.

The king, who had haſted to the ſpot where the affair happened, expreſſed the greateſt ſorrow and indignation. The provoſt of Paris had orders to diſpatch meſſengers after Craon, but he had too much the ſtart to be overtaken. Two men at arms, however, and a page, who were found in the road, ſome leagues from Paris, were beheaded three days after they were taken; as was alſo the porter of Craon's hotel, though ignorant of his maſter's deſigns. A canon of Chartres, at whoſe houſe Craon had ſtopped to refreſh himſelf, was conducted to Paris, and, though a man of unimpeached integrity, he was treated as a criminal, deprived of his livings, and condemned to paſs the remainder of his days in a dungeon. Craon, in the mean time, arrived at Sable, a ſtrong fortreſs of his own, on the confines of Maine and Brittany. He there learned that Cliſſon was not dead. Not thinking himſelf ſafe at Sable, he purſued his journey to Brittany. Though abſent, he was tried for the crime he had committed, and his manſion at Paris was levelled with the ground. His property was confiſcated, and divided among the king's favourites. The duke of Orleans had a conſiderable part of it. Almoſt all the houſes he had inhabited were demoliſhed; and moſt of the courtiers, from a ſervile attention to the king, aſſiſted at the demolition. The admiral, John de Vienne, was ordered to take poſſeſſion of the lordſhip of Ferte-Bernard, which belonged to Craon; not content with ſecuring the immenſe riches he found there, he turned Joan of Chaſtillon, wife to Craon, out of doors, with ſcarcely cloaths ſufficient to conceal her nakedneſs.

Charles, when informed that Craon had taken refuge in Brittany, ſent ambaſſadors to the duke to demand the criminal. Montfort aſſured them that he was ignorant of his retreat; and obſerved, that he could have nothing to do with a private quarrel between Craon and Cliſſon. This anſwer was deemed equivocal, and war was immediately reſolved on by the council. The duke of Berry was at Paris at this time; and it is pretended that he had been informed of the conſpiracy againſt Cliſſon, by Craon's ſecretary. This prince and the duke of Burgundy, were enemies to the conſtable, whom they accuſed of having acquired a perfect aſcendancy over the king, in order to obtain a degree of authority which he daily abuſed, and to appropriate the revenue of the ſtate to his own private uſe. When Cliſſon was wounded by Craon and his accomplices, he believed his life to be in danger; he therefore, made his will; after diſpoſing of his real property, he bequeathed ſeventeen hundred thouſand livres, in money and jewels, equal in value to about ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, and, in efficacy, to upwards of three millions and an half ſterling! Beſides the marriage portions of his two daughters, as conſiderable as if they had been princeſſes of the blood, he had diſcharged the ranſom of one of his ſons-in-law; had recently paid a hundred thouſand livres to the duke of Brittany; had purchaſed ſeveral eſtates; and diſplayed in his houſe all the pomp and ſplendour of a ſovereign prince. As his father had left his children but trifling fortunes, this immenſe wealth muſt have been acquired at the expence of honeſty.

Bent on revenging the projected aſſaſſination of his favourite, Charles would liſten to nothing that was foreign from his plan. Orders were iſſued for levying troops throughout the kingdom; every man was anxious to diſplay his loyalty by obedience, and ſuch as diſapproved an enterpriſe which tended to make a private quarrel the object of a national war, were compelled to conceal their real ſentiments; for the king had declared that any remonſtrance on this ſubject would incur his diſpleaſure. Cliſſon and his aſſociates were aware that the eyes of the nation were fixed on their conduct. Impreſſed with theſe ideas, they courted popularity, and ſought to conciliate favour by condeſcenſion. The univerſity had long ſolicited in vain, for an audience of the king; their wiſhes were now complied with, and a promiſe was obtained that the object of their complaints ſhould be immediately removed, and the preſervation of their privileges enforced. The enmity of the duke of Berry they ſought to avert, by reſtoring to him the government of Languedoc; while Charles endeavoured to ſecure the compliance of the duke of Burgundy, by profeſſions of favour and affection. But the enlightened part of the nation viewed the enterpriſe in a proper light, while the princes, leſs cautious and circumſpect, openly expreſſed their diſapprobation of the miniſter's conduct. The duke of Burgundy, in particular, was loud in his cenſures; and denounced threats againſt all ſuch as ſhould confirm his nephew in the reſolution of carrying the war into Brittany. The council would have yielded to his opinion, but Cliſſon, was too proud to relax, where intereſt and revenge urged him to be firm.

Some private meetings were held, at which different means for ſetting aſide the enterpriſe were propoſed. Many difficulties were ſtarted, and embarraſſments promoted, which retarded the departure of the troops. One reaſon appeared unanſwerable; the king's phyſicians proteſted that Charles was not in a condition to purſue the journey. Since his laſt illneſs, his conſtitution had been impaired; an internal heat preyed upon his health; and his mental faculties had ſuſtained ſtill greater injury than his bodily powers. His converſation continually betrayed ſymptoms of derangement. Alternately choleric and lethargic, his ideas ſeemed only to be clear and regular on the execution of the project he had in view. Letters were preſented him, from the queen of Arragon, who informed him that a knight, whom ſhe ſuſpected to be Craon, had been ſtopped at Barcelona, on the point of embarking for Naples. It is pretended that the duke of Brittany had actually compelled Craon to retire into Arragon.

The king refuſed to liſten to the information*; and, when the duke of Burgundy preſſed him to verify the fact, by ſending meſſengers to Barcelona, he replied, that he might ſend when he pleaſed, but that Craon was certainly in Brittany, and there alone would he ſeek him. The refuſal of the governor of Sable to ſurrender that place confirmed Charles in this opinion. In vain did the duke renew his proteſtations that he had no ſhare in the crime committed by Craon, and that he was wholly ignorant of his retreat; it was determined to give no credit to this aſſertion, but immediately to proceed to the gratification of Cliſſon's reſentment. The departure of the troops was accordingly fixed for the fifth day of Auguſt, in the year 1392.

The whole nation, excepting only the miniſters and their immediate partiſans, were highly diſcontented with the war. There was no proof that the duke of Brittany protected the criminal who was claimed by the French council. The formal diſavowal of the duke was all that the moſt rigid juſtice could require. Cliſſon triumphed over all his opponents: the army moved forward. As the troops purſued their march, they were in hourly expectation of ſome event which would cauſe them to return. There is every inducement to believe that ſecret meaſures were taken to ſet aſide the expedition. From an exact relation of circumſtances, our readers will be enabled to form an opinion on the ſubject, and to diſcover, at leaſt, a part of the truth.

The day on which the king left Mans, his ſpirits were more than uſually depreſſed†; before he mounted his horſe, he ſate down to a repaſt, but ſcarcely taſted any thing that was offered him; he appeared gloomy and ſtupid. Although the weather was exceſſively hot, he threw a ſurtout of black velvet over his armour. On his head he wore a hat decorated with pearls, over a ſcarlet hood. As he croſſed the foreſt of Mans, on the road to Angiers, he had but few attendants near his perſon, for the troops kept at a diſtance, that they might not incommode him with the duſt. He had not long entered the wood, when a ſtrange figure, clad in a white robe, ſprung from between two trees, and, ſeizing his horſe's bridle, exclaimed, "King advance no farther, but return, for you are betrayed!" Some men at arms, who were near the king, ruſhed forward, and, ſtriking the hands of this living apparition, obliged him to let looſe the bridle. He then retired, while no one either thought of ſtopping him or of enquiring who or what he was. The king purſued his journey; and, on quitting the foreſt entered on a ſandy plain, where the heat was almoſt inſupportable, from the ſcorhing rays of the ſun. Two pages were immediately behind the king, one of whom carried his lance, which he let fall on his comrade's helmet. At this noiſe the king, rouſed, as it were, from a deep lethargy, imagined the prediction of the apparition was on the point of accompliſhment; impreſſed with this idea, he attacked the pages, ſword in hand, and, having diſmounted them, preſſed onwards. Every one fled at his approach; the duke of Orleans, hearing the tumult, rode up to his brother, who inſtantly attacked him with ſuch fury, that he had ſcarcely time to provide for his ſafety by a precipitate flight. The duke of Burgundy called out "let him be ſeized!" No one, however, durſt approach him. The king, in the mean time, flew through the ranks, aiming his blows at all that came in his way. The troops, at length, formed a circle round the monarch, and one of his chamberlains, a gentleman of Normandy, named William Martel, jumped up behind him, and, ſeizing his arms, ſecured him from the commiſſion of farther violence. When his uncles and the duke of Orleans approached, they found him ſenſeleſs. The troops immediately faced about, and the king was put into a cart and carried to Mans. It was, at firſt, ſuppoſed he was poiſoned; and the wine of which he had drank in the morning was analyſed; but, on conſulting the phyſicians, they declared that the king had long borne within him the dangerous principles of this diſorder, which exceſs of labour and fatigue had only ſerved to develope.

The princes who were called by their birth to the government of the kingdom on ſuch an occaſion as the preſent, immediately began to exerciſe their authority. The care of the king's perſon was entruſted to four knights, who were entirely devoted to their ſervice; next day the king's diſorder encreaſed to ſuch a degree, that it was found neceſſary to chain him. He was conveyed to Creil, a country-ſeat on the banks of the Oiſe. It was not thought prudent to take him to Paris, as the queen was then pregnant, and it was intended to conceal from her, as far as poſſible, the real ſituation of her huſband. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy, after they had diſbanded the army, haſtened to the capital. The news of the king's illneſs ſpread a general conſternation throughout the kingdom, for Charles was beloved by his ſubjects. The people flocked to the churches, and ſought to conciliate the favour of the Deity and to enſure his protection to their afflicted ſovereign. But, while the aid of the Divinity was implored, human aſſiſtance was not neglected. A phyſician of Laon, was called in, and, by a proper regimen, he calmed the violence of the diſorder, and reſtored the king to his ſenſes. Charles was then permitted to ſee the queen, who had juſt given birth to a daughter.

The dukes of Berry and Burgundy had, at firſt, evinced a diſpoſition to admit the duke of Orleans to a ſhare in the government; but their conduct ſoon ſhewed that this was foreign from their intentions. The excluſion of that prince incapacitated him from preventing the diſgrace of his friends. Cliſſon, la Riviere, le Mercier, and Vilaines, had ſpared no pains to conciliate his favour; and their endeavours had been attended with ſucceſs. But his patronage and protection proved insufficient to secure them from the resentment of the royal brothers. The ruin of Cliffon had been previously resolved on, and it was the intention of the princes to bring him to trial before the parliament. Cliffon reflected on the danger of his situation; and, crossing the Seine, hastened to Montlhery, a place which belonged to him.

The dukes were informed of the constable's evasion; they repented that they had not ordered him to be arrested, but it was now too late. Cliffon having received information that the lord of Coucy, and others, had orders to invest him in his retreat, did not think it prudent to wait their arrival; he repaired to Brittany, where the fortified towns in his possession could afford him a safe asylum. Montagu likewise effected his escape; but la Riviere and le Mercier were arrested and thrown into prison; and it is probable they would have been brought to the scaffold, but the duchess of Berry threw herself at the feet of her husband, and obtained their release.

Commissioners were sent to Brittany to summon the constable to appear before the parliament, but they returned without having been able to find him*. They proceeded, however, with his trial; and, being declared a false, wicked, and disloyal traitor to the crown of France, he was sentenced to pay a fine of an hundred thousand marks of silver, to be deprived of the dignity of constable, and to be banished the kingdom. Philip of Artois, son-in-law to the duke of Berry, was appointed to succeed him; and entered on the duties of his office, though Cliffon could not be prevailed on to resign the constable's sword. Secretly assisted by the duke of Orleans, he commenced hostilities against the duke of Brittany, and once more involved his native country in civil war.

As the king's constitution was impaired, and his faculties injured, it was deemed necessary to provide for the safety of the kingdom, in case of his death†. The first measure adopted by the council, was, a confirmation of the edict of Charles the Wise, which fixed the majority of the French kings at the completion of their fourteenth year. For this purpose the king held a bed of justice. The different courts of justice were assembled, and a multitude of people attended to hear the publication of the ordonnance. The king settled the guardianship of his children; which was entrusted to the queen, the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon, and Lewis of Bavaria, the queen's brother. The revenues of the duchy of Normandy, the town and viscounty of Paris, and of the bailiwicks of Senlis and Melun, were assigned for the support of the dauphin and his brothers. A council, consisting of three prelates, six noblemen, and three clerks, was appointed to assist the queen and the four princes. By the same ordonnance, the form of the oath to be taken by the guardians and the counsellors, was prescribed. If the queen contracted a second marriage, after the king's death, she forfeited her right to the guardianship.

Although the dukes of Berry and Burgundy appeared, from their age, and from their quality of uncles to the king, to have a kind of ſuperiority over the duke of Orleans, yet this laſt, as firſt prince of the blood, had an inconteſtible right to the ſupreme authority; wherefore he was appointed, by letters patent, regent of the kingdom, without any ſort of reſtriction; he was not even obliged to have the aſſiſtance of a council of regency. As the king lived thirty years after theſe regulations, they were never enforced; but they tend to ſhew that the ſame principle, which had been eſtabliſhed by the ancient laws of the realm, ſtill prevailed, in the ſeparation of the offices of guardian and regent.

A. D. 1393.] After the king's health was reſtored, his phyſician requeſted, that he might experience no contradiction, nor be ſuffered to attend to buſineſs, that his mind might acquire ſtrength. In compliance with this requeſt, his inclinations were ſtudied, and every recreation which could amuſe him was promoted. The diverſions of the carnival were more than uſually brilliant; and, during that ſeaſon of relaxation and gaiety, the marriage of one of the queen's female attendants with a gentleman of Vermandois, was celebrated by a ſplendid feaſt, followed by a maſquerade. The king entered the apartment, in the diſguiſe of a ſavage, leading five other maſks, who were all chained together, and arrayed in a ſimilar dreſs; the ſix dreſſes were made of linen, covered with pitch, and while warm, powdered with down. Before the ball began, an order had been iſſued to extinguiſh all the torches; but the duke of Orleans, who was ignorant of the order, took a lighted torch from an attendant, and, careleſsly approaching it to the face of one of the ſavages, whom he wiſhed to recogniſe, ſet his dreſs on fire; the combuſtible matter of which it was compoſed cauſed the flames to ſpread with rapidity, and, in an inſtant, they were communicated to his four companions. The king had left them ſome time before, and was engaged in converſation with the ducheſs of Berry. This accident threw the company into ſuch confuſion, that, each individual being intent on providing for his own perſonal ſafety, no one thought of attempting to extinguiſh the flames. When Charles heard the noiſe, he made an effort to leave the ducheſs of Berry, but that princeſs, though ſhe knew not with whom ſhe had been converſing, prudently detained him, and warned him of the danger he would incur by mingling with the crowd. The king then made himſelf known, and the ducheſs wrapped him in her cloak, and reſcued him from deſtruction. Four of the five maſks, periſhed: the fifth, John de Nantouillet, broke the chain which faſtened him to his companions, and, running into an adjoining apartment, jumped into a ciſtern of water, and extinguiſhed the flame. The queen fainted away, and had been conveyed to her chamber; when ſhe recovered, and ſaw the king ſtanding at her ſide, her joy was ſo great that ſhe could ſcarcely credit the teſtimony of her ſenſes. Next day the king ſhewed himſelf to the people, who diſplayed an eagerneſs to ſee him. He went to the cathedral of Notre Dame, attended by the princes of the blood, and ſuch of the nobility as were then at Paris. The duke of Orleans, to expiate his imprudence, founded a chapel, which he endowed with the lordſhip of Perche-Fontaine, a part of the confiſcated property of Craon.

The terror of the king at this diſaſter, produced a return of his diſorder*. William Martel, one of his chamberlains, was the firſt who perceived its approach, of which he appriſed the duke of Orleans. During this ſecond attack, which laſted nearly ſeven months, there was ſufficient time to examine minutely all the ſymptoms of the diſorder, which began by a depreſſion of ſpirits, and, by degrees, degenerated into a total alienation of mind; when he neither knew himſelf nor any one that approached him. He denied he was the king, and, wherever he met with his name or arms, he inſtantly eraſed them.

The phyſician who cured the king in the preceding year, had died in the interval of his convaleſcence; and the faculty now exhauſted all the reſources of the medical art in fruitleſs attempts to diſcover an effectual remedy for his diſorder. All human modes of cure having been found ineffectual, recourſe was next had to ſupernatural aid. In Guienne lived a pretended magician, who had boaſted, that, he would reſtore the king to his ſenſes. This man was accordingly ſent for; and, neither the wretchedneſs of his appearance, the ignorance he betrayed in his converſation, nor the groſs vulgarity of his manners and addreſs, could, for a conſiderable time, open the eyes of a ſuperſtitious and credulous court.

The king was conveyed from one country ſeat to another, in the hope that the change of air might produce what the faculty had failed to effect. But his mind had loſt its force; and, at thoſe lucid intervals which ſometimes occurred, he was encouraged, by thoſe who ſurrounded him, to plunge into debauchery, which produced an almoſt immediate relapſe. For the laſt thirty years of this reign, therefore, the reader muſt not expect to ſee a king on the throne of France. Charles can only be conſidered as a phantom of ſovereignty, ſucceſſively in the poſſeſſion of different miniſters, who proſtituted his name to ſanction the violence of the great, and the oppreſſion of the people.

The duke of Orleans, was unable to purſue, with conſiſtency, the projects of ambition, amidſt that tumult by which his boſom was agitated. Supreme power would have flattered his vanity, but the plan for ſeizing the reins of government, and for keeping them when obtained, required application and ſteadineſs of conduct, of which, at that time, he was incapable. Beſides, though he was only brother to the monarch, his credit ſeemed to be eclipſed by that of his uncles, who had the advantage of years and experience. The duke of Burgundy had acquired a ſuperiority which nothing could ſhake. Every thing appeared to concur to the elevation of this prince; the extent of his domains; the number of his dependants; his genius, fortune, and ſplendour; his abilities in the cabinet and the field. The duke of Berry yielded to this all-powerful brother, who exercised the principal authority, at his discretion, and only employed his power for the purpose of his greatness.

The late king, had prohibited all his officers, as well as nobility, from having any concern in the collection of the taxes; but a new ordonnance was now passed, which permitted the nobility to take the taxes to farm, provided there were no other bidders. This was a sure and easy road for the gratification of their avarice; they took advantage of this permission, to deter all others from attending the sales, which produced greater inconvenience than that which the first edict was calculated to prevent; those who were at the head of affairs were not ignorant of the evil effects of such a proceeding, but they sacrificed the interest of the sovereign, and the welfare of the people, to the acquisition of partisans.

Charles, in his first short interval of convalescence, received a deputation from the university of Paris, who entreated him to exert his authority for the extinction of the schism in the papacy. As the rival pontiff's had recently made an application to him for the same purpose, this object was supposed to be nearly attained. The university received orders from the court to give their advice on the subject. Fifty-four doctors were accordingly appointed to examine and collect the suffrages, which amounted to ten thousand, and Nicholas de Cemengis, was commissioned to draw up a memorial, containing the opinions of the members. These were reduced to three, the voluntary cession of the papal dignity by the rival pontiffs; the submission of their respective rights to the discussion and decision of umpires appointed by either party; and, the assembly of a general council. The death of Clement, in the following year, put an end to, or rather changed the nature of the dispute.

A. D. 1394.] About this time, the commotions which had prevailed in Brittany, between the duke and Clisson, were terminated by a reconciliation. Montfort was induced to sue for an accommodation from his own advanced age, and the tender age of his sons, the eldest of whom was but in his eighth year, and the youngest was in his cradle. The restoration of tranquillity to his dominions was an object peculiarly desirable, and it could not be too dearly purchased by the sacrifice of resentment, and the forgiveness of injuries.

A. D. 1395, 1396.] The truce between England and France had been recently renewed, for four years; and Richard sent a splendid embassy to Paris, to demand Isabella, eldest daughter to Charles, who had not yet completed her eighth year. His offers being accepted by the French court, the princess was married, by the English ambassadors, who represented their sovereign, in the chapel belonging to the palace: the actual celebration of the nuptials was deferred till next year. The king's malady continued to encrease; his intervals of convalescence became shorter, and his relapses more frequent; in one year he had ſeven. His ſituation excited the compaſſion of all who approached him*.

Genoa was a republic diſtinguiſhed for its extenſive commerce, its numerous fleets, and the wealth of its citizens; but, being more opulent than martial, it was convulſed by inteſtine factions, and was now on the eve of a revolution†. Threatened by Galeazzo Viſconti, whoſe power daily acquired freſh force, the Genoeſe had recourſe to the protection of France, preferring ſubjection to a lawful prince, to becoming a prey to an uſurper. Galeazzo, appriſed of a project which tended to thwart his ambitious deſigns, exerted every effort he could deviſe to render it abortive: but, the negociations were continued at Genoa, and a treaty was, in a ſhort time, concluded, by which the Genoeſe formally transferred the ſovereignty of their republic to the king of France. The convention was ratified by all the orders of the ſtate, and the French ambaſſadors took poſſeſſion of the country in the name of their ſovereign. The doge reſigned his ſword, with the other enſigns of royalty, and, at the ſame time, received the title of governor of the State of Genoa, under the authority of the French king.

When the marriage-contract was ſigned between Richard and Iſabella, a truce for twenty-five years was concluded‡. It had been underſtood that the young queen of England was to remain at the court of France till ſhe attained to a proper age for the conſummation of the marriage; but this delay by no means accorded with the impatience of the Engliſh monarch, who was earneſt in his ſolicitations to Charles, to have his youthful conſort ſent to England, that ſhe might accuſtom herſelf betimes to the habits and manners of the country. He expreſſed his intentions of paſſing over to Calais, in the hope of inducing the king to comply with his requeſt. Richard, accordingly, repaired thither, accompanied by his uncles, the dukes of Lancaſter and Glouceſter, and by the principal nobility of the kingdom. The king of England's expences were eſtimated at three hundred thouſand marks of ſilver; a ſum, that greatly exceeded the marriage portion of his wife, which only amounted to eight hundred thouſand livres. The moment it was known in France that Richard had landed, the count de Saint-Paul was ſent to receive him. This nobleman was followed by the duke of Burgundy; and the king himſelf, accompanied by the princeſs Iſabella, and the whole court, took the road to St. Omer. The duke of Brittany, who had come to Paris, was of the party§. Previous to his departure, he had appointed Cliſſon regent of his dominions, and had entruſted him with the care of his wife and children. Montfort's principal object, in accompanying the king on this excurſion, was, to procure the reſtitution of Breſt from the Engliſh, which, with the aſſiſtance of Charles, he at length accompliſhed, on paying Richard one hundred and twenty thouſand livres of gold.

The nuptials of Richard and Iſabella were celebrated, on the firſt of November, with great pomp at Calais, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury*. On the ſixth of the ſame month, Richard embarked for England, while Charles returned to the capital. Before they ſeparated, they agreed to meet again, to convert the late truce into a ſolid peace.

Sigiſmond, king of Hungary, had implored the aſſiſtance of France, to check the rapid progreſs of Bajazet, the ſultan of the Ottomans, who had already ſwept away whatever adhered to the Greek empire, in Thrace, Macedonia, and Theſſaly. It was accordingly determined to ſend a body of troops to his relief, under the conduct of the count of Nevers, ſon to the duke of Burgundy. In this army, which conſiſted of ten thouſand men at arms, there were upwards of a thouſand knights, and as many eſquires. During their march they were anxious to enjoy every ſpecies of luxury and diſſipation. But, in the plains of Nicopolis, it was decreed, that their vices and preſumption ſhould experience the puniſhment they deſerved. The Hungarians being engaged in the ſiege of that city, Bajazet haſted to its relief, with two hundred thouſand men. Rejecting with diſdain the ſage councils of de Coucy, and of Sigiſmond, the French nobility, whoſe troops formed the van-guard of the Hungarian army, attacked the enemy, before the main body could ſupport them. Surrounded by myriads of infidels, their courage, though deſperate, was ineffectual; and the only honour they acquired was that of having ſold their lives dearly. Only three hundred ſurvived to become the captives of Bajazet; all of whom, except the count of Nevers, and twenty-four other lords, whoſe birth promiſed the advantage of a ſplendid ranſom, were put to death by order of the ſultan, in retaliation of a ſimilar inſtance of cruelty practiſed by the French on a body of infidels immediately before the battle. The ſurvivors were a long time confined at Bourſa, the reſidence of the victor, and were at length ranſomed for two hundred thouſand ducats.

A. D. 1397, 1398.] The death of Philip of Artois, occaſioned by a wound he had received in the battle of Nicopolis, having rendered the office of conſtable vacant, it was conferred on the mareſchal de Sancerre†. The relapſes of Charles became every day more violent; and the alienation of his mental faculties was attended with extreme bodily pain. Though viewed with tender compaſſion by his people and domeſtics, he had become an object of diſguſt to the queen. About this time ſhe contracted a criminal intercourſe with her brother-in-law, the duke of Orleans, which rendered them both objects of public indignation.

The king's frequent relapſes began to occaſion diſorders in the government, which the jealouſy that prevailed between the princes of the blood contributed to encreaſe. Each of them, during the illneſs of Charles, laid claim to the ſovereign authority, and they often iſſued contradictory orders, which it was im-poſſible to fulfil. The king, in his moments of convaleſcence, ſometimes coincided with one, and ſometimes with another. This miſunderſtanding occaſioned diviſions among the nobility, and men began to perceive that the diſputes between the princes would end in the deſtruction of one of them, if not in the ruin of the ſtate. The duke of Orleans, ſupported by the queen, endeavoured to deſtroy that influence which his uncle, the duke of Burgundy, had hitherto preſerved. He procured the diſmiſſion of Arnaud de Corbie, a dependant of that prince's, from the office of chancellor, which was beſtowed on the biſhop of Bayeux. Montagu, who had been diſgraced at the commencement of the preſent reign, was recalled through the intereſt of the duke of Orleans, and appointed ſuperintendant of the king's and of the queen's houſhold.

A. D. 1399.] While theſe diviſions prevailed in the French court, England exhibited a more turbulent ſcene. The weakneſs of Richard the Second nouriſhed the ambition of his nobles; the duke of Hereford, ſon of the duke of Lancaſter, and couſin of the king, was diſtinguiſhed above the reſt by courage, prudence, and addreſs. Baniſhed by the king for his intrigues, he had taken refuge at the court of France, and, was countenanced by the princes of the blood; he was, during his reſidence in France, maintained at the king's expence, who aſſigned him a weekly ſtipend of five hundred crowns of gold. During his abſence from England, the title of Lancaſter devolved on him by the death of his father. The profuſion of the king rendered it neceſſary for him to repleniſh his coffers by means incompatible with juſtice; and he ſeized the inheritance of his exiled kinſman. Henry of Lancaſter was connected with the principal nobility in blood, alliance, or friendſhip; theſe conſidered the injury as likely to affect them all; the common people were gained by his courteous manners; and the ſpirit of faction, which pervaded the kingdom rendered this a favourable conjuncture to effect a revolution in the government.

Richard had embarked for Ireland, to chaſtiſe the revolt of the natives; and left his kingdom open to his enemy; the duke of Lancaſter landed at Ravenſpur, in Yorkſhire, on the fourth of July, 1399, with ſixty perſons, among whom were the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the earl of Arundel. He was immediately joined by the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland*. He took a ſolemn oath that his expedition was only to recover the duchy of Lancaſter, and he invited all the friends to his family, to aſſiſt him in the execution of his plan. Multitudes flocked to his ſtandard. In a few days he found himſelf at the head of ſixty thouſand men.

The duke of York had been left regent of the kingdom, during the abſence of Richard; but his abilities were inadequate to direct government in the ſtorm of rebellion. His connections, too, with Lancaſter, rendered him unfit for the diſcharge of his office at ſo critical a juncture. The king, on the news of this invaſion, haſtened from Ireland. At Milford-Haven he diſembarked an army of twenty thouſand men ; but theſe ſoon caught the general contagion, and deſerted their ſovereign. Richard ſurrendered himſelf to the earl of Northumberland, was conveyed to London, and depoſed. Lancaſter then, in violation of his oath, preferred his claim to the vacant throne ; and, though he had not even the ſhadow of a right, his claim was allowed by the ſame proſtituted parliament ; and the uſurper, by the aſſaſſination of his ſovereign, quieted his apprehenſions from the compaſſion of a fickle people.

About this time, died John, duke of Brittany. His death was aſcribed to the malice of enchanters. The prior of Joſſelin and a prieſt of Nantes, were accuſed of having abridged his days by magic or poiſon. The people required they ſhould be applied to the rack ; but the prieſt died in priſon, and the prior was enlarged. The conduct of Cliſſon made the ſuſpicions of the public fall upon him ; Montfort had no ſooner breathed his laſt, than he diſpatched a meſſenger to the duke of Orleans, adviſing him to enter Brittany with an army, in order to take poſſeſſion of the duchy, and of the perſon of John the Fifth. That prince accordingly came to Pontorſon, but the attachment of the Bretons, and the ſupport of the duke of Burgundy, compelled him to forego his deſigns. Whatever unfavourable impreſſions the conduct of Cliſſon, on this occaſion, was calculated to excite, were ſpeedily removed by a ſubſequent trait of generoſity. His daughter, the counteſs of Penthievre, on the death of the duke, propoſed to her father to ſeize the favourable moment, and to reſtore the duchy to her huſband, by privately putting to death the children of Montfort, before the arrival of the duke of Burgundy. Cliſſon, forgot, for a moment, the feelings of a parent, and, ſeizing a javelin, darted it at his daughter. The counteſs, in endeavouring to eſcape, fell down ſtairs ; her thigh was broken, and her lameneſs ever after atteſted her own diſgrace, and the fidelity of her father.

On the acceſſion of the fourth Henry to the throne of England, the court of France truſted the French ambaſſador at London to negociate a confirmation of the truce concluded during the late reign, while they endeavoured to take advantage of the confuſion inſeparable from a revolution in the government, to get poſſeſſion of that part of Aquitaine, which was ſtill in the power of the Engliſh. The Gaſcons, affectionate to the memory of Richard, who was born among them, refuſed to ſwear allegiance to a prince, who had dethroned and murdered him. The French court, informed of their diſpoſition, thought the time was arrived for the recovery of a province which they had long conſidered as a part of the monarchy. The duke of Bourbon accordingly repaired to Agen, where he held a conference with the deputies from the diſcontented towns, to whom he promiſed, in the king's name, a renewal and confirmation of all their privileges. The king of England, who was well acquainted with the ſpirit of the French government, did not ſeem alarmed at the plans of the court ; he relied on the diviſions which prevailed among the princes and the nobles, and on the intereſt of the province to give a preference to the Engliſh government. The event juſtified his opinion ; on the return of the deputies to Bayonne, Dax, and Bourdeaux, ſuch of the inhabitants as had evinced the ſtrongeſt diſpoſition to acknowledge the authority of Charles, ſuddenly changed their minds, and declared their reſolution to remain as they were.

Henry was threatened with an attack from the Scots, who were ſecretly encouraged by the promiſe of aſſiſtance from France. The French, too, concluded a treaty* with Owen Glendour, who had excited an inſurrection in Wales by which they agreed to furniſh him with a ſupply of troops, ammunition, and money; while the channel was filled with French ſhips, which threatened the Engliſh coaſts. When affairs were in this ſituation, Henry ſent a ſtrong body of troops into Guienne; and, at the ſame time, endeavoured to ſecure the attachment of the Gaſcon nobility, by a confirmation of the privileges formerly granted to the chiefs of the moſt illuſtrious families, and by freſh tokens of his liberality and favour. Gaillard de Durfort, lord of Duras, was created grand ſeneſchal of Aquitaine. Henry could not give a more unequivocal proof of the confidence he repoſed in the fidelity of the inhabitants, than by the appointment of a native to a poſt on which the preſervation of Guienne, in a great meaſure, depended. But, while the Engliſh monarch complied with the ſuggeſtions of prudence, he maintained an appearance of friendſhip with the French, and received their ambaſſadors with peculiar marks of attention. In a ſhort time, plenipotentiaries were appointed, by either power, who confirmed the truce of twenty-five years. A negociation was entered into, at the ſame time, the object of which was the return of Iſabella, widow of Richard, and the reſtitution of her dower and jewels. The anſwers which Henry made to the requiſitions of the French court, on this ſubject, were evaſive; and they were, at laſt, obliged to content themſelves with the perſon of the queen, and to reſign her fortune. Henry would fain have obtained her hand for his eldeſt ſon, but his propoſals were rejected.

The credit of the duke of Orleans had daily encreaſed ſince he had been admitted to a ſhare in the government. Placed at the head of the finances, he exerciſed an independent juriſdiction, by means of which he brought into his own coffers that wealth deſtined to ſupport the ſplendour of the throne. He diſmiſſed the Generals of the Finances, and appointed officers to ſucceed them who were devoted to his ſervice†. Notwithſtanding the burdenſome impoſts levied on the people, the royal palaces wore an appearance of poverty; and the king himſelf was often in want of neceſſaries, while Orleans, maſter of the revenues of the crown, diſplayed a degree of pomp and magnificence, that rivalled the ſplendour of an eaſtern monarch. But, as the power of the duke of Orleans encreaſed, his popularity diminiſhed; the people had expected that as the kingdom was in tranquillity, ſome of the taxes would be repealed; and the diſappointment they experienced in this reſpect, led them to prefer accuſations againſt thoſe at the head of affairs, of paying a greater attention to their own private intereſt, than to the public welfare.

A. D. 1400, 1401.] At this period, Manuel Paleologus, emperor of Conſtantinople, came to Paris, again to animate the French to the encounter of Bajazet and the defence of the imperial city. But the rapid progreſs of that tyrant was checked by Tamerlane, the Mogul emperor, who, at the head of ſix hundred thouſand horſe, defeated his rival, on the plains of Angouri. Paleologus, therefore, was left at liberty to return and occupy Conſtantinople. After the victory, Tamerlane and his ſon Mirauxa wrote to the king of France, to propoſe a treaty of alliance againſt their common enemy, the Turk; and a plan for eſtabliſhing a commercial intercourſe between their ſubjects. Theſe letters are ſtill extant*; they were not anſwered by Charles till the concluſion of the year 1403, and the envoys, appointed to deliver his anſwer to Tamerlane, did not arrive at the place of their deſtination till a ſhort time before the death of that emperor.

The contending parties of the two dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, were now growing apace into invetérate factions. The former took advantage of the abſence of the latter, who had viſited his Flemiſh dominions, to be preſent at the marriage of his eldeſt ſon, Anthony of Burgundy, with the daughter of the count of Saint Paul, to ſeize the abſolute government of the kingdom. The duke of Burgundy, appriſed by his emiſſaries of what was paſſing at court, returned as far as Senlis; but, having there learned that the king had had a freſh relapſe, he proceeded no father, contenting himſelf with writing to the parliament on the ſubject of his complaints, and exhorting them to correct the vices which had crept into the government.

The duke of Orleans, in the mean time, diſdained to keep up thoſe appearances of moderation which his intereſt had, hitherto, urged him to preſerve. He impoſed a new tax on the whole kingdom, from which not even eccleſiaſtics were exempted. The people expreſſed their indignation at this new inſtance of oppreſſion; while the clergy refuſed to ſubmit to it. By this imprudence, the duke of Orleans forfeited the eſteem and protection of the greater part of the nation, and found himſelf obliged to ſuppreſs the impoſt. The duke of Burgundy, enraged at the aſſertion that he had conſented to a meaſure ſo univerſally reprobated, juſtified himſelf by a public denial, proteſting that he had refuſed his approbation, although he had been offered a hundred thouſand livres to grant it. He wrote to the parliament, to the ſame effect, and prepared, by his preſence, to thwart the efforts of his enemies. War was thus declared between the rival princes, and troops were levied on either ſide. The duke of Gueldres, having concluded a treaty with the duke of Orleans, marched to his aſſiſtance with eight hundred men at arms. The duke of Burgundy's forces were ſtill more numerous; he was accompanied by John the Pitileſs, biſhop of Liege, who ſupplied him with ſeven thouſand men. The environs of Paris were crowded with troops, while the two princes fortified themſelves in the heart of the capital, and the nation ſeemed to be threatened with civil war. The queen, and the dukes of Berry and Bourbon, promoted an apparent reconciliation between the parties, and prevailed on them to diſmiſs their troops. As ſoon as the king recovered his ſenſes, he convened the council, and ſubmitted the rival claims of his brother and uncle to their deciſion. Though the duke of Orleans was ſupported by the friendſhip of Charles, and the intereſt of the queen, yet, the bad uſe he had made of the power entruſted to him, cauſed his pretenſions to be rejected. The duke of Burgundy's age, his long experience, his reputation, and ſtill more the extent of his poſſeſſions, and the number of forces he could raiſe, tended to juſtify the deciſion of the council in his favour; it was, accordingly, determined that, whenever the king, from a return of his diſorder, ſhould be incapacitated from holding the reins of government, they ſhould be confided to the hands of his uncle. The duke of Orleans was compelled to conform to this decree, but he ſecretly nouriſhed a ſpirit of reſentment at the preference given to the duke of Burgundy.

The internal commotions of the kingdom did not prevent the government from enforcing ſuch meaſures as were beſt calculated to preſerve that degree of reſpect which it had long been accuſtomed to command from its neighbours and vaſſals. Since the acquiſition of the republic of Genoa, three governors had been compelled to quit their ſtation, from their inability to effect the reſtoration of order. The count of Saint Paul, had forfeited the confidence of the Genoeſe, from his diſpoſition to gallantry. He was ſucceeded by the biſhop of Meaux, a wiſe and virtuous miniſter who had alternate recourſe to indulgence and ſeverity, but both proved alike ineffectual. The city was torn by the factions of Guelfs and Ghibelines, nobility and citizens. The biſhop of Meaux, reduced, from inability, to the neceſſity of remaining a paſſive ſpectator of their quarrels, at length left this turbulent people to complete, without interruption, the ruin of their country. Soon after his departure, the rival parties appeared to be reconciled, and a ſhort calm enſued; though, on the arrival of Calville, the new governor, freſh diſorders began to prevail. An exertion of ſeverity, on his part, united the two factions, in oppoſition to his government; and the office of Doge was reſtored in the perſon of John Baptiſta Boccanegra. The governor applied, but in vain, for protection to Galleazzo Viſconti, duke of Milan; Calville, therefore, was compelled to retire for ſafety to the citadel. The Genoeſe being once more left to themſelves, their diviſions were renewed, and their animoſities revived. Every quarter of the city exhibited a ſcene of riot and confuſion; the effects of party-rage were viſible in every ſtreet, in the plunder and demolition of houſes, and the maſſacre of their inhabitants. Such was the ſtate of Genoa, when the mareſchal de Boucicaut was ſent thither, as governor, with six thousand troops. His reputation, and his forces, procured him respect; he took possession of all the fortresses, disarmed the people, and put the doge, Boccanegra, with some of his associates, to death. A proposed reformation in the government met with no resistance; the dread of punishment produced a temporary calm; but the Genoese, though restrained for a while by Boucicaut, soon returned to their old habits of anarchy.

A. D. 1402 to 1404.] About this period, Henry the Fourth of England contracted a marriage with Jane, duchess of Brittany, to strengthen his interest in that important province; but the effects of this alliance, which might have proved highly prejudicial to France, by encreasing the power of her rival, were averted by the duke of Burgundy, who secured the sons of Montfort and conveyed them to Paris.

The king, in his short intervals of convalescence, had the mortification to see his people oppressed by his turbulent kinsmen. To prevent the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans from again abusing a power which it was dangerous to entrust, wholly, to either of them, he formed a new state-council, consisting of the queen, the princes of the blood, the constable, the chancellor, and all the members of the privy council. As it was settled that all matters of importance should be decided by a majority of votes, Charles was induced to flatter himself, that the public good would no longer be sacrificed to private interest.

In these different arrangements for the administration of the kingdom, the queen was not forgetful of her own interests. Apprehensive that the same influence which had excluded the duke of Orleans from the government, might operate still farther in favour of his rival, she thought to avert the blow she dreaded, by procuring a declaration from her husband, that, in case of his death, his son should be immediately proclaimed king, the regency should be abolished, and the sole care of the royal children entrusted to herself*: so that, in this case, she would have enjoyed all the authority of a regent, without assuming the title. The queen farther obtained from Charles, a new means of encreasing the number of her dependents; the monarch granted her the power of annulling, at her pleasure, any donations which he either had made or might, in future, make. Charles was incapable of foreseeing the consequences of this permission, which tended to his own degradation, and to deliver him wholly to the discretion of a wife who was unworthy his confidence. From this moment Isabella appears to have forgotten the duties of a wife and a mother. The king was abandoned to the care of attendants, who had no other stimulus than interest to incite their attention; and her own children were left destitute of every thing, while she dissipated the revenues of the crown, and the produce of the imposts levied on the people. Charles was reduced to such a state of depression as to be incapable of exertion. When apprised of the situation of his children, he sent for their governor, who confeſſed, with tears, that they had often neither food nor cloaths! "Alas!" ſaid the wretched monarch, "I am no better treated myſelf!"

But neither the queen's authority, nor the credit of the duke of Orleans, could prevent the concluſion of a projected alliance between the grand children of the duke of Burgundy, and the offspring of his royal nephew. The dauphin, who had completed his ſeventh year, and his brother the duke of Touraine, were betrothed to the two eldeſt daughters of the count of Nevers, while madame Michelle, the king's eldeſt daughter, was contracted to the count of Charolois. The youth of the parties, indeed, rendered the conſummation of theſe marriages a matter of uncertainty; but they tended to ſtrengthen the influence of the duke of Burgundy, who had already acquired the favour of the people, by his oppoſition to thoſe impoſts, which the avarice of Orleans had led him to exact.

Protected by the queen, the duke of Orleans propoſed a new tax to the council to be levied, indiſcriminately, on the whole kingdom. The proſpect of a war with England, and the exhauſted ſtate of the treaſury, were the pretexts on which this propoſal was founded. Notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the duke of Burgundy, the edict paſſed, and was rigidly enforced. The produce of the tax was eſtimated at eighteen hundred thouſand livres, and, whoever evaded payment, was declared guilty of leſe-majeſty. This prodigious ſum, as ſoon as collected, was depoſited in the tower of the Louvre; but the duke of Orleans forced the gates, and ſeized all he could find.

At this period, the count of Saint Paul made a deſcent on the Engliſh coaſt, whence he was obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs; while the garriſon of Calais, extended their incurſions to the frontiers of Artois and Picardy, and ravaged the county of St. Paul. Theſe attempts of the count, who was allied to the houſe of Burgundy, excited the reſentment of the Engliſh againſt the duke. They, accordingly, attacked the Flemiſh veſſels, and the hoſtilities which enſued between the two people, put a total ſtop to their commercial intercourſe. The inhabitants of the principal towns of Flanders, murmured at an interruption, which ruined their manufactories. The duke of Burgundy left the court, with the view of ſtifling the firſt ſparks of diſcontent. But, being ſuddenly attacked by a violent diſorder, he was compelled to ſtop at Halle, where he ſoon expired, in the ſixty-third year of his age. He died inſolvent; his goods were inſtantly ſeized by his creditors, and expoſed to public ſale; while it was found neceſſary to have recourſe to a loan, to defray the expences of his funeral. The ducheſs of Burgundy died ſoon after her huſband.

On the death of the duke of Burgundy, every thing appeared to wear a new face. The duke of Orleans thought himſelf ſure of holding the reins of government, in future, without contradiction; but he ſoon found that he had now a more formidable rival to encounter. Not leſs ambitious than his father, but more vain and enterpriſing; paſſionate and impetuous; implacable in his hatred; hypocritical and perfidious; devoid of all ſcruples, exempt from all remorſe, and making a jeſt of religion, in an age when incredulity was not yet in vogue; ſuch was John the Fearleſs. He arrived at court, ſoon after the death of his father, to do homage for his dominions; and he was accompanied by his two brothers, Anthony duke of Limbourg and count of Bethel; and Philip count of Artois, who alſo did homage for their reſpective appanages*.

A. D. 1405.] Meanwhile the queen and the duke of Orleans exerted unlimited authority. Princes, generals, and miniſters, yielded to their united power. The people, diſtinguiſhed the queen by the appellation of la grande gaure. Such was the wretched ſtate of the kingdom, when the new duke of Burgundy, demanded a ſeat in the council, a privilege to which he was entitled by his birth. He haſtened to celebrate the marriage of his eldeſt daughter Margaret with the dauphin; and that of his ſon, the count of Charolois, with the princeſs Michelle. This double alliance encreaſed his influence: father-in-law to the preſumptive heir to the throne, he found himſelf in a ſituation to diſpute the government with Orleans, and divide with him the ſuffrages of the court.

The jealouſy of theſe princes only waited for a fit opportunity to diſplay itſelf; and it ſpeedily occured. The duke of Orleans propoſed in the council to levy a general tax, ſuch as had been impoſed in the preceding year; the exhauſted ſtate of the treaſury, and the proſpect of a war with England, were again urged as motives for this burden. The members of the council, gave a tacit approbation; but the duke of Burgundy expatiated on the miſery of the people, the vices of the preſent adminiſtration, and the miſapplication of public money. He aſked for an account of the immenſe ſums which were daily levied; he offered his perſon, his troops, and his nobility, to defend the ſtate againſt the attacks of the enemy; and proteſted, that, if the council ſhould perſiſt in their reſolution to publiſh the edict, his dominions, at leaſt, ſhould be exempt from it. The young duke of Brittany made the ſame offers as the duke of Burgundy, and aſſured the miniſters that he would willingly wait for the payment of the ſum of one hundred thouſand crowns that were due, as the portion of his wife. The edict, however, paſſed. The duke of Burgundy was careful to promulgate the remonſtrances he had urged in favour of the people, whoſe idol he inſtantly became; and this advantage, which he had the art to maintain, gave him a real ſuperiority.

While the kingdom was reduced to wretchedneſs, the queen and Orleans rioted in luxury. Moſt of the nobility followed this example, and, after a life of diſſipation, died inſolvent. The duke of Orleans ſeized for himſelf the government of Normandy; but the Normans refuſed to ſubmit to his authority, and told him they would acknowledge no other ſovereign than the king. The duke, however, applied to Charles, in a lucid interval, to confirm his appointment,

* Tréſor des Ch. Burgund. Lay. viii. No. 4.

The affair was ſubmitted to the council; ſome of the members ventured to object the oppoſition of the province, and the conſequences to be dreaded from the diſcontent of the people; they told the king that the power of his brother was already too extenſive, and that it would be highly imprudent to confer on him the government of the moſt important province in the kingdom. Charles ſeemed to open his eyes; he was moved at the deſcription of the diſorders which pervaded every part of the adminiſtration. The duke of Burgundy had partiſans in the council, who only waited for this opportunity to declare themſelves. The king acknowledged the neceſſity of a reform in the government; the princes of the blood were conſulted; the duke of Burgundy was ſent for to attend the conference; and the public were waiting with impatience for the effect of the projected change in the miniſtry; but all their hopes were ſuddenly fruſtrated; Charles had a relapſe; and the queen and the duke of Orleans again ſeized the adminiſtration.

The duke of Burgundy was on the point of leaving Paris, and the king's illneſs had not made him alter his intentions. But, as he had reſolved to appear in a ſituation to enforce reſpect, he aſſembled a body of troops, under pretence of repreſſing the incurſions of the Engliſh, who had landed at Sluys, under the earl of Pembroke. To deceive the queen and the duke of Orleans, he made application to them for a ſupply of men and money, to enable him to undertake the ſiege of Calais. In the mean time he had collected eight hundred men at arms, and the biſhop of Liege joined him with ſix thouſand men. The rendezvous of the troops was appointed at Arras. The duke of Burgundy had advanced to within two days' march of the capital, before the court were appriſed of his motions. His arrival aſtoniſhed the duke of Orleans, who found himſelf at the mercy of his enemy. He had no troops to oppoſe him; he was conſcious that a ſtrong party was formed in his favour in the council, and that the princes of the blood were diſpoſed to join him. The Pariſians only waited for the appearance of his competitor to eſpouſe his cauſe. In this emergency, the duke determined to ſeek for ſafety in flight: and, withdrawing from Paris, he haſtened to Melun; the queen followed him. Before ſhe left Paris, ſhe ordered Lewis of Bavaria, her brother, to bring the dauphin to her. She went to Corbeil to wait their arrival, and was there joined by the duke of Orleans.

The duke of Burgundy had advanced as far as Louvres, before he heard of the haſty retreat of Iſabella and Orleans; at the ſame time, he was informed of their intentions to carry off the dauphin. To prevent the accompliſhment of this ſcheme, he haſtened to the hotel de Saint Paul, where he learned that the young prince and his conſort had, notwithſtanding their own entreaties, been compelled, early in the morning, to get into a covered boat, which was to convey them to a certain diſtance, where a litter waited for them. The duke purſued the fugitives, whom he overtook at Juviſy. After ſaluting the dauphin, he aſked him whither he was going, and whether he would not return to Paris* ? The young prince having anſwered in the affirmative, the duke, conveyed him back to the city. When the duke of Orleans was informed of this circumſtance, he fled, with the queen, from Corbeil to Melun: whence they iſſued orders to all the provinces to levy troops.

The dauphin was received at the entrance of Paris by the king of Navarre, the dukes of Berry and Bourbon, the count of la Marche, and moſt of the nobility. The people made the ſtreets reſound with acclamations. The duke of Burgundy was hailed as the deliverer of the royal family. He took up his abode in the Louvre, in an apartment over that in which the dauphin reſided, that he might better preſerve him from the attempts of his mother. He received the thanks of the city, and was entreated to continue his good offices. That ſame day the parliament received letters from the duke of Orleans, who repreſented the conduct of his rival as an inſult to the king; and prohibited the entrance of foreign troops into the metropolis. The magiſtrates were at a loſs how to act. The regiſters of the court, which are ſtill extant, demonſtrate that the views of the rival princes were underſtood by the enlightened part of the public†.

Every neceſſary meaſure was adopted for the defence of the capital. The chains which had been taken from the Pariſians, during the former commotions, were reſtored and placed at the end of the ſtreets. The government of the Louvre was entruſted to Regnaut d'Angennes, and that of the Baſtile to Montagu. The care of the daupin the duke of Berry took upon himſelf. Freſh troops daily arrived at Paris, which ſoon contained a body of five-and-twenty thouſand men, independent of the different corps which were poſted in the neighbouring villages, where they committed dreadful diſorders.

A council having been convened, the duke of Burgundy explained the motives of his conduct, and, proteſting that he did not wiſh for a ſhare in the government, offered his perſon, his fortune, and his friends, to aſſiſt in removing the calamities with which the kingdom was afflicted; he declared, that he would never ceaſe to inſiſt on a reform in the government, till he had accompliſhed that object. This declaration proved the inſincerity of his previous proteſtation, and ſhewed that he conſidered himſelf as arbiter of the ſtate. The attachment of the Pariſians gave him a decided advantage over his rival; which the number of troops that he had introduced into the capital enabled him to maintain.

The duke of Orleans was employed in ſtrengthening the fortifications of Melun, whither troops flocked to him from the different provinces, ſo that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of twenty thouſand men. The king, in his ſhort intervals of reaſon, endeavoured to allay the fury of either party; but they were too much enraged to ſubmit to conſtraint. The duke of Orleans approached Paris; a detachment of his army took poſſeſſion of Charenton, and every preparation was made for a general action. The princes of the blood were aware of the danger, and ſpared no pains to prevent it. The dukes of Berry and Bourbon, with the kings of Sicily and Navarre, were accepted as mediators. After a delay of two months, paſſed in continual alarm, peace was, at laſt, concluded at Vincennes, where the queen was preſent. The two princes conſented to diſmiſs their troops, and the duke of Burgundy was admitted to an equal participation, with the duke of Orleans, in the authority of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. This laſt prince reſerved for himſelf the department of the finances, which was not the ſmalleſt object of his ambition.

Peace was proclaimed; and the people, tired of theſe diſputes, rejoiced at the reſtoration of harmony. The duke of Berry invited his two nephews to meet at the hotel de Neſle, his uſual reſidence, where they exchanged embraces, and promiſes of friendſhip. They carried their confidence ſo far, as to ſleep in the ſame bed; a cuſtom then in vogue, and regarded as the moſt infallible proof of eſteem.

During theſe tranſactions, Charles was reduced to a ſituation the moſt deplorable, from the neglect of his attendants. The princes, buſied in projects of ambition, had become callous to the common feelings of humanity. At length, his ſituation was ſuch that his firſt phyſician appriſed the council of his danger. Aſhamed of their conduct, they prepared to remedy it. The care afterwards taken of him, by degrees, reſtored him to bodily health, though his mental faculties continued in the ſame derangement.

While the palace exhibited miſery and want, the queen made her public entry into the capital, and diſplayed all the pomp and luxury which the age could afford. The arts of gallantry and magnificence had been exhauſted in the dreſs of the profligate Iſabella; on either ſide of whoſe carriage walked the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans, followed by the princes and nobles of the court. This proceeded, through immenſe crowds of people, to the cathedral, and from thence to the Louvre. The Pariſians vainly flattered themſelves that the accommodation which had taken place between the rival dukes muſt prove beneficial to the kingdom. They placed an implicit faith in the profeſſions of the duke of Burgundy. By the new arrangement the government of Picardy was conferred on that prince, and he divided with the duke of Orleans the produce of the ſubſidies, which continued on the ſame footing as before.

At this period Oliver de Cliſſon breathed his laſt, in his caſtle of Joſſelin, in Brittany; he left an immenſe fortune, to the acquiſition of which he had ſacrificed his honour; he had but few qualities to conciliate eſteem, and many to extort reprobation; his intrepidity in the field gained him admirers in a martial age, when valour was an adequate ſubſtitute for virtue: but his avarice and cruelty enlarged the number of his enemies, and left an indelible ſtain on his memory.

A. D. 1407.] Though the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, veiled their mutual animoſity, it was eaſy to perceive that their hatred was too violent to ſubſiſt in this ſtate of conſtraint. We are now coming to a grand epoch in the hiſtory of France. The revolutions which enſued, effected a total change in the people, their manners and cuſtoms. Blot out forty years from the annals of the country, and the ſudden alteration muſt excite aſtoniſhment. The civil and political adminiſtration; the government; the laws, the intereſts of the ſtate, the cuſtoms, the ſpirit of the people, were no longer the ſame; in ſhort, ſays Villaret*, it was no longer the ſame nation.

The duke of Burgundy, beſides a vaſt domain, had the ſupport of his two brothers, whoſe property was conſiderable, and whoſe power extenſive. To one of them he had recently enſured the ſucceſſion of the united duchy of Brabant and Limbourg. He was father-in-law to the heir-apparent, and had contracted his eldeſt ſon, the count of Charolois, to a daughter of the king; to ſtrengthen his connection with the reigning family, he had concluded a marriage between the duke of Touraine, ſecond ſon to Charles, and his own niece, Jaqueline of Bavaria. With the princes, and in the council, he enjoyed a degree of conſideration which the vigour of his conduct had acquired. By his oppoſition to the projected impoſts, at a time when he had no ſhare in the adminiſtration, he had gained the favour of the people. His mind was unimproved by ſtudy, and, as he had an aukward delivery, forebore, as much as poſſible, to ſpeak in public. The duke of Orleans poſſeſſed all the graces of perſon, with a mind embelliſhed by wit, and adorned with all the literary knowledge of the age. His eloquence is ſpoken of in terms of admiration. Liberal, or prodigal; trifling, frivolous, and inconſtant; he wiſhed to unite buſineſs with pleaſure. Born with the happieſt diſpoſition, but left to his own guidance, at an age when reaſon had ſcarcely begun to aſſert her empire over the mind, he indulged in the gratification of his paſſions, which ſoon corrupted his manners, and depraved his heart. He ſet an example of licentiouſneſs to the whole court.

Opportunities of diſpute could not be wanting between princes who were actuated by mutual hatred. The king, notwithſtanding a determination to remove his brother from government, ſuffered affection to overcome his reſentment. He granted to his eldeſt ſon, the count of Angouleme, who had juſt married the young queen of England, widow to Richard the Second, the duchy of Guienne. This grant diſpleaſed the duke of Burgundy, who openly expreſſed his diſcontent. Pope Benedict, too, who was a friend to the duke of Orleans, afforded him another ſubject of diſpleaſure, by depoſing, at the ſolicitation of the people, the biſhop of Liege, a martial prelate, the friend and ally of the duke of Burgundy. Every day gave riſe to ſome new complaint. Whenever they met at the council, it was for the purpoſe of contradiction; whatever was propoſed by one being diſapproved by the other; their diſputes became more and more violent, and it was every moment apprehended that ſome pointed inſult would be offered.

The deſtruction of the duke of Orleans had long been reſolved on. Six months before the preſent period, the duke of Burgundy had employed agents to ſeek a proper place for the execution of his deſign*: in November, 1407, he purchaſed the hotel de Notre Dame, which was ſituated in the vicille Rue du Temple. Here he ſtationed eighteen ruffians, under the conduct of Ralph d'Octonville. The ſecret was ſo well kept, that the prince againſt whom theſe machinations were levelled, had not the ſmalleſt ſuſpicion of danger.

The duke of Burgundy, in the mean time, cōntinued his diſſimulation; and affected to meet the advances of the duke of Berry, who again offered himſelf as a mediator between the rival princes. On Sunday, the twentieth of November, 1407, the duke conducted his two nephews to the church of the Auguſtines, where they confirmed their oaths of reconciliation. They attended a feaſt given at the hotel de Neſle, where they renewed their promiſes of friendſhip. They ſigned an act of confraternity, accepted the order of knighthood from each other, and, before they parted, made proteſtations of the ſtricteſt harmony and concord. Two days after, they again met at the council, and reiterated their profeſſions. The duke of Orleans invited the duke of Burgundy to dinner on the Sunday following; the invitation was accepted; they embraced and parted.

The day after this laſt interview, the duke of Orleans, having paſſed part of the day at the hotel de St. Paul, went, in the afternoon, to the hotel Barbette, a houſe which the queen had purchaſed of Montagu, the grand maitre-d'hotel, and which was called the queen's private reſidence. Iſabella had juſt given birth to a child, which died ſoon after. The duke ſupped with her; and, about eight in the evening, Schas de Courte-Heuſe, one of the conſpirators, came to tell him that his brother wanted to ſpeak to him immediately, on buſineſs which would not admit of delay. The duke ordered his mule to be ſaddled, ſet out for the hotel de Saint Paul, followed only by two eſquires, mounted on the ſame horſe, and preceded by four or five footmen with torches. Such of his attendants as had accompanied him to the queen's, were in no haſte to follow him. Though he ſeldom went out without an eſcort of ſix hundred gentlemen, he had that day, but a ſmall retinue. The duke paſſed the conſpirators, who were drawn up in the front of a houſe above the hotel de Notre-Dame. The horſes, on which his two eſquires were mounted, took fright, and run away with their riders. At that inſtant the duke was ſurrounded by the aſſaſſins, who exclaimed, "Kill him! kill him!" "I am the duke of Orleans!" ſaid the prince. "So much the better," replied one of the ruffians; "you are the very man I want!" and with the blow of a battle-axe, he cut off the duke's left hand, which reſted on the pommel of the ſaddle. A repetition of blows brought him to the ground; though weltering in blood, he had ſtill ſufficient ſtrength to riſe on his knees, and parry the blows with his arm; but a blow from a club, filled with iron points, broke his arm above the elbow. At length he fell on the pavement; when two freſh wounds put an end to his exiſtence. As ſoon as he ceaſed to move, the aſſaſſins held a torch to his face to ſee if he was dead. At that moment, a man, whoſe face was concealed beneath a hood, iſſued from the hotel de Notre-Dame, and ſaid to his aſſociates, "Put out the lights, and let us be off; for he is dead." This, moſt probably, was the duke of Burgundy himſelf. The footmen who carried the torches had all fled on the firſt attack, except one, whoſe name was Jacob. This faithful domeſtic threw himſelf on the body, received many of the blows that were aimed at the prince, and fell a victim to his fidelity. Such are the chief circumſtances of this murder, as extracted from the depoſitions of eye-witneſſes, who underwent an immediate examination*.

The aſſaſſins ſet fire to the hotel, which had ſerved them for a retreat, in the hope that the alarm of the conflagration, would favour their eſcape. In the mean time, the duke's two eſquires returned; and the attendants, who had been left at the hotel Barbette, having arrived, the prince's body was conveyed to a houſe, oppoſite to the place where the murder was committed. The news ſoon ſpread through the town. The queen was immediately carried to the hotel de Saint Paul. At break of day the princes aſſembled at the hotel d'Anjou, where the duke of Burgundy attended. The gates of the town were ordered to be ſhut, and corps-de-garde were placed in the ſtreets. The body was conveyed to a neighbouring church, where the princes went to ſee it. Suſpicions, at firſt, fell upon the lord of Cany, whoſe wife the duke of Orleans had ſeduced; but on enquiry, he had been abſent from Paris more than a year. The laſt duties were paid to the duke of Orleans, who was buried at the church belonging to the convent of the Celeſtines. The pall was ſupported by the king of Sicily, and the dukes of Berry, Bourbon, and Burgundy; the laſt of whom appeared, and he had reaſon to be ſo, more deeply afflicted than the reſt. Lewis, duke of Orleans, left three ſons by his wife, Valentina, of Milan. By his will, he left to his eldeſt ſon, Charles, the duchy of Orleans; the counties of Valois, Blois, and Beaumont; and the county of Aſt and Luxembourg. In this deed, which contains a prodigious number of legacies and bequeſts for charitable uſes, the duke ſtyles himſelf, Lewis, ſon to a king of France, unworthy duke of Orleans.

Many enquiries had been made, and ſeveral perſons examined, on the ſubject of this murder. The provoſt of Paris, at length, received information that one of the aſſaſſins had taken refuge in the duke of Burgundy's palace. He immediately reported this circumſtance to the council, and applied for an order from the king, to authoriſe him to ſearch a palace of a prince of the blood. The duke of Burgundy was confounded when he heard of the diſcovery which had been made. Diſconcerted by the provoſt's report, pale and trembling, he led the king of Sicily and the duke of Berry to one extremity of the council-chamber, where he confeſſed his crime, ſaying, that the devil had taken him by ſurpriſe, and tempted him to it. The duke of Berry burſt into tears, and exclaimed, "Now "have I loſt both my nephews!"

The council aſſembled again the next day, when the duke of Burgundy preſented himſelf at the door, but the duke of Berry refuſed him admiſſion. The duke of Bourbon, who arrived ſoon after he was gone, complained loudly of the council's neglect in not having ſecured his perſon. On his return home his fears increaſed; and while the council were loſing time in deliberating, he mounted his horſe, and left Paris, accompanied only by ſix attendants. He was fortunate enough to find freſh horſes on the road, which enabled him to reach Bapaumes in ſix hours.

The duke of Bourbon was the only one of the council who had the ſpirit to propoſe that he ſhould be immediately purſued, and brought to juſtice; but the other members were too weak to follow this advice. The moſt faithful ſervants of the duke of Orleans, enraged at their timidity, aſſembled to the number of one hundred and twenty men at arms, to revenge the death of their prince. This troop had ſcarcely left the city, when they received peremptory orders from the king of Sicily to return. It is probable, their purſuit would have been fruitleſs, as the duke had ſo much the ſtart of them. But it is aſtoniſhing that none of his accomplices ſhould have been ſecured; and that, notwithſtanding there were corps-de-garde placed in every part of the town, and all the gates were ſhut, they ſhould have found means to leave the houſe in which they were known to have taken refuge, and to effect their eſcape. The Pariſians, attached to the duke of Burgundy, openly rejoiced at the death of the duke of Orleans, and converted his murder into ridicule.

In other parts of the kingdom, this event was viewed in a proper light; it inſpired with horror and alarm all thoſe who ſtill preſerved in their hearts any ſentiments of affection for their country. The ducheſs of Orleans was at Chateau-Thierry, when ſhe received the news of her huſband's death. Moſt of the nobility and gentry who were attached to her family haſtened to join her; and, while the princeſs indulged the firſt tranſports of grief, they prudently provided for the ſafety of her children. Two of the princes were conducted to the caſtle of Blois; and the youngeſt, the count of Angouleme, was left to conſole his mother.

Valentina repaired to Paris, accompanied by the count of Angouleme, and the queen dowager of England, wife to her eldeſt ſon, Charles of Orleans. The king of Sicily, the dukes of Berry and Bourbon, met her without the walls of the city. The ducheſs and her attendants were dreſſed in black: her car was entirely covered with black cloth, and drawn by ſix white horſes. She alighted at the hotel de St. Paul, where ſhe had an audience of the king. When ſhe threw herſelf at his feet, Charles, who then enjoyed an interval of reaſon, raiſed her up, and promiſed her all the ſatisfaction which ſhe was entitled to expect from his affection and equity. He ſwore to revenge the death of a brother whom he had never ceaſed to love. This oath was renewed, and theſe promiſes were confirmed, at a public audience which the ducheſs obtained ſome days after; and the time was fixed for inſtituting a criminal ſuit againſt the murderer of her huſband.

The duke of Burgundy, in the mean time, was preparing to avert the gathering ſtorm, by juſtifying the crime he could no longer deny. His firſt care was to aſſemble the ſtates-general of Flanders, at Ghent, and to ſecure the forces of that province. He publiſhed a manifeſto, in which, after explaining his motives for the aſſaſſination, he exhorted his vaſſals to afford him thoſe ſuccours which the urgency of the caſe required. The deputies of the different towns, promiſed to grant him effectual aſſiſtance againſt all perſons, except the king of France and his children. He iſſued orders, at the ſame time, to levy troops, in the duchy of Burgundy, which were deſtined to join the Flemings.

The princes of the council, informed of theſe preparations, were thrown into embarraſſment. They found themſelves unprepared to oppoſe the ſmalleſt obſtacle to the invaſions with which he ſeemed to threaten them. They had no troops, and moſt of the towns, diſcontented with the preſent miniſters, ſecretly favoured the duke of Burgundy, who had flattered them with the proſpect of a happy change, in caſe he ſhould get poſſeſſion of the government; the capital avowed its partiality to that prince. It appeared neceſſary to negociate with a criminal, whom they wanted the power to puniſh. The count of St. Paul undertook to make the firſt overtures for an accommodation thus humiliating. To preſerve the king's honour, at leaſt in appearance, the duke was required, by an open confeſſion, to acknowledge a crime, which it was previouſly reſolved to pardon; but even this ſatisfaction, he refuſed to grant. The king of Sicily and the duke of Berry held a ſecond conference with him at Amiens, but were not more ſucceſsful in their negociations than the count of Saint-Paul: the duke of Burgundy remained inflexible, and refuſed to repair to court on any other condition than that of obtaining from the king an approbation of his conduct; the two princes delivered the duke's anſwer to the council, but were afraid of rendering it public, leſt it ſhould encreaſe the inſolence of the Pariſians.

The embarraſſment of the court every moment encreaſed; and, to add to the confuſion, Charles relapſed into inſanity. But he had previouſly holden a bed of juſtice, in the grand chamber of the parliament. The principle object of this aſſembly was to provide for the government of the kingdom. In the preſent ſituation of affairs it appeared too dangerous to entruſt the exerciſe of the ſovereign authority to any one perſon. It was therefore decreed that, in caſe of the king's death or illneſs, the regency ſhould be ſuppreſſed, and the kingdom be governed under the authority of the lawful heir, though a minor; that all the public acts ſhould be paſſed in his name; and that all ſtate affairs ſhould be tranſacted by the queen, if alive, and by the princes of the blood, aſſiſted by the conſtable, the chancellor, and the wiſeſt member of the council. This ordonnance, by multiplying governors, only ſerved, to multiply pretenſions and jealouſies. Authority, thus divided, loſt half its force.

The duke of Burgundy, had returned to Arras, where he aſſembled freſh troops, and advanced towards the capital. In vain did the king of Sicily and the duke of Berry renew their entreaty, that he would reſpect the laws of the kingdom, and duty to his ſovereign; in vain did they forbid him, in the king's name, to enter Paris; he even rejected, with diſdain, the propoſal, that was made him, to appear at court with a ſmall retinue. This aſſaſſin repaired to Saint-Denis, to perform his devotions. The ducheſs of Orleans, on the news of the duke of Burgundy's approach, retired from court. As the king was taken ill immediately after her departure, the enemies of her family aſcribed his relapſe to her: ſhe, therefore, haſtened to Blois, and cauſed the fortifications of that town to be repaired. Bourbon, juſtly enraged at the indignity of negociating with an aſſaſſin, refuſed to attend the conferences, and retired to his appanage.

A. D. 1408.] The duke of Burgundy entered Paris, as if taking poſſeſſion of a conquered town; a thouſand men at arms, in three bodies, attended his perſon, and the reſt of his troops were diſperſed in the environs of the capital. The inhabitants received him with joy. He marched through the town amid the acclamations of the populace, who hailed him as a prince that came to reſcue them from oppreſſion. The troops that accompanied him ſurrounded his palace, which he converted into a kind of citadel. This guard, and the fortifications which he raiſed, not appearing ſufficient for his ſafety, he built, within his palace, a ſtone chamber, which had but one opening, where he always ſlept. The king, who, in ſome degree, recovered his ſenſes for a few days, yielded to the neceſſity of the times, and gave him a more favourable reception than he had any right to expect. But the duke of Burgundy reſolved to add to the triumph of crimes, a contempt and violation of the moſt ſacred laws. He required the liberty of juſtifying the aſſaſſination of the duke of Orleans, which he had only committed, he ſaid, for the good of the king and the welfare of the ſtate. The princes and the council ſhuddered at the propoſal; but it was thought dangerous to irritate a ruffian, who was in a ſituation to give laws to his ſovereign, and who might eaſily be provoked to the commiſſion of ſtill greater crimes.

The eighth of March was the day appointed for receiving this juſtification, at a public audience held, for the purpoſe, in the hotel de Saint-Paul. The dauphin repreſented the king, who had juſt had a dangerous relapſe. The aſſembly was compoſed of the princes of the blood, the prelates, nobility, chief magiſtrates, the univerſity, the provoſt of the merchants, and the principal citizens of Paris. The duke of Burgundy appeared armed, ſurrounded by a numerous guard, and followed by an immenſe croud of the loweſt rabble. John Petit, a monk of Normandy, undertook his defence, to which, in his exordium, he ſaid he was induced, by the pecuniary obligations he was under to the duke, who had raiſed him from penury to opulence.

He preferred many ſcandalous accuſations againſt the duke of Orleans; but all, as may be ſuppoſed, foreign from the purpoſe: that this prince, had merited the ſevereſt puniſhment, will not admit of diſpute; but the ſmalleſt palliation of his rival's infamy could not be collected, from any ſource whatever. As ſoon as the orator had finiſhed, he turned to the duke of Burgundy, deſiring his confirmation of what he had advanced, which the duke immediately gave; adding, that he had facts of ſtill greater importance to relate, which he reſerved for the king's private ear! ſilence prevailed throughout the aſſembly; and the members immediately retired. The duke of Burgundy was now complete maſter of the capital, and his troops kept the royal family in a ſtate of captivity. Every thing was to be apprehended from a prince, who had diſplayed a total contempt of all laws human and divine. The commiſſion of one other crime would have crowned his aſpiring hopes; and, in the accommodating doctrines he had adopted, he could have found no difficulty in juſtifying any deed, to which his intereſt urged him.

The queen fled with precipitation to Melun, taking with her the dauphin and the reſt of her children; ſhe was followed by the king of Sicily, and the dukes of Berry and Brittany. Charles, thus abandoned by his whole family, was left totally to the mercy of the duke of Burgundy, who extorted, from the feeble monarch, an approbation of his conduct. But it was requiſite, for the duke's purpoſe, that this approbation ſhould be made public; and, though it could not be done without committing a moſt daring outrage on nature, religion, humanity, and the laws, yet, ſuch an obſtacle was inſufficient to deter him from the accompliſhment of his wiſh. When the wretched monarch ſigned this deed of approbation, he had ſufficient preſence of mind to tell the duke, that it might, probably, not preſerve him from the reſentment of the parties concerned: to which the duke replied, that, ſo long as he poſſeſſed the good graces of his majeſty, he ſhould fear no one.

The duke, ſeized the revenues, in imitation of his predeceſſors, and made no better uſe of them. The taxes were all continued, under the ſpecious pretext of defraying the expences of the ſtate, and of diſcharging the king's debts, which were never ſo ill-paid. The officers of the houſhold continued to take corn, wine, and other neceſſaries for the king's uſe, on credit; and the venders were never ſuffered to claim their debts.

The queen, in the mean time, continued to ſtrengthen the fortifications of Melun; while the ducheſs of Orleans aſſembled the friends of her houſe at Blois. The duke of Brittany, who had followed the queen to Melun, left her, for a ſhort time, in order to counteract the machinations of the counteſs of Penthievre; and, after reſtoring tranquillity to his dominions, he prepared to lead a formidable army to her aſſiſtance.

The duke of Burgundy, though maſter of the capital, had not troops ſufficient to oppoſe the confederacy that was forming againſt him. His brother-in-law, John of Bavaria, biſhop of Liege, having been juſt depoſed by his ſubjects; and the city of Maeſtricht, whither he retired, being actually inveſted by the new biſhop, the duke had an honourable pretext for leaving Paris. The queen's army daily increaſed; the troops from Brittany were advancing, by rapid marches, to join her; and theſe forces, united to thoſe which the ducheſs of Orleans and her ſons were raiſing, might render his ſituation dangerous. Reſolved on retreating, he exhorted the Pariſians to perſiſt in their attachment; and aſſured them that he would ſpeedily return, in a ſituation to give law to his enemies.

The duke of Burgundy had no ſooner left the capital, than preparations were made for the return of the queen and her children. The ſpeedy arrival of the ducheſs of Orleans was alſo announced, who had determined to apply to the king, to bring the murderer of her huſband to juſtice. Iſabella, accompanied by the princes, made her entry into the capital, under an eſcort of three thouſand men at arms, moſt of which were the troops of the duke of Brittany. The Pariſians murmured becauſe they marched through the ſtreets in order of battle, with colours flying, a privilege which none but their monarchs had ever aſſumed. Enraged at the duke of Brittany, they laid a plan for attacking him in the night, but their perfidy was detected, and that prince had time to aſſemble his troops, before the chains were placed acroſs the ſtreets. The provoſt of the merchants was then ſent by the citizens to make excuſes for their conduct, which the duke thought it prudent to accept; he was careful, however, to adopt ſuch precautions as were neceſſary to prevent any future ſurpriſe. The queen, on her arrival, had cauſed the keys of the city to be delivered to her: ſhe made the troops obſerve the ſtricteſt diſcipline. The next day arrived the ducheſs of Orleans; ſhe was accompanied by the young dowager of England, wife to Charles of Orleans, her eldeſt ſon; and a long file of black waggons, containing the ladies of her retinue, cloſed the proceſſion. The princes of Orleans repaired to Paris a few days after their mother, and their preſence revived, for a few moments, the general pity.

The abſence of the duke of Burgundy left the queen at liberty to re-aſſume the ſupreme power; but to render her authority more ſolid, her council deemed it prudent to procure the confirmation of it by a general aſſembly*. A meeting of that deſcription, was, accordingly, convened at the Louvre, where the parliament were invited to attend. The king's advocate, John Juvenal des Urſins, informed the aſſembly, that the ſovereign power, and the abſolute government of the realm, were granted and committed to the queen, and to my lord of Guienne, during the king's abſence or illneſs. The firſt act of ſovereignty performed by the queen and her ſon, was the convention of a bed of juſtice, conſiſting of the ſame perſons as had compoſed the general aſſembly, to hear the juſtification of the memory of the duke of Orleans. The widow of the deceaſed duke attended with her ſon, the chancellor of Orleans, and their counſel. The abbot of Cheſy made a long ſpeech, in which he refuted all the calumnious accuſations of John Petit; he was followed by Peter Couſinet, an advocate, who demanded that the duke of Burgundy ſhould aſk pardon of the ducheſs of Orleans and her children, in the preſence of the king, the princes, the council, and the people, on his knees, and with his head bare; that this ſatisfaction ſhould be repeated at the Louvre, in the court-yard of the palace, at the hotel de St. Paul, and on the ſpot where the murder was committed, that it ſhould be publiſhed throughout the kingdom by ſound of trumpet; that the different palaces of the duke, in the metropolis, ſhould be levelled with the ground, and croſſes raiſed on the ſite, with explanatory inſcriptions; that the duke ſhould found two collegiate churches, and two chapels, one at Rome, and the other at Jeruſalem; that he ſhould pay a fine of one million of gold; and that he ſhould be baniſhed beyond ſea for twenty years at leaſt, and be prohibited from ever approaching within a hundred leagues of the reſidence of the queen, or of the princes of Orleans. The dauphin, who repreſented the king, ordered the chancellor to aſſure the ducheſs, that ſhe might rely on having all the juſtice done her which ſhe was entitled to expect.

The court was loth to proceed to extremities againſt a powerful prince, who ſtill, though abſent, preſerved his influence in the capital, by the number of his partiſans, and whoſe emiſſaries even penetrated into the council; his wealth, and the extent and ſituation of his dominions, gave riſe to apprehenſions that he might join the enemies of the ſtate, with whom, it was known, he maintained a ſecret intelligence*. The truce between France and England, though yearly renewed, was ill-obſerved, and nothing but a favourable opportunity appeared to be wanting for an open violation of it. It was evidently the intereſt of thoſe in power to avoid a rupture, which would infallibly be imputed to them. Theſe conſiderations, however, important as they were, yielded to the ſolicitations of the ducheſs of Orleans, and to the reſentment of the queen.

The court and council were, indeed, more eaſily perſuaded to purſue the aſſaſſin with vigour, from the intelligence they received, at this period, that the people of Liege were advancing againſt him with forces ſo greatly ſuperior to his own, that it was thought they muſt inevitably cruſh him. The queen, under theſe circumſtances, conceived herſelf at liberty to give full ſcope to her reſent-ment; Guichard Dauphin, and Tignonville were ſent to the duke of Burgundy's army, to inform that prince that the king reſerved to himſelf the accommodation of the diſpute which ſubſiſted between the people of Liege and their biſhop; and to give him notice of the proceedings commenced againſt himſelf. The duke replied, that in aſſiſting John of Bavaria, his brother-in-law, he did but diſcharge the duties of a kinſman and ally; that, with regard to the ſuit inſtituted againſt him, he would not fail, as ſoon as he ſhould have completed his preſent enterpriſe, to repair to Paris, and juſtify his conduct to the king.

While the court were at a loſs how to act, intelligence was received that the duke of Burgundy had obtained a complete victory over the people of Liege. Thirty thouſand of the Liegois were left dead on the field, and John of Bavaria, being re-eſtabliſhed in his principality, conducted himſelf—ſays Le Gendre*—more like a tiger than a paſtor; for he cauſed upwards of three thouſand of his flock, among whom were many women, children, and eccleſiaſtics, to be either racked, hanged, or drowned. This unexpected event threw the court into a conſternation. The Pariſians, who idolized that prince, took no pains to conceal their ſentiments; and any one would have imagined that the victory of Tongres had been achieved by themſelves. The queen and her council had ſuffered the only opportunity of regaining their affections, by the abolition of the impoſts, to eſcape; and the means which ſhe now took of providing for her own ſafety, by the introduction of troops into the town, encreaſed their enmity and rage. A report was induſtriouſly propagated, by her enemies, that ſhe meant to take from them the chains which they were accuſtomed, in times of danger, to place acroſs the ſtreets, and which the duke of Burgundy had recently reſtored to them.

In vain had orders the moſt poſitive been repeatedly ſent to the duke of Burgundy, to prohibit him from approaching the metropolis, unleſs he came attended only by his uſual retinue; in vain, too, were injuctions iſſued to all the towns on his road to ſhut their gates againſt him; they were alike diſregarded; the duke no longer owned any authority ſuperior to his own: ſupported by a numerous army, fluſhed with victory, and by the wiſhes of the Pariſians, he reſolved to obey the dictates of ambition. The court, convinced he would deſpiſe the threats they were unable to execute, reſolved to ſave themſelves, by a precipitate flight, from the neceſſity of ſubmitting to the domination of a victorious rebel.

The queen had reſolved to take her huſband with her; for although, from the ſtate of his mind, he was reduced to a mere phantom, yet he was ſtill king; and that title ſufficed to juſtify the proceedings of a party, who acted under his name. Iſabella exerted her utmoſt addreſs to conceal her intentions from the Pariſians; and while ſhe amuſed them with exhortations and promiſes, ſhe had the king conveyed on board a covered boat, where ſhe ſpeedily joined him, with the dauphin and the reſt of the royal family. The duke of Brittany eſcorted the royal fugitives with fifteen hundred men at arms, a body ſufficiently numerous to keep the populace in awe; and they arrived ſafe at Gien, a town upon the Loire above Orleans.

The duke of Burgundy, in the mean time, advanced, by rapid marches, towards the capital, though the king's evaſion diſconcerted his projects. The count of Haynaut, his brother-in-law, who accompanied him, adviſed him to open a negociation, and offered to go to Tours, where the king then was, and make the firſt overtures himſelf. He accordingly repaired thither, while the duke purſued his road to the metropolis, where he was received by the populace as a titular deity. The troops that were quartered in that city ſtill obſerved ſome degree of diſcipline; but the open country, over-run by a licentious ſoldiery, from the frontiers of Flanders to the banks of the Loire, experienced the complicated horrors of violence, pillage, and murder. The king enjoyed an interval of reaſon, when the count of Haynaut arrived at Tours. A deſign had long been entertained of uniting the ſecond ſon of Charles to a daughter of this prince, and the marriage had only been delayed on account of the tender years of the parties. The propoſals which the count now made, in the name of the duke of Burgundy, were favourably received; and Lewis of Bavaria, brother to the queen, and Montagu, were ordered to accompany him to Paris, to ſettle with the duke the preliminaries of the treaty, the particulars of which had been agreed on at Tours.

The death of the ducheſs-dowager of Orleans, at this period, tended greatly to facilitate the concluſion of the treaty. Valentina terminated, at Blois, a life whoſe latter end had been empoiſoned by exceſs of grief, and an impotent deſire of revenge. A ſhort time before ſhe reſigned her breath, ſhe ſent for her children, whom ſhe embraced with all the warmth of maternal affection; and, caſting her eyes on John, the natural ſon of her late huſband, afterward ſo celebrated under the title of count of Dunois*, ſhe told him that, of all the duke's children, there was not one ſo well calculated to revenge the death of his father as himſelf. The young princes of Orleans, the eldeſt of whom had ſcarcely completed his fifteenth year, experienced the ill-effects of their mother's death, in the diminution of the zeal and number of their partiſans.

The inhabitants of Paris had ſent deputies to the king, to invite him to return to the metropolis. Charles received them with kindneſs, accepted the invitation they brought, and ſent word to the Pariſians that he would ſpeedily relieve them from the deſtructive incurſions of the troops who infeſted the environs of Paris, and ravaged the neighbouring provinces. In fact, one of the firſt conditions of the accommodation concluded at Tours, impoſed on the duke of Burgundy the neceſſity of withdrawing his forces, and of retiring to his Flemiſh dominions, till the final conſummation of the treaty, which was poſtponed till the month of March in the enſuing year. It was agreed, by this treaty, that the duke ſhould aſk pardon of the king, and of the princes of Orleans; and that, in order to confirm the reconciliation, the count of Vertus, the youngeſt of thoſe princes, ſhould marry a daughter of the duke of Burgundy's, with a dower of one hundred and fifty thouſand livres, beſides an annual income of four thouſand.

A. D. 1409.] The ceremony of aſking pardon, for the murder committed, took place at Chartres, in the preſence of the king and queen, and of the whole court. When it was over, the duke of Burgundy repaired to Paris, whither he was ſoon followed by the king. The people, eager to enjoy the preſence of their ſovereign, ran in crowds to meet him: Monſtrelet tells us, that upwards of two hundred thouſand perſons iſſued from the gates of Paris, on this occaſion. His return was celebrated by extraordinary rejoicings; the Pariſians flattered themſelves that the reſtoration of tranquillity would, at length, procure them the long-expected abolition of the taxes, which the duke of Burgundy had given them reaſon to look for.

Soon after the king's return, the queen went to Melun, and took the dauphin with her, who had juſt entered into his fourteenth year. She appeared but ſeldom at court, while the king was in poſſeſſion of his reaſon; by which means the duke of Burgundy was left at liberty to extend his influence and his power. By a ſucceſsful exertion of his talents, he recovered the confidence of his uncle, the duke of Berry, and of the kings of Sicily and Navarre. The duke of Bourbon was the only prince whoſe virtue led him to reject all offers of friendſhip, and forced him to conſider the murderer of the duke of Orleans as the the enemy of his country. Theſe ſentiments might have proved prejudicial to any one but himſelf; but his ſafety conſiſted in the conſideration he enjoyed, more from his perſonal merit than from birth. The duke of Burgundy was careful, notwithſtanding, to pay thoſe external attentions which it would have been dangerous to refuſe to a prince who was an object of eſteem to his equals, and of reſpect to the public.

The ill ſucceſs of an enterpriſe, which appears to have been hazarded with a view to ſound the diſpoſition of the people, on this ſubject, impreſſed, with ſtill greater force, on the mind of the duke of Burgundy, the neceſſity of placing a reſtraint on his conduct to that prince. Ame, lord of Viry, a captain in the ſervice of the duke of Burgundy, having retired to his eſtate, on the borders of the Beaujolois, had the inſolence to ſend a challange to the duke of Burbon, and to ravage his domains. The duke immediately aſſembled a body of troops, and, accompanied by the counts of la Marche and Vendome, the conſtable, and Montagu, haſtend to repreſs the incurſions of this marauder. The preparations he made were evidently more than ſufficient for this purpoſe, had he not expected that Ame would be ſupported. The lord of Viry did not ſtay to be overtaken by the ſtorm which threatened him, but, as ſoon as the troops approached, fled for refuge to the dominions of the count of Savoy, who immediately ſurrendered him to the duke, exacting only a promiſe that no corporal puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on him. He was impriſoned for a ſhort time, and then releaſed. The duke of Burgundy did not appear to have any concern in this affair, though, by the general opinion, it was undertaken at his inſtigation and requeſt. The miniſter, Montagu, by taking a part in this expedition, encreaſed the rage of the duke of Burgundy againſt him, which had been before excited by his ſteady attachment to the queen, and the concern he had in the evaſion of the king and dauphin. The duke, therefore, bent on his deſtruction, took advantage of the diſorders that prevailed in the finances, of which Montagu was ſuperintendant, to have him ſeized and thrown into priſon. His immenſe riches were conſidered as proofs of his maleverſation in office; and commiſſioners, appointed by the duke of Burgundy, condemned him to die, after extorting, by the means of torture, a confeſſion of ſuch crimes as they wiſhed to eſtabliſh againſt him: he was beheaded, and the duke of Burgundy is ſaid to have feaſted his eyes with the laſt ſtruggles of his victim.

The king was in a ſtate of inſanity at the time of Montagu's execution; on his recovery the news of his miniſter's death both grieved and aſtoniſhed him, but he was eaſily perſuaded that the good of the ſtate had rendered ſuch a ſacrifice neceſſary. Montagu's diſgrace was followed by a ſtrict inveſtigation into the other departments of the finances, when many of the officers were thrown into priſon, and exorbitant ſums extorted as the price of their releaſe. The next objects of the duke of Burgundy's vengeance, were thoſe who had taken advantage of the king's eaſy diſpoſition, to obtain grants of money and land: on the regiſters of the chamber of accompts at Paris, theſe grants were ſpecified—and oppoſite to them, is written—"He has had too much, let him make reſtitution." Theſe inveſtigations, or rather perſecutions, were carried on with the utmoſt rigour. All the officers of the chamber of accompts were ſuſpended. The duke of Burgundy, anxious to court the favour of the Pariſians, depoſed the treaſurers of France, and appointed ſome of the principal citizens to perform the duties of their offices. All the franchiſes and immunities which had been taken from the city, during the former commotions, were now reſtored. It was ſettled, that, in future, the provoſt of the merchants, and all the municipal officers, ſhould be elected by ſuffrages, according to ancient cuſtom. The inhabitants were allowed the privilege of bearing arms, not only for the king's ſervice, but for the defence of the city; and the power of poſſeſſing noble fiefs was confirmed to the citizens of Paris. The Pariſians ſent the provoſt of the merchants and the aldermen to the king, with aſſurances of gratitude and fidelity, accompanied by a promiſe never to take up arms, but in obedience to the orders of their ſovereign.

About this time, the Genoeſe revolted, and renounced their allegiance to the French crown; mareſchal Boucicaut, the governor, was, therefore, compelled to return to France with his troops; as was the duke of Anjou, titular king of Sicily, after an unſucceſsful attempt to recover the dominions bequeathed him by his father.

The duke of Burgundy, ever attentive to the promotion of the projects he had in view, ſpared no pains to gain the confidence of the queen*. He affected to withhold his approbation from all meaſures of conſequence which were propoſed in the council, until he had previouſly made her acquainted with their deliberations; and it was, principally, through his means that a marriage was now concluded between her brother, Lewis of Bavaria, and a daughter of the king of Navarre.

The king, anxious to profit by an interval of health, much longer than he uſually enjoyed, in order to ſettle the government†, held a bed of juſtice, at which the queen, the dauphin, and the princes of the blood were preſent. The count of Tancarville addreſſed the aſſembly, by the king's command, and recalled to their minds every circumſtance which had occurred ſince the aſſaſſination of Richard the Second; the frequent violations of the ſubſiſting truce, committed by the Engliſh, as well againſt France, as againſt her allies, in Scotland and Wales; he repreſented the neceſſity and the juſtice of retaliation; and concluded his ſpeech by obſerving, that the king had convened the aſſembly for the purpoſe of conſultation on the meaſures neceſſary to be purſued, in revenging ſuch a repetition of inſults, which were equally injurious to the dignity of the throne, and the honour of the nation. Such a propoſal, at ſuch a period, might excite reaſonable apprehenſions that the king's interval of reaſon was only imaginary. To involve the kingdom in a foreign war, at a time when the treaſury was exhauſted, when the people were oppreſſed with taxes, and diſcord on the point of burſting into a flame, was ſurely an act that bore the features of inſanity.

As ſoon as Tancarville ſat down, the duke of Berry aroſe, and renounced, for himſelf and the other princes of the blood, all profit or emolument whatever, as miniſters and members of the council. The count of Tancarville then declared, that the king revoked all penſions and ſalaries whatever, and to whomſoever granted. Theſe retrenchments proved of no real advantage to the king; they only became a ſource of patronage to the princes who, being entruſted with the reins of government, ſought to arrogate to themſelves the diſtribution of favours. The laſt meaſure adopted by the aſſembly was a reſolution that, during the king's illneſs, the adminiſtration of the kingdom ſhould be veſted in the queen, and dauphin.

The dauphin, who had but juſt compleated his thirteenth year, had neither experience nor talents ſufficient to guide, with honour to himſelf or advantage to the nation, the helm of the ſtate. By appointing a council to aſſiſt him, it was imagined, that a competition for that enviable deſtinction would give riſe to jealouſies, cabals, and intrigues; it was, therefore, determined, that one of the princes of the blood ſhould be choſen to direct his conduct.

It appeared natural that the duke of Berry ſhould be ſelected for this purpoſe; his age, experience, and rank, ſeemed to give him a decided preference over the other princes. He flattered himſelf with the idea that theſe pretenſions would be deemed valid; but, when the majority of votes in the council appeared to favour his wiſhes, by a ridiculous affectation of modeſty, he urged his inability to fill the important ſtation they wiſhed to allot him, and adviſed them to chuſe the duke of Burgundy, whoſe eulogy he pronounced, though he was neither the object of his regard nor eſteem. He did not expect that the council would take him at his word, and his aſtoniſhment could only be equalled by his diſappointment, when he found they accepted his propoſal. In vain did he attempt to recall what he had ſaid; his offer of himſelf was now unanimouſly rejected; and he had the mortification to ſee the duke of Burgundy appointed, by the king, ſuperintendant of the dauphin's education; and the young prince himſelf, having been previouſly gained over by the duke, who was his father-in-law, expreſſed ſatisfaction at the choice which the council had made. The queen and the partiſans of the houſe of Orleans were the more deeply chagrined at the diſappointment produced by the miſconduct of the duke of Berry, as a fault ſo eſſential could not admit of reparation.

A. D. 1410.] The duke of Burgundy, having removed every obſtacle which ſtood in his way, no longer thought it neceſſary to keep up thoſe appearances which he had hitherto preſerved; and Iſabella, by her abſence from court, gave him an ample ſcope for the diſplay of his ambition. He preſided at the council, in the dauphin's name, and no meaſure was adopted but by his orders. Every perſon in office, who was ſuſpected of diſaffection to his party, had been diſmiſſed; the king's houſhold, as well as the dauphin's, was filled with his creatures; he drew immenſe ſums from the treaſury; the revenue of the ſtate was entirely in his power; and the war which had been determined on with England ſupplied him with a plauſive pretext for diſpoſing of the public money.

With a view to keep up this pretext, he renewed the ancient project of laying ſiege to Calais. A ſmall body of troops were accordingly ſent into Picardy, but they ſoon returned without achieving any other exploit, than that of plundering the inhabitants and laying waſte the province. The truce between the two crowns, was ſoon after prolonged, and all pretence for hoſtility, by that means, removed.

It was not poſſible that the duke of Burgundy could long enjoy this exceſſive authority without exciting the jealouſy of the princes who had an equal right with himſelf to a participation of the ſovereign power. The duke of Berry perceived his influence daily diminiſh. He therefore retired to his appanage, and his example was followed by the duke of Bourbon; though he ſoon after returned to court, for a ſhort time, on account of the diſputes which aroſe in Brittany between the rival houſes of Montfort and Blois.

At the town of Gyen, on the fifteenth of April, 1410, the firſt of thoſe confederacies which, in the ſequel, proved ſo fatal to the kingdom, was ſigned, by the dukes of Bourbon, Brittany, and Orleans, and the counts of Alencon, Clermont, and Armagnac. The object of this league was to reſcue the king and the nation from the hands of the duke of Burgundy. Each of the confederated princes was to ſupply his quota of troops towards the ſupport of the common cauſe. Their forces amounted to five thouſand men at arms, and ſix thouſand infantry. To oppoſe the deſigns of his enemies, the duke of Burgundy aſſembled an army; engaged the king of Navarre, and the counts of la Marche and Vendome, to eſpouſe his cauſe; formed an alliance with the king of Sicily, by giving to the eldeſt ſon of that monarch his daughter, the princeſs Catherine, who, by the treaty of Chartres, had been promiſed to the count of Vertus; called his brother-in-law, the count of Haynaut, to his aſſiſtance; and, in ſhort, took every precaution which prudence could ſuggeſt, for maintaining the power he had acquired by treachery and murder. With the view to detach the duke of Brittany from the league, he ſettled his diſputes with the houſe of Penthievre, by the concluſion of a treaty advantageous to Montfort. This conduct had the deſired effect.

A marriage was concluded between the duke of Orleans, who had recently buried his wife, and Bonne, daughter to the count of Armagnac. Of all the princes and nobility united in oppoſition to the duke of Burgundy, no one evinced greater zeal than the count. He ſoon became the ſoul of the party, and had even the honour to give his name to it. He was, after the royal family, the moſt opulent and powerful ſubject of France. Sprung from the blood of Clovis, his family might be traced to the earleſt period of the monarchy; from the princes of the blood to the leaſt diſtinguiſhed among the nobility, every one deemed it an honour to be united to it. Son-in-law to the duke of Berry, father-in-law to the duke of Orleans, he poſſeſſed the experience which was wanting to the latter, and the vigour which the former had loſt. Intelligent, active, and brave, he had every qualification requiſite to form the head of a party. But his virtues were tarniſhed by cruelty; in his hatred he was implacable; and in the purſuit of revenge he was neither reſtrained by ſcruples nor remorſe.

The ſtorm which threatened the duke of Burgundy was on the point of burſting on his head, when the duke of Berry, who had hitherto preſerved an apparent neutrality, ſuddenly withdrew from court, and repaired to Angers, where all the leaders of the Armagnac party had assembled*. Never was insurrection more prompt, nor more general. From the foot of the Pyrenees to the banks of the Scheld, the kingdom was in arms in less than a month. The troops of the confederated princes hastened from the southern provinces to the borders of the Loire, ravaging the intermediate country; for pillage always formed a considerable part of their pay. During the first fermentation, occasioned by these commotions, the kingdom in general, and the confederated princes in particular, sustained a heavy loss, by the death of the duke of Bourbon. He deserved the appellation of Good, which had been conferred on him by the unanimous voice of the nation. It was this prince who made the memorable reply to a state-informer, who presented him with a list of the faults committed by some of his subjects, "Have you kept a register of the services "they have done me?" He died at Mount-Lucon, in the seventy-third year of his age. The duke left one legitimate child, who succeeded to the title, under the appellation of John the First.

Paris was soon surrounded by the Armagnacs, and the neighbouring villages were plundered by the troops. But, after a short time passed in mutual depredations, both parties seemed equally disposed to peace, though their wishes for an accommodation proceeded from different motives. Their forces were said to amount to two hundred thousand men.

The conditions of the treaty, dictated by the inability to injure, and the mutual desire of deceiving each other, were these—that Peter of Naverre, count of Mortaing, should, alone, of all the princes of the blood, be permitted to reside at court; that the leaders of either party should immediately retire, compelling their troops to observe the strictest discipline; that no one of them should return to Paris without the king's express permission; that the dukes of Berry and Burgundy should never be sent for separately; and that all the chiefs should bind themselves by oath, not to take the field again till after Easter, 1412. The treaty was signed by all the princes, who swore to observe it. The troops were dismised, and, on their return, completed the desolation of the provinces through which they passed.

A. D. 1411.] The people flattered themselves that the tranquillity thus restored would be durable: but the prospect was delusive. The animosity which prevailed between the contending factions was too fierce to admit of a sincere reconciliation. The duke of Orleans, still eager to revenge the death of his father, again applied to the council to bring his assassin to justice. This application being treated with neglect, he declared that he would have recourse to arms, and would reject all offers of accommodation, so long as the king should continue to be influenced by men, who were attached to the duke of Burgundy.

The duke farther complained that the late treaty had been violated by the conduct obſerved towards des Eſſarts, who, immediately after his diſmiſſion, had received letters-patent from the king, reſtoring him to his office. Immediately after this declaration the duke flew to arms, and engaged ſome of the nobility, who had not yet declared themſelves, to eſpouſe his cauſe. The duke of Burgundy alſo aſſembled his troops, and, previous to the commencement of hoſtilities, manifeſtos were iſſued by either party, filled with the ſevereſt reproaches, and the moſt bitter invectives. The princes of Orleans reproached their rival with the murder of their father; while the duke of Burgundy openly exulted in the aſſaſſination of a man whom he repreſented as a falſe, diſloyal, and cruel felon and traitor, who was unworthy to live; and intimated that his ſons, as poſſeſſed of the ſame ſentiments, ſhould incur a ſimilar puniſhment. The prevalence of the Burgundian faction in the metropolis ſuperinduced the proſcription of the Armagnacs, and the beſtowal of the government of Paris on the count of Saint Paul. But this laſt expedient proved highly detrimental to the peace of the city. From the different claſſes of the people he ſelected thoſe who appeared beſt calculated to ſupport his newly eſtabliſhed tyranny; and he formed them into a company of five hundred men, on which he beſtowed the appellation of the royal militia. This corps was compoſed chiefly of butchers. They ſoon became the terror of the metropolis; long accuſtomed to ſhed the blood of animals, in the immolation of human victims, they only appeared to be exerciſing their daily occupation. All, who were ſo unfortunate as to incur their diſpleaſure, or to excite their avarice, felt the fatal effects of their rage. Under pretence of proſecuting the partiſans of the Armagnac party, they made no ſcruple to gratify their own private revenge. To beſtow on any man the appellation of Armagnac was to pronounce his ſentence of death. The municipal body, the magiſtrates, the council, and even the court, were intimidated by their conduct; they daily beſieged the palace of their ſovereign, and ſurrounded the courts of juſtice; not an edict could be iſſued, an ordonnance publiſhed, a law promulgated, nor a regulation enforced, without the previous approbation of theſe ruffians. The king's perſon not being deemed in ſafety at his cuſtomary reſidence, he was removed to the Louvre. Moſt of the great towns in the kingdom, influenced by the example of the capital, and oppreſſed by the tyranny of the prevailing faction, exhibited a ſcene of violence and confuſion almoſt equally dreadful.

To complete the deſolation of this devoted country, the chiefs of the oppoſite factions reſolved to call in the aſſiſtance of her ancient enemy. The duke of Burgundy, was the firſt who obtained the degrading advantage of a promiſe from the Engliſh court to ſupply him with ſix thouſand archers.

The king of England had made repeated applications to the French court for the concluſion of a marriage between a daughter of Charles, and his ſon, the prince of Wales, which had been conſtantly rejected. By an alteration in his ſyſtem of policy, he was now induced to lend a favourable ear to the propoſals of the duke of Burgundy, who offered him one of his daughters for the prince; not that either of them, probably, was ſincere in his wiſhes for this alliance, which could only promote their mutual intereſt, ſo long as the union between them ſubſiſted, and that could be no longer than the want of reciprocal aſſiſtance continued. When the duke of Burgundy ſhould have once rendered himſelf maſter of the government through the means of his ally, he would naturally become the enemy of that monarch to whoſe aſſiſtance he had been indebted for his ſuperiority over the oppoſite faction, which would then be led to apply for aid to the ſame ſource. Henry had reſolved to afford alternate protection to either party, always favouring the weakeſt ſide, by that means to deſtroy them both, and to involve the nation in their ruin.

The dukes of Orleans and Burgundy having aſſembled their troops, the two armies came in ſight of each other, not far from the town of Mondidier. That of the Burgundians was infinitely ſuperior in numbers; it conſiſted of three thouſand knights, eighteen hundred men at arms, five thouſand archers, four thouſand pioneers, and, at leaſt, ſixty thouſand militia, from Flanders, Picardy, and Artois; whereas the Armagnacs had only twelve thouſand men at arms, their infantry having previouſly left them; but theſe were all choſen troops.

This grand quarrel now appeared on the point of being ſettled by one deciſive action, when the time preſcribed for the ſervice of the Flemiſh militia being expired, thoſe troops inſiſted on being immediately diſmiſſed*. By the deſertion of ſo conſiderable a part of his army, the duke found himſelf reduced to the neceſſity of retreating while his rival, inſtead of ſeeking to profit by the confuſion into which the Burgundians were neceſſarily thrown by this unexpected occurrence, proceeded to the iſle of France, and inveſted the capital.

The populace, in the mean time, complained of being confined within Paris, while the Armagnacs were ſuffered to triumph at their very gates. Their ſolicitations to be led againſt the enemy were urged with ſuch vehemence, that the count de Saint Paul deemed it prudent to comply; he accordingly made a ſally, accompanied by des Eſſarts, the provoſt of Paris, with a ſtrong body of citizens, by the gate of Saint Denis; but, though more numerous than the party they attacked, in the proportion of ſix to one, they ſuſtained a total defeat, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation.

At length the capital was relieved by the duke of Burgundy, whoſe army had been ſtrengthened by the junction of the Engliſh troops. On his arrival at Paris, he publiſhed a new declaration, more expreſs and ſevere than any which had hitherto appeared, containing an irrevocable proſcription of the confederated princes and their adherents, and an injunction from the king to his ſubjects to take up arms againſt them and to purſue them as enemies of the ſtate and invaders of the dignity of the throne. This edict had a ſenſible effect on the Ar-magnacs, many of whom only waited for a pretext to withdraw themſelves from the confederacy; and the duke of Orleans, finding his army diminiſh, and winter approaching, decamped in the night, and eluded the purſuit of his rival. The Burgundians, now maſters of the field, over-ran all the environs of Paris; committed the moſt dreadful diſorders; and diſplayed the moſt flagrant inhumanity in the treatment of their priſoners. The ſtreets were ſtrewed with dead bodies to which the rights of ſepulture were denied, becauſe they were Armagnacs, and lay under a ſentence of excommunication.

The Pariſians had flattered themſelves with the hopes of obtaining from the duke of Burgundy the ſuppreſſion of the impoſts, but, inſtead of gratifying their wiſhes, he impoſed a freſh tax upon the city, from which no perſon was exempt. He likewiſe ſeized the money which was deſtined for the payment of the officers of the different courts of juſtice, and which amounted to four thouſand crowns. Soon after this period, the earl of Arundel was recalled, with the forces under his command, which deprived the duke of Burgundy of ſix thouſand of his beſt troops, and reduced him to the neceſſity of ſuſpending hoſtilities till the enſuing ſpring.

A. D. 1412.] During theſe tranſactions, the Armagnacs had aſſembled at Bourges, and determined, as the beſt means of counteracting the projects of their enemies, to detach the king of England from the Burgundian intereſt, which they effected by an agreement to reſtore all the places in Guienne, which had been taken from the Engliſh, ſince the treaty of Brittany. On theſe conditions Henry agreed to ſend one thouſand men at arms, and three thouſand archers, to their aſſiſtance.

The duke of Burgundy, anxious to prevent the junction of the Engliſh troops with the Armagnacs, opened the campaign early in the ſpring; and, in order to enſure ſucceſs to his operations, he placed the king at the head of his army. After he had reduced ſeveral places of little importance, he inveſted the town of Bourges, which was ſo vigorouſly defended by the duke of Berry, that, after the ſiege had continued a month, not the ſmalleſt impreſſion was made on the place. But a want of proviſions, at length, induced that prince to propoſe terms of accommodation, which were rejected by the duke of Burgundy, who inſiſted, that he ſhould ſurrender at diſcretion. Some of the chiefs of the party intimated to the dauphin, that the duke of Burgundy, to gratify his rage and ambition, ſacrificed the welfare of the ſtate, expoſed the king's perſon, and ruined the fineſt provinces in the kingdom; that the province of Berry, which was now the theatre of war, muſt ſoon revert to the crown, by the death of the duke, who was advanced in years; and that, therefore, it might juſtly be ſaid, the king was laying waſte his own territories: that the army was daily diminiſhing from a dearth of proviſions; and that the diſpleaſure of heaven, at an unjuſt and barbarous war, appeared to be manifeſted in the prevalence of an epidemic diſtemper, of which ſeveral noblemen, and upwards of twelve hundred knights, had already died.

Theſe repreſentations made a deep impreſſion on the young prince, who began to open his eyes to the conduct of his father-in-law. The firſt effect of this change in his ſentiments was a prohibition to the artillery-men to damage the buildings of the town, under pain of death. The duke of Burgundy, ſurpriſed at ſuch an order, attempted to remonſtrate with the dauphin; but that prince frankly told him, that he was reſolved to put an end to a war which tended to ruin and depopulate the kingdom. The duke, thus reduced to the neceſſity of diſſembling, acknowledged the juſtice of his remarks, and immediately renewed the negociations. After ſome altercation, the principal articles were ſettled. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy had an interview, at which they were both armed, though ſeparated by a barrier. "Fair nephew," ſaid the former, when your father was alive there was no neceſſity for a barrier between "us!" The latter replied, "It is not placed here, my lord, on my account!" As their attendants ſtood at ſome diſtance, the particulars of the conference did not tranſpire. The treaty was ſigned ſoon after, and Auxerre was the place appointed for a meeting of the princes in order to ratify it.

The treaty was no ſooner completed, than the promiſed ſuccours from England arrived at la Hogue, in Normandy. Some days elapſed before the Engliſh were appriſed of the pacification of Bourges; but, as ſoon as they heard of it, they ſpread deſolation over the whole country, till induced to deſiſt, by an offer from the duke of Orleans, who promiſed, on their retiring into Guienne, to pay them two hundred and twenty thouſand crowns* ; and he delivered his brother, the count of Angouleme, as an hoſtage for the performance of his promiſe. One half of the money was to be paid by the king.

Moſt of the princes, and the principal nobility of the kingdom, aſſembled at Auxerre, for the purpoſe of ratifying, by their oaths, the conditions of the treaty ſigned at Bourges. The duke of Orleans was accompanied by two thouſand men at arms: the neceſſity of ſo numerous a retinue is thus explained by contemporary hiſtorians†.

The duke of Burgundy, at a private conference with des Eſſarts and Jaqueville, had told thoſe miniſters, that he had fixed upon Auxerre for his interview with the princes, as a place well calculated for the accompliſhment of a ſcheme which he had formed for maſſacring the dukes of Berry, Orleans, and Bourbon, and the count of Vertus, in order to get rid of all his enemies at a ſingle blow. Des Eſſarts, was unable to conceal the horror he experienced at ſuch a propoſal. He ventured to repreſent to the prince the eternal diſgrace he muſt inevitably incur, if, after ſacrificing the father to his rage, he ſhould extend the fatal effects of his indignation to the children, and to the other princes of the blood. The duke was thus forced to abandon his design, and his resentment against des Essarts was the more violent, as, by entrusting him with a secret of this nature, he had reduced himself to the necessity of being circumspect in his conduct towards him. The provost, who knew him too well to be deceived by an appearance of cordiality, resolved to be constantly on his guard against the machinations of a prince whose hatred was implacable, and he secretly apprised the duke of Orleans, and the other princes of the blood, of the danger that threatened them.

The congress of Auxerre, at which the dauphin presided, was numerously attended. The conditions of the late treaty were read, and all the parties took a solemn oath to enforce their observance. The project of a marriage between the count of Vertus and one of the daughters of the duke of Burgundy, which had been settled by the treaty of Chartres, was now renewed; a mutual promise to bury in oblivion all past animosities was made; and both parties renounced all alliance or connection with England.

The duke of Burgundy had now become absolute master of the government. But we have already observed, that the dauphin was discontented with his conduct, during the siege of Bourges. He was aware, that all those measures which tended to affect the stability of the throne were aimed at himself. The duke of Burgundy, too, took no pains to conceal the natural pride and severity of his temper since the success of his plans had apparently established his authority on a solid foundation.

These first symptoms of coolness were perceived by the public soon after the reconciliation of the princes. The dauphin restored young Montagu to the office of chamberlain, and to a part of his father's property. The memory of that minister was, at the same time, cleared from the infamy which the laws extended to his posterity. The dauphin publicly declared that the execution of Montagu had greatly displeased him.

Since the death of the duke of Orleans, no less than three treaties had been signed for the purpose of terminating those fatal dissentions which caused the desolation of the kingdom; but these attempts all proved fruitless. The treaty of Bourges was no sooner signed, than a thousand difficulties occurred to impede its execution. The Armagnacs claimed, agreeably to the terms of the treaty, all the offices of which they had been deprived, and all the property of which they had been robbed; but those who were in possession of their places and estates refused to resign them. A thousand pretences were invented to elude demands that were founded in justice. Even the king's orders were disobeyed; and the claimants, tired out with fruitless applications and unsuccessful pursuits, were, at length, constrained to give up those advantages which they had expected to reap from the treaty. The king, at the solicitation of the duke of Burgundy convened a general assembly, for applying a remedy to the disorders which prevailed in the administration. Every body agreed as to the necessity of a reform; but thoſe who were loudeſt in calling for it, were not the moſt ſincere in their wiſhes to obtain it. The aſſembly was opened by a ſpeech from the chancellor of Guienne, in which he explained the actual ſituation of France. After dwelling, for ſome time, on the evils occaſioned by the civil war, he pointed out the neceſſity of an union between the princes and nobility, to repel the attacks of the Engliſh, who had recently ravaged the Boulenois, and extended their incurſions to the frontiers of Picardy. The chancellor concluded by calling upon the three orders to unite in defence of the kingdom by a general contribution.

A monk, named Euſtache de Pavilly, a doctor of divinity, was ordered to draw up a circumſtantial account of the vices in the adminiſtration, and of the means of removing them. The aſſembly was then adjourned to a future day, when the monk's memorial was publicly read. The exordium contained ſome indirect complaints againſt the abſent princes; but the chief object of the work was, to arraign, in the ſevereſt terms, the preſent adminiſtration, and to offer a new plan of economy, to be obſerved in future. To prove the truth of what he aſſerted, Pavilly required that a ſtrict inveſtigation might take place; that an enquiry ſhould be made as to what property the generals and the ſovereign maſter of the finances poſſeſſed, when they entered into office; what ſalaries they had received, what they had expended, what they were now worth; what eſtates they had purchaſed, and what houſes they had built.

Of all the miniſters who were noticed in this memorial, none were ſo highly cenſured as des Eſſarts; his name was mentioned in every page, and every ſpecies of peculation was imputed to him. A deficiency of four millions of livres appeared in his accounts, but it was generally believed that he had given the money to the duke of Burgundy, and that the dread of incurring the indignation of that prince prevented him from juſtifying himſelf. From this memorial it appeared, that the expences of the king's houſhould, which, under the preceding reign, had never exceeded ninety-four thouſand livres, amounted, under Charles the Sixth, to four hundred and fifty thouſand. The fact is, that the nation was ſo dreadfully oppreſſed by the multiplication of impoſts, that the people were reduced to a ſtate of wretchedneſs the moſt abject, while the king was kept almoſt without the neceſſaries of life; the collectors of the revenue, and the miniſters of the finances preſented falſe accounts, and contrived to ſwell the expences of the houſhold, paying nobody, and appropriating the money they received to their own uſe. The memorial finiſhed with a pompous eulogy on the zeal and ſervices of the duke of Burgundy.

Many of thoſe who were concerned in the adminiſtration of the finances were ſeized and thrown into priſon; ſome fled for refuge to the churches; but moſt of them agreed to purchaſe the forgiveneſs of their crimes, and the money they advanced for that purpoſe was ſeized by thoſe who procured their pardon. Des Eſſarts was compelled to quit Paris in diſgrace, and to repair to Cherbourg of which he was governor. Le Baudran de la Heuſe was appointed to ſucceed him in the office of provoſt of Paris.

The dauphin, in the mean time, began to ſhow his diſpleaſure at the exceſſive authority aſſumed by the duke of Burgundy. John de Neele, chancellor to the dauphin, who had been promoted to that dignity by the duke, had a violent diſpute in the council with the king's chancellor, whom he inſulted very groſsly. The dauphin, happy in an opportunity of mortifying the duke, ſeized his chancellor by the ſhoulders and forced him out of the room, telling him he had no farther occaſion for the ſervices of a man who had dared to inſult the king's chancellor, in his preſence. The duke of Burgundy in vain endeavoured to reſtore John de Neele to his former dignity. The dauphin remained inexorable, and totally diſmiſſed him from his ſervice. The young prince's deſire of taking the government into his own hands daily encreaſed; and thoſe who were about his perſon, aware of his inclination, were careful to encourage it. The object of his attempts was generally the mortification of his father-in-law. The motives of his conduct were too evident to eſcape the penetration of the duke of Burgundy, but, more politic than the dauphin, he diſguiſed his ſentiments, and ſecretly adopted meaſures for maintaining that power which the prince was anxious to wreſt from his hands.

A. D. 1413.] During theſe tranſactions, des Eſſarts, ſecure in the protection of the dauphin, had returned to Paris, and taken poſſeſſion of the Baſtille*. A report was ſpread through the city, that a deſign was formed to carry off the dauphin, with his own conſent; that des Eſſarts had orders to wait for him, with ſix hundred men at arms, at Vincennes, whither he was to repair under pretence of aſſiſting at a tournament; that the princes of Orleans had troops in readineſs to enſure ſucceſs to the enterpriſe, and to bring back the prince to Paris in a ſituation that would enable him to give law to his enemies. The duke of Burgundy, thinking diſſimulation no longer neceſſary, threw off the maſk, aſſembled his partiſans, while the corps of butchers and other men of blood excited an inſurrection of the people, and, haſtening to the Baſtille, compelled des Eſſarts to ſurrender himſelf to the duke of Burgundy, who pledged his word that no inſult nor injury ſhould be offered him.

Inflated by the ſucceſs of their firſt attempt, this rabble next repaired to the dauphin's palace, and, breaking open the doors, forced a way into his apartment. The leaders of the rebels inſiſted that the traitors who ſurrounded the prince ſhould immediately be delivered into their hands; and they threatened, in caſe of a refuſal, to ſeize and maſſacre them in his preſence. The duke of Burgundy came in the midſt of the tumult, accompanied by the duke of Lorraine, to enjoy his triumph. Notwithſtanding the threats and reſiſtance of the prince, this imperious rebel, and his profligate associates, seized the duke of Bar; John de Vailly, his new chancellor; the lords of la Riviere, Marcoignet, Boissay, and Rambouillet, and several other officers of his household, who were immediately conveyed to the duke of Burgundy's palace, and confined: some of them, indeed, were massacred on the road. The rebels next summoned the duke of Burgundy to give up des Essarts; and that minister was transferred to the Chatelet.

From this moment, the dauphin was kept a close prisoner in the hotel de Saint Paul, and, such was the vigilance of the mob, that it was not possible for him to effect his escape. In a few days after the first insurrection, the insurgents, under the conduct of their leaders, repaired to the palace, where the princes were assembled; and, after pointing out the numerous abuses in the government, the immediate correction of which they demanded, in a tone of authority, they presented a list of proscription, which they compelled the dauphin to receive. This list contained the names of sixty persons, twenty of whom, being present, were instantly arrested, and conveyed to prison. Those who were absent were cited to appear by sound of trumpet, and, in the mean time, the gates of the city were shut, and corps-de-garde posted in every street.

They returned, soon after, in great numbers, and, having secured the three towers of the palace, compelled the king to give them an audience. Pavilly pronounced a studied harrangue, taking for his text—Nisi Dominus custodierit civitatem, frustra vigilat qui custodit eam.—When he had finished his speech, the chancellor asked him, by whose orders he had dared to bring his representations to the foot of the throne. The orator immediately turned to the provost of the merchants and the aldermen, whom the people had forced to accompany them, as if to ask their approbation of his conduct; but these municipal officers, equally fearful of offending their sovereign, and of becoming victims of popular fury, spoke so low as to be wholly unintelligible. Some of the rebels then went down to the palace yard, which was filled with the mob, and desired their confirmation of all that Pavilly had advanced. A party of them immediately rushed into the royal presence, and told the king, that the monk had explained the real sentiments of the people, who were resolved not to disperse till a certain number of persons, whose names they presented in a new list, were delivered up to them.

The duke of Burgundy, affected to remonstrate with the people on the impropriety of their conduct. He represented to them that the king, having but lately recovered his health, the agitation of his mind, on such an occasion as the present, might, probably, cause a relapse. They replied, that they only came for the good of the king and his kingdom, and protested, that nothing should induce them to change their resolution. The duke returned with this answer, and desired that the list which the insurgents had presented, might be read. At the head of it was Lewis of Bavaria, the queen's brother; with the archbishop of Bordeaux; the chancellor; the treaſurer of Aquitaine; the queen's confeſſor; ſeveral other noblemen and officers, and about twenty ladies in the ſervice of the queen and the dauphineſs. The objects of their proſcription were ſeized, and, without diſtinction of rank or ſex, chained two by two, and conducted to priſon. Moſt of theſe captives were conveyed to the Conciergerie; and the king was obliged not only to name twelve commiſſioners to try them, but to iſſue letters under the great ſeal, expreſſing his approbation of the rebellious conduct of the mob.

It is impoſſible for the human imagination to conceive diſorders more dreadful, and cruelties more horrid, than thoſe which were now daily committed in the metropolis of France. Numbers of men and women were hourly committed to priſon, under pretence of entertaining ſentiments inimical to the prevailing faction. No man's life was in ſafety, many of thoſe who had been ſeized by the mob, at the palace, were thrown into the river during the night, or elſe privately maſſacred in their dungeons.

The duke of Burgundy, the chief promoter of theſe troubles, was not himſelf exempt from inquietude. In the tumult and confuſion which prevailed in the city, every thing was to be feared from the mob; a blind monſter, capable of ſacrificing, in the height of its inſenſate rage, the man who lets it looſe and excites it to action. Having once ſet the machine in motion, he was ſoon convinced of his inability to direct it at his pleaſure. Every day the inſurgents compelled the council to aſſent to the abolition of old laws, or the adoption of new ones. Des Eſſarts was ſtill kept in confinement, though, he flattered himſelf with the hopes of a ſpeedy releaſe*. He ſuffered decapitation; his head was ſtuck on a lance.

The dauphin, reduced to deſpair, had applied to the leaders of the Armagnacs to releaſe him from the perilous ſituation in which he was now placed. He had made ſeveral fruitleſs attempts to elude the vigilance of his guards, who never loſt ſight of him for a moment. The duke of Orleans and the leaders of his party received regular information of the proceedings at Paris, as well by letters from the dauphin, as by the means of the duke of Berry, who ſtill remained at court. After ſeveral conferences between themſelves, and after ſeveral meſſages received from the king and the dauphin, it was at length agreed, that ambaſſadors ſhould be appointed by either party, to terminate, by a definitive treaty, the objects of conteſtation which had occurred ſince the peace of Auxerre.

The plenipotentiaries accordingly met at Pontoiſe, and the duke of Burgundy was even obliged to ſend deputies in his own name, being unwilling to complete his diſhonour by openly oppoſing a reconciliation, which was meant to reſtore tranquillity to the kingdom; perhaps, too, he flattered himſelf with the hopes that the ſeditious populace of Paris would prevent the king and the dauphin from accepting the propoſals, and by that means raiſe up an invincible obſtacle to the projected accommodation: in a few days the treaty was reduced into form, and contained, in ſubſtance, a promiſe, on the part of the princes, confirmed by their oaths, to preſerve a ſtrict harmony and good underſtanding with each other, and to live, in future, like true relations and friends; to put a ſtop to all hoſtilities; to diſmiſs their troops; to reſtore ſuch as had been deprived of their places; and to conſign to oblivion all paſt injuries.

This plan of accommodation was ſent by the king to the parliament, who were ordered to deliberate on the propriety of accepting it. The rebel chiefs now made a laſt effort, by repairing to the hôtel de Saint-Paul, and inſiſting, in a tone of inſolence, that the articles of the treaty ſhould be ſubmitted to their inſpection. Meeting with a refuſal, they re-aſſembled on the following day, and ſeized the town-houſe. But although they were formidable from their numbers, and had come to an unanimous determination, that the treaty ſhould be immediately diſcuſſed by themſelves, in order to fruſtrate every attempt at accommodation, yet they could not prevent the adoption of a more juſt and eligible mode of deciſion by a plurality of ſuffrages, to be collected by the officers of the different diſtricts. This was a fatal blow to the Burgundian faction. Three thouſand Burgundians had indeed aſſembled for the purpoſe of ſeizing the palace, but the prudence of the duke of Burgundy, who was conſcious that they muſt be ſoon overpowered, repreſſed their zeal; and peace was publicly proclaimed, at the town-houſe, amidſt the acclamations of the multitude. The government of Paris was reſtored to the duke of Berry; the dauphin reſerved the command of the Baſtille for himſelf, having appointed the duke of Bavaria his lieutenant; and the duke of Bar was made captain of the Louvre. It was publickly reported, and generally believed, that theſe two noblemen were to have been brought to the ſcaffold, the very next day. The brother of John de Troye, an active and dangerous rebel, was ſeized and executed. In his houſe was found a liſt of proſcriptions*, by which no leſs than fourteen hundred perſons, with their families were doomed to die.

Previous to the ratification of the treaty of Pontoiſe, it had been agreed, that none of the princes ſhould enter the metropolis; but the duke of Burgundy had no ſooner retired than the king of Sicily, the dukes of Orleans, Bourbon, and Alençon, and the count of Auxerre, arrived at Paris. We muſt obſerve, however, that the recent conduct of the duke of Burgundy was ſuch, as fully authorized this apparent violation of the agreement. All the officers and miniſters, † This ſanguinary liſt was divided into three parts. Such as were deſtined to be maſſacred, were diſignated by a T, (for Tués, killed) placed oppoſite to their names; thoſe who were to be baniſhed were marked with a B; while an R pointed out ſuch perſons as were to be ſuffered to eſcape on paying a ranſom. who had been indebted for their promotion to the protection of the duke of Burgundy, were now deprived of their places.

Charles d'Albret, on his return to Paris, was reſtored to the dignity of conſtable, though the count of Saint-Paul, by the advice of the duke of Burgundy, refuſed to give up the ſword of office. Clagnent de Brebant was alſo reinſtated in his poſt of admiral of France. The duke of Burgundy, in the mean time, was preparing to repair the diſgrace he had recently ſuſtained. He had written ſeveral letters to the king, aſſuring him that his precipitate retreat was ſolely influenced by the ſituation of his domeſtic affairs, which required his immediate preſence in Flanders: he renewed his proteſtations of attachment to the monarch, and of zeal for the welfare of the ſtate; and farther expreſſed his fixed reſolution rigidly to abide by the conditions of the late treaty. But while he made theſe profeſſions, he was engaged in aſſembling all his forces, both in Burgundy and the Low Countries. The ſtates of Artois voted him a ſupply ſimilar to that which the king annually levied on his ſubjects; he had opened a negociation with the Engliſh court; and ſtill carried on a ſecret correſpondence with his partizans at Paris, many of whom, by diſguiſing their ſentiments, had eluded the vigilance of the oppoſite party. The court of France could not be ignorant of his intentions; indeed he took no pains to conceal them, for ambaſſadors having been ſent to him by the king, to demand the reſtitution of Cherbourg, Caen, and Crotoy, which he ſtill kept in violation of the late treaty, and to forbid him to form an alliance with England, he diſmiſſed them in a diſdainful manner; when they obtained an audience at Liſle, where the duke then was, he did not deign to give them an anſwer, but calling for his boots, immediately mounted his horſe, and ſet out for Oudenarde. Some time after, he ſent a herald to juſtify his conduct, but the king's miniſters very properly interfered, and prevented him from ſubmitting to the degradation of a reply.

A. D. 1414.] During theſe tranſactions, the dauphin evinced a ſtrong deſire to take the reins of government into his own hands; forgetful of the injuries he had ſuſtained and the inſults he had experienced from the duke of Burgundy and his adherents, he wrote to that prince in terms of affection, urging him to repair to Paris, with a ſufficient guard to ſecure his perſon from inſult. This letter was dated in the month of December, 1413. In the following month the queen, accompanied by the king of Sicily, the dukes of Berry and Orleans, and other princes of the blood, went to the Louvre, where the dauphin then was, and, in his preſence, ſeized four noblemen belonging to his court*. The dauphin highly reſented this exertion of authority, and even attempted to call the people to his aſſiſtance, but he was prevented by the princes. Of the four captives, three, the lords of Moi, Brimeu, and Montauban, were releaſed, after a confinement of a few days, on a promiſe never more to approach the perſon of the dauphin. John de Croi, the fourth, was reſcued from his guards.

The dauphin enraged at this detection of his duplicity, ſent letter after letter to the duke of Burgundy, requeſting he would haſten to releaſe him from the captivity in which he was holden. The duke ſpeedily collected a formidable body of troops; and advancing as far as Dammartin, extended his incurſions to the gates of the metropolis.

As ſoon as the princes and the council were apprized of his approach, they reviewed their troops, which conſiſted of eleven thouſand men, and divided them into three bodies. All the gates of the town, except two, were kept conſtantly ſhut. The duke of Burgundy, in the mean time, continued his march to Saint-Denis, where he was received, on a promiſe, which he immediately broke, to do no injury to the inhabitants. His forces conſiſted of two thouſand men at arms, and three thouſand archers, a number wholly inſufficient to attempt the reduction of the capital; but he had greater dependence on the attachment of the Pariſians, than on his own ſtrength. He ſent a herald with letters to the king, the dauphin, and the citizens, who was immediately diſmiſſed by the count of Armagnac. The duke then advanced to the gate of Saint-Euſtache, where he drew up his men in order of battle, hoping the populace would make ſome diverſion in his favour; but the vigilance of the conſtable fruſtrated his plans. The duke ſtill perſiſted in his deſign: he found means, through his emiſſaries, to ſtick up a manifeſto on the cathedral, the palace, and other public edifices, containing proteſtations of his zeal for the welfare of the ſtate. He expreſſed his ſurpriſe that the citizens of Paris, and other loyal ſubjects, ſhould ſuffer their ſovereign to be treated with ſuch ſeverity. Under any other circumſtances theſe reproaches might have excited an inſurrection, but the princes had taken their precautions, with ſo much prudence and care, that not a ſingle individual durſt avow his ſentiments. Corps-de-garde were poſted in every part of the city, as well as on the ramparts. Day and night, bodies of armed men were continually marching through the ſtreets with colours flying. The duke of Berry, as governor of Paris, iſſued a prohibition to all tradeſmen, and artizans, to quit their ſhops and approach the ramparts, under pain of death. At length the duke of Burgundy, having made a laſt attempt to ſtimulate the zeal of his partizans, and finding the vigilance of his adverſaries not to be eluded, retired to his own dominions.

Lewis of Bavaria, the queen's brother, and the lord of Gaucourt, being informed of the duke's retreat, left Paris with a ſtrong detachment of the garriſon, in the hope of coming up with the rear of his army; but when they arrived at Senlis, they learned that he had fled with ſuch precipitation, that he had not even allowed his troops the uſual time for reſt.

Paris ſtill continued to preſerve the appearance of a town that was cloſely inveſted by a powerful enemy; the ramparts were coverſed with ſoldiers; corps-de-garde were poſted at all the gates, and the ſtreets filled with armed men, drawn up in order of battle, ready to act on the firſt ſignal of revolt. Heavy contributions were levied for the paying theſe troops. The chains were taken from the inhabitants, and depoſited in the Baſtille. All the citizens, without exception, had orders to deliver up their arms, and a general prohibition to wear a ſword, or any other offenſive weapon, was publiſhed; and death was proclaimed as the conſequence of diſobedience.

War having been reſolved on by the council, a general aſſembly was convened at the hôtel de Saint Paul, at which the queen, the princes of the blood, the chief nobility, the prelates, and the members of the council attended. The dauphin preſided in the abſence of the king, who was, at this time, indiſpoſed. All the ſubjects of complaint againſt the duke of Burgundy, were here detailed with preciſion and energy. Early in the ſpring the army, conſiſting of two hundred thouſand men, took the field, under the immediate command of the king, who had by this time recovered his health ſufficiently for that purpoſe. From the prince to the private ſoldier, every man wore the Armagnac ſaſh; which greatly diſpleaſed thoſe, whoſe attachment was confined to their ſovereign, independent of all party. It appeared ſtrange, indeed, that ſo powerful a prince as the king of France, ſhould, in his own dominions, and in a war undertaken for the purpoſe of enforcing reſpect to his authority, ſubmit to uſe the ſtandard of his vaſſal. The defence of the capital, during the king's abſence, was entruſted to the duke of Berry, with a body of twelve hundred men at arms.

The campaign was opened by the ſiege of Compiégne, which, after a ſhort reſiſtance, ſurrendered by capitulation. Noyon opened its gates on the firſt ſummons, but Soiſſons made a more obſtinate defence. The attack, however, was conducted with ſuch vigor and ſucceſs, that the garriſon, in a ſhort time, found themſelves reduced to extremities. A courier diſpatched by the governor, to the duke of Burgundy, being intercepted by the beſiegers, they became acquainted with the deſperate ſituation of the place. The offer to capitulate, therefore, was rejected, and the town taken by aſſault, the governor ſuffered decapitation; ſuch of the garriſon as had eſcaped the general maſſacre experienced a ſimilar fate.

While the royal army was in the Vermandois, intelligence was received that a body of Burgundians were on their march to join the duke. The duke of Bourbon, and the conſtable d'Albret, with a detachment of troops, immediately ſet out to meet them, and coming up with them near the banks of the Sambre, obtained a complete victory. The counteſs of Hainaut attempted to promote an accommodation, for which purpoſe ſhe waited on the king at Perronne, accompanied by the duke of Brabant, and by deputies from the different towns of Flanders. Charles replied, That, "if his couſin, the duke of Burgundy, " would come to him, he ſhould experience ſuch treatment as would give him " content; if he wiſhed for juſtice, juſtice ſhould he have, and if mercy was " his object, he ſhould obtain as much of it as would anſwer his purpoſe*." This was the only anſwer they could procure. The army advanced to Bapaumes, which immediately ſurrendered; in this town ſeveral of the Burgundian faction were taken, and among the reſt Caboche, the butcher, who was immediately executed.

Arras was next inveſted. Being a place of importance, every precaution had been taken for enabling it to ſuſtain a long ſiege. It was divided into two parts, the town and the city, and had two governors. The garriſon amounted to twelve hundred men at arms, and ſix hundred croſs-bowmen. All the old men, women, and children, were ſent away; the ſuburbs were burned; new fortifications and freſh batteries were erected; and the walls and towers were ſupplied with cannon.

Notwithſtanding the number of troops employed in the ſiege, ſuch was the ignorance or infidelity of thoſe who conducted it, that two of the gates were left free of acceſs, by which means the garriſon had an opportunity of receiving ſupplies, and of making ſallies to advantage. A general miſtruſt prevailed in the royal army. Several private combats were fought before the walls; mines and counter-mines were ſprung; and the braveſt knights ſignalized their valour, in various encounters.

The artillery was badly ſerved, through the treachery of the perſon to whoſe care it was entruſted; a dearth of proviſions and forage began to be felt by the royal army, as well as by the garriſon; the ſeaſon was far advanced; and the troops were attacked by an epidemic diſorder, which proved fatal to numbers. The counteſs of Hainaut and the duke of Brabant, ſeized the opportunity to renew their propoſals for an accommodation. The king was diſpoſed to lend them a favourable ear, as well from inclination, as from the ſecret inſtigations of the dauphin, who was diſpleaſed with the aſcendency which the duke of Orleans daily acquired, and with the imperious conduct of the count of Armagnac. This diſpoſition of Charles to terminate the war was, it ſeems, well known to the confederated princes, who, of courſe, took great pains to effect a change in his ſentiments. Before the treaty could be finally ſettled, he had a relapſe; but the dauphin, on whom the command thendevolved, haſtened its concluſion. It was agreed, That the keys of Arras ſhould be delivered to the king, and the ſtandard of France hoiſted on the walls of the town; that the duke of Burgundy ſhould ſurrender Crotoi, and diſmiſs from his court ſuch perſons as had incurred the indignation of the king and dauphin; that whatever had been taken by either ſide, during the war, ſhould be reſtored; that all offenſive declarations which had been publiſhed to the prejudice of the duke's honour ſhould be revoked, and that letters of juſtification ſhould be granted him; that he ſhould never go to Paris without permiſſion from the king and dauphin; and that he ſhould renounce his alliance with England. Peace was, accordingly, proclaimed; the troops were diſbanded; and the badges of party, for a while, diſappeared.

But this interval of tranquillity was ſhort: the duke of Burgundy put his troops into cantonments in the Cambreſis, where they lived at diſcretion. The count of Tonnere, one his vaſſals, having eſpouſed the oppoſite party, he marched into Burgundy, pillaged Tonnere, and raiſed the citadel. The Armagnacs, on the other hand, ſurpriſed, a party of Burgundians, and put to death two hundred. The count of Saint-Paul entered the province of Luxembourg, while the companies who had been diſmiſſed by their chiefs made war on their own account, and completed the general deſolation.

The duke of Burgundy had ſtill a powerful party at court. The dauphin, by the treaty of Arras which he had concluded in contradiction to the count of Armagnac, and the confederated princes*, evinced the preference which he gave him over the oppoſite party.

The dauphin intent on taking the government of the kingdom into his own hands, had recourſe to a ſtratagem for his purpoſe. He invited his mother and all the confederated princes to give him the meeting at Corbeil, on a day ſpecified in his letters; and while the whole court repaired to the appointed place, he made the beſt of his way to Paris; ordered the draw-bridge at Charenton to be drawn up the moment he had paſſed it; arrived at the Louvre at five in the afternoon, and commanded the gates of the town to be ſhut. Maſter of the capital, he ſent orders to the princes to retire to their eſtates; the duke of Berry only received permiſſion to return.

His firſt exertion of power was the ſeizure of his mother's treaſures, which Iſabella had placed in the hands of different citizens of Paris; he next compelled his wife to retire to the convent of St. Germain, that he might be at liberty to indulge his appetites, ſurrounded by courtiers, who ſtudied his paſſions at the expence of his honour, he repaid their treacherous ſervices with money appropriated to the ſervice of the ſtate. He undertook the management of the finances himſelf, the command of which was eſſential to ſupport his prodigality; he called an aſſembly of the citizens and municipal officers of Paris, whom he informed of his reſolution no longer to ſubmit to the authority of miniſters. About this time an ambaſſador arrived from the duke of Burgundy, the object of whoſe embaſſy was to requeſt that the dauphin would again take his wife to his bed, and diſmiſs a miſtreſs whom he had choſen to occupy her place. In caſe of a refuſal, he was ordered to tell the prince, that the duke would conſider the treaty of Arras as virtually annulled, and that in caſe of a war with England, neither he nor his ſubjects would take up arms in defence of the kingdom. To this demand the dauphin returned an evaſive anſwer, rather calculated to ſoothe, than to ſatisfy the duke.

A. D. 1415.] While the kingdom was torn by inteſtine commotions, an enemy, not leſs powerful than ambitious, was ſecretly preparing to profit by this complication of misfortunes. Henry the Fifth had ſucceeded his father in the throne of England, and, he had long determined to profit by the diſſentions which prevailed in France for the gratification of his ambition, by the total ſubjection of the kingdom. The claim which he had to advance to France, was, abſurd; whether its validity be tried by the French or the Engliſh doctrine of ſucceſſion. By the former, which excluded all females from the crown, and denied their power of tranſmitting a title to their male poſterity, Henry could not claim a right; by the latter, as advanced by the third Edward, which admitted the excluſion of females, but eſtabliſhed their right of tranſmitting a title to their male poſterity, his pretenſions were not leſs abſurd; becauſe any right to be derived from thence was veſted in the earl of Marche, tranſmitted from queen Iſabella to her ſon, Edward the Third, and from him to that nobleman, by Phillippa, only child of Lionel duke of Clarence, the elder brother of John, duke of Lancaſter, from whom all the pretended rights of Henry were derived. It was not, however, an age in which princes were to be reſtrained from purſuing the projects of ambition by motives drawn from the ſources of reaſon and juſtice. Henry determined to enforce his pretenſions though he concealed his deſigns till they were ripe for execution. He had on his acceſſion opened negociations with the French miniſtry, confirming the truce concluded by the ſecond Richard; but he rendered them fruitleſs, by perpetually varying in his demands, according to the ſituation of the kingdom.

When it was determined to take up arms againſt the duke of Burgundy, Henry thought the national confuſion favourable for his attempts. He ſent ambaſſadors to make a formal demand of the French crown, in virtue of the rights which he derived from the third Edward; this ſtrange propoſal had ſuch an effect on the council that they remained ſilent for a time, as much from ſurpriſe as indignation. The ambaſſadors then declared that their maſter had authorized them to declare that he would content himſelf with the provinces which had been ceded by the treaty of Bretigny, adding only the immediate poſſeſſion and full ſovereignty of Normandy, Anjou and Maine, and ſuperiority of Brittany and Flanders. This laſt propoſal was, probably, the conſequence of a projected alliance, which Henry was then negociating with the duke of Burgundy, but which the treaty of Arras, for the preſent ſuſpended. The Engliſh ambaſſadors again varied in their propoſals; their laſt demand was that the treaty of Bretigny ſhould be ſtrictly fulfilled, one half of Provence, with the counties of Nogent and Beaufort, be ceded to England; and the princeſs Catharine be given to Henry, with a portion of two millions of crowns. The duke of Berry, who preſided at the conferences, offered to reſtore a part of Guienne. The powers of the Engliſh envoys being limited, they left Paris without a deciſion. Neither Charles nor his council could believe that Henry was ſeriouſly bent on war. in the mean time he was occupied in preparations for his intended expedition. He obtained from parliament a ſupply of two-tenths and two fifteenths, and a grant of the lands of all the alien priories in the kingdom; he alſo received a free gift, from the clergy, of conſiderable amount*; after borrowing all the money he could, he pawned his jewels, and even his crown, to make up the neceſſary ſum†. Having aſſembled a great fleet, and a powerful army, he repaired to Southampton, in order to embark for France; but before he had got his troops on board the tranſports that were deſtined to receive them, he diſcovered a dangerous conſpiracy formed to deprive him of the throne. This was ſpeedily quelled, and having inflicted an exemplary puniſhment on the principal conſpirators, and appointed his brother, John duke of Bedford, regent of the kingdom, he ſailed from Southampton, on the 13th of Auguſt 1415, with ſix thouſand men at arms, and twenty-four thouſand archers, and landed ſafe on the coaſt of Normandy, about nine miles from Harfleur. He immediately inveſted that city.

The garriſon of Harfleur conſiſted only of four hundred men at arms. They made a vigorous reſiſtance, but ſo little precaution had been taken to put the fortified towns in a ſtate of defence, that when the place had been beſieged about a fortnight, the garriſon had expended all their powder, and a ſupply having been intercepted by the enemy, they were reduced to extremity. They opened the gates to the enemy on the twenty-ſecond of September. The garriſon were ſuffered to depart, without their arms, on a promiſe to ſurrender themſelves priſoners at Calais, unleſs the king of England ſhould be brought to action, and ſuſtain a defeat, previous to his arrival at that city. The opulent citizens were thrown into priſon, and confined till they paid their ranſom: ſuch as refuſed to abjure their country, and take an oath of fidelity to the conqueror, were ſent to England; and the reſt of the inhabitants, men, women, and children, were all expelled the town; at the gate of which, a part of their cloaths were delivered to them, with five ſols to each perſon to defray the expences of their journey‡. Henry was led to the adoption of theſe rigorous meaſures by the deſign which he entertained of peopling the town entirely with Engliſh.

But though the acquiſition of Harfleur was an object of importance to the king of England, the great loſs which he ſuſtained made it a dear conqueſt. This loſs proceeded leſs from the ſiege, than from an epidemic diſorder which prevailed in the army. In this dilemma, the neceſſity of returning to England was manifeſt to every one; the king ſummoned a council to deliberate on the ſubject. The duke of Clarence gave his opinion for an embarkation at Harfleur; but the Engliſh monarch refuſed to adopt it—as wearing the appearance of flight; and declared that he would rather make his way by land to Calais."* The latter mode was adopted, and every thing prepared for this expedition. †

While the Engliſh were thus engaged in ſettling the mode of retreat, it became a queſtion, at the court of France, whether the defence of the kingdom ſhould be entruſted to the Armagnacs or to the Burgundians. Had the dauphin followed his own inclinations, he, probably, would have delegated that truſt to the latter; but the change in the miniſtry made him give his voice in favour of the oppoſite party. The biſhop of Chartres, the new chancellor of Aquitaine, being an enemy to the duke of Burgundy, and ſtrongly attached to the duke of Berry, engaged the dauphin to ſend for the duke of Orleans and his principal adherents.

The conſtable d'Albret having received intelligence of Henry's deſign to proceed to Calais, formed a junction with the troops under the command of marſchal de Boucicaut, and haſtened to Abbeville, to guard the paſſes on the Somme, which Henry was obliged to paſs. Orders had been diſpatched to the different provinces for all who were able to bear arms, to repair to the royal ſtandard without delay. The duke of Burgundy offered to join the army in perſon, attended by all his forces. This offer, it was not thought prudent to accept.

Henry leaving Harfleur, advanced by ſlow marches, to the banks of the Somme, which he intended to croſs at the ſame place where Edward the Third, before the battle of Creçy, had eſcaped from Philip of Valois; but he found the paſſage ſtopped up by piles ſtuck in the bottom of the river, and defended by the nobles of Picardy, who were drawn up on the oppoſite bank. At Pont Remi

† To reſcue Henry from the charge of imprudence in this particular, Mr. Hume has aſſerted, that having diſmiſſed his tranſports, "he lay under a neceſſity of marching by land to Calais, before he "could reach a place of ſafety." But this aſſertion is evidently abſurd: for, admitting that the tranſports had actually departed, it certainly would have been more adviſeable, in point of expedition, to ſend over to England for tranſports—the diſtance by ſea not exceeding thirty leagues—and wait their arrival; than to attempt a paſſage over a tract of country near two hundred miles in extent, unprovided with guides, unſupplied with proviſions, and purſued and haraſſed by an army which moſt hiſtorians make amount to ten times, and none to leſs than four times the number of his own. It will not be urged that there was no veſſel in the port to ſend over to England; as ſubſequent to the adoption of Henry's propoſal, the duke of Clarence, with the earl of Marche, and many other noblemen, who had ſuffered extremely from the diſorder which had proved ſo fatal to the Engliſh troops, embarked at Harfleur for England, where they went for the recovery of their health; nor will it ſcarcely be contended that Harfleur could not be deemed a place of ſafety, ſince, with ſo ſmall a garriſon, as four hundred men at arms, it had ſuſtained a long and vigorous ſiege; and, after its reduction, Henry had been careful to repair the damage which the fortifications had ſuſtained in the different attacks. This perilous enterprize, therefore, was not the reſult of neceſſity, but of enthuſiaſtic ambition and obſtinate temerity.

and ſeveral other places, where Henry attempted to croſs the river, he was equally unſucceſsful; every paſs was guarded, and every bridge was broken down. His difficulties hourly increaſed, and his ſituation daily became more deſperate. His troops were inceſſantly harraſſed by bodies of horſe which ſcoured the country, and prevented them from foraging; exhauſted by a toilſome march, by ſickneſs, and a dearth of proviſions, their ſpirits were only ſupported by the fortitude of their ſovereign. At length the Engliſh, after having paſſed three weeks on the banks of the Somme, diſcovered a paſs between Peronne and Saint Quentin, which the inhabitants had neglected either to guard or to render impracticable. Henry, after croſſing, purſued his march with celerity. He wiſhed to avoid an action, and neceſſity alone could have induced him to riſk one.

The different bodies of French troops had, by this time, formed a junction with each other; and amounted, by the beſt accounts, to fourteen thouſand men at arms, and forty thouſand infantry; the Engliſh did not exceed a fourth of that number. The two armies came in ſight of each other, in the county of Saint-Paul, not far from the village of Azincourt, where the Engliſh arrived on the twenty-fourth of October. The French generals had repeatedly offered them battle, but Henry contented himſelf with replying that, ſince he had begun his march to Calais, he had never refuſed to engage. On the twenty-ſecond of October a herald at arms was diſpatched to the Engliſh camp, to tell the king that in three days he might expect to be attacked. Henry accepted the challenge without heſitation.

The night before the battle, the Engliſh took up their quarters in the villages of Azincourt, Maiſoncelles, and the adjoining hamlets; when the brightneſs of the moon gave Henry an opportunity of examining the ground with attention, and of fixing on a ſpot for the enſuing engagement, which poſſeſſed local advantages to enable a handful of men to reſiſt a numerous army. This was a gentle declivity, on the ſummit of which ſtood the village of Azincourt, and which was flanked, on either ſide, by a wood. Having taken theſe precautions, he retired to reſt. With the French, all was riot and confuſion; the whole army paſſed the night in the open air, and both men and horſes were numbed with the cold rain which fell from the cloſe of the day to the enſuing morn.

On the morning of Friday, the twenty-fifth of October, 1415, both armies were drawn up in order of battle. The conſtable d'Albret was guilty of an error which nothing could palliate, by occupying the ground choſen for him by the enemy. This preventend him from profiting by that advantage which the ſuperiority of his numbers afforded. In the narrow plains, flanked by the woods, he could neither extend his front ſo as to encircle the enemy, nor employ his numerous cavalry. He drew up his army in three lines; the firſt was commanded by himſelf, and, conſiſted of a choſen band of eight thouſand men at arms, diſmounted, and four thouſand archers; the ſpace they occupied was ſcarcely large enough to contain them; on each wing of this diviſion were poſted five hundred men at arms, who had orders to direct their efforts againſt the Engliſh archers.

Henry had alſo drawn up his army in three lines; the firſt, which was commanded by the duke of York, conſiſted wholly of archers, four deep; each of whom, beſides his bow and arrows, had a battle-axe, a ſword, and a ſtake pointed with iron at both ends, which he fixed before him in the ground, with the point inclining outwards, to protect him from the charge of the enemy's cavalry. The king himſelf headed the ſecond line, accompanied by his youngeſt brother, Humphrey, duke of Glouceſter, the earl mareſchal, and the earls of Oxford and Suffolk. The third line was commanded by the duke of Exeter, uncle to Henry.

The Engliſh monarch rode along the lines, mounted on a white courſer, with a golden crown, affixed to his helmet. Four royal banners were diſplayed before him: he was followed by ſeveral horſes, richly capariſoned, and ſurrounded by the chief officers of his court and army. He ſtrove to encourage his troops. He told them, that the French had determined to cut off three fingers of the right hand of every priſoner whom they ſhould make*; and he declared that every ſoldier in his army, who ſhould, on that day, conduct himſelf with gallantry, ſhould thenceforth be deemed a gentleman, and enjoy the privilege of wearing coat-armour†.

Before the battle began, the two armies ſtood gazing at each other, for a conſiderable time; but Henry, fearing that the French might diſcover the danger of their ſituation, gave the ſignal of attack about ten in the morning. The Engliſh archers let fly a ſhower of arrows among the crowded ranks of the enemy, which did infinite execution; and the French cavalry hemmed in by their own troops, and incommoded by the clayey ſoil, moiſtened by recent ſhowers, were unable to exert their force. A ſecond flight of arrows threw the firſt line of the French into ſome confuſion, which was increaſed by a diſcharge from the bows of two hundred archers, whom Henry, before the battle, had placed in ambuſh in their flank. The battle now became general; when the archers had expended their arrows, they flung their bows, and, ruſhing onwards, attacked the enemy with their ſwords and battle-axes. In vain did the French men at arms attempt to advance; they were effectually ſtopped by the pointed ſtakes which, piercing their horſes brought them to the ground, while the men, inſtead of retiring to the wings, preſſed back on the firſt line of the army, and, by that means, contributed to augment the diſorder which already prevailed in the front. The Engliſh, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, completely broke the firſt line, and forced it off the field.

* Thomas de Elmham p. 61. † Id. ib. Villaret, t. xiii. p. 364.

While the firſt line of the Engliſh were retiring to recover their breath, behind their ſecond line, where Henry commanded in perſon, the duke of Alençon advanced with the ſecond diviſion of the French, in hopes of reſtoring the battle. This ſecond ſhock was more bloody than the firſt; and victory long remained doubtful. Eighteen French knights, who had entered into a ſolemn compact to take the Engliſh monarch, either dead or alive, forced their way through the ranks, and approached his perſon. One of them aimed a blow at his head with a battle-axe, which, though it did not pierce his helmet, for a while deprived him of his ſenſes. He muſt probably have fallen a victim to theſe aſſociates, but for the generous ſpirit of David Gam, and two other Welch officers, who ruſhing between him and his aſſailants, ſacrificed their lives to the ſafety of Henry. When he recovered from the blow, perceiving the three gallant ſoldiers, to whom he was indebted for his preſervation, expiring at his feet, he knighted them as they lay on the field of battle. The French knights were all killed; and the Engliſh king, ruſhed into the midſt of the enemy, attended by his brother Glouceſter, who fought by his ſide. They continued to advance with rapidity, and were ſoon ſeparated from their troops. The duke of Glouceſter was felled to the ground by the ſtroke of a mace, and Henry, covering him with his ſhield, ſuſtained the ſhock of his numerous aſſailants, until the duke of York arrived to his relief. Glouceſter being conveyed from the field, the king renewed the attack, and his troops, bore down all before them.

The duke of Alençon, followed by a few faithful adherents, ruſhed into the midſt of the foe, and cutting his way through the ranks, arrived at the ſpot where Henry was fighting. He called out to the king of England to let him know that he was the duke Alençon; at the ſame inſtant he aimed a blow at his head, which cleft the crown on his helmet; he was on the point of repeating it—his arm was already uplifted, when a ſtroke from the battle-axe of Henry laid him at the feet of his adverſary; the king interpoſed to ſave his life, but in vain, the rage of the Engliſh troops rendered his interpoſition ineffectual. Diſcouraged by the loſs of their leader, the ſecond line made no farther reſiſtance; the third fled without ſtriking a blow.

While the king of England was receiving the congratulations of his nobles, news was brought him that his camp was attacked. He immediately aſcended an eminence whence he could plainly diſtinguiſh the cauſe of this alarm, which proceeded from a ſmall party of troops, who, under the command of Robert de Bournonville, had left the army in the heat of action, to plunder the baggage which the Engliſh had left in Azincourt. The king piqued at this inſult, ordered all his priſoners to be inſtantly put to death, except the princes of the blood and the nobility. The Engliſh troops, evincing a diſinclination to fulfil theſe orders, Henry ſelected two hundred archers, who, running through the ranks, diſpatched the victims.*

The French never loſt, in any battle, ſo many perſons of diſtinction, as in that of Azincourt. Ten thouſand men were left dead on the field, beſides nine thouſand knights or gentlemen, and one hundred and twenty knights-bannerets.

There were ſcarcely a family in France of any diſtinction, that did not loſe ſome of its members. The priſoners, including thoſe who were maſſacred during the attack on the Engliſh camp, amounted to fourteen thouſand men, among whom were the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon. The loſs of the Engliſh was inconſiderable; Villaret makes it amount to ſixteen hundred men. The only perſons of rank, who fell on their ſide, were the duke of York and the earl of Suffolk.

The want of a ſufficient number of troops, and the advanced ſeaſon of the year, prevented the Engliſh monarch from reaping any immediate advantage from his victory, except that of being enabled to purſue, his march to Calais, whither he conducted his ſpoils and priſoners. He embarked for England on the ſixteenth of November, and arrived at Dover the ſame evening.

The duke of Brittany was advancing to join the army, at the head of ſix thouſand men, when he received intelligence of the defeat at Azincourt. To increaſe the general conſternation, the duke of Burgundy entered the province of Champagne, with a numerous army.

In the preſent critical ſituation of affairs, it appeared neceſſary to entruſt the government to ſome perſon of rank and experience, who poſſeſſed ſufficient influence and power to prop, by his own ſtrength, the falling fabric of the ſtate. The duke of Berry was too old, and the duke of Brittany too young, to bear ſo heavy a burden. It was reſolved to call the count of Armagnac to the defence of the kingdom. Two noblemen were accordingly deputed to offer him the dignity of conſtable, and the poſt of prime miniſter. He immediately ſettled a diſpute in which he was engaged with the count Foix, and ſet out for Paris, with a ſtrong body of troops. Meanwhile, theduke of Burgundy ſent ambaſſadors to Paris, with inſtructions to wait on the king and dauphin, and to make them a tender of his ſervices. At the ſame time, he demanded permiſſion to repair to court, and to employ all his forces for the preſervation of the kingdom; the council forbade him to appear at court, unleſs he choſe to come with his uſual retinue; and all the towns on his road had orders to refuſe him admittance; but, that he might have no cauſe to complain of this prohibition, it was extended to all the other princes; the government of Picardy was alſo offered to this turbulent prince, on condition that he ſhould wage war againſt the Engliſh. But the government of a province was too trifling an object to a man who aſpired to the ſovereignty of a kingdom: the duke of Burgundy had determined to profit by the public calamities, to gratify his own private ambition; and this gratification he thought might be beſt promoted by a temporary alliance with England, in the formation of which he was actually engaged at the very time that he made offers of aſſiſtance to the king. If he had founded any hopes of a change in his favour, on the diſpoſition of the dauphin, thoſe hopes were not deſtroyed by the death of that prince, who expired at the Louvre, on the fifteenth of December, 1415. The Duke of Burgundy, ſoon after, ſent to demand his daughter, who was reſtored to him.

* Such is Villaret's account of this tranſaction; but the Engliſh hiſtorians relate it in a different manner. They acknowledge the order to maſſacre the priſoners, but affirm that Henry believed the attack on his camp to be more formidable than it really was; that his order was influenced by ſerious apprehenſions of danger from the number of his priſoners; and that, as ſoon as he found his miſtake, he countermanded it, and put an immediate ſtop to the ſlaughter it had occaſioned. Between theſe different accounts, the reader muſt decide for himſelf. But candour compels us to obſerve, that Villaret attempts to obviate the difficulty with regard to the priſoners, by remarking that Henry might have releaſed them on their parole, with an injunction to join him at Calais. This mode of treating priſoners, he tells us, was very common in thoſe times, when any man who broke his parole was deemed infamous; and he adds, that Henry himſelf had actually releaſed all the priſoners he had brought with him from Harfleur, on the ſame condition, immediately before the battle.

During this time, the count of Armagnac arrived at Paris, and received the conſtable's ſword from the king. Every thing now wore a new face. He was no ſooner in poſſeſſion of power, than he infuſed into every part of the government that inflexibility with which his own character was marked. The capital was kept in a ſtate of continual alarm; every one became an object of ſuſpicion, and the throne was inacceſſible to all but ſpies and informers. Threats and puniſhments, the diſmiſſion of placemen, and the impriſonment of citizens announced the ſeverity of the new adminiſtration. The iſle of France was over-run with troops, who completed the deſolation which the Burgundians had begun. The count confined the envoys of the duke of Burgundy, who, in return, impriſoned thoſe of the count.

The duke of Burgundy inſiſted on being received into Paris with his troops; while his proximity rouſed the zeal of his partiſans. Some of his ſpies were ſeized and executed, for having ſent him word that, in the metropolis, there were five thouſand men, ready to take up arms in his favour. All whoſe fidelity was ſuſpected were baniſhed the city; many, too, ſubmitted to a voluntarily exile, rather than encounter the dangers inſeparable from a revolution produced by violence; for it was univerſally believed that the duke of Burgundy would lay ſiege to Paris. This, however, does not appear to have been his intention, either becauſe he deemed his forces inſufficient for ſuch an enterprize, or becauſe he wiſhed before he made his attack, to ſee the effect of his negociations with England, and of the conſpiracies which his friends were ſecretly forming in the capital.

Ambaſſadors had been ſent to Hainaut to invite the new dauphin, who was then at the court of his father-in-law, to return to the capital; and envoys from the duke of Burgundy arrived there at the ſame time to congratulate him on his acceſſion. The king's ambaſſadors could only obtain a public audience, at which the Burgundian envoys were preſent; while theſe laſt had ſeveral private conferences both with the dauphin and the count of Hainaut. The French miniſters had received orders, from the conſtable, to ſound the dauphin's inclinations, to convince him it was his intereſt to declare againſt the duke of Burgundy, and to intimate that his influence at the court would depend on the preference he ſhould give to the prevailing party. The count of Hainaut diſmiſſed the ambaſſadors without any poſitive anſwer; while the conſtable immediately began to ſtrengthen his party againſt the new dauphin, by oppoſing to him the count of Ponthieu, the king's next ſon, who was created governor of Paris, and duke of Touraine.

The duke of Burgundy ſtill remained with his army in Brie, but, convinced of his inability to make any effectual attempt on the capital, he only waited for an honourable pretext for withdrawing his troops: at his inſtigation, therefore, the dauphin ſent orders to both parties to diſarm without delay; the commands were of courſe obeyed by the duke of Burgundy, who returned to Artois, where he put his troops into cantonments.

The conſtable, who had recently obtained the office of ſuperintendant of the finances, and of governor-general of all the fortreſſes in the kingdom, enjoyed the authority of an abſolute monarch. The exhauſted ſtate of the finances, an inevitable conſequence of the confuſion which prevailed in every department of the government, required freſh reſources on every change in the miniſtry. A general impoſt was now eſtabliſhed from which no claſs of people were exempted. It was ſpecified in the edict, iſſued for this purpoſe, "That the king had, of his "own good will, hitherto exempted the clergy from the payment of all ſubſidies "or taxes; but that now it was his pleaſure, in conſequence of the important "objects he had in view, that no ſuch exemption ſhould obtain, and that no "complaints on the ſubject ſhould be allowed." All aſſemblies, for the purpoſe of remonſtrating againſt this edict, were forbidden. This prohibition was deemed neceſſary, as the prelates had a meeting at Bourges, juſt before the battle of Azincourt, when they remonſtrated with the king on the impropriety of taxing the church. The tax which gave riſe to this clamorous oppoſition was a duty of forty ſols on every barrel of wine!

A. D. 1416.] The emperor Sigiſmund, paid a viſit to the court of France, where he was received with a degree of magnificence that but ill accorded with the poverty of the ſtate; in return for which he undertook to mediate a peace with England. During his reſidence in the capital, a conſpiracy was diſcovered, ſo ſanguinary in its nature, ſo comprehenſively wicked in its extent, as none but ſuch a mind as the duke of Burgundy's could plan, and none but ſuch a heart as his could execute. The partiſans of that prince were ſtill numerous in the metropolis, where they had ſeveral private meetings; and the duke, by means of his emiſſaries, continually incited them to adopt ſome deciſive meaſure. Different bodies of troops, diſperſed about the Iſle of France, had orders to aſſemble, on the firſt ſignal. The conjuncture was favorable, for the conſtable was then abſent in Normandy, employed in repreſſing the incurſions of the garriſon of Harfleur, while the court were lulled in ſecurity. The deſign of the conſpirators was to murder all the partiſans of the Armagnacs; to ſeize the king, the queen, and the chancellor; to load the duke of Berry and the king of Sicily with irons, to ſhave their heads, and, after leading them through the different ſtreets of the city, mounted on bulls, and expoſed to the deriſion of the populace, to maſſacre them, together with all the princes of the blood, and all the noblemen of the party; the ſcene was to be cloſed with the murder of the king. The duke of Burgundy had not only given a verbal approbation to the ſcheme, but had confirmed it by letters, under his own hand, to the leaders of the conſpiracy. After killing the chancellor, it was intended to give the ſeals to William d'Orgemont, who was, next to the duke of Burgundy, the ſoul of the conſpiracy.

This tragedy was to have been exhibited on the night of Eaſter-Sunday; every thing was prepared, and the conſpirators already exulted, by anticipation, in the ſucceſs of their ſchemes, when the hopes of the faction were ſuddenly blaſted, by the wife to a citizen of Paris, who diſcovered the plot. The queen, the princes, and the chancellor haſtened to the Louvre, the only one of the loyal palaces which was then in a ſtate of defence. Tannegui du Chaſtel, provoſt of Paris, immediately collected what troops he could find, and taking poſſeſſion of the market place and the neighbouring ſtreets, where the ſedition was deſtined to begin, burſt open the doors of ſeveral houſes, in which he ſeized the leaders of the conſpiracy, who were ready armed, and waiting for the appointed ſignal; having ſecured theſe villains, he viſited every part of the city, and examined with care all ſuſpected places. While the ſoldiers were employed in conveying to priſon ſuch criminals as they had ſeized, the reſt fled. Some were executed publicly, others were drowned in the night; but d'Orgemont, the moſt criminal of them all, eſcaped with the ſlighteſt puniſhment; as an eccleſiaſtic, he was claimed by the ſpiritual judge, who impoſed a fine of eighty thouſand crowns, and ſentenced him to perpetual impriſonment. He died in the fourth year of his confinement.

During theſe commotions, the conſtable had defeated a detachment of the garriſon of Harfleur, but the news which he received from Paris induced him to conclude a truce with the enemy, that he might haſten his return to court. His preſence inſpired the Pariſians with terror; the citizens were ordered to depoſit their arms at the Baſtille; all meetings of the people were forbidden under the severest penalties; and the grand Butchery, which was considered as the cradle of sedition, was levelled with the ground. Four new butcheries were established in the different quarters of the town. As soon as the constable had restored tranquillity to the capital, he returned to Normandy, to renew the siege of Harfleur. He had engaged a number of Genoese vessels, and a body of Genoese cross-bow-men; the king of Castile likewise supplied him with another squadron; so that when these ships were added to the French they formed a powerful fleet, which, after scouring the English coasts, returned to block up the port of Harfleur, while the army besieged it by land. The news of this enterprize, which France, in her present situation, was supposed to be incapable of forming, astonished Henry, and rendered him less difficult with regard to the terms of the accommodation which the emperor had undertaken to negociate. He even consented to a truce for three years, during which time the foundations of a solid peace might be laid; and offered to deliver the town of Harfleur into the hands of the emperor and the count of Hainaut.

But these propofals were rejected by the constable, who thought himself sure of succeeding in his attempt upon Harfleur. The siege was carried on with incredible ardour, and the place must have been reduced but for the valour of the earl of Dorset. The king of England, finding his negociations ineffectual hastily assembled all the vessels he could collect from the different ports in his dominions, and formed a fleet, which he intrusted to the care of his brother, the duke of Bedford. That prince immediately sailed to Harfleur, where he attacked the French fleet under the command of the viscount of Narbonne. After a long and bloody action, he obtained a complete victory, threw a supply of troops and ammunition into the town, reinforced the garrison, and returned in triumph to Dover. A second victory obtained, some time after, by the earl of Huntingdon, over a French fleet compelled the constable to raise the siege of Harfleur. During these transactions, the duke of Berry died at Paris, in the seventy-sixth year of his age.

The emperor Sigismund still continued to support, in public, the character of a mediator, though he only used it as a veil to conceal his real designs. The advantages which the king of England had just obtained, and the animosity of the rival factions, made him consider the ruin of the monarchy as inevitable. He also flattered himself with obtaining some provinces, which formed a part of the ancient kingdom of Arles, and to which the emperors of the West had preferred some obsolete claims. These were his inducements to conclude an alliance with Henry, previous to his departure from London.

Notwithstanding this alliance Sigismund repaired to Paris, where he delivered to the court of France an account of his mediation, with the affected candour of an impartial umpire. After a short stay, he returned to Calais, where the English monarch was shortly expected.

The duke of Burgundy, ſtill maintained a correſpondence with Henry. He had forborne to form immediate connections with England, but he now adopted a different conduct; and an interview with Henry was appointed to take place at Calais, about the end of September. The court of France diſpatched ambaſſadors to Calais, to diſcover the object of the interview; and to propoſe a ceſſation of hoſtilities till February following, which was accepted by Henry. With regard to the duke of Burgundy, he privately ſigned a treaty of alliance with Henry, by which he acknowledged the validity of that monarch's claim to crown of France, engaged to aſſiſt him in obtaining the kingdom, and to do homage to him as his vaſſal*.

Sigiſmund, during the conferences at Calais, took every precaution for concealing from the French ambaſſadors his treaty with England; by which he had engaged to aſſiſt Henry, with all his forces, in the conqueſt of France, on condition of obtaining the reſtitution of thoſe provinces which had formed a part of the ancient kingdom of Arles. He then returned to Paris, where he again received the thanks of the court for his interpoſition; as ſoon as he had reached his own dominions, he publiſhed a declaration of war againſt France.

The imperious conductof the conſtable excited diſcontents throughout the kingdom; and the preſence of the dauphin, then at Valenciennes, was earneſtly wiſhed for, to counterbalance his authority†. The queen, forced to conceal the hatred which ſhe bore to the count of Armagnac, depended wholly, for the eſtabliſhment of her power, on the return of her ſon. The count of Hainaut was ſolicited to bring the young prince to court, but the negociations for this purpoſe had always failed, becauſe it was required, as a preliminary condition, that he ſhould renounce all alliance with the duke of Burgundy. At length the count was prevailed on to attend the dauphin to Conpiégne, where he had ſeveral conferences with the queen. In the mean time, an order was publiſhed, in the dauphin's name, to compel the different leaders to diſband their troops; but no attention was paid to it.

From Compiégne the court of Hainaut went to Paris, where, he declared, that the dauphin ſhould either repair to court accompanied by the duke of Burgundy, or return to Hainaut. This alternative deſtroying all hopes of a reconciliation, it was reſolved by the council to arreſt the count, but being apprized of their deſign he left the city with precipitation, and returned to Compiegne, where he found the dauphin expiring; ſome authors affirm that his death was occaſioned by an abſceſs in the head, while others aſcribe it to poiſon. Accuſations were retorted by all parties, but the real author is unknown.

A. D. 1417.] Every event which occurred, during this diſaſtrous reign, ſeemed to augment the calamities of the kingdom. The nobility, jealous of the authority enjoyed by the conſtable, obeyed him with reluctance. The people, burdened with taxes, held him in deteſtation. He was aware of the danger of his ſituation, and conſcious that he occupied a poſt ſurrounded by foes. His moſt formidable enemy was the queen, who had retired from the metropolis. Vincennes was the uſual place of her reſidence; her court was chiefly frequented by men of pleaſure.

Charles was almoſt the only perſon in the kingdom ignorant of the depravity of his wife; the conſtable at length reſolved to undeceive the monarch. He had placed ſpies on the conduct of Iſabella, and their obſervations he communicated to the king. Charles haſtened to Vincennes, as he approached her reſidence he met her chief paramour, Lewis Bourdon. This nobleman had juſt left Iſabella, when he met the king, whom he haſtily ſaluted, while his looks betrayed confuſion, and a deſire of avoiding him. The provoſt of Paris conducted him to priſon. Charles inſtantly returned to Paris, without ſeeing the queen. That ſame evening Bourdon was put to the torture, confeſſed more than the king wiſhed to know, was encloſed in a leathern ſack, and thrown into the Seine. All the queen's officers were diſmiſſed, and ſhe herſelf was ſent to Tours, under the care of perſons who were made reſponſible for her conduct. All the treaſure ſhe had amaſſed, and depoſited in different convents, and in the hands of private citizens, were ſeized by a joint order from the dauphin and the conſtable, and appropriated to the public uſe.

New declarations were daily publiſhed againſt the duke of Burgundy and his adherents, in which they were repreſented as public enemies. The duke alſo cauſed manifeſtos to be ſtuck up in all the great towns, in which he threatened to purſue with fire and ſword all ſuch as ſhould ſupport the Armagnacs. The parliament ordered theſe publications to be publicly burnt; the ſentence was executed, but the miſchief was already done. Moſt of the towns in Ponthieu, Picardy, Vermandois, and the Beauvoiſis opened their gates to the Burgundian troops; many other places revolted, and expelled the collectors of the revenue. At Rouen, the populace maſſacred the lord of Gaucourt, the king's bailiff, and his lieutenant, and compelled the other officers to take refuge in the caſtle. The dauphin haſtened to Rouen with a body of troops. He was obliged to negociate with the rebels. The inhabitants admitted the dauphin into the town, and returned to their duty.

The court daily received intelligence of the defection of ſome town, whoſe inhabitants had been ſeduced by the intrigues of the Burgundian emiſſaries. Rheims, Châlons, Troyes and Auxerre opened their gates, and pillaged the offices belonging to the public-receivers, all of whom they maſſacred, without diſtinction or mercy.

While ſuch was the ſtate of France, the king of England landed, on the firſt of Auguſt, 1417, near Touques, in Normandy, with twenty-five thouſand men*, while the duke of Burgundy advanced from another quarter, with ſixty thouſand troops. Henry muſt have been well aſſured that his ally would fulfil the terms of the treaty between them, or he never would have ventured to attempt the reduction of ſuch a powerful kingdom, with a force ſo inadequate. Nor was he deceived by the event: his expedition had leſs the air of a conqueſt than of a peaceable excurſion. Tonque capitulated on the fourth day of the ſiege. From thence Henry ſent a manifeſto to the king, advancing his claims to the crown of France, and demanding the kingdom. After he had ſubdued the country between Harfleur and Caen, he laid ſiege to the latter, which was taken on the ninth of September.

The lord of Cany had been ſent, in the mean time, to Amiens, with an order from the king to the duke of Burgundy, immediately to retire from his dominions. The duke, gave him a written anſwer, in which he diſavowed his alliance with the Engliſh; and obſerved, that a command to diſarm, at a time when France was attacked, proved "the damnable diſpoſition of the traitors who beſieged the throne," who were unable, of themſelves, to reſiſt the enemy. The conſtable had recalled the few troops that were ſtationed in Normandy, as if he wiſhed to accelerate the loſs of that province. Plenipotentiaries had met at Bernouville, but the demands of the Engliſh were ſo exorbitant, that they were rejected. Henry required the hand of the princeſs Catharine, with the kingdom of France for her dower; though he was willing that Charles ſhould enjoy the title and authority of King during his life, on condition that, he ſhould be acknowledged as regent.

Meanwhile the Burgundian army approached the metropolis; all the intermediate towns, either bribed or intimidated, had made no attempt to impede their progreſs. The troops, paſſing the Seine, ſacked pillaged, and burned every place where they met with the ſmalleſt reſiſtance. At length the capital itſelf was inveſted; the duke of Burgundy eſtabliſhed his quarters firſt at Montrouge, and then at Meudon. Hoping to get poſſeſſion of the capital, by means of the ſecret correſpondence which he maintained with his partiſans, he did not preſs the ſiege. Content to confine the attention of the conſtable to the defence of the town, he took the opportunity to cut off all communication between Paris and the provinces.

During theſe tranſactions, the queen was intent on recovering that freedom which ſhe had ſo juſtly forfeited.† Her hatred to the duke of Burgundy had appeared irreconcileable; but it now ſunk beneath the tranſports of an indignation more recent in its date, and not leſs violent. She made no ſcruple to employ the aſſaſſin of the duke of Orleans as the inſtrument of her vengeance. She diſpatched a ſervant to the duke, with a letter, inviting him to releaſe her from captivity. He knew too well his own intereſt to neglect this opportunity; quitting the ſiege of Corbeil, he haſtened to Touraine with eight hundred men. On the duke of Burgundy's arrival, Iſabella, accompanied by her deliverer, took the road to Chartres. In that city ſhe performed the firſt acts of her new adminiſtration, by creating a parliament, which ſhe appointed to ſit at Amiens.

Having formed a plan for getting poſſeſſion of the capital, the duke thought it neceſſary to encourage his partiſans by advancing nearer to the ſcene of action. The conſpirators had engaged to ſecure one of the gates of the city; a furrier, who was privy to the ſcheme, revealed it to the provoſt of Paris. The conſpirators were ſeized, thrown into priſon, and executed.

The duke of Burgundy was within half a league of Paris, when he received the news of this affair. As the ſeaſon was too far advanced to permit him to keep the field with ſo numerous an army, he placed ſtrong garriſons in the towns he had reduced, diſbanded the militia of Artois and Picardy, and led the remainder of his troops to Troyes.

The king of England, in the mean time, continued his victorious progreſs; he ſoon became maſter of Lower Normandy, as far as the banks of the Sartre, which ſeparates that province from Maine, whither his troops extended their depredations. The people fled before them; upwards of twenty five thouſand families retired to Brittany, where they introduced the art of combing wool, and making cloth. The towns were equally deſerted with the villages. When the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of Lizieux, they found but one man and one old woman in the place, who were unable, through illneſs, to follow the reſt of the inhabitants. The duke of Brittany and the queen of Sicily, as guardian to her ſon, the duke of Anjou and count of Maine, concluded a truce with the enemy, in order to defend their dominions from inſult. While the Engliſh were thus advancing into the heart of the kingdom, the prince of Orange was ſent into Languedoc, where he reduced moſt of the towns, and having aſſembled the ſtates compelled them to acknowledge the authority of the queen and the duke of Burgundy. But the count of Foix, having been appointed, by the dauphin, to the government of that province, expelled the Burgundians.

A. D. 1418.] At Rouen the inhabitants again revolted, expelled the king's officers, and, corrupted by the Burgundian emiſſaries, hoiſted the ſignal of faction. The count of Aumale, governor of the town, took refuge in the caſtle, where the rebels compelled him to capitulate. Henry, having received a reinforcement of troops from England during the winter, almoſt completed the reduction of Normandy. Of the whole province, the only towns which remained to be ſubdued were Rouen and Cherbourg.

The news of ſuch repeated loſſes filled with conſternation all ſuch as had the real intereſt of their country at heart. The only means of preventing the total ruin of the kingdom appeared to be the union of the court with the queen and the duke of Burgundy. For effecting this deſirable purpoſe deputies from either party met at the village of La Tombe. The project of a pacification was drawn up, to which the queen and the duke of Burgundy conſented. It was alſo approved by the dauphin and the council. By this it was agreed that the queen ſhould repair to court, and that the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy ſhould be aſſociated in the government of the kingdom.

During theſe negociations the conſtable was engaged in the ſiege of Senlis, which he preſſed with ſuch vigor that the governor had agreed to ſurrender the place, unleſs relieved within a limited time. Having apprized the count of Charolois of his ſituation, that prince ſent John of Luxembourg, to his relief, who arrived within a league of Senlis, the night before the day appointed for the ſurrender of the place. On the enſuing morn, the conſtable ſummoned the governor to fulfil the terms of the capitulation, and on meeting with a refuſal, put to death ſix of the hoſtages who had been delivered to him to enſure its performance. The governor immediately maſſacred ſix-and-forty priſoners, whoſe heads he threw over the walls. The conſtable raiſed the ſiege, and haſtened to the capital, where his preſence had become neceſſary.

On his return, all hopes of accommodation vaniſhed; he perſuaded the dauphin of the impropriety of conſenting to a treaty which placed the duke of Burgundy on the ſame footing with himſelf. The treaty was rejected. He declared, that thoſe who could adviſe the dauphin to ſign ſuch an act, ought to be conſidered as traitors and enemies to the ſtate.

Perrinet le Clerc, the ſon of an ironmonger at Paris, reſolved to make the Burgundians maſter of the capital. He communicated his intentions to Liſle-Adam, who was then at Pontoiſe. This conſpiracy eſcaped the vigilance of the government. The father of Perrinet, being a municipal officer, was entruſted with the care of the gate Saint-Germain. In the night of the twenty eighth of May, Liſle-Adam arrived before the walls of Paris, with eight hundred men at arms; he was admitted into the city by le Clerc, who had taken the keys of the gate from under his father's pillow, while he was aſleep. As ſoon as Liſle-Adam had entered with his troops, he threw the keys over the ramparts, that none might eſcape his vengeance. He then advanced, in ſilence, to the Châtelet, where he was joined by five hundred citizens, who exclaimed—"Peace, peace! Long live Burgundy!"

The Burgundians ſpread over the different parts of the city. The populace following the troops, joined in the acclamations of—"Peace, peace! Long live Burgundy!—Liſle-Adam repaired to the palace, and having burſt open the gates, forced way into the king's apartment, and compelled Charles to mount on horſe-back, in order to be exhibited to the people; while the other leaders of the rebels, ſeconded by the populace, ran to the houſes of the chancellor, the miniſters, and principal officers, all of whom were loaded with chains and thrown into priſon. Tanneguy du Chaſtel, provoſt of Paris, rouſed by the clamours of the mob, aroſe with precipitation, and putting on his armour, flew to the dauphin's reſidence; ſeizing that prince, who was ſcarcely awake, in his arms; he had the good fortune to reach the Baſtille, with his burden. During this time the conſtable had taken refuge in the houſe of a maſon, where, diſguiſed in the dreſs of a beggar, he had leiſure to reflect on the viciſſitudes of fortune.

When the day appeared, the ſtreets were filled with an immenſe crowd of people, bearing on their cloaths, the red croſs of Saint Andrew. The houſes were broken open, and expoſed to depredations. Guy de Bar, the new provoſt of Paris, at the head of an armed troop, authorized theſe proceedings. While ſome of the rabble were laden with the ſpoils of their fellow-citizens, others were conducting to priſon, the devoted victims of their malice or revenge. The ſtricteſt ſearch was made after the conſtable; the maſon was induced to give him up; he was inſtantly conveyed to the Châtelet, and from thence to the priſon of the Conciergerie.

The mareſchal de Rieux, Tanneguy du Châtel, Barbazan, and the other noblemen who had, at firſt, fled for ſhelter to the Baſtille, conveyed the dauphin from thence to Melun. Two days after their eſcape they returned to Paris with ſixteen hundred men, in the hope of taking the Burgundians by ſurpriſe and releaſing the conſtable. When they came to the Hotel de Saint-Paul they learnt that the king had been removed to the Louvre; a deſperate action, however, took place in the Rue Saint-Antoine, in which the Burgundian troops being joined by the ſeditious rabble, overpowered the Armagnacs, and compelled them to retire, after killing four hundred, and taking ſeveral priſoners, who were immediately maſſacred. A deputation was then ſent by the rebels to the dauphin to engage him to return to the capital, but he had left Melun before the meſſenger arrived there. The Baſtille was ſurrendered by capitulation.

The noblemen attached to the dauphin, collected a ſmall body of troops, and again appeared before Paris. At this time, a ſtrong party of the Paris militia, conſiſting chiefly of butchers, who had long been abſent on predatory excurſions, returned to the capital. They reported that the friends of the dauphin only waited for an opportunity to ſurprize the town, exterminate the Burgundians, and releaſe the conſtable with all the other priſoners. Theſe rumours, were encouraged by Liſle-Adam, and other leaders of the Burgundian faction. The queen, and the duke of Burgundy, who were then at Troyes, being informed of the ſucceſs of their plans, ſent a meſſage to their confidental friends, intimating that the annihilation of the oppoſite party would be the only effectual method of eſtabliſhing their own authority; and that, without that, they durſt not venture to come to Paris.

On the twelfth of June, the populace, forced open the doors of the priſons, murdered the goalers and guards, made the priſoners walk out one by one, and maſſacred them as they paſſed, Armagnacs, Burgundians,* criminals, debtors, all were butchered without diſtinction of rank, age, or ſex. Not a priſon nor dungeon eſcaped the malignity of theſe ruffians. The grand Châtelet made a vigorous reſiſtance; its inhabitants aſcended the towers, and attempted to repel the attacks of the mob; for ſome time they exhibited the ſight of priſoners ſuſtaining a ſiege; at length, however, the building having been fired in different parts, they were compelled to ſurrender. The rabble then forced theſe victims to precipitate themſelves from the tops of the towers into the ſtreets below, on pikes which they held to receive them. In the court-yard of the palace, and in the environs of the gates of Paris, the mob ſtood "up to their ancles in human blood!"† When the barbarians had cleared the priſons, they ſpread over the different parts of the town; not a ſtreet but was the ſcene of numerous murders; whoever wiſhed to get rid of an enemy, a rival, or a creditor, had only to point him out as an Armagnac, and he was inſtantly diſpatched. The conſtable, the chancellor, and his ſon, the biſhop of Coutances, were faſtened together with a cord, and dragged round the city on three ſucceſſive days, expoſed to the inſults and deriſion of an inſolent rabble; leaders of the Burgundians, at the head of two thouſand men at arms, attended theſe executions, and encouraged the rabble. Revenge was ſharpened by intereſt; every chief of the faction gained more than an hundred thouſand crowns, by this revolution. Three thouſand five hundred men were maſſacred during the three firſt days of the tumult; among whom were the conſtable, the chancellor, ſeven prelates, a great number of the nobility, and many of the judges of the parliament. When all the miſchief was done, a prohibition to pillage was iſſued; the mob, however, paid little attention to an order, which they knew was given only to preſerve appearances.

The queen and the duke now made their triumphant entry into the capital. The ſtreets, ſtill ſtained with blood, ſhed in their quarrel and by their orders, were ſtrewed with flowers; and re-echoed with the ſounds of muſical inſtruments. Iſabella appeared in a car richly decorated. She alighted at the Hôtel de Saint-Paul, where her huſband awaited her arrival. The ſenſeleſs monarch received his conſort as a beloved wife, and his treacherous kinſman as an affectionate friend.

The object of the tumult being accompliſhed, it, at length, became neceſſary to reſtore order. Since the commencement of the revolution, the parliament, and other ſuperior courts, had diſcontinued their functions. Moſt of the judges had been maſſacred or compelled to fly the capital. By an order of the council, the different juriſdictions were ſuppreſſed, and the power of appointing new ones was veſted in the king. All the officers of the king's houſhold were changed. The queen and the duke were reſolved not to leave one of the oppoſite party in poſſeſſion of any place or power.

All perſons ſuſpected of entertaining ſentiments hoſtile to the prevailing faction were apprehended, ſo that the priſons, in a ſhort time, again overflowed with victims of party-rage. The troops who were ſtationed in the vicinity of the metropolis, by intercepting the proviſions, occaſioned a ſcarcity that revived the fury of the people. Means, were found to perſuade the multitude that the Armagnacs were the authors of the famine. The maſſacres were renewed, and the priſons were once more made to flow with blood. The ferocious rabble now headed by Capeluche, hangman of the town. He ordered and ſuperintended the executions; dictated laws, and compelled obedience. Having forced an entrance into the palace, the duke of Burgundy advanced to meet him, and after ſhaking hands, theſe worthy aſſociates conferred together for ſome time. The people having cleared the priſons, inſiſted that all the captives who were confined in the caſtle of Vincennes ſhould be delivered to them; and their requeſt was no ſooner complied with, than they put them all to death. In this ſecond maſſacre, fourteen thouſand perſons (of which five thouſand were women) were ſuppoſed to be ſlain.

The Pariſians had, by this time, become ſo ungovernable, that the duke of Burgundy began to be alarmed. His ſafety depended on putting a ſtop to diſorders which might finally be turned againſt himſelf. For this purpoſe he drew up his troops, and ſeized the principal leaders, who were publicly executed; even his friend Capeluche was not ſpared. He embodied ſix thouſand of the moſt turbulent, and ſent them to lay ſiege to Montlhery and Marcouſſy, whoſe garriſons extended their incurſions to the very gates of Paris. Captains were appointed to command them; but on the approach of Tanneguy du Châtel, with a body of regular troops, they fled with precipitation. When they attempted to return to Paris, the gates were ſhut againſt them.

The kingdom of France was now reduced to ſuch a ſituation that every change proved a new ſource of calamities.* Moſt of the principal towns opened their gates to the Burgundians. The chains were replaced at the ends of the ſtreets of Paris. The arms taken from the citizens by the count of Armagnac were reſtored. In ſhort, the duke of Burgundy ſpared no pains to conciliate the affection of the Pariſians. He was ſeconded by the pope's legates, who had conſiderable influence as well over the parliament as over the univerſity, from the favours which thoſe bodies hoped to obtain from the court of Rome. During theſe tranſactions, the dauphin had left Melun, and repaired to Bourges, where he was joined by a number of the nobility, who had reſolvdd to devote their lives and fortunes to his ſervice. Beſides thoſe officers who were perſonally attached to him, all ſuch as were uninfected by the ſpirit of party acknowledged in him the ſole heir to the crown, the rights of which were veſted in his perſon during the incapacity of the monarch. The dauphin now aſſumed the title of Regent. He appointed a chancellor and inſtituted a parliament, which was chiefly compoſed of the magiſtrates who had eſcaped the maſſacre of Paris. This court was ſoon after transferred to Poitiers. The chamber of accompts, eſtabliſhed at Bourges, at the ſame time, continued to ſit there, till ſome years after the acceſſion of Charles the Seventh. The queen and the duke of Burgundy were earneſt in their ſolicitations to the dauphin to return to Paris; and it was propoſed to ſend his conſort to him, in the hopes of inducing him by that mark of attention, to accept the invitation; but theſe attempts to promote a reconciliation occaſioned no ceſſation of hoſtillties; the war ſtill continued, though on very unequal terms, ſince the duke of Burgundy had exerciſed the ſovereign authority. Melun and Meaux were almoſt the only places of conſequence, near the iſle of France, which ſtill remained true to the dauphin. The Burgundians gained poſſeſſion of Coucy, through the treachery of a girl, who was kept by the governor. The garriſon being compelled to leave the place, put themſelves under the command of Stephen Vignolles, ſurnamed la Hire, and Poton de Xaintrailles. Theſe two warriors, at the head of forty lances, attacked and defeated four hundred men at arms, commanded by the lord of Longueval. Some days after this heroic atchievement, they obtained a ſimilar advantage over two thouſand men led by Saveuſe. Soiſſons and Compiégne were taken and ſacked.

The duke of Brittany had made a journey to Paris, to mediate a peace between the contending parties; and his exertions, determined the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy to appoint plenipotentiaries for regulating terms of accommodation*. The plan of a treaty was drawn up, to which the queen and the duke aſſented; to induce the dauphin to ſign it, the duke of Brittany went to Angers, where the prince then was, and took with him the dauphineſs, who, ſince the laſt commotions, had been detained at Paris. But moſt of the nobles who were attached to the dauphin rejected with diſdain a treaty which authorized the duke of Burgundy to ſhare the ſupreme authority with the lawful heir to the throne. moting a peace, returned to Paris with the news, and then haſtened back to his own dominions.

The Engliſh, during this time, met with no obſtacles to impede the progreſs of their arms. An Engliſh officer, with only ſixty men, croſſed the Seine, in the middle of the day, in ſight of Graville, who was poſted on the oppoſite bank, with eight hundred men at arms, and twelve thouſand militia, who fled at the approach of the enemy. This cowardice, or treachery, occaſioned the loſs of Pont de l'Arche. Cherbourg, after a ſiege of three months, ſurrendered to the duke of Lancaſter.

Henry now haſtened to complete the reduction of Normandy, by inveſting the capital. The inhabitants determined to make the moſt vigorous reſiſtance; not doubting, but that the duke of Burgundy, who had already ſent ſome troops to their aſſiſtance, would exert the whole force of the kingdom, to ſave a place of ſo much importance. Meſſengers were ſent to inform that prince of the approach of the enemy, and the duke aſſured them that they might rely on ſpeedy relief.

The ſiege of Rouen filled with conſternation the inhabitants of Paris. The parliament held a meeting on the occaſion, which was attended by the members of the univerſity, and the principal citizens†, when a deputation of magiſtrates was ſent to the king to entreat him to provide effectual means for the relief of Rouen and the ſafety of the metropolis. The anſwer they received was, that the king and the duke of Burgundy were about to leave Paris for that purpoſe; in fact, the court did remove to Pontoiſe, but rather from the dread of the contagious diſorder, which had not yet leſs the capital, and with the view of getting rid of the importunate remonſtrances to which they were hourly expoſed, than with any deſign of accompliſhing the grand objects, to which the magiſtrates had endeavoured to call their attention.

The Duke, who, a ſhort time before, when his attacks were directed againſt his king and country, had appeared at the head of ſixty thouſand men, now that he had become abſolute maſter of the government, and had the ſole and entire diſpoſal of the revenue and the forces of the ſtate, could not muſter an army, ſufficiently ſtrong to retard the operations of the king of England, who had beſieged Rouen with leſs than twenty thouſand men. Entruſted with the defence of the kingdom, he ſeems to have confined his attention to the preſervation of the metropolis, and of ſuch other places as reſiſted the efforts and intrigues of the dauphin's party. His troops, inſtead of promoting any object of public utility, encreaſed the dearth of proviſions in the capital, by incurſions into the country. The Duke's conduct was the conſequence of the poſition into which he was thrown by his inſidious policy. Since the late revolution had delivered the king and and the government into his hands, he was no longer intereſted in the ſucceſs of Henry. The conqueſt of Normandy ſeemed but as a prelude to the total reduction of the kingdom; and the duke of Burgundy, having every thing to fear from the king of England, had powerful motives for wiſhing to impede the progreſs of his arms. On the other ſide, the dauphin, who was wholly influenced by the houſe of Orleans, gave him no leſs ſubject for inquietude and alarm. He could not act againſt the enemies of the kingdom, without leaving his own perſonal enemies at full liberty to act againſt himſelf; and to preſerve the advantages he had obtained over theſe laſt, he muſt abandon the defence of his country. With a man of his principles the choice ſcarcely admitted of a doubt; beſides, he was influenced by a motive ſtill more powerful than any we have yet noticed; this was the apprehenſion that the king of England might render him an object of public indignation, by publiſhing the ſecret treaty which he had concluded with that prince at Calais. Thus was the duke of Burgundy, caught in his own ſnares.

Henry concerted all his meaſures with prudence and circumſpection. While he liſtened to every propoſal for an accommodation, he purſued his conqueſts with ardour. Convinced that he was only indebted to the duke of Burgundy's fears, for his forbearance to oppoſe him, he took care to encreaſe them, by pretending to lend a favourable ear to the offers of a ſeparate alliance with the dauphin. He appointed fourteen perſons to confer with the deputies of that prince. The conference took place at Alençon; but the dauphin's ambaſſadors could never extort from the Engliſh miniſters a fair explanation of their maſter's pretenſions. The conferences were terminated; but the dauphin, wrote to the king of England, deſiring an interview. Henry, who was then engaged in the ſiege of Rouen, replied, that as ſoon as the town was reduced, he would appoint a place for that purpoſe.

The city of Rouen which had ſuſtained a ſiege of four months, was, by this time, reduced to the laſt extremity. The inhabitants had ſignalized their courage and fidelity; and had they not been betrayed by the miniſtry, all the efforts of Henry to reduce them would have proved unſucceſsful. Before the enemy's approach they had burned the ſuburbs; but at the commencement of the ſiege, the Engliſh took the fort of Saint-Catharine; and ſoon after the reduction of Caudebec rendered them maſters of all the paſſes on the Seine, the paſſage whereof they completely cloſed by a triple row of iron chains; the firſt of which was ſunk in the river, the ſecond was placed on a level with the ſurface, and the third raiſed two feet above the water. The navigation was no ſooner interrupted than a dearth of proviſions was felt in the town. Though the enemy had not inveſted Rouen till the end of Auguſt, all the proviſions were conſumed by the month of October. Guy Bouteiller, the governor, who had been appointed by the Burgundian party, had totally neglected the neceſſary precautions as well for ſupplying the town with proviſions, as for defending it from the attacks of the enemy. Every part of his conduct proved him a traitor who had long ſince ſold himſelf to the king of England, to whom he tranſmitted a regular account of the proceedings of the inhabitants.

Henry, enraged at the obſtinacy of their defence, threatened them with extermination, unleſs they ſpeedily ſurrendered. He ordered gibbets to be erected, round the walls of the city, to which were ſuſpended all the priſoners he had taken.* But ſuch barbarous conduct, far from intimidating the inhabitants, only ſerved to excite their indignation, and to render more frequent thoſe impetuous ſallies which often carried deſtruction even to the royal tent. A breach was no ſooner made than repaired; and the brave Normans evinced a reſolution to bury themſelves beneath the walls of their capital, ſooner than ſurrender it to the enemy.

At the end of November the ſiege was no farther advanced than on the firſt day. The king of England informed of the ſituation of the inhabitants, reſolved no longer to preſs the attacks with ſo much vigour, from a conviction that the place muſt ſoon be reduced, by famine: fifty thouſand of the inhabitants periſhed during the ſiege. Twelve thouſand perſons of both ſexes were diſmiſſed the town, as uſeleſs mouths; but the beſiegers refuſed them a paſſage through their camp, and drove them back into the ditches, at the foot of the ramparts, where they remained expoſed to the weather, to hunger and thirſt, and to the balls and arrows of the enemy, as well as to thoſe of their own countrymen. Baſkets were let down by the inhabitants from the top of the walls, to receive ſeveral new-born infants, of which the women were delivered in the ditch; as ſoon as baptiſm had been adminiſtered to the innocent victims, they were returned to their expiring parents†, leſt their ſtay might encreaſe the dearth of proviſions which prevailed in the city.

Six deputies, having eluded the vigilance of the beſiegers, repaired to Paris, where they repreſented the horrors of their ſituation in ſuch ſtrong terms, that the Parliament appointed a number of magiſtrates to ſecond their remonſtrances to the king and the duke of Burgundy. The duke gave them his word of honour that he would immediately march, in perſon, againſt the Engliſh. The Arrierre-ban had been publiſhed; the orders to take up arms were repeated in the provinces, and the court advanced to Beuvais, which had been fixed on as the rendezvous of the troops. But all this vain pomp of preparation ended in an impotent attack on the Engliſh army, by a detachment of eighteen hundred men, who were repulſed with conſiderable loſs.

Still the inhabitants of Rouen did not loſe courage. They were chiefly excited to this ſpirited reſiſtance by Alain Blanchard. Under his conduct, ten thouſand of the citizens agreed to make a deſperate ſally; a part of them had already reached the enemy's camp, when the bridge ſuddenly gave way, (the perfidious governor having previouſly cauſed the wood by which it was ſupported to be ſawed nearly through) and let all thoſe who were upon it fall into the river; the reſt were obliged to return to the city. At length the inhabitants, wholly unable to hold out any longer, ſent, for the laſt time, to ſummon the king either to relieve them, or elſe to abſolve them from their oaths of fealty and allegiance. The duke of Burgundy poſitively promiſed, that the French army ſhould appear before the walls of Rouen, the day after Chriſtmas-day; but when the time came, he ſent them word that it was impoſſible to afford them any aſſiſtance, and that, therefore, they had only to make the beſt terms they could with the king of England.

A. D. 1419.] Henry, at firſt, inſiſted that they ſhould ſurrender at diſcretion; but the inhabitants unanimouſly declared, that ſooner than ſubmit to ſuch a degradation, they would all meet death in one general ſally, after ſetting fire to the city in various places. The king, informed by the governor of this deſperate reſolution, granted them more favourable terms. The articles of capitulation were accordingly drawn up, by which it was agreed that the garriſon ſhould march out of the town without arms; that the inhabitants ſhould pay, at two inſtallments, the ſum of three hundred thouſand crowns, by way of ranſom; and that they ſhould take an oath of allegiance to Henry, as their lawful ſovereign; that they ſhould enjoy all the privileges which had been granted them as well by ſuch kings of England as had been dukes of Normandy, as by the kings of France, to the time of Philip of Valois; and that a certain number of citizens, among whom was Alain Blanchard, ſhould be delivered to the king*. Henry, dreading this courageous demagogue, ordered him to be immediately executed†: in his laſt moments he diſplayed a degree of firmneſs and intrepidity, which ought to have made the king bluſh for his cruelty.

The reduction of the capital was followed by the ſurrender of the few places in Normandy which had not yet ſubmitted; Château-Gaillard, a fortreſs ſituated upon the Seine, near Andely, was the only place which ſtill ventured to reſiſt. It ſuſtained a ſiege of ſixteen months; nor would the governor, Mauny, conſent to yield, till all the cords for drawing water were entirely worn out, when the garriſon had nothing to drink. Meanwile the approach of the Engliſh alarmed the capital, where famine had ſucceeded the horrors of aſſaſſination and peſtilence. The courſe of the Seine, both above and below Paris, being commanded by the enemy and by the garriſon of Melun, who had declared in favor of the dauphin, all communications with the provinces was ſtopped. The dauphin opened a negociation, with the Engliſh, at Alençon, and with the Burgundians at Montereau; while the Burgundians themſelves were alſo negociating with him and with Henry.

Whether the duke of Burgundy ſtill entertained hopes of procuring a reconciliation with the dauphin, or whether he only wiſhed to intimidate him, he renewed the negociations with the Engliſh, whoſe plenipotentiaries repaired to Troyes, with freſh propoſals from their ſovereign. It was reſolved that the two kings ſhould have an interview between Meulan and Pontoiſe; and this reſolution was communicated to the dauphin, who was invited either to attend in perſon, or elſe to ſend plenipotentiaries who might, in his name, accede to the treaty meant to be concluded. The French court repaired to Pontoiſe, while Henry advanced to Mantes. The king, having had a freſh relapſe, was left at Paris. The princeſs Catharine accompanied the queen. A field, encloſed with a double palliſade, was choſen for the interview. An equal number of Engliſh and French troops had orders to poſt themſelves at an equal diſtance from the ſpot.

When the neceſſary precautions for their mutual ſafety had been taken, Iſabella, the princeſs, and their retinue, accompanied by the duke of Burgundy and the miniſters, entered a magnificent pavillion which had been erected for their reception, where they found Henry. This firſt interview paſſed in mere compliments. The queen perceived the impreſſion which her daughter had made on his heart; and thinking that abſence might tend to irritate his deſires, ſhe reſolved not to let Catharine attend the conferences in future. Henry though he had conceived an affection for the princeſs, made love ſubſervient to ambition. "Fair "couſin," ſaid he, to the duke of Burgundy, "*we wiſh you to know that we will "have the girl, and the dower we demand with her, or elſe we will expel your king and "you from this kingdom." The duke ſuffering his intereſt to ſubdue his ſpirit, contented himſelf with obſerving, that before Henry could accompliſh that object he would be tired of the war.

But while the king of England was dictating the terms of peace, the dauphin, who foreſaw the inevitable ruin of the country from the projected accommodation, diſpatched Tanneguy du Châtel to Pontoiſe, with orders, at all events, to break off the conferences. He bribed all the confidential friends of the duke of Burgundy, and engaged the lady of Giac, of whom that prince was enamoured, to ſecond his endeavors. All the obſtacles which had hitherto prevented a reconciliation with the dauphin were ſuddenly removed; and the duke conſented to a treaty, and left the prince maſter of the conditions. All that remained to be done was to deceive the enemy, to amuſe them ſome time longer, and then to ſtart ſome pretext for a rupture. The conferences were, accordingly, continued, during which the duke concluded his ſecret treaty. Every thing being ſettled, he left Pontoiſe, and went to Corbeil, between which place and Melun, he had an interview with the dauphin.

The treaty, ſigned by the two princes and the principal noblemen of either party, was carried to Paris, and preſented to the parliament by the archbiſhop of Sens. It contained a general amneſty for all paſt tranſactions; and ſtipulated that the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy ſhould jointly govern the ſtate, and unite their forces for the expulſion of the Engliſh from France: the Pariſians teſtified their ſatisfaction on the occaſion by public rejoicings; and their example was followed, by all the principal towns in the kingdom.

Henry had not conceived it poſſible that a reconciliation could take place between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy; but the late treaty deſtroyed thoſe hopes which he had founded on the diſſentions prevailing between the rival parties. Far from being in a ſituation to oppoſe the undivided forces of France, his army, which did not exceed twenty-five thouſand men, was ſcarcely ſufficient to defend all the places he had reduced. His own dominions, too, were threatened with an attack from the Scotch; while the kings of Caſtile and Arragon, intent on aſſiſting their ancient ally, had ſent an army into Béarn, for the purpoſe of inveſting Bayonne, and equipping a fleet, to convey a body of auxiliaries to France. Courage and diſſimulation were the arms which Henry oppoſed to this combination of difficulties. Willing to gain time, he propoſed new terms, and by lengthening out the negociations, procured leiſure for ſettling his plans. On the twenty-ninth of July the truce expired, and in the night of the thirtieth the duke of Clarence took Pontoiſe by aſſault. Liſle-Adam, the governor, eſcaped in his ſhirt. As the court had reſided for ſome time in this town, and had but juſt left it, the Engliſh found the greater part of the baggage of the princes and nobility. The booty is ſaid to have amounted to upwards of two millions of crowns.* The enemy being maſters of this poſt, ſpread themſelves over the Iſle of France, and inſulted the ſuburbs of Paris. The queen and the duke of Burgundy conducted the king to Troyes, leaving the capital, which was but ſcantily ſupplied with proviſions, and ill-diſciplined troops, under the government of the young count of Saint-Paul.

But notwithſtanding theſe calamities, the moſt flattering hopes were conceived from the recent union of the royal family; all eyes were fixed on the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy: the fate of France depended on their conduct. It is impoſſible to ſay, whether their reconciliation was ſincere; but they did not long perſiſt in the ſentiments profeſſed on ſigning the treaty. The duke of Burgundy appeared loth to fulfil the principal condition, by which he had engaged to employ all his forces againſt the Engliſh. This inactivity, the conduct of Henry, with whom he had juſt entered into a freſh negociation; the reduction of Pontoiſe, and the retreat of the court at Troyes, formed a combination of circumſtances that expoſed him to ſuſpicions of treachery.

The two princes had agreed to meet, on the eighteenth of Auguſt, at Montereau; but when the time approached they both evinced repugnance to the interview.* The dauphin's friends repreſented to him, that he riſqued the ſafety of the ſtate by expoſing his perſon to the faith of a prince, already ſtained with the guilt of murder, committed in violation of the moſt ſolemn oaths; of a prince, who, for the long ſpace of twelve years, had rendered France a ſcene of horrors and of crimes. The irreſolution of the duke of Burgundy proceeded from different motives; fear and miſtruſt were familiar to a mind, goaded by the ſtings of conſcience: he delayed, as long as poſſible, this fatal interview, which was, firſt, put off to the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, and, afterward, to the tenth of September. The dauphin, meanwhile, inceſſantly ſolicited the duke no longer to defer a meeting on which the ſafety of the ſtate depended. Tanneguy du Châtel went ſeveral times to Troyes for the purpoſe of removing every obſtacle. Sometimes he evinced a diſpoſition to yield to their ſolicitations, but his fears ſoon returned: it is ſaid that a Jew, named Mouſque, who was verſed in judicial aſtrology aſſured him, "that if he went to Montereau, he would never return."—Whatever it was that made an impreſſion on his mind, that impreſſion was ſo ſtrong that he determined not to leave Troyes, and deſired the dauphin to let the interview take place in that city.

New expedients were employed to induce him to change his reſolution. Du Châtel, who knew his fondneſs for the lady of Giac, had again recourſe to her; and her influence again prevailed. The dauphin had arrived at Montereau a fortnight before; barriers had been erected for their mutual ſafety, on the bridge where the conference was to be holden; and the duke's officers repaired to the ſpot to examine them, and declared they were perfectly ſafe. The princes were to be accompanied by an equal number of noblemen; and every caution which miſtruſt or ſagacity could ſuggeſt was adopted. One end of the bridge was guarded by the dauphin's troops, the other by the duke's. A wooden apartment was conſtructed in the centre of the bridge, and in the middle of that apartment another barrier was fixed about the height of a chair. The dauphin entered firſt, attended by Du Châtel, and nine others. After waiting ſome time, he ſent to the duke to haſten his arrival. At length he appeared, followed by Charles of Bourbon, Noailles, and eight other perſons. As ſoon as he came on the bridge the barrier was locked; he then approached the dauphin, and after they had exchanged a few words the duke was maſſacred, with Noailles, who attempted to defend him. The dauphin was carried into the town half-diſtracted, and almoſt ſenſeleſs. Theſe are the only circumſtances of this event on which all authors agree. Whatever they have added bears ſtrong marks of their reſpective prejudices.

This event was productive of the moſt fatal conſequences to the kingdom. In vain did the dauphin publiſh manifeſtos, in which he aſſerted that the duke of Burgundy had drawn his ſword againſt him, and made an attempt on his perſon, with a view to deprive him of his liberty: nobody believed him. The news of the murder was received at Paris with indignation and horror. The nobility, clergy, magiſtrates, and citizens took an oath to revenge the duke's death, and immediately reſumed the badges of faction. The funeral obſequies were celebrated in the cathedral, and in the churches with as much pomp as was ever obſerved on the death of a king. Not content with paying theſe marks of honour, to the baſeſt of mankind, the Pariſians preſumed, in the effervеſcence of their zeal, to queſtion the right of the dauphin to the throne of his anceſtors.

The neglect of the dauphin and his adherents to profit by the death of the duke of Burgundy, affords an argument in favour of the ſuppoſition that the murder was not premeditated. They ought to have haſtened to Troyes, before the death of the duke could have reached that city, and ſecured the king's perſon, thereby giving to their ſubſequent conduct an appearance of lawful authority. Had they done this, the court, the miniſters, the council, all which ſtill repreſented a phantom of government would, as uſual, have yielded to the moſt powerful party; the dreadful effects of the queen's reſentment would have been averted; and that princeſs would have been prevented from plunging into freſh crimes. Twice had Iſabella ſeen the public object of her affections periſh by an aſſaſſin. She had long deplored the loſs of the duke of Orleans, but the deſire of revenging a more recent inſult had induced her to forget the ſubject of her regret, and to court a reconciliation with his murderer. The death of that murderer now filled her mind with a ſpirit of indignation, in which all her other paſſions were thenceforth abſorbed. She cauſed a violent declaration to be ſent, in the king's name, to all the towns in the kingdom, denouncing vengeance againſt the dauphin, and *his accomplices, murderers of the duke of Burgundy. She implored the alliance of England; and, at the ſame time, ſolicited the duke's ſon to join his reſentment to hers, and to make the revenge of his father's murder a common cauſe.

Philip, count of Charolois, was at Ghent, when he received the news of his father's end. He wanted that experience neceſſary in the ſituation in which he was now placed; his mind being ſolely occupied by the blind paſſion of revenge, he overlooked every conſideration of policy. Even his council, and the principal nobility who were attached to the houſe of Burgundy, were not influenced by more rational principles. On the firſt invitation, the mareſchal of Burgundy had conducted a body of troops to Troyes, to quiet the fears of the queen, the court and the miniſtry. The Pariſians had deputed Morvilliers, the firſt preſident of the parliament, to wait on the new duke, with offers of ſervice. The other towns were eaqually forward in their profeſſions; ſo that the Burgundian faction becãme more powerful than ever. Every part of the monarchy which ſtill reminded entire was at the diſpoſal of Philip; he had the ſame authority, the ſame reſources, the ſame domains as his father, and he enjoyed a reputation exempt from reproach.

Any exertion, on the part of Henry, became ſuperfluous; he had only to ſuffer his enemies to purſue their own coùrſe; and their paſſions proved more ſerviceable to his ambitious ſchemes, than his own valour and policy. The queen and the duke of Burgundy conducted themſelves with ſo much paſſion and precipitation, that even the crown of France now courted his acceptance. So early as the twenty fourth of September, only a fortnight after the death of the late duke, the king of England had appointed cnmmiſſaries to receive their propoſals, and to regulate the conditions of the treaty; the fundamental principles of which were not openly explained through fear of diſguſting the nation. The queen and the duke of Burgundy had already taken their reſolution ſo far, that they gave to all the towns, which acknowledged their authority, aſſurances of a peace.

The dauphin, meanwhile, and his miniſters, had retired into Berry, whence they advanced to the frontiers of Anjou, for the purpoſe of engaging the duke of Brittany to eſpouſe their cauſe*. Charles had an interview with that prince, who came attended by a numerous retinue, having, previous to his departure, appointed a certain number of gentlemen, to whom he entruſted the care of his perſon. Although the duke, had hitherto ſuffered his ſubjects to engage in the ſervice of the dauphin, the two princes now parted with mutual diſſatisfaction.

The remainder of this year was employed by the dauphin, in overrunning Touraine, Poitou and Languedoc.- The government of this laſt province he took from the count of Foix, and gave it to the count of Clermont†. He alſo re-eſtabliſhed the parliament of Toulouſe. In the following year he completed the expulſion of the prince of Orange, the Burgundian governor, by the redction of Niſmes and Pont Saint-Eſprit, the only places which ſtill adhered to the Burgundian faction in that part of France. Ambaſſadors were ſent by the dauphin, to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of the kings of Arragon and Caſtile, and of the regent of Scotland.

In the mean time the French, Engliſh, and Burgundian plenipotentiaries completed the misfortunes of the kingdom at Arras. Deputies from the principal towns had repaired to that city; and Saint-Paul, governor of Paris, attended the conferences, on the part of the king of France. The dauphin propoſed to Henry a negociation; but his propoſal was rejected. Henry no longer made any ſecret of his deſigns; as the time for accompliſhing his projects approached, his precautions for the removal of every obſtacle encreaſed. He ſent orders to England to keep a ſtrict watch over the priſoners taken at Azincourt: in his letter to the chancellor, he obſerved that if any of them eſcaped, and particularly the duke of Orleans, it would be a moſt unfortunate circumſtance. This anxiety ſufficiently announced his dread of that prince, who by his perſonal qualities and extenſive poſſeſſions, might have raiſed an impediment not eaſy to be ſurmounted.

The king of England conceived that, to convey to him a powerful kingdom, the conſent of the nation was requiſite. With the view of obtaining that conſent, he formed private treaties with the principal towns. Paris concluded a truce with him from November the twentieth, till December the twelfth. He promiſed the inhabitants that, if declared heir to France, he would preſerve all the privileges they enjoyed under their ancient ſovereigns. Theſe manœuvres, made the people inſenſibly loſe ſight of the laws of the monarchy. They ſighed for a more tranquil ſtate, and believed that any treaty which would put an end to this ſcene of miſery muſt be lawful.

A. D. 1420.] The preliminary conditions of this important treaty were ſigned at Arras, in January. It was there agreed that Charles, during life, ſhould enjoy the title of king of France; that Henry ſhould marry the princeſs Catharine, be declared heir to the kingdom, and immediately entruſted with the government; the kingdom to paſs to his heirs-general; that France and England ſhould for ever be united under one king, but ſhould ſtill retain their ſeveral uſages, and privileges; that all the princes, peers, vaſſals and communities of France ſhould ſwear that they would adhere to the future ſucceſſion of Henry, and pay him obedience as regent; that this prince ſhould unite his arms to thoſe of king Charles and the duke of Burgundy, to ſubdue the adherents of the dauphin; and that theſe three princes ſhould make no peace nor truce with him but by common agreement.

Immediately after this convention, the duke of Burgundy entered into a confederacy with Henry; by which the two princes ſwore and engaged to aſſiſt each other in purſuing the dauphin and his accomplices, till they had inflicted on them "that puniſhment which they deſerved." By the ſame treaty, the king of England agreed, as ſoon as he ſhould be declared king of France, to ſettle on the duke and ducheſs an annuity of twenty thouſand livres. It was farther agreed that one of the brothers of the king of England ſhould marry the duke of Burgundy's ſiſter.

While meaſures were preparing for placing a foreign family on the throne; while arms and policy were at once employed to ſap the foundations of the monarchy, that tranquillity which the province of Brittany had hitherto contrived to preſerve amidſt the general commotion, was diſturbed by an event which at any other period would have appeared incredible*. John duke of Brittany, had, by his virtues, completely confirmed the rights of his houſe to the ſovereignty of that province. He reigned in the hearts of his ſubjects; while the houſe of Blois-Penthiévre, which had ſo long been the rival of his family, content with the ſecond rank in the duchy, appeared to have forgotten their pretenſions.

Oliver, count of Penthiévre, with his brothers, Charles and John, lived in habits of intimacy with the duke, who admitted them into his councils, ſuffered them to partake of all his pleaſures and amuſements, and even, ſometimes, of his bed. He had reſolved to appoint them guardians to his children, in caſe of his death. Yet, they were plotting his deſtruction. Margaret de Cliſſon, their mother, inceſſantly excited them to this enterprize.

Every thing being ready for the execution of the plot, the count of Penthiévre went to Nantes, and invited the duke to paſs a few days with him at Chantoceaux. The prince, accepted the invitation; and, left Nantes, accompanied by Oliver. He had no ſooner paſſed the ſmall river Troubarde, than the conſpirators took up the planks of the bridge, which had been previouſly looſened, in order to prevent his attendants, who were at ſome diſtance, from following him. Charles de Penthiévre immediately appeared at the head of forty armed men, who attacked the few noblemen that were near the duke's perſon, wounded ſome of them, loaded them all with chains, and then binding the duke himſelf, conveyed him to a neighbouring fortreſs. He was kept for five months in a ſtate of captivity the moſt rigorous, continually removing from one place to another. During that period, his rebellious vaſſals made him ſubmit to every kind of indignity, inceſſantly placing before his eyes the inſtruments of torture and death. The count repeatedly inſulted him in the moſt indecent manner, held his clenched hand to his face, and threatened to cut him in pieces; in ſhort, by deferring his death, they appeared to have no other view than that of prolonging his puniſhment. Margaret, refuſed the conſolation of relieving him from a ſtate of uncertainty, more inſupportable than death itſelf.

* Argentrè. Nouvelle Hiſtoire de Bretagne.

The nobles of Brittany, enraged at this daring attempt on the perſon of their ſovereign, aſſembled; flew to arms, levied troops, and purſued the Penthiévres, who fled before them, from one retreat to another, without finding any aſylum that could ſecure them from their rage. They inveſted Chantoceaux, whither the old counteſs of Penthiévre had retired with a part of her family. A breach was ſoon made in the walls, when Margaret, trembling for her life, perſuaded her ſons to releaſe the duke. But Oliver firſt exacted from his noble captive a promiſe to give him his daughter in marriage, and to reſtore the places which had been taken. After this convention he was conducted to the camp of his friends, before the walls of Chantoceaux, where he was ſurrendered, by Charles of Penthiévre, to the Breton nobility, who then ſuffered Margaret to depart. The duke took poſſeſſion of Chantoceaux that ſame day, and ordered the place to be levelled with the ground.

The pope having abſolved him from the oaths which had been extorted from him during his captivity, Margaret de Cliſſon and her three ſons were cited to anſwer for the attempt committed on their ſovereign. Not complying with this citation, they were declared infamous, and ſentence of death was pronounced upon them by the parliament of Brittany; their towns and fortreſſes were demoliſhed; their property became the reward of thoſe who had contributed to bring them to puniſhment. Some time after they formed a ſecond plan for aſſaſſinating the duke, but it was attended with no better ſucceſs than the firſt. They were compelled to leave their country, and finiſhed the remainder of their lives in diſgrace. By this means did Margaret de Cliſſon verify the prediction of her father, the conſtable, who had foretold that ſhe would one day occaſion the ruin of her family.

The term now approached for the concluſion of that treaty, the preliminary conditions whereof had been ſigned at Arras. The duke of Burgundy, having aſſembled his army, took the road to Champagne, accompanied by the Engliſh ambaſſador, the earl of Warwick*. Having reduced ſuch towns on his road as were in poſſeſſion of the dauphin, he arrived at Troyes on the twenty-ninth of April. The public entry of the duke into that city, was diſtinguiſhed by all the magnificence of regal ſplendour. Charles, gave him ſuch a reception as Iſabella had told him was proper and juſt. The clauſes of the treaty were diſcuſſed with the Engliſh miniſters, who carried a copy of the convention to their ſovereign. On the receipt of it, Henry, at the head of ſixteen hundred men repaired to Provins, whence he ſent a meſſenger to announce his arrival to the court of France. The king had juſt had a violent relapſe, and in this ſtate of imbecility he was made to transfer a full power to the queen, and the duke of Burgundy, to repreſent him, and to diſpoſe of the kingdom. It had been ſettled that the firſt interview with the Engliſh monarch ſhould take place at a ſhort diſtance from Troyes; but Henry, entered that city on the twentieth of May. Next day the treaty was ſigned, and he was declared regent during the incapacity of Charles.

The day after the treaty was ſigned, Catharine was affianced to the king of England. Henry devoted but a very ſhort ſpace of time to thoſe pleaſures which the ſtate into which he had juſt entered was calculated to afford; on the third day after his marriage, he marched to Sens, which ſurrendered to his arms. From Sens the combined armies of England and Burgundy proceeded to Montereau, which was taken by aſſault; a part of the garriſon retired to the caſtle. Henry hanged his priſoners before the walls of the caſtle, which in a few days was reduced to the neceſſity of capitulating. The king of England next directed his attacks againſt Melun, which was defended by a ſtrong garriſon, under the command of Barbazan, who ſuſtained the attacks of the enemy with a degree of intrepidity that aſtoniſhed Henry: although the artillery had levelled a part of the walls with the ditch that ſurrounded the town, he did not dare to riſk an aſſault. A ſcarcity of proviſions compelled the garriſon to ſurrender. By the terms of the capitulation it was agreed that the lives of the troops ſhould be ſafe, and that they ſhould be releaſed without paying any ranſom. From theſe conditions were excepted all ſuch as had been concerned in the murder of the late duke of Burgundy; the greater part of the garriſon, with Barbazan, their commander, were thrown into priſon at Paris, where ſeveral periſhed through want.

After the reduction of Melun, the two monarchs, repaired to the capital. They were received with every demonſtration of joy. An aſſembly of the three eſtates of the kingdom was held in Charles's palace, in which the treaty of Troyes was declared to be an irrevocable law of the realm. The dauphin and his accomplices, as the aſſaſſins of the duke of Burgundy, were formally pronunced guilty of leſe majeſty, deprived of their right of ſucceſſion to all honors and dignities; and their ſubjects and vaſſals abſolved from their oaths of fealty.

Henry, who had now attained to the ſummit of his ambition, is accuſed by the French hiſtorians, of having exerciſed his authority with cruelty and deſpotiſm that rendered it inſupportable*. After impoſing a heavy tax on the Pariſians, and ſubjecting the Normans—to impoſts upon ſalt, and other articles of conſumption, he diſmiſſed all officers and placemen whoſe fidelity he ſuſpected. Of the king's houſhold he left but a few ſuperanuated officers. The court of Charles was almoſt forſaken, while that of Henry diſplayed all the pomp and luxury of the age. That monarch had ſecured Paris by a formidable garriſon, and by taking poſſeſſion of the Louvre, the Baſtile, and the caſtle of Vincennes. The duke of Clarence was appointed governor of Paris, in room of Saint Paul.

The Pariſians, at this time, experienced a complication of wretchedneſs. The winter was extremely ſevere, and joined to a dearth of proviſions, reduced the people to the laſt extremity. Paris, which had already loſt more than one half of its inhabitants, was daily deſerted by numbers, who haſtened to join the lawful heir to the throne. This extenſive city ſoon became one vaſt deſart, in many parts whereof, the wolves nightly prowled for prey. Such was the ſtate, not only of the capital, but of many of the principal towns; a more horrid ſituation than that of France, can ſcarcely be conceived.

The dauphin unable to reſiſt his enemies confined his efforts to fortifying himſelf in the countries beyond the Loire. In his capacity of regent, he removed the parliament and univerſity of Paris to the city of Poitiers. Thus were there ſeen in France, at the ſame time, two kings, two queens, two regents, two parliaments, and two univerſities of Paris. The dauphin had the misfortune to loſe two of his beſt friends; the firſt was the count of Vertus, younger brother to the duke of Orleans, who died in the bloom of youth; the ſecond was Lewis of Anjou, who went to Italy, on the invitation of Sforza, to the conqueſt of Naples. To counterbalance theſe diſadvantages, he obtained from Scotland, ſeven thouſand men, under lord Buchan.

A. D. 1421.] Henry, after appointing the duke of Clarence, lieutenant-general of Normandy, and leaving him ten thouſand men to ſupport his authority, left Paris, and repaired to Rouen, where he obtained a ſupply of money from the clergy. He then conducted his young conſort to England, where ſhe was crowned on the twenty-ſecond of February, 1421*.

During the abſence of the Engliſh monarch, his brother, the duke of Clarence, aſſembled his troops, and proceeded to the city of Angers, which he inveſted. The reduction of this place would have opened for the Engliſh a free entrance into Poitou, Touraine, and the Orleanois, and have compelled the dauphin to retire to the very extremity of the kingdom. To raiſe the ſiege, therefore, became an object of importance; and, for this purpoſe, the troops formed a junction with the Scottiſh forces, under the earl of Buchan. Advancing as far as the ſmall town of Bauge, they thence ſent a defiance to the duke of Clarence, which was immediately accepted. That prince, inſtantaneouſly decamped, and by a forced march arrived about noon the next day, in ſight of the French army.

The Engliſh fought with valour; but they had not Henry to command them.

* Rymer's Fœdera, tom. x. p. 49. T. Elmham, c. 112.

The duke of Clarence poſſeſſed the courage of his brother, but he wanted his genius and military ſkill. He ſcarcely allowed himſelf time to draw up his troops in order of battle; nor would he wait the arrival of the earl of Saliſbury, who was haſtening to join him with a corps-de-reſerve, leſt that nobleman ſhould partake with him in the glory of the day. The ſignal being given, and the battle begun, the duke, neglecting the firſt duties of a general, preſſed forward into the thickeſt of the fight, and, at the very commencement of the action was thrown on the ground. Bouteiller immediately attempted to ſecure him, in the hope of procuring, by that means, the releaſe of the duke of Orleans, whom Henry muſt have conſented to exchange for his brother; but all his efforts proved fruitleſs. The Engliſh ruſhed onwards in crowds to reſcue their general; and the French being equally anxious to retain a prize ſo valuable, prodigies of valour were performed on both ſides. In this dreadful encounter the duke of Clarence was ſlain by the earl of Buchan. The Engliſh at laſt fled, leaving two thouſand five hundred men at arms on the field of battle. The action was over when the earl of Saliſbury appeared with his corps-de-reſerve; and the French generals deeming it imprudent to renew the fight retired with their priſoners.

The dauphin, to evince his gratitude for the eſſential aſſiſtance afforded him by the Scots, promoted the earl of Buchan to the office of conſtable of France, which had been vacant ever ſince the murder of the count of Armagnac.

Henry, was at Beverley when he received intelligence of his brother's defeat. he haſtened to London, and applied himſelf with ardour to collect a powerful army, and a ſufficient ſupply of money to defray the expences of a vigorous campaign. The parliament which aſſembled on the ſecond of May, granted him money; and, at the ſame time, ratified the treaty of Troyes. The Engliſh monarch having embarked at Dover on the tenth of June, landed the next day at Calais, with twenty-four thouſand archers, and four thouſand horſe. During his abſence in England, the dauphin's party had acquired conſiderable ſtrength. La Hire defeated a body of troops, in Campagne, under the command of the Count de Vaudemont, who was taken priſoner. James de Harcourt ravaged the frontiers of Artois and Picardy, took Pont de Remi, and reduced ſeveral fortreſſes in Ponthieu and Vimeu. The dauphin, accompanied by the duke of Alençon, and the new conſtable, beſieged and took Montmorail; thence extending their incurſions into the Chartrain, they reduced Gaillardon, and put the governor, to death.

But a negociation, more advantageous than theſe ſucceſſes, had procured the dauphin an important ally, in the duke of Britany. Although that prince had concluded a ſeparate truce with England, he had hitherto refuſed to ſubſcribe the treaty of Troyes. His ſubjects deteſted the Engliſh; and he had reaſons for being diſpleaſed with their conduct. While kept in cofinement by the Penthiévres, his ducheſs and the ſtates of the province had applied for aſſiſtance to the king of England, but in vain; the nobles of Brittany who had taken up arms in defence of their ſovereign, had entreated Henry to permit the count of Richemont, then a priſoner at London, to come and command them, offering to reſtore him at the end of the campaign, or to pay for him any ranſom which the king might chuſe to exact. The Engliſh monarch deferred his anſwer, reſiſting the ſolicitations of the count, who could not obtain permiſſion to return to his native country, till a fortnight after his brother had been reſtored to liberty. By granting a conditional releaſe to Richemont, Henry flattered himſelf, that, the duke of Brittany would be deterred from contracting any alliance with the dauphin. The count, exerted all his influence for that purpoſe; but his efforts proved ineffectual.

This alliance was an additional motive to Henry to haſten his exertions. On his arrival in France, he was met by the duke of Burgundy at Montreuil. After ſettling their plan of operations the two princes parted; the duke went to aſſemble his troops, and the king repaired to Paris, where he made preparations for carrying on the war with vigour. He was joined by the duke of Burgundy, at the head of three thouſand men. As their united forces were too numerous to find ſubſiſtence in a country already laid waſte; it was agreed that they ſhould ſeparate, and that the king ſhould march againſt the dauphin, while the duke employed his troops in reducing the few towns in Ponthieu and Picardy which ſtill held out for that prince.

On the approach of the Engliſh army, the dauphin retired towards Orleans. Henry inveſted Dreux, which ſurrendered at diſcretion, and Tillieres the governor of the place, having been found in arms, after ſwearing to obſerve the treaty of Troyes, was hanged. The Engliſh monarch had, in his former expedition, carried over the king of Scots, whom he perſuaded to ſend orders to his countrymen, who had joined the dauphin, to leave the French ſervice; but the earl of Buchan replied, that he ſhould obey no commands from a king in captivity.

The Engliſh advanced to the banks of the Loire, above Orleans. They reduced the caſtle of Beaugency, and ſome other places, but the impoſſibility of procuring ſubſiſtence for ſo numerous an army, without foraging at a diſtance from the main body, inceſſantly expoſed the troops to the attacks of the dauphin's ſcouring parties, and of the enraged peaſantry, who ſecured themſelves from purſuit, in the extenſive foreſt of Orleans. Theſe inconveniences, joined to an epidemic dyſentery, compelled Henry to return, after loſing four thouſand men, almoſt without fighting*.

* Villaret, tom. xiv. p. 136.

Meanwhile the duke of Burgundy had entered Ponthieu, and inveſted Saint Riquier, a place of great ſtrength. Some of the dauphin's generals having aſſembled troops, advanced. The duke haſtened to meet them, and a deſperate action took place. The Armagnacs were defeated. Saint Riquier immediately ſurrendered on condition that the priſoners, taken in this battle, ſhould be reſtored to liberty. This check completely ruined the dauphin's party in Picardy and Ponthieu, where the ſmall number of places occupied by his adherents opened their gates to the enemy.

The king of England, after he had refreſhed his troops prepared to beſiege Meaux*. On the ſixth of October, the earl of Exeter took poſſeſſion of the ſuburbs, where in a few days, he was joined by the king, with the reſt of his troops, which might amount to twenty-five thouſand men. The garriſon did not exceed one thouſand†; but they were all choſen troops, with the baſtard of Vaurus at their head. They evinced a determination to defend the place to the laſt extremity, and the ſituation of the town, and the ſtrength of its fortifications, ſeemed to juſtify their hopes of a ſucceſsful reſiſtance. Meaux is divided by the Marne into two parts, diſtinguiſhed by the different appellations of The City, and The Market-place; the latter is formed into an iſle, by a canal ſupplied by the waters of the Marne. The Marché was, at this time, ſtrongly fortified, being ſurrounded by a wall, provided with parapets, and flanked at equal diſtances by round towers, of the ſame height, on the top of which grew large trees that, at a diſtance, exhibited the appearance of a foreſt in the air. Theſe ramparts were conſtructed with ſuch ſolidity, that the greater part of them are ſtill ſtanding.

Though the ſiege was preſſed with the utmoſt vigour, and all the machines then in uſe were employed in battering the walls, a long time elapſed before any impreſſion could be made on them. The inhabitants diſplayed the ſame intrepidity with the garriſon; and continual ſallies were made, in which no quarter was ſhown; all the priſoners, on both ſides, being maſſacred as ſoon as taken‡. Vaurus, the governor, had ſet the example to encreaſe the ardour of his troops, by eſtabliſhing an irreconcileable animoſity between them and the enemy. Whenever an Engliſhman or Burgundian was taken, he ordered him to be hanged on a neighbouring tree, which acquired the appellation of the oak of Vaurus he expoſed on the ramparts, in ſight of the beſiegers, an aſs with a crown on his head, at whoſe ſide was placed a man blowing a horn, and calling to the Engliſh from time to time, to come to the aſſiſtance of their ſovereign. Henry, enraged, redoubled his efforts; while Vaurus, being in daily expectation of relief from the dauphin, treated his threats and attacks with equal contempt. But the Engliſh having ſtrongly fortified their camp were ſecure from ſurprize; and D'Offemont attempted to enter the town with forty men at arms, was taken priſoner. Still the garriſon were ſo little apprehenſive of being reduced to the neceſſity of ſurrendering, that they releaſed, on payment of a conſiderable ranſom, Peter of Luxembourg, though by detaining him, they would have been certain, in caſe of a capitulation, of preſerving their own lives, and of enſuring more favourable terms than they could otherwiſe expect.

At length a practicable breach having been effected in the walls of the city, Vaurus made the inhabitants retire, with their moſt precious effects into the Marché. All hopes of aſſiſtance from the dauphin were now at an end. The proviſions were nearly exhauſted; and the ramparts were eſſentially damaged by the repeated attacks of the enemy. In this ſituation, the king of England ſummoned the garriſon to ſurrender, and meeting with a refuſal, he ordered a general aſſault, which laſted ſeven hours, and was attended with a vaſt effuſion of blood on both ſides. In the heat of the action, the garriſon having broken or loſt all their lances, made uſe of ſpits and continued to fight with ſuch intrepidity that the Engliſh were obliged to retire. This, however, was their laſt effort. The chiefs of the companies, of which the garriſon was compoſed, did not think it prudent, by a longer reſiſtance, to fall victims to the deſpair of Vaurus. They accordingly agreed to deliver him and five others to Henry; the fortreſs was then ſurrendered to the Engliſh: the governor was hanged on his favourite oak, and his five aſſociates, one of whom was the man that had blown the horn on the ramparts, were conducted to Paris, and there executed. The garriſon remained priſoners of war, and moſt of the officers were compelled to purchaſe their liberty by the ſurrender of all the fortreſſes in their poſſeſſion.

Among the priſoners was Philip de Gamaches, abbot of Saint Pharon, who had diſplayed great courage during the ſiege. The king of England ſent word to the lord of Gamaches, who was governor of Compégne, that if he did not immediately ſurrender that city, he would throw the abbot into the river*. The threat gave to Henry poſſeſſion of the place.

The dauphin's generals finding it impoſſible to force the Engliſh camp before Meaux had endeavoured to draw off their attention to another quarter. With this view they firſt took by ſurprize the bridge of Meulan, and ſoon after reduced the town of Avranches; but Henry ſtill continued the ſiege of Meaux, and ſent the earl of Saliſbury into Normandy, with a detachment of troops, who ſpeedily recovered the places which had been taken.

The reduction of Meaux was followed by the ſurrender of a number of ſmall towns and fortreſſes, which haſtened to open their gates to the conqueror. From the borders of Campagne to the ſea-ſide, Crotoy was the only place which refuſed to ſubmit to the Engliſh. Diſcouraged by this ſucceſſion of loſſes, thoſe men who had hitherto delayed their ſubmiſſion to the prevailing power, now yielded to the torrent; and even many of the dauphin's adherents, deeming his cauſe deſperate, forſook him. James de Harcourt, one of his generals, who had recently obtained ſome advantage over the enemy on the frontiers of Normandy, was attacked on his retreat, and defeated with the loſs of three hundred men.

A. D. 1422.] The king of England, after paſſing a few days at Meaux, and giving orders for repairing the fortifications returned to Paris, where he made his public entry, accompanied by his queen, who had left England ſome time before. The inhabitants notwithſtanding their diſtreſs, incurred a prodigious expence for the reception of Henry and Catharine. After a ſhort ſtay at Paris Henry prepared for new expeditions. He conducted the court to Senlis, and advanced himſelf as far as Compiégne, while the earl of Warwick inveſted Saint-Valery, which ſurrendered by capitulation, after ſuſtaining a ſiege of three months, carried on with vigour, both by land and ſea.

While the king of England was at Compiégne, he received intelligence of a conſpiracy which haſtened his return to the capital. The wife of one of the king's attendants had formed the bold deſign of delivering Paris into the hands of the dauphin*. The day was fixed, and an adequate number of reſolute men were poſted in the environs of the city, when the plot was detected by a prieſt. The woman was immediately ſeized, and her accomplices were executed.

The dauphin, with the auxiliaries he had received from Scotland and Caſtile, had, by this time, collected an army of twenty thouſand men, the command of which was given to the earl of Buchan, as conſtable of France. With theſe troops he formed the ſiege of Coſne, the garriſon of which agreed to ſurrender if not relieved by the duke of Burgundy before the eighteenth of Auguſt. The duke ſent a meſſage to the king of England, requeſting a reinforcement, although his own forces were ſuperior, in number, to thoſe of the dauphin. Henry replied that he would attend him in perſon. He left Paris; but, on his arrival at Senlis, was ſeized either with a fiſtula or a pleuriſy†. He was conveyed to Vincennes, while the command of the troops devolved on the duke of Bedford.

When the Engliſh and Burgundians approached the army of the dauphin, that prince would fain have riſqued an action, but being prevailed on to follow the more prudent advice of his generals, he raiſed the ſiege of Coſne. The duke of Burgundy detached two thouſand men to attack his rear-guard, they were defeated, with conſiderable loſs.

The duke of Bedford now haſtened back to Henry, whom he found at the laſt extremity. He ſent for the earl of Warwick, and ſome other noblemen; and, delivered his inſtructions as to the future diſpoſal of his kingdom and family. He entreated them to continue to his infant ſon thoſe marks of attachment and eſteem which he had ever experienced from them. He deſired they would cultivate the friendſhip of the duke of Burgundy, and make him an offer of the regency of France; but, if he ſhould reject it, he appointed the duke of Bedford to that office. The education and perſon of his ſon he committed to the earl of Warwick. He enjoined them not to liberate the priſoners taken at the battle of Azincourt, till his ſon ſhould be able to take the reins of government; he recommended his queen to their care and protection; and he conjured them, if they ſhould find it impoſſible to place his ſon on the throne of France, never to make peace without obtaining the abſolute ſovereignty of Normandy. He expired, on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, 1422, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the tenth of his reign.

The duke of Burgundy repaired to Paris immediately after the death of the Engliſh monarch; the government of the kingdom was offered him, but he refuſed to accept it, and, notwithſtanding the intrigues of the queen, who had aſpired to the regency herſelf, ceded it to the duke of Bedford, whoſe authority was acknowledged without contradiction. The military and political talents of this prince were tempered by a degree of moderation which was wanting in the character of his brother.

The death of Henry, far from effecting a revolution in favour of the dauphin, ſeemed to render his affairs more deſperate. Several noblemen forſook his party; and the duke of Brittany, in violation of the treaty of Sablé, charged his miniſter to accede to that of Troyes. This change in his conduct proceeded from reports, that the dauphin had formed a plan for aſſaſſinating him. The accuſation was deſtitute of probability; but the temper of the times afforded ſome excuſe for the duke's credulity. The Bretons entered Poitou and advanced to the frontiers of Aunis, with a deſign to ſurprize Rochelle, but the dauphin, apprized of their intentions, had time to prevent the execution of their plan.

Charles the Sixth finiſhed, at this period, a life of misfortune; having ſurvived his ſon-in-law, Henry, only fifty-one days. His death, which happened on the twenty-firſt of October, 1422, was occaſioned by a violent fever. None of the princes of the blood attended his funeral. The treaſury did not contain money ſufficient to pay the expences of it.

CHARLES THE SEVENTH.

A. D. 1422.] CHARLES the Seventh was at the caſtle of Eſpally, when he heard of his fathers death. Solicitations of his nobles were requiſite to rouze him to thoſe active duties which his ſituation called for. The duke of Bedford, as regent of the kingdom, had aſſembled the principal citizens of Paris. He renewed the proſcription againſt the lawful monarch, and exacted an oath of allegiance to the young king of England from every inhabitant of the city.

The Engliſh, at this period, were maſters of Paris, Normandy, the Iſle of France, Brie, Champagne, Picardy, Ponthieu, the Boulenois, the town and diſtrict of Calais, and the greater part of Aquitaine; while, from their alliance with the duke of Burgundy, they ſecured the duchy whence he derived his title, with Flanders and Artois.

Charles was confined to the provinces of Languedoc, Dauphné and Auvergne; the Bourbonnois, Berry, Poitou, Saintonge, Touraine, and the Orleanois, with a part of Anjou and Maine.

The tender age of the Sixth Henry, only nine months old at the death of his father, was ſupplied by the ability and experience of his two uncles, the dukes of Bedford and Glouceſter. The regent was gifted with prudence, valour and generoſity; he was ſeconded by the moſt renowned generals of the age, and was at the head of armies enured to victory, while the whole power of England was at his command; and the northern provinces of France contributed their efforts to reduce the remainder of the kingdom to ſubjection.

At the head of the king's party, were the earl of Buchan, conſtable of France; the mareſchals de la Fayette, and de Severac, Xaintrailles, La Hire, Harcourt, La Trémoille, and the baſtards of Orleans and Bourbon. Theſe warriors were endued with intrepid courage, but, as generals, none of them were to be compared with the officers which England had to oppoſe to them.

Thus the regent had every advantage, which extent of territory, experienced generals, diſciplined troops, and pecuniary reſources could afford him. The ſituation of Charles, too, was rendered more dangerous, by the facility of his temper, which made him a dupe to his favourites. This appeared in the firſt event of his reign.

A. D. 1423.] Though it was in the depth of winter, hoſtilities had never ceaſed; Graville, in January, having taken Meulan by aſſault, and put the garriſon to the ſword, the duke of Bedford, and lord Saliſbury, inveſted the place. Graville informed the king of his ſituation, and Charles ordered Narbonne and Aumale to his relief, with ſix thouſand men. When this detachment arrived within ſix leagues of their place of deſtination, a miſunderſtanding took place between the leaders, and the troops diſbanded for want of pay. It is ſaid, that du Châtel had received money for that purpoſe, which he diſſipated. The garriſon of Meulan, finding themſelves betrayed, pulled down the king's banners from the walls, in ſight of the enemy, and aſked to capitulate. Several of the garriſon entered into the Engliſh ſervice; Graville was among the number, but he afterwards returned to his duty.

Liſle-Adam retook Ferté-Milon, which the French had reduced, while Luxembourg completed the expulſion of the royaliſts from Picardy. The caſtles of Marcouſſy and Montlhery were alſo taken by the Engliſh. A conſpiracy, entered into by ſome citizens of Paris, to deliver the capital to the king, being detected by the regent, the conſpirators were executed; a woman who had joined them was burned alive.

The commencement of his reign was highly unfavourable to the new monarch. Independent of the checks he received in the defeat of his troops, and the demolition of his fortreſſes, he had the mortification to loſe a valuable ally, the duke of Brittany. The count of Richemont had, by this time, recovered his former influence over the mind of his brother. The regent releaſed the count from his parole, on which he had been permitted by Henry the Fifth to viſit his native country; and by his perſuaſion, the duke ſeconded the Engliſh arms.

To theſe negociations ſucceeded the operations of war. The reduction of ſmall towns was of little importance, as the garriſons, generally ſurrendering by capitulation, were at liberty to haſten to the defence of ſome other place. No quarter was ſhewn when a town was taken by aſſault; nor even when, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, it ſurrendered at diſcretion. The garriſon of Orſay having ſuſtained a ſiege of ſix weeks, were ſent to Paris to be executed; but through the interceſſion of the ducheſs of Bedford, their lives were ſpared.

The French, in the mean time, had not been idle; Mâçon and Crevant had ſurrendered to their arms, but the laſt was retaken by the Engliſh, at the moment that a body of Scottiſh troops, which had recently landed under the command of Stuart, together with a French detatchment arrived to relieve it. The French laid ſiege to Crevant a ſecond time, with ten thouſand men. Saliſbury, who was then employed in the ſiege of Montaguillon, left a ſufficient number of troops to keep the garriſon in awe, and marched with the reſt to Auxerre, where he was joined by Toulongeon, mareſchal of Burgundy. It was reſolved to attack the royaliſts before Crevant, where a ſharp conflict enſued, in which the beſiegers were routed with the loſs of fifteen hundred men. The number of priſoners was ſtill more conſiderable; among them was Stuart, conſtable of Scotland.

This diſaſter was followed by the reduction of Montaguillon, Mâçon, and Coucy. In ſhort, all the northern provinces of France were in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, except the ſtrong fortreſs of Mount Saint-Michael, in Normandy, and the town of Crotoy, in Ponthieu, ſituated at the mouth of the Somme. Crotoy was, ſoon after, obliged to capitulate.

Every effort which Charles made to repair his loſſes, ſeemed only to encreaſe them. While La Hire reduced Compiégne, Xaintrailles took by aſſault the towns of Ham and Guiſe. But the Engliſh retook Ham, and inveſted Guiſe, where Xaintrailles was taken priſoner, in a ſally. Liſle-Adam, though defeated by La Hire, with the loſs of five hundred men, compelled the French to evacuate Compiégne.

John de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk, with two thouſand five hundred men, entered Anjou, and laid waſte the country to the gates of Angiers. He then took the road to Normandy through Maine, carrying off twelve thouſand oxen. The count of Aumale, governor of Anjou, aſſembling the nobility of the province, reſolved to intercept the retreat of this invader. He purſued the enemy, and overtook them near Gravelle, a town in Maine.

Pole drew up his troops behind his carriages, and received the French with reſolution. But Aumale had detached part of his army, who attacked the Engliſh in the rear, while he engaged them in front; this manœuvre decided the victory; after an obſtinate reſiſtance, the Engliſh were defeated with the loſs of fifteen hundred men. Pole was taken priſoner, and exchanged for Stuart. This victory revived the ſpirits of the royaliſts. About the ſame time, Charles obtained a ſupply of one thouſand men at arms, and five hundred lances, from the duke of Milan. As theſe troops entered Beaujolois, they received a meſſage from the governor of la Buiſſiere, informing them that he was then negotiating with Toulongeon, for the ſurrender of the town; and as the mareſchal knew nothing of their march, it would be eaſy to ſurprize him when he went to take poſſeſſion. This ſtratagem was executed with ſuch ſecrecy and ſucceſs, that Toulongeon, on entering la Buiſſiere with ſeven hundred men, was made priſoner, with all his followers. The duke of Savoy, perceiving that the flames of war, were advancing with rapidity toward the frontiers of his territories, negotiated a truce between the king and the duke of Burgundy for the Lyonnois and Burgundy.

Charles endeavoured to ſecure the attachment of his allies by honours and rewards. To Stewart, conſtable of Scotland, he gave the county of Evreaux, and the lordſhip of Aubigny, which was long poſſeſſed by that branch of his family eſtabliſhed in France. The king's ambaſſadors had ratified the ancient treaties with Scotland, and obtained a freſh ſupply of five thouſand men. Theſe troops landed at Rochelle towards the end of the year 1423, under the command of Archibald, earl of Douglas, on whom Charles beſtowed the duchy of Touraine, with the dignity of lieutenant-general of the kingdom in time of war. This honour, which placed the earl above all the military men in France, not even excepting the conſtable, excited the murmurs of the French nobility.

A. D. 1424.] To counteract the effects of this liberality to the Scots, the Engliſh miniſtry deemed it prudent to releaſe the king of Scotland, who had been detained in captivity for ſixteen years; on condition that he ſhould pay forty thouſand marks for his ranſom, and ſign a truce for ſeven years with England, during which time neither of the contracting parties ſhould afford aſſiſtance to the enemies of the other. Theſe terms being complied with, James returned to Scotland in March 1424.

The enſuing campaign commenced with trifling ſkirmiſhes, and ſieges, which occupied either army till the approach of ſummer. The earl of Saliſbury was then ſent by the regent to inveſt Ivry, a ſmall town in Normandy. Giraut, the governor, was reduced to the neceſſity of capitulating, when he agreed to ſurrender the place, if not relieved before the fifteenth of Auguſt. Charles reſolved to make an effort to relieve him; having collected ſeven thouſand Scots, fifteen hundred Italians, and ten thouſand French, he ſent them to Ivry, under the command of the earls of Douglas and Buchan; the duke of Alençon, la Fayette, the count of Aumale, and the viſcount of Narbonne. But when they arrived within ſight of the Engliſh camp, which the duke of Bedford had recently entered with a freſh body of troops, they found it ſo well ſituated, and ſo ſtrongly defended, as to preclude all hopes of a ſucceſsful attack; they were, therefore, compelled to retire; and, turning to the left, advanced to Verneuil, which the inhabitants, in ſpite of the garriſon, delivered up. Ivry in the mean time ſurrendered; and the regent, followed the French to Verneuil; but finding that place already in their poſſeſſion, he choſe an advantageous poſt, in the hope that they would afford him an opportunity of bringing them to a decisive engagement. The earl of Douglas called a council of war, at which the thoughtless impetuosity of the French, overcame the prudence of the Scots, who urged, that as there was no absolute necessity for an action, it would be madness to risk the loss of an army which formed the last resource of the king. This advice being rejected by the French nobility, an action was resolved on, and conducted with the same temerity which dictated the resolution. Douglas had drawn up his forces under the walls of Verneuil, with a design to entice the English from their advantageous situation; but the viscount of Narbonne frustrated his project, by precipitately advancing towards the enemy, and obliging the whole line to follow him without order or regularity. The English archers, let fly a volley of arrows at the foremost ranks of the French army; and though pressed by superior numbers, and compelled to retreat, they soon rallied behind the baggage, and continued to do great execution. The contest was maintained with considerable fury, for three hours, when victiory declared for the English. The earl of Douglas and his son; the earl of Buchan; Harcourt, count of Aumale; with a number of gentlemen, were left dead on the field. The loss of the French amounted to five thousand men; and that of the English to sixteen hundred. Verneuil was invested the day after the battle, and the garrison were compelled to capitulate, for want of provisions, on the fourth day of the siege.

The king's finances were now totally exhausted; his only army was annihilated; his most powerful adherents were either slain or in captivity; his hopes of assistance from Scotland were destroyed by the liberation of the king of Scots, and, to render his misfortunes complete, Charles devoted the greater part of his time to luxurious enjoyments, and submitted to favourites destitute of principle or ability. Yet a single incident counteracted this combination of unfavourable circumstances, and deprived the English of such an opportunity to complete their conquests, as they never could recall.

In the preceding reign, Jaqueline, countess of Hainaut and Holland had fled from the dominions of her husband the duke of Brabant to England. During her residence at the English court, the duke of Gloucester was tempted to make her an offer of his hand. Finding the countess inclined to accept his offer, he signed a contract of marriage, without waiting to procure a papal dispensation, and without obtaining the consent of the duke of Burgundy (cousin-german to the duke of Brabant) whose alliance was of so much consequence to the English nation. That prince was extremely irritated at this step; and, though the duke of Bedford's efforts to calm his resentment had proved effectual so long as Gloucester made no attempt to seize the inheritance of his wife, his brother's imprudent conduct soon gave to that resentment both energy and effect. Gloucester raised an army in the summer of 1424, with which he landed at Calais in the month of October, ſix weeks after the battle of Verneuil, that is to ſay, preciſely at the time when king Charles, deſtitute of all reſources, only waited for the junction of the Engliſh and Burgundian forces, to ſee his ruin completed. Glouceſter's arrival ſuſpended the fatal blow.

The duke of Burgundy at the diſembarkation of theſe troops, imagined, that they were to reinforce the Engliſh army; he was ſoon, undeceived, when he received intelligence that Glouceſter, with his intended wife, had entered Hainaut, and reduced moſt of the principal towns in the province. The duke immediately iſſued orders to all his ſubjects and vaſſals to take up arms, and to march under the conduct of the count of Saint-Paul and Liſle-Adam, to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Brabant. Thus the Low Countries, which had hitherto enjoyed tranquillity, became the threatre of war. All the nobility of Flanders, Artois and Picardy, joined the Burgundian forces; and even ſuch as were ſerving in the duke of Bedford's army, immediately left it, and followed the example of their countrymen.

The utmoſt exertions of the regent, were inadequate to prevent the diſpute between his brother and the duke of Burgundy from proceeding to extremities. The war was carried on for nearly two years, when, at length, an opportunity offered for promoting a temporary reconciliation. In the ſummer of the year 1426, the duke of Glouceſter finding it neceſſary to return to England, left the counteſs in the town of Mons, whoſe inhabitants gave her up to the duke of Burgundy, by whom ſhe was ſent to Ghent. Jaqueline made her eſcape and fled to Holland, where ſhe remained two years, making vain attempts to recover her inheritance. In the mean time an appeal had been made by the duke of Burgundy to the ſovereign pontiff on the validity of her marriage; and a definitive ſentence was obtained from Martin the Fifth, by which it was declared that her contract with the duke of Glouceſter was null, and her firſt marriage valid: And it farther pronounced, that, even in the caſe of the death of the duke of Brabant, it ſhould never be lawful for her to eſpouſe the Engliſh prince. Glouceſter relinquiſhed his pretenſions, when too late to remedy the miſchiefs they had occaſioned.

While this war tended to relax the efforts of the Engliſh, and gave the king time to recover from the conſternation into which he had been thrown by the defeat at Verneuil, his council endeavoured to profit by the favourable conjuncture, to detach the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany from his enemies. Charles knew that the count of Richemont was highly diſpleaſed with the duke of Bedford, who had refuſed to entruſt him the command of his army. To gain his ſupport he made him an offer of the poſt of conſtable of France, then vacant by the death of Buchan. He conſented to join the king, and to prevail on his nobles to do the ſame. The plan of an alliance was drawn up and approved by the ſtates of Brittany; and Richemont went to Chirnon, where he received the conſtable's ſword from the hands of the king.

He ſoon after, conducted Charles to Saumur, where the duke of Brittany did homage to him, and renewed the treaty of Sablé, to which a clauſe was added, that proved the doubts which were entertained of the fidelity of the king's miniſters. To enſure payment of the troops which the duke engaged to furniſh for the king's ſervice, he inſiſted that the revenue ariſing from the province of Languedoc, deſtined for that purpoſe, ſhould be received by two officers, one of whom he ſhould be permitted to appoint himſelf.

A. D. 1425.] The conduct of the duke of Glouceſter had not only deprived the regent of reſources neceſſary to purſue with vigour the advantages he had obtained; but compelled him to repair to England, at this critical conjuncture, to accommodate a difference which had ariſen in the Engliſh miniſtry, between that prince and the biſhop of Wincheſter. Bedford's departure, the war in the Low Countries, the diſaffection of the duke of Burgundy to the cauſe he had hitherto eſpouſed with ſo much warmth, the recent alliance between the king and the duke of Brittany, all ſeemed to concur to the reſtoration of the lawful heir, and the final expulſion of the enemy. But, Charles a mere puppet, moved only at the will of his favourites, which rendered this happy combination of circumſtances of little utility. The management of his affairs was left wholly to his miniſters.

A. D. 1426, 1427.] The conſtable, meanwhile, having with his brother's aſſiſtance, encreaſed his army to twenty thouſand men, opened the campaign with the ſiege of Pontorſon, which he took, and put the garriſon to the ſword. Richemont next made an attempt to reduce Saint-James de Beuvron, which the Engliſh had garriſoned with ſix thouſand men. The attacks, though carried on with vigour, were repelled by the more ſucceſsful valour of the enemy. Richemont, determined to ſtorm the town, though no practicable breach had been effected in the walls. Before he made the attempt, he detached two thouſand men to cut off the ſupplies which the enemy expected from Avranches.

The aſſault was begun by the French with impetuoſity; but the perſeverance of the Engliſh prevented them from making any impreſſion on the place. The conflict was ſharp and bloody; in the heat of the action the detachment of two thouſand men, having found nothing on the road, returned to aſſiſt their countrymen; but one part of the French army miſtaking them for a reinforcement coming to join the garriſon, and the other imagining they had been repulſed by a ſuperior body of the enemy, who were haſtening to attack them in the rear, the alarm became general, and, notwithſtanding the efforts of the conſtable to undeceive and to rally his troops, they fled on all ſides. The Engliſh, by a ſally, compelled Richemont to follow his men, leaving all his baggage and artillery behind him.

Richemont reſolved to chuſe a favourite for his ſovereign, on whom he could rely; with this view he recommended la Tremoille. When he mentioned him to the king, Charles replied—" You force me to receive him; but you will repent it, for I know him better than you do. Tremoille verified the prediction of Charles.

The check which the conſtable had received at Saint James de Beuvron, and the conſequent diſperſion of his army, expoſed the frontiers of Brittany to the incurſions of the Engliſh; he therefore haſtened to Pontorſon, and after ſtrengthening the fortifications of that place, left a ſtrong garriſon to defend it. It was ſoon after beſieged by the enemy, who could not reduce it till the month of May, in the following year. The Engliſh meanwhile formed the ſiege of Montargis. The troops deſtined for this enterprize, amounted to three thouſand men; and ſuch was the deplorable ſituation of the king at this period, that he found it impoſſible to muſter an equal force. The garriſon of Montargis, reſiſted the Engliſh, for three months.

At length, being reduced to the laſt extremity, they ſent to apprize the king of the danger of their ſituation. The baſtard of Orleans, a young nobleman of high ſpirit, and endued with prudence ſuperior to his years, undertook to relieve the place. He was ſupplied with ſixteen hundred men.

When the French approached they found that the garriſon had opened their ſluices, and laid a great of the Engliſh camp under water; and had, likewiſe, by the ſame means, cut off the communication between the different diviſions of their army. The baſtard of Orleans, divided his little army into two corps, and ſent La Hire with one of them to attack that diviſion of the Engliſh which was commanded by John de la Pole, while with the other he marched againſt the earl of Suffolk's diviſion. La Hire, having completely defeated John de la Pole, haſtened to join the baſtard of Orleans, who, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, obliged the earl of Suffolk to fly. Warwick, after being compelled to remain a quiet ſpectator of the defeat of his troops, was himſelf reduced to the neceſſity of decamping.

Graville immediately advanced againſt Mans, which he took by ſurprize; but the earl of Suffolk had time to retire to the citadel, where there were proviſions only for three days. Talbot advanced to his relief, and entering the citadel in the night, attacked the French with great fury the next morning, and drove them from the town. After this exploit, Talbot and Suffolk marched to Laval, which they took by aſſault.

About this time the duke of Bedford returned from England with twenty thouſand men, with which he hoped to retrieve the time which had been loſt in fruitleſs expeditions during his abſence. Circumſtances were ſuch as to juſtify theſe hopes. La Tremoille had, by his intrigues, occaſioned an open rupture between the king and the conſtable, who had retired to Parthenay. The princes of the blood and moſt of the nobility were prejudiced againſt the favourite; and even thoſe troops which acknowledged the authority of Charles, eſpouſed the cauſe of Richemont. Charles's ſituation appeared to be deſperate. Bedford having ſecretly conducted, in ſeparate detachments, a formidable army to the frontiers of Brittany, made an unexpected attack on that province, and compelled the duke to forego his alliance with Charles; to ſign the treaty of Troyes; and to promiſe to do homage for his duchy.

A. D. 1428.] The duke of Bedford, by his late treaty with the duke of Brittany, having freed himſelf from a dangerous enemy who lay behind him, reſolved on an enterprize which, if ſucceſsful, would, prepare the way for the final conqueſt of France. Orleans was ſo ſituated between the provinces which acknowledged the regent, and thoſe which held out for Charles, that it afforded an eaſy entrance into either; the duke, determined to reduce it, to facilitate his paſſage into the ſouth.

The command of this important expedition was entruſted to the earl of Saliſbury. He entered the country which lies between the Seine and the Loire, and employed Auguſt and September in the reduction of ſeveral ſmall towns which ſurrounded Orleans. On the eighth of October, a detachment of the Engliſh were ſent to reconnoitre that city; but being repulſed in a ſally made by the garriſon they croſſed the Loire, ſacked and burned the town of Clery, and on the twelfth preſented themſelves in full force before Orleans. Gaucourt, the governor, was a man of approved valour and experience; and a great number of nobility had thrown themſelves into the town. The garriſon and inhabitants appeared to be inſpired with the utmoſt intrepidity; even the women partook of the martial ardour, and contributed their efforts to the ſupport of the common cauſe.

Saliſbury's army, not exceeding ten thouſand men, was inſufficient to form a complete line of circumvallation round Orleans. He therefore reſolved to make his approaches from the ſouth, leaving the oppoſite ſide ſtill open to the French. He then attacked the caſtle of the Tourelles, and carried it the ſecond aſſault; but the acquiſition of this important fortreſs proved fatal to Saliſbury, who being wounded in the head by a cannon ball, as he was ſurveying the town from its ſummit, on the twenty-ſeventh of October, was conveyed to Meun, where he died on the third of the following month*. The earl of Suffolk ſucceeded to the command. Being convinced that the reduction of the city would be nearly impoſſible, before the garriſon were deprived of all communication with the adjacent country, he erected redoubts at different diſtances, all around it, which he was enabled to man by a ſtrong reinforcement of Engliſh and Burgundians which had recently joined him. Meanwhile the Baſtard of Orleans, and ſome other officers who had been ſent to haſten the departure of the troops, and of a convoy for Orleans, entered the city with five or ſix hundred lances.

duce provisions into the town; and the besiegers themselves, unable to collect a sufficiency from a country already exhausted by frequent incursions, stood in almost as great want of supplies as the besieged. When the English had lain four months before the place, the duke of Bedford, having collected, at Paris, a considerable quantity of provisions, arms and ammunition, sent it to the army in five hundred waggons, under the escort of two thousand five hundred men, commanded by Sir John Fastolfe. This convoy was met, on the twelfth of February, by the count of Clermont, and other officers at the head of four thousand French and Scottish troops. Fastolfe, apprized of their approach, had prepared to receive them, by surrounding his little army with the baggage-waggons, leaving open only two avenues, which were guarded by his best archers. He sustained the first attack of the French, and finding them thrown into some confusion he rushed out before they had time to rally, and obtained a complete victory. Six hundred soldiers, were slain in this action, which was called The battle of Herrings, because the provisions chiefly consisted of herrings, for the use of the English army during the Lent season. The bastard of Orleans, La Hire, Xaintrailles and La Fayette, collected the scattered remains of their army, and returned to Orleans.

This event threw a greater damp on the spirits of Charles, than any misfortune which he had hitherto experienced; but to try every expedient for the preservation of Orleans; he dispatched Xaintrailles to the regent at Paris, to propose that the city should be delivered up to the duke of Burgundy, and remain in his possession till the conclusion of the war. Burgundy seconded a proposal which tended to invest him with the power of deciding the contest; but Bedford rejected a measure from which no good could accrue to the English interest. This conduct of the regent is said to have disgusted the duke of Burgundy. The siege continued with vigour; the garrison began to experience a scarcity of provisions; and Charles, entertained thoughts of retiring, with the small remnant of his forces, into Languedoc and Dauphiny.

The troops which had been dispersed at the battle of the Herrings were now collected; and a strong reinforcement was hourly expected from Scotland. The Scottish monarch, by a treaty concluded in the month of November, 1427, had engaged to send his daughter Margaret to the court of France, as she was destined to espouse the dauphin Lewis, when arrived at years of maturity. This princess, instead of a dower, was to bring a supply of six thousand troops. But while the king was waiting the arrival of these succours, he received assistance from another quarter, which enabled him to effect a revolution more speedy than his most sanguine partisans could have taught him to hope.

A. D. 1429.] At Dom-Remy, near the banks of the Maese, which divides Champagne from Loraine, a village belonging to France, lived a country girl of ſeventeen *, called Joan d'Arc. Joan had been taught to hold in deteſtation the Engliſh name; and the ravages of war, which ſhe ſaw extended even to her father's cottage, encreaſed this abhorrence. The expulſion of the enemy from her native land, and the triumph of the lawful ſovereign, ſhe juſtly regarded as the only means of correcting the evils which deſolated the kingdom. Her zeal encreaſed with her years; her manners was irreproachable.

Several years had elapſed, when preſſed more and more by that ſecret impulſe which urged her to arm in defence of her king and country, ſhe preſented herſelf to Baudricourt, governor of Vaucouleurs, a town in the neighbourhood. She flattered herſelf that he would ſupply her with arms, and an eſcort to enable her to repair to court: but Baudricourt diſmiſſed her with contempt. After ſix months Joan paid him a ſecond viſit, but met with no better ſucceſs. Still undiſmayed, ſhe preſented herſelf a third time to the governor, who believing her bewitched, wiſhed to have her exorciſed by the curate of the pariſh. She mantained, however, the truth of her miſſion; and aſſured him that the royaliſts had juſt ſuſtained a defeat near Orleans.—The account of the battle of the Herrings, which arrived ſoon after, ſtaggered the governor; Joan's revelations thenceforth met with general credit, and ſhe was regarded as a præternatural inſtrument of Providence. Having ſurmounted this difficulty, ſhe was furniſhed with a ſuit of armour; and two gentlemen, with their ſervants, were appointed to accompany her to court. She arrived at Chinon, where Charles then reſided, in the month of February.

The letters which Joan had received from Baudricourt, were ſent to the king as ſoon as ſhe arrived, but ſhe paſſed two days before ſhe could obtain an audience; it was even debated whether ſhe ſhould be admitted to the preſence of Charles. Curioſity, however prevailed, and ſhe procured admiſſion. Though Charles was diveſted of every enſign of royalty, ſhe diſtinguiſhed him from his courtiers, and addreſſed herſelf immediately to him. She promiſed to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans and conduct him to be crowned at Rheims. The energy with which ſhe expreſſed herſelf made converts of all who heard her. Charles, who could loſe nothing by the experiment, reſolved to try what effect her preſence would have on the drooping ſpirits of his troops. This reſolution was no ſooner adopted, than reports were induſtriouſly circulated, that ſhe had revealed a ſecret to the king, which, being only known to himſelf, muſt certainly have been diſcovered to her by heavenly inſpiration.

The troops glowed with impatience to retrieve their honour under the auſpices of this female champion. As ſoon as the nation was duly prepared for her reception ſhe aſſumed the habit of a man, was armed cap-a-pee, mounted on a ſtately courſer, and exhibited to the people. When a ſword was offered her, ſhe deſired that ſomebody might be ſent to the church of St. Catherine de Fierbois, for a particular ſword, which would be found on a tomb behind the great altar. Her requeſt was complied with, and the weapon was found and brought to her.

When the news of her approach reached the Engliſh camp, the ſoldiers infected with the general contagion, were ſeized with a ſecret horror: nor could they derive either courage or conſolation from the perſuaſions of their leaders, who aſſured them that the Maid, far from being the vicegerent of Heaven, was a mere engine of the devil.

Orleans had now been inveſted by the Engliſh ſeven months; and the conſtruction of the numerous forts which cut off all communication with the ſurrounding country had nearly reduced the ſpeedy capture of that city to an abſolute certainty. At this critical juncture Joan was diſpatched to Blois, where a large convoy of arms, ammunition, and proviſions had been collected for the ſupply of Orleans. Some days elapſed after her arrival before every thing was prepared for this important expedition on the ſucceſs of which the fate of the city, and, probably, of France, depended. This awful interval the Maid employed in exhorting the troops to place all their hopes in the aſſiſtance of Heaven. Her native eloquence, her fervent piety, forced incredulity itſelf to believe, and converted the moſt hardened hearts; the effects of her exhortations and example were almoſt univerſal. People ſaw with admiration a girl of ſeventeen, who could neither read nor write, performing, at once, the oppoſite functions of a general, and a miſſionary. She aſſembled all the prieſts in the town, and having formed them into a battalion, placed them at the head of the troops, as they marched out of Blois, preceded by a banner, decorated with a croſs. The air reſounded with hymns, which the ſoldiers repeated aloud. The troops became as enthuſiaſtic as their leader; they marched forward with unuſual confidence, impreſſed with the conviction that their efforts muſt be crowned with victory, and that they were favored with the moſt ſublime revelations*.

The mareſchal de Bouſſac, and La Hire accompanied the convoy, with an eſcort of ſix thouſand men. The convoy approached Orleans on the 29th of April, and, after a faint and ſpiritleſs reſiſtance by the Engliſh, who were unmanned by their ſuperſtitious fears, was conveyed into the city without loſs. The baſtard of Orleans, whom we ſhall hereafter call the count of Dunois, had been ſent out to ſupport the convoy, and to introduce Joan, who was received by the garriſon with acclamations of joy, as the ſaviour of their liberties. From this moment the garriſon believed themſelves invincible.

* Monſtrelet, ſpeaking of the Maid, obſerves, that ſhe had lived a conſiderable time at a ſmall inn, where ſhe acted in the capacity of oſtler; and, in the diſcharge of this maſculine duty, uſed frequently to ride the horſes of the gueſts to the watering-place, and to perform other offices to which young girls were little accuſtomed. But this account is proved to be a little falſe by informations taken at the place of Joan's birth, which demonſtrate that ſhe only paſſed a fortnight at an inn at Neufchâtel, in Lorraine, whither ſhe had been conducted by her uncle.

Joan, previous to her departure from Blois, had ſent, by a herald, a letter addreſſed to the king of England, the duke of Bedford, and to the generals who commanded the ſiege; in which ſhe ſummoned the Engliſh to leave Orleans, and reſtore the kingdom to the lawful ſovereign. The herald having been thrown into priſon, Joan, on her arrival at Orleans, ſent to demand him, threatening, in the governor's name, to make ripriſals. The herald was accordingly releaſed, and a letter ſent by him, replete with invectives. On the following days freſh convoys and freſh troops arrived in the town. The Maid was ever foremoſt to facilitate their entrance, placing herſelf at the head of her troops, between the enemy and the town, and diſplaying her conſecrated banner.

On the fourth of May, the French, under the command of Joan made a ſally, and attacked one of the Engliſh forts, which, after an obſtinate reſiſtance for four hours, was carried ſword in hand, and four hundred men, out of twelve, which compoſed the garriſon, were put to the ſword. On the Friday following two other forts were reduced. In theſe different aſſaults, Joan was always the foremoſt, with her ſtandard in her hand, diſplaying the coolneſs and intrepidity of a hero. Her courage was of a ſuperior kind, as ſhe had an extreme repugnance to the effuſion of human blood, and never killed any one. When queſtioned as to her motive for always carrying her banner in time of action, ſhe replied that ſhe would never make uſe of her ſword, nor put any perſon to death.

The enemy having abandoned one of their forts, named Saint John the White, and retired to another which they had erected on the ruins of the church of the Auguſtines, Joan advanced to attack it. The French had planted their ſcaling-ladders, when they were ſeized with a ſudden panic and fled with precipitation: the Maid was compelled to follow them; but ſeeing the Engliſh iſſuing from the fort to cut off their retreat, ſhe faced about, and advanced to meet them with an intrepid countenance. The boldeſt of her followers haſtened to her aſſiſtance; by degrees the whole detachment returned, when the attack was renewed, and, after a long and bloody conflict, the fort was taken.

The Engliſh had now nothing remaining on the ſide of Sologne but the fort of Tourelles, and an entrenchment which they had thrown up on the bridge. On this poſt, the moſt important of all, the ſucceſs of the ſiege depended. The attack was deferred till the next day. Joan paſſed the night under arms, at the head of a detachment; and, at the break of day, the French attacked the entrenchment, which was defended with great courage. Joan, having received a wound in the throat, retired to have it dreſſed; and the ſoldiers had no ſooner loſt ſight of her, than their courage began to fail them. They were on the point of ſounding a retreat, to which the count of Dunois had conſented, when Joan returned, and, running to the foot of the entrenchment, planted her ſtandard; and animating the ſoldiers perſuaded them to renew the charge. The Engliſh, ſtruck with terror, quitted the entrenchment, and ran for refuge to the fort; but moſt of them were drowned in the Loire, by the fall of the draw-bridge. The entrenchment being forced, the French haſtened to the fort of the Tourelles, which immediately ſurrendered.

Suffolk, having loſt ſix thouſand ſoldiers, in the different attacks, and finding that neither argument nor example could allay that panic with which his whole army were impreſſed, and which probably had infected his own, at length called a council of war, who were unanimous in opinion that the ſiege muſt be raiſed. The Engliſh army accordingly decamped from before Orleans, on the eighth of May, and retired to the different fortreſſes, on the banks of the Loire, which they had taken before the ſiege. This event is ſtill celebrated at Orleans every year, on the eighth of May, when public thankſgivings are offered up in the cathedral, and an eulogy is pronounced on the deliverer of the city.

Thus was the firſt object of Joan's extraordinary miſſion accompliſhed, a miſſion the divinity of which not the moſt incredulous of the French could now dare to diſpute, the duke of Bedford thus expreſſed himſelf in a letter which he wrote to the king and council of England:—"Alle things there proſpered for "you, till the tyme of the ſiege of Orleans, taken in hand, God knoweth by "what advis. At the whiche tyme, after the adventure fallen to the perſone "of my my couſin of Salyſbury, whom God aſſoille, there felle, by the hand "of God, as it ſeeemth a greet ſtrooke upon your peuple that was aſſembled "there in grete nombre, cauſed in grete partie, as I trowe, of lakke of ſadde "belive, and of unlevefulle doubte that thei hadde of a diſciple and lyme of "the fiende, called the Pucelle, that uſed fals enchauntments and ſorcerie. "The whiche ſtrooke and diſcomfiture nought oonly leſſed in grete partie the "nombre of youre peuple there, but as well withdrowe the courage of the "remenant, in marveilous wyſe, and couraiged youre adverſe partie and "enemy's*."

Joan, though the wound ſhe had received at the attack of the Tourelles was not yet cured, accompanied the count of Dunois to Loches, to inform the king of the ſucceſs of his arms. It was determined to march immediately towards Champagne, after taking all the places which the enemy ſtill poſſeſſed in the vicinity of Orleans. The duke of Alençon, with a body of ſix thouſand men, laid ſiege to Jargeau, whither the earl of Suffolk had retired with a ſmall detachment of the army. In a few days a practicable breach was affected, when the Engliſh offered to ſurrender, if not relieved within a fortnight; their propoſal, however, was rejected, and the troops had orders to begin the attack. During this ſiege, which laſted ten days, the Engliſh diſplayed more valour than they had lately ſhewn; while Joan, with her uſual intrepidity, animated the troops by her exhortation and example. As ſhe was mounting the breach, with her conſecrated ſtandard, ſhe was aſſailed with a ſhower of arrows, one of which tore her banner, while a ſtone ſtruck her on the head, and tumbled her into the foſſée. She ſoon, however, recovered. The French renewed the attack with additional vigour; and, in a ſhort time, made themſelves maſters of the place. One half of the garriſon, which conſiſted of twelve hundred men, were put to the ſword, and the remainder, with Suffolk and his brother, taken priſoners*.

The duke of Bedford having by this time ſomewhat recovered from the ſurprize into which he had been thrown by the late extraordinary reverſe of fortune, collected four thouſand men, which he ſent, under the conduct of Sir John Faſtolfe, to join the army now commanded by lord Talbot. The junction of theſe troops had not been long effected. The two armies met on the eighteenth of June, at the village of Patay, near Yenville.

The greateſt part of the Engliſh diſpirited by their late misfortunes, and ſtill under the influence of that ſuperſtitious panic to which thoſe misfortunes were imputable, fled at the firſt onſet. Sir John Faſtolfe himſelf, who had ſignalized his courage in many a well-diſputed conflict, eſcaped not the general infection; he ſet the example of flight to his troops, and the order of the Garter was taken from him, as a puniſhment for this inſtance of cowardice. Lord Talbot, indeed, fought with his uſual bravery; but, being deſerted by his army, was ſoon obliged to ſurrender. In this action eighteen hundred of the Engliſh were ſlain, and about one hundred gentlemen taken priſoners, beſides the Lords Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford†.

Sully was the firſt place taken by the French, after the battle of Patay; and Tremoille, to whom the town belonged, led the king thither notwithſtanding the ſolicitations of the citizens of Orleans, who, anxious to behold their ſovereign, had requeſted Charles to honour them with his preſence, and having prepared every thing for his reception, they could not conceal their diſcontent when they found their hopes diſappointed. The king, however, was obliged to repair to Château-Neuf on the Loire, between Sully and Gien, where ſeveral councils were held for the purpoſe of ſettling the plan of future operations. Some, eager to profit by the conſternation of the Engliſh, propoſed to enter Normandy, which was then deſtitute of troops; while others, were of opinion that the king ſhould immediately proceed to Rheims. Joan herſelf inceſſantly ſolicited Charles to fulfil this important part of her miſſion; and the aſcendancy which ſhe had gained, by her heroic courage and uninterrupted ſucceſs, over the minds of the people, overcame every objection which was oppoſed to her advice.

The accompliſhment of this project, undertaken in contradiction to all the rules of human prudence, was a matter of ſuch extreme difficulty, that the bare propoſal, but a few weeks before, would have been conſidered as inſanity. Rheims was at the diſtance of near eighty leagues, and in poſſeſſion of the enemy; the road that led to it was in a manner lined with hoſtile troops, and defended by a variety of ſtrong fortreſſes; while Charles had only a body of ten thouſand men to overcome theſe complicated difficulties. But to an army inflated with recent ſucceſs, ſtimulated by a reſiſtleſs ſpirit of ſuperſtition, and led by an heroic enthuſiaſt, convinced of her own inſpiration, no obſtacles could appear inſurmountable.

The army, being aſſembled in the environs of Gien, was there reviewed by the king, whoſe finances were ſo far exhauſted, that it was ſcarcely poſſible to muſter money ſufficient to diſcharge even a ſmall part of the pay that was already due to the troops. But this defect was ſupplied by the ardour with which both officers and men embarked in the enterprize. The nobility flocked to the ſtandard of their lawful ſovereign, and all, whoſe fortune enabled them to defray their own expences, refuſed to accept any pay.

The army firſt marched to Auxerre, which refuſed to open its gates; but the offer of the citizens to ſupply the troops with proviſions, and to be guided in their conduct by the example of other towns, being accepted*, they purſued their route to Troyes, which they immediately inveſted. The garriſon was compoſed of ſix hundred men at arms, half Engliſh and half Burgundians. The French had brought no artillery with them; and, to encreaſe their embarraſſment, they were ſo ill ſupplied with proviſions, that a ſcarcity prevailed on the ſecond day of the ſiege. A council was called, at which opinions were divided; ſome propoſed to raiſe the ſiege of Troyes, and proceed immediately to Rheims; while others, diſcouraged by the numerous difficulties they had to encounter, were of opinion that it would be moſt prudent to return to Orleans. By adopting the firſt propoſal, the army would have been expoſed to a ſimilar oppoſition from every town on the road; while by following the laſt, they would have covered themſelves with ſhame.

Charles reſolved to conſult Joan d'Arc; who was accordingly ſummoned to attend the council. She poſitively affirmed that before the expiration of three days, the king ſhould enter the town. The archbiſhop of Rheims, chancellor of France, who was preſent at the time, told her, that if her prediction was verified within a week, Charles would think himſelf very fortunate; but the Maid repeated her promiſe with an air of confidence, that inſpired the troops with additional courage. She took the whole management of the aſſault upon herſelf, and advancing to the ſide of the foſſée, there fixed her conſecrated banner, and made the neceſſary preparations for the attack. The garriſon, ſeeing her approach, were ſtricken with a panic, and offered to capitulate; and that ſame day Charles entered the town in triumph. After refreſhing his troops, he purſued his march to Châlons, and was agreeably ſurprized at meeting with the biſhop, and a deputation of the principal inhabitants, who had come forth to meet him with the keys of the town.

But notwithſtanding this unexpected ſucceſs, the chief object of the expedition ſtill remained to be accompliſhed; viz. the reduction of Rheims. That city was defended by ſix hundred choſen men, under the conduct of Saveuſe and Châtillon, who might eaſily have ſtopped the progreſs of the royal army, and have given time to the enemy to relieve the place, the ſiege of which Charles was not in a ſituation to undertake. But far from making reſiſtance, they were no ſooner apprized of the reduction of Troyes and Châlons, than they aſſembled the inhabitants of Rheims, and declared that the defence of the city required a reinforcement of troops, whoſe departure they were going to haſten, exhorting them to repel with vigour the attacks of the enemy during their abſence. But they had no ſooner left the town, than the citizens ſent deputies to Charles, to requeſt he would honour them with his preſence.

It is highly probable that, in evacuating Rheims, Seveuſe and Châtillon had only acted in compliance with the ſecret orders of the duke of Burgundy. The refuſal to ſequeſter the city of Orleans in his hands, had greatly diſpleaſed that prince; and a coolneſs had ever ſince ſubſiſted between him and the regent. Charles entered Rheims on the twenty-ſeventh of July, when the dukes of Lorraine and Bar, and the Damoſeau de Commercy, accompanied by a numerous and martial retinue, came to make him a tender of their ſervices. The ceremony of his coronation was performed, with great ſolemnity, on the twenty-eighth; and, as ſoon as it was finiſhed, the Maid of Orleans, who had ſtood near his perſon in complete armour, with her ſacred banner in her hand, fell at his feet, and, embracing his knees, with tears of joy entreated his permiſſion to return home, the two grand objects of her miſſion being completed. The king, however, being too ſenſible of the advantages which he derived from her preſence to comply with her requeſt, Joan was compelled to remain with the army. But from this moment ſhe ceaſed to take the chief direction of the troops upon herſelf, or to offer her opinions in oppoſition to that of the council, or of the principal officers. She contented herſelf, in future, with ſtanding foremoſt in every danger. She, probably, hoped by this conduct, to extinguiſh thoſe ſentiments of jealouſy which her ſervices had excited.

The coronation of Charles proved far from a vain and barren ceremony; it ſeemed to give him a freſh title to the allegiance of his ſubjects, who, confounded by ſuch an uninterrupted ſucceſſion of extraordinary events, could no longer heſitate to aſcribe them to ſome ſupernatural influence. Impreſſed with theſe ideas, they regarded their ſubmiſſion to the Engliſh as an act of oppoſition to the will of Heaven, and became impatient to ſwear fealty to Charles, whom they now eſteemed as their only lawful ſovereign. The inhabitants of Laon, Neufchâtel, Soiſſons, and of many other towns and fortreſſes, expelled the Engliſh and Burgundian garriſons, and ſubmitted to him*; and the whole nation appeared to give him the moſt unequivocal marks of their duty and attachment. Charles's expedition, from Rheims to the Iſle of France, had rather the appearance of a triumphal march, than of the progreſs of an army in an enemy's country.

While Charles was advancing, with ſuch rapidity, into the heart of France, the duke of Bedford exerted his utmoſt addreſs to counteract the effects of his victories. Knowing that the French monarch had made advances to the duke of Burgundy, in order to detach him from the Engliſh, he conducted himſelf with ſo much ſkill and prudence in this dangerous criſis, that he prevailed on that prince to renew his alliance with him†. By the alternate employment of careſſes and ſeverity, he retained the Pariſians in obedience, and prevented the defection of many other places which had evinced a diſpoſition to eſpouſe the intereſt of Charles. The duke of Burgundy left Paris on the ſixteenth of July, to aſſemble his troops, and, two days after, the regent ſet out for Normandy, to raiſe the forces of that province; from thence he proceeded to Calais, where his uncle, the biſhop of Wincheſter—who was now created Cardinal—had landed with an army of five thouſand men, which he was conducting into Bohemia, on a cruſade againſt the Huſſites. Having perſuaded his uncle to join theſe troops to thoſe which he had juſt raiſed‡, he found himſelf at the head of ten thouſand men, with which he returned to Paris. On the approach of Charles, he left the capital, and pitched his camp between Corbeil and Melun.

The king, on his departure from Provins, had directed his march towards the frontiers of Brie, with the reſolution to bring the enemy to battle; but on their approach, he changed his courſe, and determined to regain the banks of the Loire. The troops had already advanced as far as Bray, when Charles was again induced, by the advice of his principal officers, to alter his reſolution; and the royaliſts accordingly facing about proceeded to Dammartin, where they eſtabliſhed their quarters.

The duke of Bedford left Paris a ſecond time, and the two armies remained in ſight of each other a whole day, but without coming to action. The regent, then returned to the capital, while the king repaired to Creſſy, in Valois, whence he ſummoned the towns of Beuvais and Compiégne to ſurrender. The inhabitants of both theſe places expreſſed their readineſs to acknowledge the authority of their lawful ſovereign, and thoſe of Beauvais expelled their biſhop for his ſervile attachment to the Engliſh.

Charles advanced towards Compiégne, in order to take poſſeſſion of that town but learning, as he approached Senlis, that the duke of Bedford had left Paris, for the third time, with a view of intercepting him in his march, he halted at Monpilloi, and waited for the enemy. The regent ſoon came in ſight, but ſtill doubtful of the confidence of his own troops, while he ſeemed to face the enemy, he choſe his poſts with ſo much care and diſcernment, that Charles in vain endeavored to compel him to a deciſive action. After remaining two days in preſence of each other the two armies ſeparated†; the Engliſh returned to Paris, and the king proceded to Compiégne, which opened its gates to receive him. During his ſtay in that city he received the ſubmiſſion of the inhabitants of Senlis, and ſeveral other places.

While theſe hoſtile motions ſpread conſternation around the metropolis, the duke of Burgundy remained at Arras, under pretence of aſſembling his troops. If this prince had employed all his forces in favour of the enemy, he might eaſily have ſtopped the victorious progreſs of the royal arms. But experience had at length convinced him that his intereſt and that of the Engliſh were oppoſed to each other. Content with keeping up appearances with his allies, and with avoiding an open rupture, their humiliation gave him a ſecret ſatisfaction. The king ſent the archbiſhop of Rheims, to wait on him with propoſals for a reconciliation. The duke expreſſed his pleaſure at this mark of attention, and by his anſwers gave the envoy reaſon to believe that the time was not far diſtant when he and the king might meet as friends. At this period, the French reduced Aumale and Château-Gillard, where they found the brave Barbazan who had been detained a priſoner in that fortreſs eight years. The conſtable too, having aſſembled ſeven thouſand men, entered Normandy, and took poſſeſſion of Evreux—but on the approach of the duke of Bedford, he was compelled to retire with precipitation.

On Sunday, the eighth of September, the army, commanded by the duke of Alençon, the count of Clermont, and the lord of Montmorenci, who, ſince the reduction of Compiégne, had done homage to the king, approached Paris by the gate of Saint-Denis, to deceive the Engliſh, while a ſtrong detachment began the attack on the oppoſite ſide. The beſiegers had flattered themſelves, that the people would riſe in the town and ſecond their efforts, but finding no ſigns of an inſurrection, ſoon prepared to retreat. Joan d'Arc, unaccuſtomed to fly, reſolved to perſiſt in her efforts to reduce the place; ignorant of the depth of the foſſée, ſhe inceſſantly called for faſcines to fill it up; and while thus employed, ſhe received a wound in the thigh from a croſs-bow. The pain ſhe experienced, and the quantity of blood ſhe loſt, compelled her to lie down behind a ſmall eminence, where ſhe was ſuffered to remain till night, when the duke of Alençon went to her aſſiſtance. Joan, notwithſtanding her ſimplicity, could no longer doubt that her merit and atchievements had made her many enemies; of this the danger to which ſhe had been ſo long left expoſed was alone ſufficient to convince her. She now renewed her ſolicitations to the king for permiſſion to return to her friends; and being reſolved no longer to bear arms, ſhe made a preſent of her martial habiliments to the monks of Saint-Denis: Charles however, refuſed her requeſt, and ſhe was ſtill compelled to remain with the army. The troops decamped four days after this unſucceſsful attack. He next took poſſeſſion of Gournay, Bray, Melun, and Sens.

The duke of Burgundy arrived at Paris in December with eight hundred men at arms. This body of troops excited the regent's ſuſpicions; and he requeſted the duke to enter the city with only a part of his retinue; but this Burgundy refuſed. His entry rather reſembled a triumph; being preceded by ten heralds at arms, and an equal number of trumpeters. The cardinal of Wincheſter arrived ſoon after.

A. D. 1430.] The reſult was a truce for Picardy, Artois, Champagne, and Burgundy, and ſome particular towns in other parts of the kingdom, which deſired to be included in the ceſſation of arms; ſome days after the truce was concluded, Saint Cloud, Saint Denis, Vincennes, and the bridge of Charenton were comprized in it, at the ſolicitation of the Engliſh, who were anxious to ſecure a ſupply of proviſions for the capital *. The truce was publiſhed at Paris, in preſence of the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy, the cardinal of Wincheſter, and the deputies of the different orders; and, on the ſame day, the duke of Burgundy was conſtituted governor of Paris, and regent of the whole kingdom of France except Normandy, till Eaſter †.

Charles, croſſed the Seine at Bray, whence he purſued his march to the banks of the Loire. The remainder of the campaign was employed in the reduction of Saint-Pierre-le-Moutier, a town ſituated in the Nivernois, between the Loire and the Allier. The approaches were made in form, and in a few days a practicable breach was affected. The Maid was preſent at the ſiege, and animated the troops by her exortations and example. The French diſplayed their uſual courage and confidence in the aſſault, but the place was defended with ſuch obſtinate valour, that, after a long and bloody conflict, they were compelled to retreat. But the heroic Maid diſdained to fly; Dolon, a gentleman who had been appointed to attend her*, being ſent to entreat that ſhe would return to the camp, found her ſurrounded by five or ſix men at arms, who had bravely reſolved to ſacrifice their lives to her ſafety. Her intrepidity ſeemed to encreaſe with the danger to which ſhe was expoſed—She proteſted ſhe would never abandon her poſt till ſhe had attained her object. Her reſolution inſpired the troops with freſh courage, and urged them to renew their exertions for ſubduing the town. They returned to the attack with a degree of fury that proved irreſiſtible: the garriſon gave away, and the place was taken.

The king repaſſed the Loire, and the troops were put into winter quarters. Charles, convinced that he was indebted for the glorious ſucceſs of the laſt campaign, to the zeal of his ſubjects, the courage of his nobles, and the heroic enthuſiaſm of the Maid, evinced an anxiety to prove his gratitude for ſuch important ſervices. On the city of Orleans, the valour and fidelity of whoſe inhabitants had firſt revived his drooping hopes, and turned the tide of ſucceſs in his favour, he conferred a variety of new privileges and exemptions. He ſent for Joan's parents, and granted a patent of nobility to the Maid herſelf, to her father and three brothers, and to all their deſcendants, both male and female; he alſo changed the name of their family from d'Arc to du Lys; a name which their poſterity always preſerved, with the addition of—dit la Pucelle. The privilege, in favour of the female deſcendants of Joan's family, ſubſiſted till the commencement of the ſeventeenth century. Eude le Maire, who was deſcended from it by the mother's ſide, regiſtered his letters of nobility in 1608; but ſix years after this prerogative was ſuppreſſed, by an arrêt of the parliament, and limited, in future, to the male heirs.

The Engliſh, meanwhile, made ſome attempts on Lagny, which were ſucceſsfully repelled by the valorous exertions of Ambroſe de Lore, Foucaut, Chabannes, Xaintrailles, and Joan d'Arc. The Maid had lately left the French court to join the army. At the head of three hundred men, ſhe attacked a famous leader of banditti, called Franquet d'Arras; he was defeated and taken priſoner. Being conveyed to Lagny, his life was made to pay the forfeit of his crimes; Joan had interceded in his favour, but her ſolicitations were rejected, yet was the execution of Franquet afterward aſcribed to her as a crime, by her iniquitous judges.

* Procés MS. de Jeanne d'Arc. Depoſition du Sieur Dolon.

The duke of Bedford, having obſerved the great effects produced by the coronation of Charles, was induced to believe that if young Henry were to undergo the ſame ceremony, it might be attended with ſimilar advantages. He ſolicited the protector and council of England to ſend him over without delay; but the nation was ſo much exhauſted by the war, that ſix months elapſed before money could be procured to defray the expences of his journey; even then the protector was obliged to raiſe it by pawning the jewels of the crown, and by extorting numerous loans, ſome of which were ſo trifling as not to exceed five marks *. The young king, embarked at Dover, on the twenty-ſeventh of April, 1430, and landed at Calais, the ſame day, attended by the chief nobility of England, and a conſiderable number of troops. But many of theſe troops were ſo terrified by the accounts they had heard of the Maid of Orleans, that they immediately deſerted and returned to England. From Calais Henry was conducted to Rouen, where he remained till December, in the following year from the inability of the regent to raiſe money to defray the expences of his coronation.

Compiégne, being in the poſſeſſion of the royaliſts, cut off the communication between Picardy and the Iſle of France, its reduction, therefore, became an object of importance. A numerous garriſon, aided by the zeal and courage of the inhabitants, rendered the undertaking difficult. The duke of Burgundy inveſted the town on every ſide at the ſame moment; but his plans, though conducted with ſecreſy, had been diſcovered to the French; and Joan d'Arc, accompanied by Xaintrailles, had thrown herſelf into the place.

While the enemy's troops were taking poſſeſſion of their reſpective quarters, the Maid made a ſally, at the head of ſix hundred men, and attacked the poſt of Marigny, whither Luxembourg and ſome other of the generals had repaired to examine the approaches to the town. The enemy, though, at firſt thrown into ſome confuſion, made a ſucceſsful reſiſtance; and the royaliſts, found it neceſſary to retreat; when Joan, placing herſelf in the rear of the detachment, frequently faced about, and checked the purſuit of the enemy. Juſt as the laſt ranks had paſſed the barriers, an Engliſh archer, attacked the Maid, and pulled her from her horſe. The baſtard of Vendôme, coming up at the time, Joan, who was diſarmed, ſurrendered herſelf his priſoner.

Flavy, governor of Compiégne, was accuſed of having contributed to the capture of the Maid, by giving ſecret orders to ſhut the barrier againſt her; but this accuſation was wholly deſtitute of truth; nothing can be found to juſtify it. Could any thing have added to the glory which Joan had ſo well-earned; the immoderate joy diſplayed by the Engliſh and Burgundians on her capture muſt have encreaſed it†. The ſoldiers flocked in crowds to behold this girl of eighteen, whoſe very name had, for more than a year, made them tremble, and carried terror even to the capital of England. The duke of Burgundy converſed with her ſome time. Couriers were diſpatched to all the towns in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, to invite the inhabitants to partake of the general ſatisfaction; and the duke of Bedford ordered public rejoicings at Paris, preceded by a Te Deum. The duke of Burgundy continued to preſs the ſiege of Compiégne, though with more vigour than ſucceſs. He was ſoon called into the Low Countries, on the death of his couſin, Philip of Brabant, whoſe inheritance the counteſs of Hainaut threatened to diſpute with him. Bruxelles, and all the principal towns in Brabant, acknowledged the duke for their ſovereign, who added that rich and fertile province to his other extenſive dominions.

Compiégne after having been inveſted nearly ſix months, found itſelf reduced to the laſt extremity, though rather from want of proviſions than from the efforts of the enemy. Luxembourg conſidered its reduction as infallible, when the count of Vendôme, Xaintrailles, and ſeveral other officers of rank, having formed a junction of the different corps under their command, which compoſed a body of four thouſand fighting men, advanced as far as Verberie, with the intention of relieving the place. The enemy called a council of war, at which it was reſolved to leave a ſufficient force to guard the entrenchments, and to march with the remainder of the army againſt the French, who were then drawn up in order of battle, within ſight of Compiégne. When the Engliſh and Burgundians came in preſence of the royaliſts, they halted.

While the two armies remained in this ſituation, different detachments of the French having made a circuit, entered the town by the gate on the oppoſite ſide *. Theſe detatchments, with a part of the garriſon, under the command of Flavy, attacked a work which was defended by Brimeau, mareſchal of Burgundy. The French were twice repulſed; but being encouraged by Xaintrailles, and by the inhabitants of the town, who, both men and women, ran to partake of the glory of the enterprize, they returned a third time to the charge, and carried the poſt. Luxembourg was informed of this diſaſter, which he could neither prevent nor remedy. The reduction of this fort gave a free acceſs to the troops, who immediately entered Compiégne in ſight of the enemy. Next day they conſtructed a bridge of boats, repaſſed the Oyſe, and reduced a ſecond fort on the banks of that river. The enemy, alarmed, evacuated a third, ſo that only one, which commanded the bridge, now remained in their poſſeſſion. Luxembourg, diſconcerted by ſuch repeated loſſes, made his troops return to their quarters; he was uncertain how to act, till the deſertion of a great part of his army put an end to his doubts, and compelled him to raiſe the ſiege. The enemy having received orders to retreat, fled with ſuch precipitation, that a part of the baggage, with all their proviſion, ammunition, and artillery, fell into the hands of the French.

A ſplendid victory, obtained by Xaintrailles over a body of Engliſh and Burgundians at Germigny, completed the glory of this ſucceſsful campaign. The number of priſoners taken in theſe different expeditions was prodigious, and moſt of them were men of diſtinction; where the enemy had taken one, the royaliſts had taken ten *. This being the caſe, it is truly aſtoniſhing that nobody ſhould have thought of offering ſome of theſe numerous priſoners in exchange for the maid of Orleans. After the important ſervices which ſhe had rendered to her king and country, ſuch an inſtance of neglect reflects eternal diſgrace on the memory of Charles, whoſe falling fortunes ſhe had ſo gallantly reſtored, and of thoſe warriors who had witneſſed her glorious atchievements, and triumphed under her auſpices.

The ſucceſs of the French arms was not confined to Picardy and the iſle of France. Barbazan, aſſembled three thouſand troops in the environs of Châlons, in Champagne, with which he attacked the united forces of England and Burgundy. The enemy, whoſe army amounted to eight thouſand men, had taken poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt. The firſt efforts of the French were ſuſtained with great firmneſs; but Le Bourge de Vignoles, having attacked them in the rear, during the heat of the action, they were inſtantly thrown into confuſion, and all the exertions of the leaders to encourage or rally their men proving ineffectual, they were completely routed. Almoſt the whole army were either killed or taken priſoners. This victory only coſt the royaliſts eighty men.

That period was now arrived, at which the Maid of Orleans was doomed to fall the victim of a barbarous age. The conſpicuous part which this heroine played in the tranſactions of the preſent reign; the celebrity which ſhe juſtly acquired by the extent and importance of her ſervices; her courage, her character, her virtues, her misfortunes—all combine to render her an object highly intereſting to the reader, and to juſtify the hiſtorian in paying due honor to her memory, by unveiling the iniquity of her perſecutors; by expoſing to the indignation of the world, the baſe and wicked means that were exerted † for the deſtruction of a girl of eighteen, whoſe only crime was the attempt to reſtore her ſovereign to the throne of his anceſtors, and to reſcue her country from foreign oppreſſion.

1431. A. D.] Immediately after Joan had been taken, friar Martin, vicar general of the inquiſition of France, claimed the priſoner—"As vehemently ſuſ-"pected of many crimes ſavouring of hereſy; crimes which could neither be "concealed, nor overlooked without good and proper reparation:"—Theſe were the expreſſions he made uſe of when he wrote to the duke of Burgundy, and the count of Ligny—"moſt humbly and affectionately entreating them," and, a few lines after, "expreſsly enjoining them, in virtue of his office, and of the authority "committed to him by the holy ſee, under the pain of incurring the penalties of diſobedi- "ence, to ſend, as ſoon as poſſible, the ſaid Joan, to anſwer before him, to ſuch charges "as the attorney for the inquiſition ſhould prefer againſt her." The Maid was taken on the twenty-fourth of May, and this letter was written on the twenty-ſeventh.

The Univerſity of Paris wrote, at the ſame time, to the duke and to the count, and their ſolicitations were ſtill more urgent: not content with deſiring that the Maid might be delivered up to the Inquiſition, they expreſſed their hopes that ſhe would be watched ſo cloſely that no opportunity of eſcaping the juſtice of the church could poſſibly occur. This abominable letter, and another to the duke of Burgundy, couched nearly in the ſame terms, are inſerted in the criminal proceſs. The univerſity employed the moſt preſſing ſolicitations to prevent the Maid from eſcaping, or from being releaſed on paying a ranſom.

Joan had, at firſt, been confined in the fortreſs of Beaulieu, and afterwards in the caſtle of Beaurevoir. The extreme rigour of her captivity gave her but too juſt reaſon to dread the horrid ſcene that was to follow. Theſe alarming apprehenſions, and her indignation at the continual railleries and inſulting language of her guards, who had formerly trembled at her aſpect, led her to make a deſperate attempt to recover her liberty. Having watched an opportunity while her motions were leſs attended to than uſual, ſhe jumped from one of the windows of the tower; but ſhe was unfortunately ſo much hurt by the fall, as to be unable to riſe from the ground. She was immediately ſeized and conveyed back to her priſon, where ſhe was confined more cloſely than before, and ſoon after was transferred to the caſtle of Crotoy. During this time, every exertion was made to get her from the count of Ligny. That nobleman having, at firſt, evinced a reluctance to give her up, the duke of Bedford had applied to the duke of Burgundy to interpoſe his authority; while the biſhop of Beauvais who ſaid that ſhe was taken within his dioceſe, ſummoned them both to deliver the priſoner into his poſſeſſion. The count was offered ſix thouſand livres for her, and afterwards ten thouſand.

The count of Lingy was ſtaggered by theſe injunctions and offers, notwithſtanding the ſolicitations of his wife, who repeatedly threw herſelf at his feet, and conjured him, not to deliver up to certain death a brave and innocent captive, whom the laws of war commanded him to reſpect. The inquiſitor, the biſhop of Beauvais, and the univerſity of Paris returned to the charge, preſſed the duke of Burgundy anew, offered to give ſecurity to the count of Ligny for the ten thouſand livres, and even preſented a petition to the king of England, to "beg his high excellence, in honour of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, to give or- "ders that this women ſhould be ſhortly rendered into the hands of the Eccleſiaſtical Judge." At length the iniquitous bargain was concluded; Ligny received ten thouſand livres, and a penſion of three hundred was ſettled on the Baſtard of Vendôme. Joan was then delivered up to a detachment of Engliſh troops who conducted her to Rouen, where ſhe was to be tried.

Cauchon, biſhop of Beauvais, five other French prelates; friar Martin, vicar general of the inquiſition in France; about fifty doctors of the cannon law, with the cardinal of Wincheſter, were appointed to try this extraordinary cauſe.

Theſe judges held their firſt ſeſſion at Rouen, on the twenty-firſt of February, 1431; when their priſoner appeared before them, bending beneath the weight of chains, from which ſhe earneſtly, but in vain, entreated them to relieve her. The queſtions that were put to her chiefly tended to eſtabliſh her belief in the reality of thoſe viſions, and of that intercourſe with departed ſaints, which ſhe had originally aſſigned as a reaſon for undertaking the defence of her country.

At the ſecond ſeſſion, ſhe was aſked whether king Charles had had viſions as well as herſelf,—"Send to aſk him," replied the Maid. She was repeatedly preſſed to ſay whether ſhe was of opinion that ſhe had done right in attacking Paris on a feſtival; at lentgth ſhe anſwered that ſuch ſolemn days certainly ought to be reſpected, but that, for an error of that nature, it was the province of her confeſſor to give her abſolution. When aſked whether the ſaints had ever announced the deſcent of the Engliſh, ſhe anſwered that the Engliſh had invaded France long before the period of her firſt revelations;—in fact, ſhe was but three years old when Henry the Fifth firſt landed on the coaſt of Normandy, in 1415. At the fifth ſeſſion ſhe declared that, before the expiration of ſeven years, the Engliſh would experience a much heavier loſs than they had ſuſtained before Orleans.

The judges aſſembled on the third of March, for the ſixth time, when abſurd queſtions were repeated, to perplex and confound the unhappy victim, who, from time to time, betrayed her hopes of eſcaping the rage of her tyrants. When queſtioned whether ſuch hopes were founded on a promiſe made her by the celeſtial ſpirits with whom ſhe had converſed, "That has no "concern with my trial"—ſaid ſhe—"do you wiſh me to ſpeak againſt my-"ſelf?" A report having been circulated that a child had been raiſed from the dead by Joan at Lagny, the biſhop of Beauvais hoped, by extorting from her a confeſſion of this miracle, to obtain ſufficient proof for his purpoſe; but the Maid defeated his malice, by replying that the child being thought dead was carried to the church, where it had exhibited ſufficient ſigns of life to juſtify the adminiſtration of baptiſm;—a miracle which could be only aſcribed to God himſelf. With a view to convict her of ſuperſtition, ſhe was aſked whether ſhe had often changed her banner; whether that banner had been conſecrated; for what purpoſe ſhe had cauſed the names of Jeſus and Mary to be embroidered thereon; whether ſhe had aſcribed any fortunate effects to her banner; and whether ſhe had inſtilled ſuch a belief into the French troops? They demanded, "Why ſhe carried her ſtandard in her hand, at the coronation of Charles "at Rheims?"—"It was but juſt," ſaid ſhe, "that having ſhared the toils "and dangers, it ſhould likewiſe ſhare the glory."

Her judges were diſconcerted, but their hearts were not touched. They had recourſe to the unprincipled expedient of altering her anſwers, in order to give them a criminal interpretation. William Manchon, one of the two ſecretaries who were employed to write down her anſwers, made oath that he had been applied to for this purpoſe, but had rejected with ſcorn the infamous propoſal, notwithſtanding the urgent ſolicitations of the biſhop of Beauvais, who abuſed him in the moſt groſs and illiberal manner, for harbouring ſcruples to which he himſelf was a ſtranger. About the middle of the trial, another apoſtolic notary, of a more pliant diſpoſition, was employed. Cauchon likewiſe engaged a prieſt, named Oyſelleur, to introduce himſelf into the priſon, and to gain her confidence, by pretending to be a priſoner like herſelf. Deceived by the perfidious eccleſiaſtic, ſhe made no ſcruple to confeſs to him, while two men, concealed for the purpoſe, overheard and wrote down every thing ſhe ſaid. But none of theſe baſe artifices had yet brought any thing to light which could poſſibly affect the life or liberty of Joan; and the infamous prelate, enraged at the diſappointment, was ſtrongly ſuſpected of an attempt to poiſon his innocent victim *.

A ſtate of the trial being drawn up, was ſubmitted to the inſpection of certain doctors, who declared the proofs inſufficient to eſtabliſh the conviction of the priſoner; the interrogatories, were renewed, though the object was ſtill the ſame. At the thirteenth ſeſſion, Joan's judges attempted to make her comprehend the diſtinction between the church-triumphant, and the church-militant, and to extort from her an opinion on that difference; a queſtion which could never have been put by divines to a young girl who could neither read nor write, but with the malignant intention of taking an unfair advantage of her reply. The Maid anſwered that ſhe ſhould always be ready to ſubmit to the church. One of the judges, an Auguſtin monk, named friar Iſembert, being moved with compaſſion, ſeized this opportunity to adviſe her to appeal to the pope and council, which ſhe immediately did. This appeal muſt have ſnatched her from the fury of her enemies, but for the interference of Cauchon, who caſting a look of indignation at the monk, ordered him in the Devil's name to be ſilent; he, at the ſame time, forbade the ſecretary to make any mention of the appeal. Joan obſerving the perfidy of her judges, exclaimed—"Ah, you write down every thing

* Depoſition de Thyac, Medecin. Procés. MS.

" that tells againſt me, but will ſuffer nothing that is in my favour to be written " down."

The conduct of this crowd of prieſts, doctors, and divines, preſided by an unprincipled biſhop, in employing, againſt a ſimple and inexperienced girl, all the ſubtilties which a deſire of finding her guilty could ſuggeſt, cannot but excite the moſt lively indignation. They ineſſantly laid ſome new ſnare for her ignorance; putting queſtions to her on different ſubjects at the ſame moment, queſtions which had no connection with each other, and employing, in ſhort, every kind of feint and equivocation, that could throw her off her guard. They often loſt ſight of the principal object to interrogate her on matters the moſt trifling, puerile, and abſurd. They aſked her whether ſhe took frequent walks in her infancy; whether ſhe had ever fought with her infant companions; whether ſhe had ever painted herſelf; whether the ſaints who appeared to her talked French or Engliſh; and whether they wore ear-rings, and rings?—" You took one ring from me," ſaid ſhe to Cauchon, " pray return it."

During her trial, the count of Ligny, had the curioſity to pay her a viſit. He endeavoured to perſuade her that he came to treat about her ranſom; but the Maid replied—" You have neither the inclination nor the ability. I know very " well that theſe Engliſhmen will put me to death, in the belief that, after my " death, they will conquer the kingdom of France; but were there a hundred " thouſand more God-damns than there are here at preſent, they would never re- " duce this kingdom." Stafford drew his ſword, and would have run her through the body, had he not been prevented by Warwick*. She complained that an Engliſh nobleman, of high rank, attempted to raviſh her in priſon; but the authority which the culprit enjoyed, prevented this fact from being duly atteſted. The ducheſs of Bedford, obtained a promiſe from her huſband that no violence ſhould be offered to the perſon of Joan, whoſe pretentions to chaſtity ſhe had cauſed to be verified. During that examination the duke of Bedford was concealed in an adjoining apartment, whence, by an aperture made in the wall, he beheld his perſecuted victim, in a ſtate of pure nature.

At length the captive maid, bending beneath the weight of her chains, expoſed to the moſt inhuman treatment, daily inſulted by her guards and by her judges, fell dangerouſly ill. The duke of Bedford, the cardinal of Wincheſter, and the earl of Warwick appointed two phyſicians to attend her, with the ſtrongeſt injunctions " to take care that ſhe did not die a natural death; " adding, that the king of England had bought her at a dear rate; that it was " his intention to commit her to the flames; that the biſhop of Beauvais " was apprized of this, and that it was for that reaſon he was ſo eager to

* Villaret, tom. xv. p. 57.

"have the trial finiſhed *." In fact, the judges frequently met twice a day; and Joan was likewiſe obliged to ſubmit to various private examinations in priſon. The biſhop wiſhed to put her to the rack, and the inſtruments of torture were placed before her; but the dreadful ſight was incapable of betraying her into any variation or equivocation in her anſwers. Nothing but the dread of her dying during the operation deterred Cauchon from putting his project in execution.

The trial being ended, ſeventy charges were exhibited againſt Joan, which were reduced to twelve; and ſent to the univerſity of Paris, who confirmed the deciſions of the tribunal at Rouen; and, at the ſame time, wrote to the king of England, beſeeching him to order ſentence to be pronounced without delay. When the trial was read to the Maid, ſhe pointed out ſeveral parts of it which were contrary to truth, and where her replies were groſsly miſrepreſented; but her remarks were diſregarded, and her judges, bent on her ruin, reſolved to purſue her to the utmoſt. On the twenty-fourth of May, Joan was conducted to the church-yard of Saint Ouen, where a ſcaffold was erected, and a defamatory ſermon preached by one William Erard, replete with illiberal abuſe, and the moſt groſs invectives againſt the Maid herſelf, the king, and the whole nation. After this ſermon the biſhop of Beauvais roſe to pronounce ſentence.

The object which the judges had in view was but imperfectly fulfilled. By condemning Joan, as convicted of the crimes imputed to her, and by putting her to death, in conſequence of ſuch condemnation, without that previous confeſſion of her guilt which the laws required, they would rather confirm than remove the ſuſpicion, that revenge and and not juſtice had been conſulted in her trial. She had formerly denied moſt of the charges exhibited againſt her, and the want of evidence rendered the proceedings irregular. The only mode of making her appear guilty was by extorting from her a public retractation. She was accordingly ſummoned to abjure; but ſhe ſaid that ſhe knew not the ſignification of that term, and begged ſhe might be allowed to have ſome perſon to conſult with. The perſon who was choſen for this purpoſe, aſſured her if ſhe perſiſted in contradicting any one of the charges ſhe would be infallibly burned; and he adviſed her to ſubmit herſelf to the ſentence of the church. Joan, raiſing her voice, then ſaid—"I appeal to the univerſal church, whether "I ought to abjure or not."—"You muſt abjure immediately," exclaimed Erard, "or you will be burned." While this ſcene was paſſing on the ſcaffold, the people evinced their indignation by a confuſed murmur; and the biſhop of Beauvais was preparing to pronounce ſentence, after which Joan was given to underſtand there could be no hopes of mercy. They ſhewed her the executioner, who was waiting with his cart to convey her to the place of execution. Intimidated by theſe infamous manœuvres, and by the baſe manaces of her, judges, who threatened to commit her to the flames; preſſed too by others who, in a tone of affection, entreated her to ſave both her body and ſoul by a ſpeedy retractation, ſhe, at length, declared, that, with regard to her revelations, ſhe ſubmitted to the deciſions of the church and her miniſters. The ſecretary then approached her, and read a form of abjuration, which contained a ſimple promiſe never more to bear arms, to ſuffer her hair to grow, and to quit the dreſs of a man. Being told that if ſhe refuſed to ſign this paper inſtant death would be her portion, ſhe conſented. But at that moment another paper was ſlipped into her hand, inſtead of that which had been read to her, by which deception ſhe was made to ſign an acknowledgement that ſhe was really guilty of all the crimes which had been aſcribed to her. The truth of this circumſtance is eſtabliſhed, beyond the reach of confutation, by the depoſition of the very ſecretary who read the firſt paper to her †. Immediately after ſhe had ſigned the ſuppoſed abjuration, with the ſign of the croſs, the biſhop of Beauvais pronounced ſentence, by which ſhe was condemned to paſs the remainder of her days in priſon, with no other nouriſhment than the "Bread of Pain, and the Water of Anguiſh," according to the ſtyle uſed by the inquiſition. The aſſembly was diſſolved; and Cauchon and his aſſociates, on their return, were inſulted and pelted by the populace. Theſe miniſters of iniquity, notwithſtanding the diſgrace they had incurred, had not been able even to ſatisfy the enemy to whom they had ſold their conſciences. The Engliſh threatened to exterminate them for not having earned the money they had received from their monarch ‡. The earl of Warwick reproached the biſhop and doctors who had aſſiſted at the trial; and declared that if Joan were ſuffered to eſcape puniſhment, the king's intereſt would be materially affected. "Give yourſelf no uneaſineſs," ſaid one of them, "we will have her yet, I "warrant you."

Joan after ſhe had re-aſſumed the female dreſs, begged ſhe might be confined in the priſon belonging to the archbiſhop's court, where ſhe hoped to receive better treatment, but this favour was denied her. The firſt night after ſhe was conducted back to the dungeon ſhe had hitherto occupied, her guards took her woman's cloaths from off her bed, and put her man's apparel, which ſhe had quitted, in their place. At day-break ſhe begged that the chain which was faſtened round her body might be looſened, and perceiving her man's apparel, ſhe earneſtly entreated that the clothes ſhe had worn the day before might be reſtored; but with this requeſt the guards refuſed to comply. In vain did ſhe repeatedly declare that they muſt be conſidered as the authors of her deſtruction, ſince they knew the prohibition ſhe had received from her judges to dreſs herſelf in man's clothes: they replied, that ſhe ſhould have no other. The fear of incurring the penalty of diſobedience detained her in bed till noon, when, preſſed by a natural call, ſhe was compelled to riſe and cover herſelf with the only clothes ſhe could procure. This was all her perſecutors wiſhed for. Several witneſſes inſtantaneouſly entered the place to verify this pretended tranſgreſſion. On their depoſitions the judges haſtened to the priſon; and while the clerk was employed in writing an account of the ſituation in which the priſoner was found, Andrew Marguerye, one of the aſſiſtant-doctors, obſerved that it was neceſſary to aſk her what had been her motive for re-aſſuming the dreſs of a man; but this obſervation, which might have led to a diſcovery of the truth, nearly coſt him his life. Some other of the judges, alarmed at the danger of her ſituation, and aſhamed of their own conduct, in having conſented to become the inſtruments of injuſtice, withdrew. Peter Cauchon, on leaving the priſon, met the earl of Warwick, and exclaimed, in a tranſport of joy, "Farewell, farewell, it's all over; we have her ſafe!"—and this inhuman exclamation was accompanied by a burſt of laughter. The next day the court met, when Joan was declared to be a relapſed heretic, and as ſuch was delivered over to the ſecular arm.

On the thirtieth of May ſhe was taken from Priſon, under an eſcort of one hundred and twenty men at arms; ſhe was dreſſed in female apparel; and on her head was placed a mitre, with inſcription—"A relapſed heretic; an Apoſtate; an idolater." She was ſuported by two Dominican friars; and as ſhe paſſed through the ſtreets ſhe exclaimed, Ah! Rouen, Rouen, muſt thou be my laſt abode?" Two ſcaffolds had been erected in the old market place, where the cardinal of Wincheſter, the biſhop of Therouenne, chancellor of France; the biſhop of Beauvais, and the other judges, had already taken their ſeats, and were waiting the arrival of their victim. Joan appeared fettered, and her face, as ſhe mounted the ſcaffold, was bathed with her tears. Nicholas Midy, who was appointed to preach the funeral ſermon, filled his ſacrilegious harangue with all the vehemence of fanaticiſm, mingled with the gall of hypocriſy; he finiſhed his diſcourſe with theſe words—"Joan, depart in peace; the church can no longer defend you; ſhe reſigns "you to the ſecular power. The biſhop of Beuvais then pronounced the ſentence of condemnation; at the end of which he invoked the mercy of the ſecular judges, who were ſeated on the ſecond ſcaffold. Before ſhe deſcended, Joan ſaid to the biſhop—"You are the cauſe of my death; you promiſed to reſtore me to the "church, and you deliver me up to my enemies." This was the only time that pity ever found a momentary reſidence in the boſom of that impious and inexorable prelate; he haſtened, however, to expel her as an unwelcome gueſt; the tear ſtarted from his eye; but anxious to conceal a weakneſs which he deſpiſed, he turned aſide, and indignantly wiped it from his face:—the reſt of the judges, the people, and the guards, both Engliſh and Burgundians, leſs aſhamed of their humanity, gave a free ſcope to their tears.

Joan fell upon her knees, imprecated the mercy of the Supreme Being; called on the eccleſiaſtics, and all who were preſent, to aſſiſt her with their prayers; and did not forget, in theſe her laſt moments, her ungrateful ſovereign. The bailiff of Rouen and his aſſiſtants, who were ordered to repreſent the ſecular tribunal, did not pronounce any ſentence; but ſimply ſaid—"Take her away."—On the front of the pile, which was deſtined to reduce her to aſhes, was placed a tablet with the following inſcription;—"Joan, who called herſelf the Maid; "a pernicious liar, a deceiver of the people, a ſorcereſs, ſuperſtitious, a blaſ- "phemer, preſumptuous, an unbeliever, a murderer, an idolater, cruel, of "diſſolute manners, a worſhipper of the devil, an apoſtate, ſchiſmatick, and "heretick!" The executioner trembled as he advanced to receive her from the hands of her guards. She aſked for a crucifix; an Engliſhman, who was preſent, broke a ſtick and formed a kind of croſs, which ſhe took, and after kiſſing it, preſſed it to her heart, and aſcended the fatal pile. Before the fire was applied to the wood, they brought her the croſs of a neighbouring church, which, at her earneſt requeſt, was placed before her. As ſoon as ſhe felt the flames approach her, ſhe warned the two prieſts who ſtood near her to retire. In order to remove any doubt that might be entertained of her death, the pile was raiſed to an extraordinary heigt, ſo that every ſpectator had a full view of her. This precaution, rendered her execution more tedious and painful. As ſoon as ſhe was ſuppoſed to be dead, the executioner received orders to remove the fire, that the people might have a better opportunity of beholding what remained of her body. As long as ſhe retained the power of utterance, the ſacred name of Jeſus was heard to iſſue from the flames: theſe pious ſounds were only interrupted by the ſobs and groans which the violence of her anguiſh extorted from her. When her body was conſumed (all but her heart, which was found entire) the cardinal of Wincheſter ordered her aſhes to be collected, and thrown into the Seine.

Thus miſerably periſhed, at the age of nineteen, the unhappy Maid of Orleans, whoſe purity of life and intrepity of ſoul, diſplayed in the beſt of cauſes, —the juſt defence of her king and country—could not have failed, in an age leſs addicted to ſuperſtition and cruelty, to ſecure the grateful admiration of her friends, and the generous reſpect of her enemies. The difference between fanaticiſm and virtuous enthuſiaſm is to be diſcovered in their effects; that euthuſiaſm which gave riſe to, and ſupported the glorious efforts of Joan in the cauſe of liberty, cannot afford the ſmalleſt pretext for detracting from her merit, as it was evidently derived from the moſt laudable motives. Seldom, if ever, are the ſeeds of glory to be found in a mind that is barren of virtue. It is clear ſhe was convinced of the truth of her inſpiration; ſhe acted in conſequence of that conviction; and her conduct was firm, ſteady and conſiſtent. In ſhort, it may juſtly be doubted if either ancient or modern hiſtory can ſupply an example of heroiſm ſo exempt from pollution as that of Joan d'Arc.—For the conduct of her perſecutors no excuſe can be found. Nor can the conduct of Charles eſcape the ſevereſt reprehenſion; an offer to exchange, or a threat to retaliate on ſome of the many priſoners of diſtinction whom he had in his power at this period, muſt have ſecured the releaſe, or, at leaſt, have prevented the execution of that generous Maid, to whom he was chiefly indebted for the preſervation of his honour, and the ſafety of his kingdom. He had every motive which could operate with the greateſt energy on the human mind to ſuperinduce the moſt powerful exertions for reſcuing his benefactreſs from the hands of her aſſaſſins; but, lulled on the boſom of pleaſure, he enjoyed, in indolence and eaſe, the fruits of her victories, and conſigned her, without an effort, to the malice and perſecution of her vindictive and fanatical enemies.

The irregularity of the proceedings on the trial of Joan, and the manifeſt injuſtice of the ſentence pronounced on her, greatly alarmed the judges; who, after her death, were expoſed to the hatred of the people, and even to the contempt of the Engliſh themſelves. They were pointed at in the ſtreets; they were avoided as objects of univerſal execration. Peter Cauchon thought to ſhield himſelf from danger, and to exempt himſelf from reproach, by obtaining from the king of England letters of protection againſt the holy ſee. At the ſame time a circular letter was addreſſed, in the name of the young monarch, to the emperor, the pope, and all the powers of Europe; containing an abridged account of the capture, the trial and the execution of Joan.

Twenty years after, Charles the Seventh cauſed the trial of Joan to be reviſed, and her memory to be re-eſtabliſhed.—Commiſſioners for this purpoſe were authorized by pope Calixtus the Third. John and Peter d'Arc, brothers to Joan, appeared as plaintiffs in the cauſe; and the depoſitions of one hundred and twelve witneſſes, all favorable to her honor, are ſtill extant. By a definitive ſentence of the ſeventh of July, 1456, the former ſentence was declared null, abuſive, and manifeſtly unjuſt; and Joan d'Arc was declared to be innocent of all the crimes which had been imputed to her. A croſs was erected on the ſpot where ſhe was executed, and a ſtatue of her is ſtill to be ſeen there. Her firſt judges were ſuffered to paſs unpuniſhed till the ſucceeding reign, when Lewis the Eleventh ordered them to be proſecuted; two only were alive, and they were condemned and executed.

The duke of Bedford was disappointed in his expectation of happy consequences from the death of the Maid of Orleans. Joan had taught the French that their enemies were not invincible, and that they still possessed sufficient resources to assert their own independence; though deprived of the benefit of her example, they recollected her precepts, and determined to pursue the path which she had so gloriously opened for them. The English were repulsed in three successive attempts upon Lagny; and though the regent endeavoured to revive their hopes, and to chear their spirits, by the pomp of a coronation, performed with great magnificence at Paris, on the seventeenth of December, 1431—yet were they unable to recover, before the conclusion of the year, any of those numerous places which had been taken from them in the course of the preceding campaign.

Towards the end of this campaign the Mareschal de Boussac formed a plan for the reduction of Rouen. One of those adventurers, who occasionally served either party, had promised to deliver up to him one of the gates of the citadel; the day having been fixed for the execution of the project, the Mareschal, accompanied by the lords of Fontaines, Fouquet, and Mouffy, marched from Beauvais with a body of troops, and placed themselves in ambuscade, in a small wood, about a league from Rouen. Ricarville, a gentleman of Normandy, advanced with a detachment of one hundred and twenty men to the very walls of the citadel. He had no sooner given the appointed signal than the gate was opened to him, when he rushed into the fort, slew all that opposed him, and, after securing the principal tower, pointed the artillery which he found there against the other part of the citadel. Never was any scheme accomplished with greater celerity or success. Once masters of the citadel, the French would have had little difficulty in reducing the town, since the inhabitants secretly favoured their cause; and the king of England, who was then at Roüen, must infallibly have been taken prisoner.

Ricarville having secured the post he had taken, immediately mounted his horse, and hastened to give the mareschal an account of what had passed. Every thing depended on dispatch. But Boussac's troops, who were chiefly composed of adventurers assembled in haste, refused to stir, till a proper division of the plunder had been settled: so many disputes arose between them on this account, that all attempts to accommodate them proved fruitless; the soldiers returned to Beauvais, and their officers were obliged to follow them. The French finding themselves left to the mercy of the enemy, resolved to sell their lives as dearly as they could; they defended the tower for twelve days, when a want of provisions compelled them to surrender; they were hanged, and the man who had opened the gates to the troops was quartered. The campaign was closed by an action between a body of English, under the command of Willoughby, and a detachment of French, conducted by Ambrose de Loire, near the fortreſs of Saint Celerin, about ten miles from Alençon, in which the former were defeated, with the loſs of ſix hundred men, beſides a great number of priſoners*.

A. D. 1432.] The commencement of the enſuing campaign was ſignalized by the reduction of Chartres†, which had conſtantly been in the poſſeſſion of the Burgundians or Engliſh, ever ſince the year 1417, when the duke of Burgundy made himſelf maſter of the town. The count of Dunois formed the project for taking it, by means of two of the inhabitants who had been made priſoners, and who promiſed to introduce him into the place. A monk, was engaged in the plot, who invited the citizens to attend a ſermon which he meant to preach on Eaſter-day; and while, by this artifice, he called off their attention to one extremity of the town, the French were admitted, by the two inhabitants, at a gate on the oppoſite ſide. A ſkirmiſh took place, in which the biſhop of Chartres, and about eighty of the citizens, were ſlain; all the Engliſh and Burgundians that fell into the hands of the enemy were put to death; a heavy ranſom was exacted from the inhabitants; and the town, after being expoſed to every ſpecies of exceſs from a brutal and licentious ſoldiery, was entruſted to the command of Dunois.

The arrival of a legate from the pope, who had orders to negociate an accommodation between the contending powers, led the people to flatter themſelves with the idea of a ſpeedy termination to that fatal conqueſt which had ſo long deſolated the kingdom. Several conferences were holden, at which the Engliſh, Burgundian and French plenipotentiaries aſſiſted; but between the Engliſh and French the difference was too wide to be eaſily adjuſted. The caſe was different with the duke of Burgundy, whoſe miniſters and thoſe of Charles agreed to a truce for ſix years, which was confirmed by their reſpective ſovereigns‡. Unfortunately, this truce proved of ſhort duration; the companies of banditti, in the ſervice of the king and the duke, renewed hoſtilities, notwitſtanding the orders they received to reſpect the convention; and, at the expiration of three months, the two princes found themſelves reduced to the neceſſity of again taking up arms, and continuing the war.

Meanwhile the duke of Bedford, had ſent Arundel, Warwick, Liſle-Adam, and the Baſtard of Saint Paul, to make an attempt upon the town of Lagny. After breaking down the bridge, and demoliſhing the fort which defended the place on the ſide of the river, they made various aſſaults, in which they were repulſed with ſuch loſs, that their ſoldiers deſerted in crowds, and compelled them to raiſe the ſiege. This affront, ſuſtained by the beſt generals which the Engliſh then had in their ſervice, operated on the mind of the regent as an additional motive to emulation and reſentment. He amaſſed a prodigious quantity of artillery, and other machines, and inveſted Lagny in perſon, at the head of ſix thouſand men; while the town was defended by only eight hundred. The beſiegers were repulſed in ſeveral attacks; but, after a ſiege of five months, the place was reduced to the laſt extremity. At this critical period, a body of French troops, arrived before Lagny, forced one of the enemy's quarters, and eſcorted a convoy into the town. The French, after this ſucceſsful expedition, croſſed the Marne, and entered the Iſle of France; and the duke of Bedford, dreading an attack on the capital, with the diſaffection of whoſe inhabitants he was well acquainted, raiſed the ſiege of Lagny, with ſuch precipation, that he left a part of his baggage, a quantity of ammunition, and all his heavy artillery behind him.

During theſe tranſactions, the Engliſh had taken Mortargis by ſurprize; but Graville and Guitry retook the town ſoon after, and made a fruitleſs attack on the citadel, which the eneny had time to fortify. The earl of Arundel inveſted Saint Celerin for the forth time; and after a ſiege of three months, he demoliſhed the fortreſs. Louviers was likewiſe reduced, and La Hire taken priſoner; but being ſoon after releaſed, he joined Xaintrailles; and having aſſembled a body of troops, they took poſſeſſion of Gerbroi, a caſtle in the Beauvoiſis, where the earl of Arundel prepared to inveſt them. La Hire and Xaintrailles, deeming it imprudent to wait for the enemy in a fortreſs that was not in a proper ſtate of defence, marched out with all their forces, attacked the Engliſh juſt as they were employed in fixing their quarters: a deſperate conflict enſued, in which the enemy, notwithſtanding the ſuperiority of their numbers, and the courage of their leader, were totally defeated. The earl of Arundel was taken priſoner, and died a few days after, of the wounds he had received in the action. Soon after this, Ambroſe de Loire extended his incurſions to the very gates of Caen, upon a fair-day, and carried off two thouſand perſons, with a conſiderable booty.

Both parties were, by this time, ſo much exhauſted, that neither could find reſources to continue the war with ſpirit and effect. On the fourteenth of November, 1432, Ann of Burgundy, ducheſs of Bedford, died at Paris. By her death the chief tie which united the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy was diſſolved; and the marriage of the former with the daughter of the count of Saint Paul, within two months after her deceaſe, laid the foundation of an open rupture between thoſe noblemen. To prevent a diſpute which muſt have proved highly detrimental to the Engliſh intereſts, the cardinal of Wincheſter brought them both to conſent to an interview at Saint Omer, for the final deciſion of their differences; but a ridiculous point of etiquette, as to the payment of the firſt viſit, maintained with equal obſtinacy by either prince, fruſtrated the intentions of the cardinal, by preventing their meeting.

Charles was unable to profit by the coolneſs which ſubſiſted between the Engliſh and Burgundian princes. La Tremoille ſtill enjoyed his poſt of prime miniſter. Charles no longer eſteemed him; but he bore with him from habit. To the conſtable, in particular, he was an object of deteſtation. A conſpiracy was accordingly formed againſt him, of which Charles of Anjou, count of Maine, was the oſtenſible leader; but of which the conſtable, though abſent, was the ſoul. The lord of Bueil, nephew to La Tremoille, undertook to conduct the execution of the plot. While the court was at Chinon, the conſpirators, having obtained admiſſion into the caſtle, by the aſſiſtance of Gaucourt, the governor forced an entrance into the apartment of La Tremoille, who, alarmed at the noiſe, jumped out of bed, and ſeizing his ſword put himſelf in a poſture of defence; but being diſabled by a wound in the belly from a dagger, he was ſeized, fettered and conveyed to the caſtle of Montreſor. Du Bueil, and Coitivy, two of the conſpirators, had the inſolence to go to the king, and after telling him what had paſſed aſſured him that the only object they had in view was his welfare, and the good of the ſtate. The conſpirators were ſuffered to reap the fruits of their audacity; the count of Maine was appointed to ſucceed La Tremoille, and the conſtable was recalled to court, and placed at the head of the troops.

Meanwhile an inſurrection of the peaſants in Lower Normandy gave an alarm to the Engliſh government; but the want of a leader ſoon compelled this undiſciplined multitude to diſperſe. A revolt which took place nearly at the ſame time, in Upper Normandy, was not ſo eaſily quelled. The mareſchal of Rochefort, having joined the inſurgents with a body of regular troops, took from the Engliſh the towns of Dieppe, Fecamp, Montivilliers, Tancarville, L'Iſlebonne, and Harfleur, with ſeveral forts of leſs importance. The Engliſh haſtened to check the rapidity of his progreſs, and, by the deſtructive incurſions of either army, the fertile province of Normandy was laid waſte. The author of the Chronicle of France relates, "that in all the Pays du Caux not a man nor woman "remained, except the garriſons of the different fortreſſes."

A.D. 1433, 1434, 1435.] The Engliſh, no longer allured by ſplendid victories, began to murmur at the continuation of the war; the ſupplies granted by parliament were ſcanty, and wholly inadequate to the exigencies which called for them. For this purpoſe conferences were again holden; but the demands of the Engliſh, and the conceſſions of the French, ſtill inclining to oppoſite extremes, no accommodation could be effected. The duke of Burgundy, by this time, was convinced that, by eſpouſing the cauſe of the Engliſh, he had ſacrificed his intereſt to his reſentment; and as the latter ſubſided the dictates of the former became prevalent. A congreſs was appointed to aſſemble the following year, in Arras. The conferences were opened on the twentieth of Auguſt, 1435.

The only ſacrifice which the French would conſent to make to the Engliſh, for the purchaſe of a peace, was the ceſſion of Normandy and Guienne, ſubject to feudal homage; in return for which they inſiſted that the Engliſh monarch ſhould relinquiſh every pretenſion to the crown of France, and immediately give up every town and fortreſs which he poſſeſſed in that kingdom. The Engliſh commiſſioners, regarding this offer as an inſult, immediately left the congreſs, without ſpecifying the nature of their demands. When they were gone, the duke of Burgundy proceeded to conclude a ſeparate treaty with Charles; the terms of which were finally adjuſted on the twenty-firſt of September. The conditions were ſuch as raiſed the houſe of Burgundy to the higheſt pitch of elevation, though at the ſame time, they laid the baſis of its deſtruction. Charles formally diſavowed the aſſaſſination of John, duke of Burgundy, affirming, that the attempt had always diſpleaſed him; that, had he been previouſly acquainted with the intentions of the aſſaſſins, he would have prevented the murder, but that he was then very young, and poſſeſſed of little penetration *: he engaged to deliver all the aſſaſſins up to juſtice; to found chapels and perpetual maſſes for the ſoul of the murdered prince, as well as for thoſe of his attendants, who were killed at the ſame time; to erect a croſs on the ſpot where the murder was committed; and to pay fifty thouſand crowns of gold, as a compenſation for the jewels which had been taken from the duke at the time of the aſſaſſination. He agreed to cede to Philip and his heirs the counties and cities of Boulogne-ſur-Mer, Maçon, and Auxerre, with all their dependencies; the caſtles, towns, and diſtricts of Bar-ſur-Seine, Peronne, Roye, and Mont-Didier, with their appendages; certain territories were mortgaged to Philip, until four hundred thouſand crowns ſhould be paid for their redemption. Philip himſelf was exempted from doing homage for all his territories during the life of Charles, and his vaſſals from obeying him as their ſuperior lord; the French monarch engaged to ſuccour the duke in caſe of an attack by the Engliſh; and both parties agreed to make no treaty with the enemy but by mutual conſent. A general pardon was granted to all perſons, except the aſſaſſins before mentioned. Each party renounced every alliance to the prejudice of the other. Such were the extravagant terms by which the king of France detached the duke of Burgundy from the intereſts of his enemies.

When the news of the treaty of Arras was received in England, by a herald ſent by the duke of Burgundy for that purpoſe, who was likewiſe inſtructed to apologiſe for the conduct of his maſter in departing from the treaty of Troyes, which he had ſolemnly ſworn to maintain, the people expreſſed the moſt violent indignation; the Londoners, in particular, were ſo much incenſed againſt Philip for this breach of Faith, that they plundered all his ſubjects who were then reſident in the metropolis, and even put many of them to death. The herald, too, was treated with contempt, and diſmiſſed without an anſwer.

* Villaret, tom. xv. p. 182.

No one experienced greater diſappoitment on this occaſion than Iſabella. At that moment when ſhe firſt violated the laws of nature, by the proſcription and diſinheritance of her ſon, her puniſhment began. She had regarded with unnatural horror, the progreſs of Charles, in recovering his kingdom; and his reconciliation with the duke of Burgundy had ſuch an effect on her mind, that it ſoon brought her to the grave. She died at Paris—deſpiſed by the Engliſh, and deteſted by the French—on the thirtieth of September; ten days after the concluſion of the treaty of Arras. Her body was conveyed to Saint Denis, where it was privately interred, near the tomb of Charles the Sixth.

The death of Iſabella had been preceded by that of the duke of Bedford, who expired at Rouen, on the fourteenth of September. This prince, whoſe death proved an irreparable loſs to the Engliſh, was endued with extenſive talents. As Lewis the eleventh was one day walking in the cathedral at Rouen, where the duke was buried, and looking with attention on the tomb of that prince, one of his courtiers adviſed him to demoliſh that monument. "No," replied the monarch, "Let the aſhes of a prince reſt in peace; who, were he alive, would "make the boldeſt of us tremble. I could wiſh a more ſtately monument had "been erected to his memory." The duke of York was appointed to ſucceed the duke of Bedford as regent of France.

The inſults and violences which the Burgundians experienced from the incenſed Londoners, in conſequence of the treaty of Arras, were far from diſpleaſing to the duke of Burgundy. They afforded him a ſpecious pretext for the commencement of hoſtilities. He accordingly made an unſucceſsful attempt to ſurprize Crotoi, and ſoon after ſent a formal defiance to the king of England.

Six hundred Burgundians were now diſpatched by Philip, to join the mareſchal de Liſle-Adam, on whom the king had recently conferred the government of Pontoiſe. The ſtates of Flanders, granted the duke of Burgundy ſubſidies for ſupport of the war; but he did not meet with the ſame docility from thoſe towns which had been ceded to him by the late treaty. On the renewal of the old impoſts at Ameins, the inhabitants flew to arms, choſe a leader, and repairing in a body to the houſe of the mayor, told that officer that they were reſolved to pay no taxes, and that they were certain the good king Charles, their Lord, would not require them to pay any more than the other towns which were under his dominion. They then proceeded to pillage ſeveral houſes, and to impriſon the duke's officers, ſome of whom they executed. A body of troops being ſent to repreſs this ſedition, the leaders were executed, order was reſtored to the town, and the impoſts collected without farther oppoſition.

A. D. 1436. 1437.] Paris was ſtill in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh; but the inhabitants preſſed on all ſides by the garriſons of the neighbouring forts, alarmed at the proſpect of famine, and haraſſed by the ſeverity of the government, ſecretly wiſhed for a change that might releaſe them from their ſituation. To accompliſh ſuch a change, however, was a matter of extreme difficulty. Yet, to remove, undiſmayed by the dangers they had to encounter, ſix citizens embraced the daring reſolution to deliver up the town to the king. They communicated their intentions to Charles, and only required, as the reward of ſo important a ſervice, a general amneſty. The conditions were joyfully accepted by Charles, who likewiſe ſecured to them an extenſive confirmation of their privileges.

The 13th of April, 1436, was the day appointed for the execution of this important project. No precaution which could tend to enſure its ſucceſs had been neglected; the principal inhabitants had been apprized of the ſcheme, and only waited for the ſignal to excite the people to riſe; while the conſtable had received orders to approach the town with a body of troops, in order to ſecond their exertions. Richemont accordingly repaired to the gate of Saint James; he obtained admiſſion by a poſtern, and, the draw-bridge being let down, his cavalry entered the town.

The people had by this time aſſembled, and made the ſtreets reſound with the acclamations of—"peace, peace! Long live the king and the duke of Burgundy!"—The Engliſh, alarmed at the tumult, flew to arms; and Lord Willoughby, their commander, led them to the diſtrict of the Halles, where they hoped to be able to defend themſelves againſt the attacks of the enemy; but in every ſtreet they met a crowd of inhabitants, all armed, and bearing the white croſs of the royaliſts. After a vain attempt to reſiſt the torrent, Willoughby took ſhelter in the Baſtille. The Engliſh capitulated on the following day, and obtained permiſſion to retire into Normandy. Tranquillity was immediately reſtored to the capital; and the day after the departure of the Engliſh, the introduction of ſupplies produced a fall in the price of corn, from fifty to twenty ſols the meaſure.

Paris was thus reſtored, after an interval of fifteen years, to the domination of its ſovereign. The magiſtrates reſumed the exerciſe of their functions; while thoſe who had been baniſhed or proſcribed, returned, and were reinſtated in their rank of citizens. About two months after the reduction of Paris, the marriage of the dauphin Lewis, with the princeſs Margaret of Scotland, was celebrated.

The duke of York having received his commiſſion of Regent, landed in Normandy with a body of troops, which enabled him to retake ſome places of little importance that had been lately reduced by the French. While he was employed in the conqueſt of Normandy, he received intelligence that the duke of Burgundy, with fifty thouſand Flemings, had laid ſiege to Calais. A fleet of five hundred ſail was collected in a few weeks, and an army of fifteen thouſand men being raiſed, the command was given to Glouceſter, who landed at Calais on the ſecond of Auguſt, 1436; but the duke of Burgundy having met with more oppoſition from the garriſon than he expected, and being afraid to riſk an engagement, raiſed the ſiege, and made a precipitate retreat, with the loſs of his artillery and baggage. Nor were the military expeditions of Philip, in the enſuing campaign, more ſucceſsful. After quelling an inſurrection of the Flemings, in which he was wounded and Liſle-Adam loſt his life, he levied a powerful army, and ſent his generals to inveſt Crotoy, while he placed himſelf at a convenient diſtance, with a ſtrong body of forces, in order to cover the ſiege. Talbot, being apprized of the duke's motions, advanced to oppoſe him with four thouſand men; and finding the enemy poſted on the banks of Somme, he boldly plunged into the ſtream at the head of his troops. The Burgundians, intimidated at this daring courage, provided for their ſafety by a precipitate flight. The ſiege of Crotoy was immediately raiſed; and Talbot, having ſtrengthened the garriſon, and repaired the fortifications, extended his incurſions into the provinces of Artois and Picardy, which he laid waſte, and returned to Normandy laden with ſpoils.

Talbot, on his return to Normandy, found himſelf compelled to confine his efforts to the reduction of a few towns of little importance. A want of money and of troops, joined to ſome other cauſes, reduced the enemy to the neceſſity of acting on the defenſive. The factions that prevailed in the Engliſh council cauſed the removal of the duke of York, though a prince of great ſpirit and ability, from the regency of France. He was ſucceeded by Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, who in the month of November landed in Normandy with a reinforcement of a thouſand men.

At length, Charles, after an abſence of twenty years, made his public entry into Paris; where he was received, with teſtimonies of loyalty, by every claſs of people.

A. D. 1437, 1438.] But the flattering proſpect which had recently opened itſelf to Charles, was ſhortly obſcured by a ſucceſſion of freſh calamities. The troops, which had been diſmiſſed from the different towns and fortreſſes, ceded to the duke of Burgundy by the treaty of Arras, gave a looſe to licentiouſneſs and plunder. Diſperſed in ſeparate bands, and headed by experienced captains, they overran the moſt fertile provinces in the kingdom, pillaged the defenceleſs inhabitants and ſpread ruin and devaſtation around them, wherever they appeared. The peaſants juſtly alarmed at theſe dreadful incurſions, fled from their habitations, and neglected the culture of their lands. From hence and from the inceſſant rains which fell during the years 1437 and 1438, a moſt deſtructive famine aroſe, ſucceeded by a peſtilence, which ſwept away vaſt numbers of the people, particularly in Paris and its environs. Mezeray obſerves, that the metropolis loſt ſo many of its inhabitants, that the wolves prowled about the ſtreets in ſearch of prey; and carried off the children in ſight of their parents. The king haſtened his retreat from this ſcene of horrors, and his example was followed not only by the court, but by every perſon who was not compelled by neceſſity to reſide in the metropolis.

A. D. 1439.] At Bourges, Charles received ambaſſadors from the council of Baſil, which had quarrelled with pope Eugenius the Fifth; and in an aſſembly compoſed of the princes of the blood and the dignified clergy, he cauſed the regulations of that council to be examined. Theſe he compiled into a law, to which he gave the appellation of, THE PRAGMATIC SANCTION; and which has ever ſince been conſidered as the bulwark of the Gallican Church, as it took from the ſee of Rome the power of nominating to eccleſiaſtical dignities, and of granting reverſions, and penſions, and exemptions within the monarchy of France.

Such little diſcipline now reigned in the army, ſuch little ſubordination now prevailed in the ſtate, that the officers who had been appointed by the king to the command of towns and fortreſſes, began to aſſert their independence of the power whence they derived their conſequence and authority, and to exerciſe the deſpotiſm of tyrants. Flavy, who had diſplayed ſo much ſkill and reſolution in the defence of Compiégne, when attacked by the united forces of England and Burgundy, had been deprived of the government of that city by the conſtable. He found means to be reſtored to his command; and having conceived ſome diſguſt againſt the mareſchal de Rochefort, he cauſed that nobleman to be ſeized, and thrown into priſon. The count of Richemont, and even the king himſelf, interpoſed to procure the mareſchal's releaſe, but in vain; Flavy refuſed to ſet him at liberty, unleſs he would conſent to pay an exorbitant ranſom. While a negociation was carrying on for this purpoſe, the mareſchal died.

A. D. 1440.] The pope ſtill continuing his exhortations to peace, to which the ſituation of either kingdom afforded the ſtrongeſt inducements. Conferences were opened but the propoſals of France and England were ſtill ſo widely different, that all hopes of accommodation vaniſhed. The Engliſh plenipotentiaries inſiſted on the free and independent poſſeſſion of Normandy and Guienne, with Calais and its diſtrict; but the French would only conſent to a partial annexation of thoſe territories to the crown of England, and clogged, alſo, with the uſual burden of homage and fealty: the negociaions, therefore, were diſcontinued*.

The attempts to negociate a peace had not prevented the continuation of hoſtilities. At the beginning of July, the count of Richemont inveſted the city of Meaux, one of the beſt-fortified places in the kingdom, which Henry the Fifth of England had formerly beſieged for ſeven months before he could reduce it.

* Monſtrelet, fol. 154. Fabean, An. 1439. Stow, p. 377.

It was defended by the baſtard of Thian, an officer of approved courage, but, notwithſtanding the moſt vigilant and active exertions, it was taken by aſſault, after a ſiege of three weeks, when the conſtable put the governor to death, with ſeveral other Frenchmen who were found among the priſoners. The garriſon effected their retreat into the marché, and broke down the bridge of communication, ſo that Richemont had all his operations to begin anew. He formed compleat lines of circumvallation, ſtrengthened with redoubts, to prevent the entrance of ſupplies; lord Talbot, reſolved to ſuccour the beſieged, and, attacked one of the redoubts, which he ſpeedily carried, and then entered the place with a convoy: the next day he effected his retreat by ſimilar means, and determined ſoon to return with a more effectual ſupply; but, that the garriſon were forced to ſurrender; the ſucceſs of this enterprize encouraged the conſtable to undertake the ſiege of Avranches, which he was ſpeedily compelled to raiſe, being attacked by Talbot, at the head of thoſe troops which he had deſtined for the relief of Meaux, who made him retreat with precipitation, leaving his baggage and artillery behind him.

On the concluſion of the treaty of Arras, a marriage had been agreed on between the count of Charolois and Catherine of France, the completion of which had hitherto been deferred on account of the youth of the parties. The king, anxious to confirm as far as poſſible, the attachment of the houſe of Burgundy, now complied with the ſolicitations of the duke, who preſſed him to ſend the princeſs to his court, although ſhe had but juſt entered her eleventh year. A new conference was opened for the promotion of peace, under the mediation of the ducheſs of Burgundy, but it proved equally fruitleſs with the laſt.

While the king was employed in the promotion of projects, which had the eaſe and welfare of his ſubjects for their object, a conſpiracy was forming in his very palace. La Tremoille, who had been ſo long honoured with the confidence of his maſter, ſaw, with indignation, the poſt he had enjoyed more ably and more worthily filled by the count of Maine. Not daring to ſhew his jealouſy, he planned in ſecret the means of effecting the ruin of his rival; and the more ſurely to promote his project, he made no ſcruple to involve his ſovereign in the effects of his vengeance. He engaged in the plot ſeveral princes and nobles, who were diſcontented with the miniſter. The duke of Bourbon joined the conſpirators: as did alſo the duke of Alençon, the counts of Vendôme and Dunois, and others. Their firſt attempt was to ſeduce the dauphin from his duty, by perſuading him that his father kept him in a ſtate of ſubjection, though nobody was more capable than he of correcting the vices which had crept into the government; that the nation, only expected their ſafety from him, whom they invoked as their guardian genius. Lewis lent a favourable ear to theſe inſinuations. Some of them carried him off, with his own conſent, from the caſtle of Loches, and conveyed him to Niort. Every thing had been planned and conducted with ſuch ſecrecy, that the king was not aware of the ſtorm till the very moment it burſt. The object of the conſpirators was to ſecure the king's perſon, and to inveſt the dauphin with the ſupreme power, in the hope of governing the kingdom under his name. The king, more enraged than alarmed at the danger which threatened him, inſtantly ſent for the conſtable, who joined him at Amboiſe; he then embraced Richemont, and exclaimed—"Since I have my conſtable with me, I "fear nothing."

The confederated princes publiſhed a manifeſto in the dauphin's name, inviting the French to eſpouſe the cauſe of the preſumptive heir to the throne. In other times, ſuch a publication would have ſufficed to produce an almoſt general inſurrection; but the people, who ſtill felt the dreadful effects of the calamities occaſioned by the diſſentions of the great, had learned, from fatal experience, that theſe troubles, excited under the ſpecious pretext of the good of the ſtate, only tended to gratify the ambition of individuals. The leſſon they had received was too recent to be forgotten. They were at length convinced, that as the power of the monarch chiefly conſiſts in the affection of his ſubjects, ſo cannot ſubjects look for the enjoyment of tranquility, unleſs they preſerve inviolate their attachment to that protecting authority, which ſtrengthens and confirms the ſocial bond. The nobles of Auvergne informed the dauphin, by the lord of Dampierre, that they were ready to ſerve him againſt all men, except the king his father.

Charles, meanwhile, having ſummoned the duke of Alençon to reſtore the dauphin, advanced as far as Saint Maxient, which that prince had reduced. He had no difficulty in recovering the place; and while he remained there he had the ſatisfaction to ſee the count of Dunois return to his duty, with expreſſions of repentance, and ſolicitations for pardon. The king then proceeded towards Niort, while the dauphin and the duke of Alençon, retired into the Bourbonnois. Lewis here applied for aſſiſtance to the duke of Burgundy; but the duke replied, that though he would willingly receive him at his court, he could not think of enabling him to carry on a war againſt his father. This refuſal threw the princes into conſternation, and, finding the king's army daily encreaſe, they at length reſolved to ſue for mercy. The dauphin and the duke of Bourbon repaired to Cuſſet, accompanied by La Tremoille, Choumont and Prie; but the three laſt noblemen were ordered by Charles, to retire under pain of impriſonment. The dauphin, enraged, proteſted he would proceed no farther, but as he was already encloſed by the royal army, it was too late to retreat. As he approached his father, he bent on his knee, and entreated forgiveneſs for himſelf and Bourbon. "Lewis"—ſaid the king—"you are welcome: you have been long abſent. Go and reſt "yourſelf to-day, and to-morrow we will talk to you." The king having refuſed to pardon La Tremoille, Chaumont and Prie, the dauphin aſked him whether he muſt return, for he had promiſed ſo to do, in caſe he ſhould be unable to procure a pardon for his friends. Charles, enraged at the queſtion, replied—"Lewis, the gates are open, and if they are not wide enough for "you, I will order five or ſix toiſes of the wall to be pulled down, in order to "facilitate your eſcape. You are my ſon, and can incur no obligation "without my conſent; but if it be your pleaſure to leave me, go—for by the "Grace of God, I ſhall be able to find others of our blood, who will afford "us better aſſiſtance in maintaining our honour and power, than you have "done hitherto." The dauphin preſſed the matter no farther. The duke of Bourbon obtained his pardon. Charles extended his forgiveneſs to he reſt of the rebels: he alſo reſtored the government and revenues of Dauphiné to his ſon. This dangerous war terminated in ſix months.

While Charles was reducing his ſon to obedience, the Engliſh had two armies in motion, one of which laid waſte Picardy; while the other, conducted by Somerſet and Talbot, laid ſiege to Harfleur. As theſe noblemen had not ſufficient troops to take the town by ſtorm, they determined to reduce it by blockade; they entrenched themſelves very ſtrongly, and blocked up the harbour by a powerful fleet. An army, commanded by Dunois, came to the relief of the place; but, having made an unſucceſsful, though vigorous attack, on the Engliſh entrenchments, they were obliged to abandon the enterprize, and the garriſon ſoon after capitulated. The reduction of Harfleur was followed by the loſs of Montivilliers.

The negociations for the releaſe of the duke of Orleans from captivity, which had been long depending, were at laſt brought to a concluſion. That prince having offered to pay the ſum of one hundred thouſand nobles for his liberty, the queſtion was debated by the council of England, when the ſentiments of the duke of Glouceſter, and the cardinal of Wincheſter, were entirely oppoſite. The former ſtrongly contended, that the dying requeſt of the fifth Henry—that none of the French priſoners ſhould be releaſed until his ſon ſhould have attained a ſufficient age to aſſume the reins of government himſelf—ſhould be ſtrictly adhered to: the cardinal replied, that the ſum offered was of ſuch magnitude as, in the preſent ſtate of affairs, ought not to be rejected. He farther obſerved, that the duke's preſence in France might give ſtrength and effect to thoſe factions which prevailed againſt Charles, and might conſequently prove advantageous to the Engliſh intereſt. Theſe arguments were ſucceſsful, and the duke of Orleans, after a tedious captivity of twenty-five years, was permitted to return to his native country. One of the conditions of his releaſe was that he ſhould engage to exert his utmoſt influence in effecting a general peace; and if he ſucceeded in his efforts for that purpoſe, that part of his ranſom which he had paid before his departure was to be reſtored, and the remainder remitted*.

Meanwhile the nobility flocked from every part of the kingdom to render their ſervices to the duke of Orleans, who was univerſally eſteemed for his affability, courage, and generoſity. Knights of the firſt diſtinction deemed it an honour to have their children admitted into his ſervice, in the capacity of pages. It was generally believed that immediately on his arrival at the court of Charles the reins of government would be entruſted to his hands; the prince himſelf was impreſſed with the ſame opinion. He had four-and-twenty archers for his ordinary guard; and his retinue conſiſted of three hundred horſe, excluſive of a great number of gentlemen who followed him at their own expence. On his return to France, he was careful not to enter upon the territories of the count of Ligny, who had always peremptorily refuſed to ſign the treaty of Arras, and whoſe conduct, in that reſpect, had at length, ſo much irritated Charles, that he had given orders to his generals to attack him; when the count died, and left his nephew, the young count of Saint-Paul, ſole heir to his extenſive dominions. The duke of Orleans purſued his journey to Paris, and in all the towns through which he paſſed, received the ſtrongeſt marks of affection from the inhabitants. Charles had, at firſt, expreſſed an earneſt deſire to ſee this prince; but being apprized of his intimate connection with the dukes of Burgundy, Brittany and Alençon, as well as of the numerous retinue by which he was accompanied, the calamities which the kingdom had already ſuſtained by the ambition of the great recurred moſt forcibly to his mind, and induced him to ſend word to the duke that he ſhould be happy to receive him at court, provided he would come attended only by his houſhold. The duke, piqued at an order which he conſtrued into an affront, took the road to Orleans, and immediately retired to his own domains.

The king, having aſſembled a body of troops, entered Champagne, and reduced ſeveral fortreſſes which were in poſſeſſion of the Companies. After paſſing ſome time at Troyes, he repaired to Bar-upon-Aube, whither the Baſtard of Bourbon, who now headed the Companies, went to meet him with offers of ſubmiſſion; but was immediately ſeized, tried, and condemned. He was tied in a ſack and thrown into the river, whence his body was taken by his family, and honourably interred. This exertion of ſeverity operated as a ſalutary check to the deſtructive incurſions of the leaders of thoſe deſperate banditti who infeſted the kingdom.

* Rymer's Fœdera, tom. x. p, 776, 786.

The earl of Warwick having died, the duke of York was reſtored by the Engliſh council to the regency of France; but the party of Charles daily acquired freſh ſtrength, and the military operations of that monarch were generally attended with ſucceſs. At the urgent ſolicitations of the ducheſs of Burgundy, he was induced to conſent to a renewal of the negociations for peace; but after the plenipotentaries had aſſembled at Saint Omer, he haſtily broke off the conferences, on the frivolous pretext that the Engliſh commiſſioners were not of equal rank with the French. The concluſion of the year 1440 was diſtinguiſhed by the reduction of ſeveral of the nobility who ſtill refuſed to acknowledge the authority of the lawful ſovereign. The chief of theſe was the young count of Saint Paul.

The ducheſs of Burgundy paid a viſit to Charles during his ſtay at Laon, in order to prefer certain demands, in the name of her huſband, and to complain of the conduct of the court to the duke of Orleans. The king however, was not more diſpoſed to give her ſatisfaction in theſe particulars, than on ſome other articles which concerned her own private intereſt; the ducheſs obſerved at her departure—"My lord, of all the requeſts I have preferred, you have not granted one, though, in my opinion, they were all founded in reaſon."

A. D. 1441.] Charles, at the head of his troops, opened the campaign in the month of April, by the ſiege of Creil, a town on the river Oyſe, which in twelve days he obliged to capitulate. His next attempt was on Pontoiſe which he inveſted about the middle of May, with twelve thouſand men. This ſiege was conducted with the greateſt vigour, as Charles was extremely anxious to obtain poſſeſſion of a place ſo important both from its ſtrength, and ſituation. The defence, was conducted with intrepidity; and all the precautions of the beſiegers proved inadequate to reſiſt Talbot, who forced their entrenchments, and entered the town with a conſiderable convoy. The garriſon, deriving freſh ſpirits from this ſeaſonable ſupply, repelled every attack of the French, who continued the ſiege till the middle of Auguſt; when the duke of York having collected an army of eight thouſand men, marched from Rouen towards Pontoiſe. When he approached the place, he ſent a herald to Charles, challenging him to battle; but his propoſal being ſubmitted to the diſcuſſion of the council, it was unanimouſly reſolved to reject it. The two armies were ſeparated by the river Oyſe; and, as the bridge was guarded by a detachment of a thouſand men, Charles ſet the Engliſh at defiance, and continued the ſiege without dread of moleſtation. His ſecurity, proved fallacious; for the duke of York having found means to tranſport ſix hundred men, in boats made of leather, during the night, to the oppoſite ſide, they attacked the guard on the bridge, and having put them all to the ſword, opened a paſſage for the remainder of the army. Charles was thrown into conſternation by this unexpected aſſault, haſtily raiſed the ſiege, and took ſhelter under the cannon of Poiſſy. Thither he was followed by the duke of York, who once more challenged him to battle; but finding Charles determined to avoid an engagement, he pillaged the abbey and the town of Poiſſy,* and having recruited the garriſon of Pontoiſe, returned to Normandy.

The precipitate retreat of the army from an inferior force gave riſe to great murmurs at Paris; and the popular diſcontents, in that factious and turbulent city, became ſo loud and prevalent, that the king deemed it neceſſary to recover his loſt reputation by ſome ſignal effort. With this view he returned to Pontoiſe, wholly unexpected by the Engliſh; re-commenced the ſiege; and conducted it with ſo much vigour, that a practicable breach was ſoon effected, which Charles was the firſt to mount. His conduct on this occaſion, inſpired his troops with ſuch courage that their efforts proved irreſiſtible; the place was taken, five hundred of the garriſon were put to the ſword, and the remainder ſecured. All the priſoners were conducted to Paris, and after being exhibited, chained by their necks two and two, to the deriſion of the populace, ſuch as had not wherewithal to pay their ranſom, had their hands and feet tied, and were thrown into the Seine.

The duke of Orleans was extremely mortified at the diſappointment of his hopes which led him to aſpire to a principal ſhare in the government. The king and his miniſters ſeemed totally to have forgotten him, though their neglect, inſulting as it was, gave him no grounds for ſhewing his reſentment. He had an interview with the duke of Burgundy at Heſdin, where the two princes paſſed ſome days together, and laid the plan of a confederacy, which was put in force the following year. Immediately after this interview, the duke of Burgundy began to raiſe troops, but in order to lull the ſuſpicions of Charles, he iſſued ſtrict orders to his men to commit no depredations on the territories of France.

A. D. 1442.] When every thing was prepared, an aſſembly of the malcontents was appointed to be held at Nevers. In a circumſtance thus delicate, when there was every reaſon to apprehend a general defection, the king conducted himſelf with a degree of prudence and moderation, that ought to have rendered the confederate princes aſhamed of their conduct. He contented himſelf with ſending them a remonſtrance, in which he obſerved, that they ought not to have formed the project of calling an aſſembly, in his abſence, much leſs without his conſent; that his deſign, after an intended expedition into Guienne, was to have aſſembled the ſtates, in the city of Bourges, in order to conſult them on the general affairs of the kingdom. He complained of the conduct of the duke of Brittany in joining the confederates, at a time when the ſituation of the ſtate called for the unanimous exertion of all its members, in order to reſiſt the common enemy. After theſe reproaches, conveyed in mild and moderate language, he conſented that the diſcontented princes and nobles ſhould aſſemble at Nevers; and even offered to ſend a ſafe-conduct to the duke of Burgundy for that purpoſe.

The aſſembly accordingly met, and diſpatched deputies to the king, with remonſtrances on the points with regard to which they required ſatisfaction. The principal demands they preferred were theſe—The concluſion of a peace with England, and the correction of numerous vices which had crept into the adminiſtration; an equal diſtribution of juſtice; an abridgment of the tedious formalities of the law; the choice of magiſtrates; an augmentation of the number of ſtate councillors; a repreſſion of the licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiery, and a proper regulation for enſuring their pay; and, laſtly, a diminution of impoſts for the relief of the people. Theſe demands, indeed, appeared to have no other object than the tranquillity of the ſtate, the public welfare, and the happineſs of the nation: but the true motive of their conduct was ſufficiently explained by the exhibition of their perſonal injuries. They all complained that the king allowed them no ſhare in the government. The duke of Alencon claimed the reſtitution of Niort and Suſanne, and the payment of his penſion; the duke of Bourbon, and the counts of Vendôme and Nevers, preferred the ſame demands with regard to their penſions; while the duke of Burgundy complained, that certain articles of the treaty of Arras—which, however, he did not ſpecify—had not been fulfilled.

The king, having duly examined the repreſentations contained in the memorial, reminded the princes, that he had conſulted all or moſt of them, on every matter of importance to the welfare of the ſtate; that in the choice of ſtate-councillors he had never been influenced by party-ſpirit; that he had been reduced to the neceſſity of taking poſſeſſion of the town and caſtle of Niort, formerly commanded by the duke of Alencon; that with regard to reſtoring the duke to his command, and to renewing his penſion, thoſe were points that could only be decided by his future conduct; that the duke of Bourbon had refuſed to receive his penſion; that the count of Vendôme had retired from office on his own accord, and that when he choſe to conduct himſelf in a manner conſiſtent with the duty he owed his ſovereign, he would act by him accordingly; that he was willing to pay the penſion of the count of Nevers, and to ſatisfy him with regard to ſome other complaints of leſs importance. Charles concluded his anſwer with an aſſurance that it had ever been his intention to obſerve the peace of Arras; that if any one had preſumed to break it, that was without his knowledge, and he publickly diſavowed him; that he himſelf had ſeveral complaints to prefer on the nonobſervance of that treaty, but that he wiſhed to ſpare the duke of Burgundy all ſuch diſagreeable recrimination.

Had the confederated princes been actuated by patriotic motives, the king's reply muſt have induced them to return to their duty. Charles, convinced that he had given them every ſatisfaction they could require, was ſurprized to hear, from his confidential miniſters, that they were endeavouring to encreaſe the number of their partizans, by ſeducing the clergy, nobility and people of the diſtant provinces. The conduct of the duke of Burgundy, in particular, aſtoniſhed the king; and he was frequently heard to declare that, could he be aſſured any ſerious attempt on his authority was intended, he would ſuſpend every other expedition to march againſt the rebels. His prudence ſuggeſted to him a means of averting the ſtorm, without having recourſe to violent meaſures, by ſeeking to gain over ſome of the chief malcontents. He invited Orleans to court, and aſſigned him a penſion of four thouſand livres: the duke, in return for the favourable reception he had experienced, detached the duke of Burgundy from the league: and the example of that prince was followed by the count of Nevers, and the duke of Brittany, who had only engaged in the confederacy at the inſtigation of the duke of Orleans. The dukes of Bourbon and Alençon, and the count of Vendôme, being unable to ſuſtain a war by themſelves, were compelled to ſubmit, and throw themſelves on the mercy of their ſovereign.

A. D. 1443.] Charles now marched, at the head of ſixteen thouſand men at arms, to the relief of Tartas, a ſtrong town ſituated on the river Douze, near its junction with the Adour, which being inveſted by the Engliſh, had engaged to ſurrender if, by the twenty-third of June, an army ſufficiently ſtrong to raiſe the ſiege did not appear before its walls. As the Engliſh made no attempt to diſpute the poſſeſſion of the place, it was ſurrendered to the king, who immediately reſtored it to the lord of Albert, to whom it belonged. The army then proceeded to inveſt Saint Sever on the Adour, which was taken by aſſault, after a ſiege of three weeks, and the garriſon were put to the ſword. Acques, Marmande and Reole experienced a ſimilar fate. The former, was ſoon retaken by the enemy. But theſe trifling ſucceſſes were more than counterbalanced by the loſs of La Hire, one of the moſt ſkilful and intrepid warriors of France, who died towards the end of the preſent campaign.

The Engliſh inveſted Dieppe, which was ably defended by the governor, aſſiſted by Dunois, who had thrown himſelf into the place with a thouſand men. As the ſeaſon was far advanced, Talbot, lately created the earl of Shrewſbury, who commanded the Engliſh, deſpairing of ſucceſs without a ſtronger force, left a part of his troops to guard the works he had conſtructed, and repaired to Rouen to wait for a reinforcement which was daily expected to arrive from England. During his abſence, the dauphin arrived with ſixteen hundred men at arms, and made two desperate attacks on the English works, in the first he was repulsed, but the second proved successful; five hundred of the enemy weer killed, and the rest taken prisoners. The dauphin then entered Dieppe in triumph, and rewarded the garrison and inhabitants for their valour and fidelity.

About this time died John the Fifth, duke of Brittany, on whom his subjects had bestowed, by unanimous consent, the appellation of "the good Duke." Some time before his death he had projected a marriage between his eldest son Francis, who succeeded him in the duchy, and Isabella of Scotland, sister to the dauphiness. Having questioned his ambassadors, on their return from Scotland, on the perfections of his intended daughter-in-law, they assured him, that, "she was "handsome enough, that her body was straight and well-formed for bearing "children, but that she appeared to them to be rather simple."—The duke replied—"My dear friends, I beg you'll return to Scotland and conduct her hither: "her qualifications are just such as I could wish them. Those great subtilties in a wife "are more hurtful than serviceable. I'll have no other; by Saint Nicholas, I think "a wise wife enough when she can distinguish her own shift from her husband's "doublet."

A. D. 1444.] Both France and England were, by this time, so completely exhausted that a speedy termination of the war appeared inevitable. The duke of York had already concluded a truce with the duchess of Burgundy, in the name of the duke, her husband, for an intermediate time*; and the English council, convinced of their inability to pursue the war with vigour, resolved to propose terms of accomodation to Charles, and William de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, was sent to Tours for that purpose. To adjust the terms of a lasting peace, however, was found to be impossible; a truce, therefore, was concluded between the two monarchs, and their allies, to commence on the twenty-eighth of May, 1444, and to last till the first of April, 1446†; but the period of its duration was afterwards prolonged to six years. Had Suffolk's commission extended no farther than to the restoration of tranquillity, the English nation would have been highly indebted to his efforts; but he was charged, either by a private article of his instructions, or (which is more probable) by the secret commands of the cardinal of Winchester, to procure for young Henry a consort, who, being indebted to him for her elevation, might prove a formidable acquisition to his party. The person, fixed on for this purpose was, Margaret of Anjou, daughter of René, count of Anjou, and titular king of Sicily. This princess was one of the most accomplished women of the age: with a person eminently beautiful, she possessed a masculine vigour of mind, a daring spirit of enterprize, and an understanding at once solid and acute; in ſhort, ſhe was peculiarly calculated to acquire a deſpotic aſcendency over the feeble mind of Henry, and to ſupply his imbecillity and defects. When Suffolk made his propoſals to her, they were immediately accepted, and the treaty of marriage was accordingly ſigned; but though the princeſs brought no dowry, he ventured, without any direct authority from the council, to engage, by a ſecret article, that the province of Maine ſhould be ceded to her uncle, Charles of Anjou, count of Maine, prime miniſter of the king of France. The articles of the marriage being adjuſted, Suffolk returned to England to procure its ratification. The treaty of marriage was ratified by the king and council of England. Suffolk was ſent, with a ſplendid train of peers and peereſſes, to conduct the new queen, who was then only in her ſeventeenth year, to England, where ſhe landed in April, 1445.

While the Engliſh and French plenipotentiaries were engaged at Tours in ſettling the conditions of the truce, and in attempts to eſtabliſh a durable peace, a circumſtance occurred which had nearly occaſioned a renewal of the war between the king of France and the duke of Burgundy. A body of French troops made a ſudden irruption into the territories of Philip, where they committed great devaſtations. The lord of Beaumont, mareſchal of Burgundy, having aſſembled the nobility of the province, marched againſt the invaders, whom he attacked and defeated. The dauphin was informed of the chaſtiſement which the troops had received, which he was abſurd enough to conſider as an affront offered to himſelf, and ſwore that he would revenge the inſult. The duke of Burgundy, deſpiſing his threats, ſent him word, that ſhould he venture to carry hoſtilities into his dominions, he would find him prepared to receive him. This difference might have been attended with fatal effects, had not mutual friends ſufficed to calm the reſentment of either prince.

The truce with England gave to France the firſt interval of repoſe which ſhe had enjoyed for a long ſeries of years. The people haſtened to profit by the reſtoration of tranquillity; the operations of commerce and agriculture were renewed; and the nation endeavoured by exertions of induſtry to repair the calamities of war. But ſtill the intercourſe between the different provinces was interrupted by the numerous bands of armed plunderers whom the armiſtice had deprived of their uſual occupation. An opportunity ſoon occurred, for ridding the kingdom of theſe formidable enemies. Frederic the Third, the Emperor, and his couſin Sigiſmond, archduke of Auſtria, had lighted up the flames of civil war in Switzerland, in the hope of conquering that country; and they now applied to the king of France to aſſiſt them with his troops in the accompliſhment of their projected enterprize. The archduke was affianced to Radegonda, daughter to Charles, though the marriage never took place, as the princeſs died before ſhe had attained to years of maturity. This intended alliance, however, was eagerly ſeized by the French monarch as a plauſive pretext for granting the required aſſiſtance, by which means he would have an opportunity of delivering the provinces from a turbulent banditti. The dauphin was appointed to command the expedition; and his army conſiſted of fourteen thouſand French, and eight thouſand Engliſh*; it is probable that the latter embarked in the expedition for the ſame purpoſe as Charles.

The Swiſs were engaged in the ſiege of Zurich, which had not yet joined the confederacy, when the dauphin Lewis marched againſt them. After that prince had formed a junction with the troops of the emperor and the archduke, the Swiſs ſent a detachment of twelve hundred men, from their army which was encamped before Zurich, to attack him. In the plain of Bottelen, between Baſil and Montbeliard, a moſt deſperate action was fought between theſe ſons of freedom and the combined forces of France and Germany. The dauphin's cavalry were repulſed by the Swiſs, who, croſſing a rapid ſtream, poſted themſelves in the garden of a lazaretto, and there continued to fight till almoſt every man of them was ſlain; the few that eſcaped were, on their return, maſſacred by their countrymen. The French, Engliſh, and Imperialiſts loſt ſix thouſand men on this memorable day. The names of the twelve hundred patriots who thus ſacrificed their lives to the liberties of their country are ſtill preſerved in the public regiſters of Switzerland. Lewis, convinced that another ſuch victory would prove fatal to his army, accepted the offers of peace propoſed by the Swiſs under the mediation of the council of Baſil and the duke of Savoy. It was accordingly ſettled that France ſhould obſerve a ſtrict neutrality between the confederated Cantons and the princes of the houſe of Auſtria. The emperor, enraged at this defection of his allies, endeavoured to harraſs them as much as he could, for which purpoſe he ordered the inhabitants to refuſe them lodgings, and took care to deprive them of food and forage. Thus diſtreſſed they were compelled to ravage the country, and were in conſequence attacked by the peaſants, who maſſacred great numbers of them. The dauphin returned to France with the ſmall remains of his army, from an expedition in which he had acquired neither honour nor advantage.

Charles determined to profit by the interval of tranquillity which the prolongation of the truce with England ſecured to the kingdom, to reſcue his ſubjects from the inconveniences to which they were inceſſantly expoſed by the licentious conduct of the troops. With this view he aſſembled the princes of the blood, the nobility and the principal officers of the army, whom he engaged, by an appeal to their intereſt, to ſecond his efforts for the accompliſhment of this ſalutary plan. Some attempts had already been made, by way of experiment, to ſupport a body of troops, that were paid by the towns and villages in which they were ſtationed. This had ſucceeded, and the people, aware of the advantages to be reaped from a regular eſtabliſhment, cheerfully conſented to pay an annual impoſt for the pay and ſupport of the army; in return for which the king gave up the profits which his predeceſſors had been accuſtomed to derive from a debaſement of the coin. This impoſt was alſo rendered leſs onerous to the ſubject by the abolition of a variety of oppreſſive taxes, to which he had before been liable.

The king having ſettled this important point announced the execution of his project. All the troops were reviewed, when the moſt courageous, and beſt-equipped, were ſelected to complete the number that was meant to be retained. The reſt were immediately diſmiſſed, and received poſitive orders from the king to return to their reſpective homes, without committing any diſorders on the road. By the ſame declaration, they were forbidden, under pain of being treated as enemies to their country, and diſturbers of the public repoſe, to take up arms and aſſemble together, without an expreſs command from the ſovereign. To enforce the execution of this ordonnance, the conſtable's lieutenants, the mareſchals, and other officers, had received orders to line the public roads with their archers. Theſe wiſe precautions were ſo rigidly obſerved, that not the ſmalleſt tumult occurred. Many of the diſbanded troops returned to their families and became uſeful members of ſociety; while others, unwilling to renounce a life of plunder, and alarmed at the ſeverity of the new regulations, abandoned their country.——From this moment, France enjoyed a degree of tranquillity to which it had been a ſtranger for more than a century.

The troops whom Charles determined to keep were divided into fifteen companies of one hundred lances each. Each lance, or man at arms, was attended by three archers, a coutillier, or eſquire, and a page, all mounted, ſo that the companies formed a body of nine thouſand men. The officers were all experienced captains, in the choice of whom merit and not birth was conſulted. A great number of gentlemen, and even men of inferior rank, whoſe fortune enabled them to follow the profeſſion of arms, joined this body of horſe, as volunteers, in the hope of being appointed to fill the vacant places. Theſe ſupernumeraries encreaſed to ſuch a degree, that, in a ſhort time, ſome of the companies could bring twelve hundred horſe into the field. Beſides their captains and other officers, the king appointed inſpectors and commiſſaries to review them, and to keep them in order. In time of peace, and while in winter-quarters, they were all ſubject to the juriſdiction of the place where they were ſtationed. They were reſtrained, by the ſevereſt penalties, from the commiſſion of violence and diſorder; and were forbidden to exact any thing whatever from the perſons in whoſe houſes they were quartered. This ſtrict ob-ſervance of diſcipline ſoon diſpelled the terror which the ſoldiery had long been accuſtomed to inſpire. The people began to conſider them as their defenders, and to eſteem them accordingly; and petitions were preſented to the king from all parts of his dominions, to requeſt the favour of providing them with quarters. They were paid where they were ſtationed, ſo that the produce of the tax, impoſed for their ſupport, was generally ſpent in the province in which it had been raiſed. As there were ſtill many younger ſons of the nobility who could not be admitted into the new companies of men at arms, and whoſe indigence prevented them from ſerving as ſupernumeraries, the king retained a certain number of them, and aſſigned them a ſtipend of twenty crowns per month. The king, at the ſame time, formed a body of four thouſand archers, whoſe number he propoſed to augment whenever the ſervice of the ſtate ſhould require it.

Thus did Charles effect the eſtabliſhment of a ſtanding army, maintained by a regular and perpetual impoſt; an eſtabliſhment that gave to the French monarchs a degree of ſuperiority over their great vaſſals, which nothing could in future, counterbalance. The princes and nobility were not aware of the conſequences of a regulation which founded the greatneſs of the monarchy on the ruin of their own. This revolution in the army produced a revolution in the ſtate. The moſt powerful landholders could no longer oppoſe, with any proſpect of ſucceſs, a ſovereign who was conſtantly armed. The diviſion of intereſts which prevailed among theſe opulent ſubjects precluded the poſſibility of a regular and ſolid union, on which alone their preſervation depended. By engaging, ſeparately, in ſuch an unequal conteſt, they ſunk beneath the weight of the ſupreme power, which acquired additional ſtrength from their fall; and the king recovered that univerſal empire, which had been torn from the poſterity of Charlemagne.

A. D. 1445, 1446, 1447, 1448.] Charles having thus introduced order into his finances and diſcipline among his troops, now laboured to recal the advantages of commerce, and to revive the languid ſpirit of induſtry. On the marriage of Henry of England to Margaret of Anjou, the province of Maine had been promiſed to Charles of Anjou, the queen's uncle. The court of London had ſtudiouſly delayed the reſtoration of that county, for the ceſſion whereof no plauſible reaſon could be offered, but Charles inſtantly ordered the Count of Dunois, at the head of a powerful army, to enter the province and expel the Engliſh: Mans, after a gallant reſiſtance, was compelled to capitulate; and, with its dependencies, was for ever alienated from the crown of England.

But while the epithet of Victorious was annexed to the name of Charles; while his fortune and his conduct excited envy and ſecured admiration, he experienced all the pangs of filial ingratitude. The dauphin had appeared anxious to repair his firſt error by prudence and circumſpection. The king had reſtored him to his confidence, and had entruſted him with important commiſſions. But theſe marks of kindneſs had no effect upon the inflexible temper of Lewis. The martial atchievements of this prince had greatly encreaſed his preſumption; and an impatience to diſplay thoſe ſuperior talents with which he fancied himſelf endowed, induced him to form an unnatural wiſh to accelerate the arrival of that period when the reins of government would be delivered into his own hands. To facilitate the accompliſhment of his deſign, he had ſeduced ſeveral of the croſs-bowmen and archers belonging to the king's guard. Fortunately he attempted to corrupt the fidelity of Anthony de Chabannes, count of Dammartin, who revealed the plot to his father. Charles inſtantly ſent for his ſon, and reproached him with his criminal intent. Lewis, without betraying any ſign of confuſion, denied the fact, and treated Chabannes as an impoſtor: That nobleman replied, that he knew what reſpect was due to the ſon of his ſovereign, but that he was ready to maintain by arms the truth of his aſſertion againſt any of the dauphin's houſhold. The monarch was but too well convinced of his ſon's infamy; ſeveral of the Scotch guards, who had entered into the plot, the object of which was the ſeizure of the king's perſon, and, poſſibly, his aſſaſſination, were executed, and their leader, Cuningham, would have experienced a ſimilar fate, but for the interceſſion of the Scottiſh monarch. Lewis finding his perfidy diſcovered, retired into Dauphiné, a few days after the queen had given birth to a prince (in 1446), to whom the king aſſigned the duchy of Berry as an appanage.

While Charles was employed in reſtoring his kingdom to its former ſplendour, the diſſentions which prevailed in the councils of England, afforded him a fair proſpect of effecting the total expulſion of his enemies from France. The queen's faction, headed by the cardinal of Wincheſter and the marquis of Suffolk, had ſacrificed to their ambition and revenge the duke of Glouceſter, whoſe death was highly reſented by the people. This deed, joined to ſome other acts of injuſtice, excited a ſpirit of diſcontent throughout the nation, and paved the way for thoſe tumults and diſorders which marked the reign of the Sixth Henry.

The king of France had reſolved to profit by this combination of favourable occurrences; and, having made every neceſſary preparation for purſuing the war with vigour and effect, he only waited for a favourable opportunity to renew hoſtilities; and ſuch a one ſpeedily occured. Sir Francis Surienne, after he had been compelled to evacuate the county of Maine, had retired, at the head of his troops which amounted to two thouſand five hundred men, into Normandy, under the natural expectation of being received and protected by Edmund, duke of Somerſet, who had recently replaced the duke of York in the government of that province. Somerſet, however, being ſcarcely able to find pay and ſubſiſtence for the forces already there, refuſed them admittance; upon which they repaired to Brittany, ſeized the ſmall town of Fougeres on the river Coveſnon; repaired the fortifications of Pontorſon and St. Jacques de Beuvron, and ſubſiſted by committing depredations on the whole province. The duke of Brittany, juſtly enraged at the infraction of a truce, in which as an ally of France, he had been included, made inſtant application for redreſs to the duke of Somerſet; who replied, that the violence was committed without his knowledge, and having no authority over Surienne, and his followers, he could not poſſibly be anſwerable for the conſequences. This reply proving unſatisfactory to the duke of Brittany, that prince appealed to the king of France as his liege lord, who, in the moſt peremptory terms, inſiſted that Somerſet ſhould recal the plunderers, and make reparation to the duke of Brittany for all the damages which he had ſuſtained; and, that an accomodation might be abſolutely impracticable, he eſtimated thoſe damages at ſixteen hundred thouſand crowns.

A. D. 1449, 1450.] Four powerful bodies of troops were now deſtined for the invaſion of Normandy: One commmanded by Charles in perſon; a ſecond by the duke of Brittany; a third by the duke of Alençon; and a fourth by the count of Dunois. As the governor of Normandy had been obliged to diſmiſs the greater part of his forces from want of money to pay them, and to ſuffer the fortifications of the towns and caſtles to become ruinous for the ſame reaſon, the French experienced but little reſiſtance. A multitude of places were ſpeedily reduced; while Somerſet remained at Rouen unable to oppoſe the progreſs of the enemy. The garriſon of that city conſiſted but of two thouſand men; and Charles, having reduced the greateſt part of Normandy in leſs than four months, advanced, at the beginning of October, to attack the capital, with a numerous and well-diſciplined army. The inhabitants, averſe from the Engliſh government, called on Somerſet to ſurrender; and, after a feeble reſiſtance, he was obliged to conſent to a capitulation, by which he not only delivered up Rouen to the French, but engaged to put them in poſſeſſion of Arques, Caudebec, Tancarville, Mouſtier-Villiers, Liſle bonne, and Honfleur, on condition that he ſhould be ſuffered to go with the garriſon wherever he pleaſed, leaving Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, and ſeveral other noblemen as hoſtages, till the terms of capitulation ſhould be fulfilled. The governor of Honfleur refuſed to obey the orders of Somerſet, and ſuſtained a ſiege, but was obliged to ſurrender on the eighteenth of F bruary, 1450: Harfleur, too, made an obſtinate defence, but, at length, experienced a ſimilar fate.

The king during theſe operations had eſtabliſhed his quarters at the abbey of Jumieges, five leagues di ant f om Honfleur, where Agnes Sorrel had recently arrived, in order to give him intelligence of a conſpiracy which had been formed againſt his life *. Charles treated the report as fabulous, and while he was endeavouring to diſpel the fears of his miſtreſs, ſhe was taken in labour, and after giving birth to a child which lived ſix months, ſome dangerous ſymptoms appeared, and ſhe expired in the abbey *.

While Charles was engaged in the reduction of Upper Normandy, the conſtable and his nephew, the duke of Brittany, were equally ſucceſsful at the other extremity of the province. Surienne not only ſurrendered the town of Fougeres, but engaged in the ſervice of France. The duke of Brittany granted an exemption from all ſubſidies, for twenty years, to the inhabitants of this town, important from its ſituation, its commerce, and manufactures of cloth.

At the commencement of the next campaign, three thouſand Engliſh were landed at Cherbourg, under the conduct of ſir Thomas Kyriel, who reduced the town of Valognes, after a ſiege of three weeks. He then croſſed to Cotentin, with the view to join the duke of Somerſet, who had taken refuge at Caen; but being overtaken by the count of Clermont, at the village of Fourmigny, between Carentan and Bayeux, an action enſued. The Engliſh were at firſt victorious, but the French being reinforced by the arrival of the conſtable with three hundred men at arms, and eight hundred archers, the tide of ſucceſs was turned in their favour, and the enemy ſuſtained a total defeat. If the French hiſtorians may be credited, the Engliſh, (whoſe army had been greatly encreaſed by detachments from different garriſons) loſt four thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy four men in the action, beſides fourteen hundred priſoners, among whom was their general Kyriel †;—of their own loſs they ſay nothing.

The victory of Fourmigny was followed by the ſiege of Vire, which ſurrendered in a few days. The army then ſeparated; the count of Clermont inveſted Bayeux, while the conſtable, in cojunction with the duke of Brittany, formed the ſiege of Avranches, which, in three weeks, was reduced to the neceſſity of capitulating. Tombelaine, a fortreſs that was deemed impregnable, ſurrendered on the approach of the French; and Bayeux, after a vigorous reſiſtance, was likewiſe compelled to ſubmit. Bricquebec, Valognes, and Saint Sauveur-le-Vicomte experienced a ſimilar fate. The garriſons of theſe different towns had retired to Cherbourg and Caen; this laſt place was defended by the duke of Somerſet with four thouſand men; but being inveſted by the king in perſon with all the troops in his dominions, he capitulated on the firſt of July. A part of the army was then detached to reduce the towns of Falaiſe and Domfront, which made but little reſiſtance; while the conſtable laid ſiege to Cherbourg. This important place was taken on the twelfth of Auguſt; and thus did Charles, in little more than a twelvemonth, wreſt from the Engliſh the important province of Normandy, which had coſt them ſo much time, and ſuch an effuſion of blood to acquire.

The ſucceſs which Charles had experienced in Normandy induced him to attempt the reduction of Guienne. Several detachments were accordingly ſent towards that province at the end of the campaign, and the ſtrong town of Bergerac ſituated on the river Dordogne, was reduced in a few days. The count D'Orval, with ſome other leaders, made incurſions into the Bordelois, at the head of five hundred men at arms, and laid waſte Le Medoc. The mayor of Bourdeaux with a body of troops, to the amount of nearly ten thouſand, attacked theſe ravagers, who, notwithſtanding the inferiority of their numbers, obtained a complete victory. The Engliſh nation left eighteen hundred men on the field, beſides twelve hundred priſoners*.

The winter was employed in making preparations for the enſuing campaign, but although the revival of induſtry had reſtored plenty to the kingdom, and the taxes had been punctually paid by the provinces, the king, on examination, found his coffers empty. This alarming diſcovery occaſioned a ſtrict inveſtigation into the conduct of the miniſters of finance, and Xaincoins, a Florentine, receiver-general of the finances, being applied to the torture, confeſſed enormons depredations, in conſequence whereof he was ſentenced to die, together with his clerk, James Chartier; but the king pardoned them both on condition that they ſhould pay him the ſum of ſixty thouſand crowns of gold. Another financier, named James Cœur, a man of immenſe wealth, was likewiſe ſeized and tried by commiſſioners appointed by the king for that purpoſe. Whether this man was really guilty of the crimes imputed to him by his enemies, it is impoſſible to aſcertain; but certain his trial was conducted with the moſt ſhameful partiality, and his judges were predetermined to convict him. He was ſentenced to die, but the king changed his puniſhment into perpetual baniſhment; after exacting a fine of four hundred thouſand crowns, and confiſcating all his property.

The dauphin, about this time, gave his father freſh ſubject for uneaſineſs, by contracting a marriage with the princeſs Charlotte, daughter to Lewis, duke of Savoy. The king, who highly diſapproved of the connection, ſtrictly enjoined him to enter into no engagement till peace ſhould be concluded, when he intended to marry him to a princeſs of England. Lewis regardleſs of theſe injunctions, concluded the treaty with the duke of Savoy, who agreed to give his daughter a portion of two hundred thouſand crowns, the marriage ceremony was accordingly performed at Chambery; but as the bride was yet too young to conſummate the marriage, it was ſettled that ſhe ſhould remain at the court of Savoy till ſhe ſhould attain to years of maturity.

A. D. 1451.] The campaign was opened in Guienne, by the ſiege of Mont-Guyon, a ſtrong fortreſs on the confines of the Perigord, which was ſpeedily reduced: the town of Blaye was next taken by aſſault; ſeveral other places experienced a ſimilar fate, and Bourdeaux itſelf ſoon ſurrendered to the count of Dunois. Bayonne, the only town which now remained in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, was beſieged in the beginning of Auguſt, by the count of Foix; ill provided with ammunition and proviſions was reduced to the neceſſity of capitulating, on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month. The governor, and the garriſon remained priſoners of war; and a contribution of forty thouſand crowns was levied on the inhabitants. Thus was the important province of Guienne, which had ever been governed by independent princes, even under the firſt race of kings, at length annexed to the crown of France. Hitherto the French monarchs had only enjoyed over Guienne a right of ſovereignty which had been often diſputed; except Lewis the Seventh, who acquired a temporary property in it, in right of his wife Eleonora, which he loſt on the diſſolution of his marriage with that princeſs. By the conqueſt of Guienne, Charles found himſelf poſſeſſed of greater power than any of his predeceſſors ſince Hugh Capet. The city of Calais was all that the Engliſh now poſſeſſed in the kingdom; and amidſt all their civil feuds and public diſſentions, they never loſt ſight of the defence of that place, of the importance whereof experience had convinced them.

A. D. 1452.] The nobility of Guienne, being ſtrongly attached to the Engliſh, were highly diſcontented at the change of government; and they deputed two of their body to London to urge the king of England to undertake the recovery of the province; which they repreſented as a matter eaſy of accompliſhment. Indeed the conjuncture was favourable, for Charles had left only a ſmall body of troops in Guienne under the command of the count of Clermont, governor of the province, in the hopes of conciliating the affection of the inhabitants by ſuch a mark of confidence.

The Engliſh miniſtry eagerly embraced the opportunity, and the venerable Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, now in his eightieth year, ſet ſail for the continent with a body of four thouſand troops. He landed on the coaſt of Medoc, and all the towns and fortreſſes in that province opened their gates at his approach. The inhabitants of Bourdeaux were no ſooner apprized of the arrival of the Engliſh, than they invited Talbot to repair thither. That nobleman accordingly entered the city in triumph, and made the ſeneſchal of Guienne, and the French garriſon priſoners of war. The king was at the caſtle of Luſignan when he received the intelligence of this unexpected invaſion. Moſt of his troops being diſperſed, he iſſued orders to aſſemble them with all poſſible expedition; and, in the mean time, he diſpatched the mareſchals of Loheac and Jalognes, with ſeveral other noblemen, at the head of ſix hundred lances, to reinforce the count of Clermont, and enable him to ſuſtain the firſt efforts of the enemy. Talbot had already completed the reduction of the Bordelois, and advancing into the Perigord, laid ſiege to Caſtillon, a ſtrong place on the river Dordogne, the garriſon whereof he compelled to ſurrender. He next reduced Fronſac, and purſuing his advantage with vigour, he recovered the whole province of Guienne in ſtill leſs time than the king had taken to ſubdue it in the preceding campaign.

As ſoon as Charles had aſſembled his army, he advanced to the frontiers of the Perigord, where Chabannes inveſted Chalais, which he carried by aſſault, after a ſiege of ſix days: a part of the garriſon was put to the ſword; and eighty men, who had retired to a tower, where they were compelled to ſurrender at diſcretion, were beheaded, as rebels and traitors who had violated their oaths. During theſe tranſactions, the dauphin, who had raiſed a body of troops, the year before, in order to attack his father, ſent to offer his ſervices to Charles. The king replied, that he had already undertaken and atchieved the conqueſt of Normandy and Guienne without him, and that he did not want his aſſiſtance to enable him to recover this laſt province. The dauphin aſcribed the ſeverity of this anſwer to the count of Dunois, and, in revenge, he confiſcated the lordſhip of Valbonnais, which belonged to that nobleman.*

The royal army, ſtrengthened by the Breton troops, under the command of the count of Etampes, formed the ſiege of Caſtillon, on the 13th of July. Talbot was preſſed by the inhabitants of the neighbouring country to march to the relief of the place; and as he had lately received a reinforcement of four thouſand men, under the command of his ſon lord Liſle, he complied—though reluctantly—with their ſolicitations. He arrived before Caſtillon at the head of one thouſand men at arms, having left orders with his ſon to follow him with the reſt of the troops. The defeat of a body of archers, who defended an advanced poſt, was conſidered by the Engliſh as a favourable omen: Talbot purſued the fugitives to the French camp, but his aſtoniſhment was inexpreſſible when he found it had been ſtrongly fortified, and was guarded by formidable batteries on every ſide. Talbot attacked one of the ſtrongeſt works, which was defended by a choſen band of French nobility. During two hours the conflict was maintained with equal obſtinacy on both ſides. At length the Engliſh, overpowered by ſuperior numbers, gave way; and though thrice rallied by their leader, they were unable to maintain the ground; victory ſtill ſeemed doubtful, when the courage of the French was revived by a ſtrong body of Breton cavalry, who attacked the Engliſh in the rear. Preſſed on all ſides, they performed prodigies of valour. Talbot wounded in the face, covered with blood, rode—for his great age would no longer permit him to fight on foot—from rank to rank, exhorting his men to do their duty, but his horſe being killed by a cannon ball, he was thrown on the ground; and was ſo far exhauſted with fatigue and loſs of blood, as to be unable to riſe. As he lay gaſping for breath, his ſon haſtened to his relief; at the ſight of him Talbot recovered his ſenſes——and requeſted him to retire and preſerve his life for the good of his country. Lord Liſle, heedleſs of his father's advice, ruſhed into the thickeſt of the enemy, and met death. Talbot ſtill breathed when a French archer ſlew him, in order to ſtrip him. The death of the general decided the victory; the Engliſh fled, leaving three thouſand men on the field of battle; and as many more were killed in the purſuit.

* Hiſtoire de Louis XI. par M. Duclos—Nouvelles Obſervations ſur l'Hiſtoire de France.

Caſtillon ſurrendered the next day; and the garriſon, to the number of fifteen hundred, were made priſoners of war.

The reduction of Caſtillon was followed by that of Saint-Melyon and Libourne; and before the concluſion of the campaign, Charles retook every town and fortreſs in Guienne. A heavy contribution was levied on the inhabitants of Bourdeaux, who were alſo deprived of their privileges. In order to avert the danger of a ſecond revolt, a ſtrong garriſon was placed in that city, under the command of the count of Clermont, lieutenant-general of the province.

A. D. 1453, 1454, 1455.] Soon after the recovery of Guienne, the king haſtened to adopt ſuch meaſures as were dictated by ſound policy, as well for the preſervation of internal tranquillity, as for ſecuring his kingdom from foreign attacks, by the concluſion of advantageous alliances. The valour diſplayed by the Swiſs in defence of their liberties made him conſider that gallant people as an uſeful ally; he, therefore, concluded a treaty with them, for the eſtabliſhment of a free commercial intereſt between the two nations, by which France engaged never more to afford, directly or indirectly, any aſſiſtance whatever to the enemies of the Helvetic league; and the Swiſs promiſed, on their part, never to allow a paſſage through their dominions to any troops that were deſtined for an invaſion of France*. That was the firſt alliance which the Swiſs, conſidered as a nation, contracted with any foreign power. The ancient treaties between France and Caſtile were renewed at the ſame time.

Since the dauphin's retreat from court, the king had never ceaſed to exhort him to return; but neither threats, ſolicitations, nor prayers could overcome the invincible obſtinacy of Lewis, who always replied, that he would willingly obey his father, provided he did not order him to reſide near his perſon; he even inſinuated that if any farther reſtraint was attempted to be impoſed on his inclinations he would quit the kingdom. Charles, afraid of being compelled to have recourſe to vigorous meaſures, at length conſented that he ſhould remain in Dauphiné.

Lewis, unmoleſted by his father, directed the natural inquietude and turbulence of his mind towards other objects. He declared war againſt his father-in-law, the duke of Savoy, and, after taking ſeveral fortreſſes, was preparing to extend his conqueſts, when the duke of Burgundy, and the Swiſs of the Canton of Berne, compelled him to accept their mediation. In order to ſupport his troops, Lewis had burdened the people with taxes the moſt oppreſſive. He had eſtabliſhed an impoſt of two livres upon every hearth throughout his domains. The clergy, nobility and commons united in their oppoſition to a tax which they deemed a violation of thoſe privileges they had enjoyed under their ancient ſovereigns, and which were expreſsly ſecured to them by the deed, by which Humbert, the laſt dauphin of Viennois, had transferred his dominions to the crown of France. Lewis, having rejected the remonſtrances of the three orders, they applied to the king, who promiſed to do them juſtice. Charles accordingly placed himſelf at the head of his troops, and began his march towards Dauphiné. Lewis, deſtitute of friends, and unable to oppoſe the torrent, had recourſe to ſubmiſſion; he aſſured his father that he would return to court, but inſiſted on the diſmiſſion of ſuch perſons as had incurred his diſpleaſure. The king replied, that he did not wiſh to compel him to return to court, nor yet to remain in Dauphiné; but that he would not ſacrifice to his imaginary fears ſo many great captains and faithful ſubjects to whom the monarchy was indebted for the re-eſtabliſhment of its power.

Theſe negociations ſuſpended, for a time, thoſe deciſive meaſures which the king had reſolved to adopt; but finding, from their inutility, that it would be impoſſible to overcome the invincible obſtinacy of his ſon, he at length declared that he took Dauphiné into his own hands, and he accordingly conferred the government of that province on the lord of Châtillon. The dauphin now renewed his offers of ſubmiſſion, but ſtill clogged with the conditions abovementioned, which induced the king to obſerve for the laſt time, that he had left the court of his own accord, that he might return when he pleaſed, and that he would always be at liberty to retire, whenever he ſhould think proper. "My enemies"—ſaid Charles to the dauphin's envoys—"truſt to my word, and yet my ſon refuſes to be- "lieve me, in which it appears to me that he does me little honour." Notwithſtanding the proofs which Lewis had given of the badneſs of his heart, the king was ſtill willing to impute his diſobedience to the pernicious advice of his confidents; againſt whom he threatened to exert the utmoſt rigour of the law.

A. D. 1456.] Pope Calixtus ſent the cardinal of Avignon to promote a reconciliation between Charles and the dauphin, but while he was exerting his utmoſt efforts for that purpoſe, the king received intelligence, from Anthony de Chabannes, count of Dammartin, that his ſon was levying an army in the environs of Valence; that he had ordered all his ſubjects above eighteen years of age to take up arms, and had iſſued an injunction to the inhabitants to carry their effects into the fortified places. Leſcun, baſtard of Armagnac, was deſtined to command the dauphin's troops, which conſiſted of ſeven regular companies, of a hundred lances each. But notwithſtanding theſe formidable preparations, Lewis placed little reliance on the extent of his reſources; he knew that the people were diſaffected to his government, and though he had, at firſt, flattered himſelf that the king would be afraid to drive him to extremities, he no ſooner learnt that the count of Dammartin had received orders to take poſſeſſion of Dauphiné, and even to ſeize his perſon, than he reſolved to avoid, by a timely flight the indignation of his father. The duke of Burgundy was the only prince ſufficiently powerful to afford him protection under ſuch circumſtances; to him therefore he applied, and eluding the vigilance of the count of Dammartin, who had already ſeized moſt of his towns, and ſecured moſt of the paſſes, he repaired to the palace of the prince of Orange at Vers. From thence he ſent to apprize the lord of Beaumont, mareſchal of Burgundy, of his arrival; and that nobleman immediately joined him with an eſcort, and conducted him to Bruxelles, where he was received with great pomp and magnificence. The duke of Burgundy ſettled a penſion of ſix thouſand livres a month on the dauphin for the ſupport of his houſhold; and the fugitive prince eſtabliſhed his reſidence at Geneppe, a ſmall town in Brabant, a few leagues from Bruxelles.

Lewis, on leaving Dauphiné, had addreſſed a circular letter to the clergy of France, in which he recommended himſelf to their prayers *. At the ſame time, he wrote to the king to inform him that he had repaired to the Burgundian court in order to accompany the duke on a cruſade againſt the Turks, and to fill the poſt of Generaliſſimo of the troops of the church, which the pope had conferred on him the year before. The duke of Burgundy, too, at the prince's requeſt, ſent ambaſſadors to the king, who gave them an audience at Saint-Symphorien. After aſſuring the monarch of the rectitude of their maſter's intentions, who, they ſaid, had duly given the prince a retreat in his dominions, with a view to prevent him from ſeeking an aſylum in England, they beſought him to receive his ſon into favour, who offered to make amends for the uneaſineſs he had given his father, and even to beg pardon on his knees before any perſon whom his majeſty might chooſe to appoint to receive that mark of his repentance: they then preſented a memorial, in which the dauphin entreated his father to ſuſpend the ſeizure of Dauphiné, to permit him to wage war againſt the Turks, and to ſupply him with money and troops for that purpoſe. The Burgundian miniſters added, that, if the king conſented to this expedition, the duke propoſed to accompany the prince, and to ſerve under him.

Charles told the envoys, that the duke and the other princes of the realm ought only to receive the dauphin, ſo long as he ſhould behave to his father like a good and obedient ſon, ſince from the king alone did he derive the honour that was due to him.

Whatever appearance of confidence the king might aſſume, his ſon's retreat gave him very ſerious uneaſineſs, which he in vain endeavoured to conceal. The duke of Burgundy already was but too formidable from the extent of his own territories, without having the preſumptive heir to the crown in his power; a circumſtance of which, it was apprehended, he might ſeek to take advantage. All the garriſons of the towns on the borders of Burgundy and of the Low Countries were immediately reinforced; while the duke, on his ſide, haſtened to aſſemble his troops. But as the fear was equal on both ſides, no hoſtilities took place in conſequence of theſe preparations.

While the king was employed in fruitleſs attempts to make the dauphin return to his duty, and in endeavouring to counteract the dangerous effects of his diſobedience, a conſpiracy was formed in the heart of his dominions, which, had it ſucceded, muſt have overturned that throne, the re-eſtabliſhment whereof had coſt him thirty years of fatigue, perils, and combats, and muſt have replunged the kingdom into that deplorable ſtate, in which he had found it at the commencement of his reign. The author of this plot was the duke of Alençon, and its object the delivery of his counrry into the hands of the Engliſh*. This prince, ſince the war of the Praguerie, of which he was one of the principal authors, had ſeldom appeared at court, where his intimacy with the dauphin had rendered his conduct ſuſpected; that diſgrace which his own imprudence had incurred he aſcribed to the count of Maine, who, from the degree of favour he enjoyed with the king, had become an object of jealouſy and hatred to the duke. He had been anxious to re-purchaſe the town and caſtle of Fougeres, which had been ſold, greatly under its value, to the duke of Brittany; and he complained that the French council had refuſed to ſecond his efforts for the recovery of an eſtate which he had only been compelled to part with in order to regain the liberty he had loſt in fighting for the nation. This complaint appears to be well-founded, though it certainly could afford no juſtification of the duke's criminal conduct.

The conſpiracy was diſcovered by the infidelity of the duke's chaplain, Thomas Gillet, a native of Domfront. On receiving the intelligence Charles exclaimed, in an agony of grief; "On whom can I now rely, ſince even the princes of my "blood conſpire againſt me?" His horror, however, ſoon gave way to indignation; when he ordered the count of Dunois; Brezé, grand ſeneſchal of Normandy; Bourſier, general of the finances; Couſinot, bailiff of Rouen; and Oudet d'Aide, baliff of Conſtantin, to ſecure the culprit, who was then at Paris. The duke was apprehended, and conveyed to Chantelle in the Bourbonnois.

Three judges were appointed to examine the duke in priſon; but he refuſed to anſwer them, under pretence that, as a prince of the blood and a peer of France, he was not bound to ſubmit to any other juriſdiction than the court of peers. Since the trial of the king of Navarre, no criminal ſuit for Léze-majeſty had been inſtituted againſt a peer; and the number of years which had elapſed ſince that period, the violent convulſions by which the kingdom had been agitated, the kind of annihilation which every order of the ſtate had experienced during that long prevalence of anarchy, had made people loſe ſight of moſt of the ancient laws and cuſtoms. Neither Charles, his miniſters, nor his council, knew what forms were neceſſary to be obſerved in the trial of a peer; and they were compelled to apply to parliament for the neceſſary information on the ſubject.

When this preliminary buſineſs was ſettled, and every preparation made, the king iſſued letters patent for holding a bed of juſtice at Montargis on the firſt of June following; and all the peers and princes of the blood tenant en Pairie, were, according to ancient cuſtom, ſummoned to attend. But this citation of the peers had nearly converted the coolneſs which ſubſiſted between the courts of France and Burgundy into an open rupture. The duke of Burgundy was highly diſcontented with Charles for having eſpouſed, with too much warmth, the intereſt of the count of Saint-Paul, who, according to the Continuator of Monſtrelet, aſpired to the dignity of conſtable of France; and that nobleman was careful to widen the breach between the two princes. A late incident too had ſerved to evince the diſpoſition of the duke in a manner not to be miſtaken: the king having ſent to inform him that he had taken under his own protection the poſſeſſions of the Damoiſeau of Rodemac, ſituated in the duchy of Luxembourg; the duke replied, "Let the king take care what he is about: I wiſh to know whether "it be his intention to obſerve the peace of Arras, which I am reſolved never "to violate; tell him, I deſire to be informed of his intentions without de-"lay."

The haughtineſs of this reply did not prevent the king from citing the duke to appear at Montargis, on the fifteenth of June, with the other peers of France; and the duke told the ambaſſadors who carried the citation, that although the king of France had, by the treaty of Arras, forfeited all right to command him, he would nevertheleſs repair to the appointed place. After he had diſmiſſed the envoys, he ſent his king at arms to Charles to explain his intentions. The contemporary writers are ſilent as to the nature of this myſterious commiſſion; but Philip, at the ſame time, iſſued orders to all his ſubjects to take up arms, and hold themſelves in readineſs to accompany him to Montargis, whither he was determined to repair with all his forces. The king, on his ſide, made adequate preparations.-

Troops were now aſſembling in all quarters, and a ſingle ſpark would have ſufficed to promote a general conflagration. Charles, however, could not contemplate without horror the proſpect of thoſe calamities in which the kingdom was about to be plunged; and he wiſely determined to ſpare the blood of his ſubjects, by overlooking the inſult he had ſuſtained from the duke of Burgundy. He therefore ſent word to that prince, that having received information of his intention to repair to Montargis, accompanied by too numerous a retinue, his attendance would be diſpenſed with, and he was only requeſted to ſend three or four miniſters of his council to aſſiſt at the trial of the duke of Alençon. A report was at the ſame time circulated, that the army which had been aſſembled by the king's orders, was deſtined to oppoſe a projected invaſion of the Engliſh. The duke of Burgundy ſatisfied with the king's moderation, diſmiſſed his troops, and appointed the lords of Crôy and Lallaing, with John L'Orſevre, preſident of Luxembourg, to attend the trial.

As an epidemic diſtemper had appeared at Montargis the king was induced to transfer the bed of juſtice from that town to Vendôme. The duke of Alençon had, hitherto, perſiſted in denying the crimes that were laid to his charge: but at length, urged by remorſe, and convinced of the ſufficiency of the proofs adduced to eſtabliſh thoſe crimes, he confeſſed, that, on the reduction of Bourdeaux by the earl of Shrewſbury, he had lent a favourable ear to the propoſals of that nobleman, for a marriage between his daughter and the earl of Marche, eldeſt ſon to the duke of York; and had promiſed openly to declare againſt the king, as ſoon as circumſtances would permit; that, ſome time after this engagement, an Engliſh herald went to him at La Fleche, when he deſired him to preſs the duke of York to haſten his invaſion of Normandy; and to repreſent to the duke that that was the only time for attacking France to advantage; expreſſing his aſtoniſhment that the Engliſh could be ſuch cowards * as to defer their invaſion after the offers he had made them: He obſerved that the king was then at a diſtance, the troops were employed in Guienne, Armagnac, and on the frontiers of Dauphiné; while the people were diſcontented and eagerly wiſhed for a revolution; that if the Engliſh would land with an adequate force, he would deliver all his towns into their hands, and ſupply them with ſufficient artillery for an army of ten thouſand men; that the duke of York ought to bring the king of England to France; that Normandy was wholly unprovided with troops, and muſt be nearly reduced before any forces could be ſent to its relief. He then adviſed, that, immediately after the deſcent of the Engliſh, the ſoldiery ſhould be prohibited, under pain of death, from pillaging the inhabitants; that all grants made by Henry the Fourth and Henry the Fifth ſhould be revoked; that a general amneſty ſhould be publiſhed in favour of all who had ſince eſpouſed the intereſt of Charles; and that all impoſts, of whatever denomination, ſhould be ſuppreſſed, on condition of their renewal three or four years after the conqueſt. He farther obſerved, that, while the Engliſh attacked France on the ſide of Normandy, with an army of thirty thouſand men at leaſt, the duke of Buckingham ought to land another body of troops at Calais, ſo that the king might be ſurrounded in the heart of his dominions: He remarked, that the Engliſh need be under no apprehenſion with regard to the duke of Burgundy, "who was no ſoldier, but a "harmleſs being, who only deſired peace and concord:" that they might depend upon it, that the dauphin himſelf would declare in their favour, and would aſſiſt them by the ceſſion of his places and the aid of his artillery.

As the reward of his perfidy, the duke of Alençon required one of the three duchies of Bedford. Glouceſter, or Clarence; all the eſtates of the count of Maine; an annual penſion of twenty-four thouſand crowns; and a net ſum of fifty thouſand, one half of which ſhould be paid in advance. Moſt of theſe circumſtances were diſcovered, by means of the agents and domeſtics of the duke, who were confined in the Baſtile, where they were examined by commiſſioners appointed by the king for that purpoſe; and they were all confirmed by a variety of evidence, as well as by the letters and confeſſion of the duke of Alençon himſelf. It is highly probable, however, that the conſpiracy was carried on, on the part of the Engliſh, ſolely by the duke of York's party, ſince no traces of it are to be found in Rymer, nor in any other of our Engliſh authors.

As ſoon as the court, at which the king preſided, had aſſembled at Vendôme, the duke of Aleçnon was brought before them; when John L'Orfevre, preſident of Luxembourg, one of the duke of Burgundy's agents, made a long and eloquent ſpeech, in his maſter's name, beſeeching the king to extend his mercy to the culprit, who had rendered the moſt eſſential ſervices to the ſtate, and whoſe father and grandfather had periſhed in the fatal fields of Azincourt and Crecy, where they had ſignalized their courage in defence of their country. In the following ſeſſion, the duke of Orleans ſpoke to the ſame effect in the name of the princes of the blood; and he was followed by Juvenal des Urſins, archbiſhop of Rheims, in the name of the eccleſiaſtical peers. The king, without diſcovering his realintentions, replied, by the mouth of the biſhop of Coutances, that his conduct ſhould be influenced by the advice of the princes of the blood, and the members of the council, and that it ſhould be ſuch as would content every body. To avert his indignation, however, the moſt powerful ſolicitations were employed. The ducheſs of Alençon repaired to Brittany, and prevailed on the count of Richemont to exert his influence with Charles in favour of a prince, for whom he had ever evinced the ſincereſt attachment. The conſtable accordingly haſtened to Vendôme, where he had ſeveral conferences with the king on the ſubject.

At length, on the tenth of October, ſentence was pronounced by the chancellor, William Juvenal des Urſins; by which the duke of Alençon was declared guilty of leze-majeſty; and, in conſequence thereof, he was degraded from the honour and dignity of a peer of France; his property was confiſcated; and he was condemned to die by the hands of the executioner. The king, however, remitted that part of his ſentence which affected his life, and conſigned him to perpetual impriſonment, in the citadel of Loches, where he remained until the end of the preſent reign. The duchy of Alençon was annexed to the crown, but all the other poſſeſſions of the duke were reſtored to his wife and children, in conſideration of the ſervices which his anceſtors had rendered the ſtate.

A. D. 1457.] The conſpiracy and impriſonment of the duke of Alençon produced no commotions in the kingdom, and the princes of the blood, though intereſted in balancing a power which threatened to keep them in awe, confined their efforts to ſupplications in behalf of the culprit†. Neither this affair, nor the uneaſineſs which the king experienced on account of his ſon's conduct, prevented him from ordering preparations to be made, at the beginning of this year, for a deſcent on the Engliſh coaſt. Brezé, ſeneſchal of Normandy, was appointed to command this expedition, with a body of four thouſand men. He accordingly embarked at Honfleur, but he was forced by contrary winds into the port of Nantes, whence he ſailed for England, and arrived off Sandwich, in Kent, on the twenty-eight of Auguſt. The ſeneſchal landed his troops without oppoſition, but was obliged to ſuſtain a long and bloody conflict before he could obtain poſſeſſion of the town of Sandwich, which he plundered, and then immediately re-embarked his men, not daring to remain on ſhore ſo much as one night *. About the ſame time, a body of Bretons landed in Cornwal, plunderd a few villages, and re-embarked with equal precipitation†.

Arthur, count of Richemont and conſtable of France, ſucceeded to the duchy of Brittany, on the death of his nephew, which happened on the twenty-ſecond of September, 1457; on this occaſion he was urged by the nobility of Brittany to reſign a charge which they deemed incompatible with his preſent dignity; but the conſtable rejected their ſolicitations, and obſerved, "that he was determined "to do honour, in his old age, to a poſt, which had done him honour in his "youth." He died, however, ſoon after his acceſſion to the duchy, and was ſucceeded by the count of Etampes and Vertus, who aſſumed the appellation of Francis the Second.

A. D. 1458, 1459, 1460.] In the month of July, 1458, the dauphineſs, having attained to years of maturity, was conducted to Namur, where ſhe was received by her huſband, and the marriage was conſummated. The duke of Burgundy immediately ſettled on her a penſion of thirty-ſix-thouſand livres.

Charles was greatly incenſed at the encouragement given by the duke of Burgundy to the dauphin; but he had the moſt powerful inducements to preſerve that tranquillity which had proved ſo highly beneficial to the ſtate. The laſt years, indeed, of this monarch's reign, though they preſent none of thoſe ſtriking objects which ſo ſtrongly mark the greater part of his life, exhibit a ſight far more intereſting to humanity—A happy people finally united under the beneficent authority of their lawful ſovereign. Thus, after a long ſtorm, the eye, tired with contemplating the dreadful ſhock of warring elements, venting their fury on the rocks and mountains, repoſes, with exquiſite delight, on the leſs varied proſpect of an uniform and tranquil plain. The tranquillity which France now enjoyed, was the happy offspring of her ſovereign's moderation, juſtice, and paternal benevolonce. In the exerciſe of thoſe peaceful virtues, Charles proved himſelf worthy of the reſpect, of mankind.

At a public feaſt which the duke of Burgundy gave on a new promotion of knights of the order of the Golden Fleece, the repreſentative of the duke of Alençon was admitted ‡; and although that prince had been found guilty of high treaſon, he was, neverthelefs, declared by this aſſembly to be a nobleman of honour and exempt from reproach: nay, farther, his eulogy was pronounced, and the orator did not fail to exclaim againſt the injuſtice of the ſentence which had been paſſed on him; it was ſcarcely poſſible to attack the king in a more indecent and more inſulting manner. The duke of Burgundy ought to have recollected, that during the trial, which he had been ſummoned to attend as firſt peer of France; he had himſelf acknowledged the notoriety of thoſe crimes of which the duke of Alençon had been guilty; and that he had confined his efforts to entreaties for pardon; and that even the ambaſſadors whom he ſent to Vendóme had publickly made the ſame acknowledgments when they implored the king's clemency.

But while the duke of Burgundy was thus ſtudious to mortify the king, he was not himſelf exempt from alarm. As he had ſpies at the court of France who gave him information of every thing that paſſed there, he could not be ignorant that Charles was inceſſantly ſolicited, by different members of his council, to invade the Low Countries; and the alliances which that monarch had recently contracted with Denmark, the emperor, the elector of Saxony, the Swiſs and the Liegois, made him apprehenſive that a confederacy was formed to diſpoſſeſs him of his dominions. Unable to bear the ſtate of uncertainty in which theſe apprehenſions involved him, he determined to obtain from Charles a poſitive explanation of his intentions. With this view, he diſpatched ambaſſadors to the French court, the oſtenſible object of whoſe miſſion was, to complain of ſeveral pretended infractions of ſubſiſting treaties, but who were ſecretly charged to ſound the diſpoſition of the king, and to get intelligence of his real deſigns."*

Charles reſolved to grant the Burgundian envoys a public audience, in order that no one might doubt the ſincerity of his intentions, and the rectitude of his conduct. The ambaſſadors, after complaining that the duke had been accuſed of ſeveral inſtances of diſobedience (which, by the bye, their obſervations were ill calculated to juſtify) reminded the king of the treaty of Arras, and the ſacrifice which their maſter had, on that occaſion, made of his reſentment for the aſſaſſination of his father. They intimated, that the reduction of Paris, Normandy and Guienne was principally owing to his aſſiſtance: they advanced, that after the king had contracted alliances with the enemies of their maſter, they had farther received intelligence that he was actually engaged in negociating a truce with England, in order that he might be free to invade the Low Countries: that this conduct was the conſequence of a project which had been long conceived, and which formed one of the ſecret articles of the marriage of Margaret of Anjou with the king of England, by which that prince had engaged to reſtore all the places which he poſſeſſed in France, on condition, that he ſhould be aſſiſted in atchieving the conqueſt of Holland and Zealand. Theſe reproaches were wholly unfounded: ſince the peace of Arras more than twenty treaties had been concluded between the Engliſh and the duke of Burgundy, who had juſt renewed the truce with them; while the king carried his ſcrupſes ſo far as even to refuſe to enter into a negociation with them. The Burgundian miniſters added that the duke's ſubjects had daily reaſon to complain of the partiality of the judges of the parliament of

* Continuation de Monſtrelet.

Paris, in every cauſe which they brought before them; that prompt juſtice was never rendered them except when they were deſtined to be condemned; that the moſt inſulting language was employed by the French in ſpeaking of the duke of Burgundy; and that the government took no pains to repreſs the ſpirit of licentiouſneſs, ſo deſtructive of that reſpect which was due to a ſovereign power, a prince of the blood, and the firſt peer of France—characters which were united in the perſon of their maſter:—that the duke could not ſuppoſe the king was offended with him for having afforded an aſylum to the preſumptive heir to the crown; ſince he had taken care to apprize his majeſty of the dauphin's arrival in his dominions, and had not then been deſired to refuſe to receive a prince who was deſtined by providence to become, one day, his ſovereign.

To theſe repreſentations, the king replied with equal moderation and dignity. He juſtly obſerved that the treaty of Arras had, at leaſt, been as advantageous to the duke of Burgundy as to himſelf: that the conditions of that treaty ſufficiently atteſted that the ſacrifice of his reſentment for the death of his father had not been gratuitous: that though the mareſchal de L'Iſle Adam had contributed to the reduction of Paris, yet the honour of that atchievement was principally due to the courts of Richemont and Dunois: that the duke's ſubjects, who, ſince that period, had ſerved in the king's armies, were alſo vaſſals of the crown: that the duke of Burgundy had obſerved a ſtrict neutrality during the reduction of Normandy and Guienne: that the alliances which he (the king) had contracted with the neighbouring powers, were in no wiſe prejudicial to the duke, nor did they infringe, in the ſmalleſt degree, on the peace of Arras, which he had ever obſerved with religious ſcrupuloſity: that the project of enabling the Engliſh to reduce Holland was an abſurd ſuppoſition to which the duke himſelf gave no credit; but that the truce which the duke had juſt concluded without the knowledge of France was of a different deſcription: that the accuſations of diſobedience preferred againſt the duke were proved to be valid by juridicial acts: that if the king had not preſcribed to the duke of Burgundy the exact line of conduct which he ought to purſue with regard to the dauphin, he thought he had ſufficiently explained himſelf on that ſubject by ſending him word that he could not pay too much honour to the prince ſo long as he ſhould obſerve that reſpect and obedience which were due from a ſon to a father. The dukes of Orleans and Brittany, with the count of Maine and the other princes of the blood, were preſent while the king delivered this anſwer to the ambaſſadors, who deſired a farther explanation of his ſentiments; Charles, therefore, told them, before their departure, that he would ſend one of the members of his council to the duke to give him all the ſatisfaction he could require.

A. D. 1461.] Had the king only liſtened to the dictates of reſentment, he might eaſily have revenged himſelf of the duke of Burgundy for the uneaſineſs he had cauſed him in affording protection to the dauphin. The court of Philip was not more exempt from domeſtic diſſentions than that of Charles. The count of Charolois, diſcontented with his father and enraged more than ever with the houſe of Croi, who poſſeſſed all his confidence and favour, had formed a deſign of retiring into France; and he commiſſioned the count of Saint-Paul to make the propoſal to the king. He, at the ſame time, applied for the command of the troops, which France intended to ſend to England to the aſſiſtance of Margaret of Anjou. He was told that with regard to the armament, no deciſive reſolution had been adopted; but that if he choſe to come to France, he would be received with all the reſpect that was due to his rank and birth. Several meſſages paſſed on the ſubject; but as the king found it was the count's intention to ſacrifice the objects of his reſentment before he left his father's dominions, he broke off the negociation with this generous remark:—"For two kingdoms ſuch as mine I would not conſent to "ſo villainous an action."

The king had been indiſpoſed for ſome time, and though at an age when the generality of men ſtill retain their faculties, both mental and bodily, unimpaired, he daily experienced a diminution of his ſtrength. That rapid ſucceſſion of events which continued from the commencement to the concluſion of his reign, had ſcarcely permitted him to enjoy an inſtant of repoſe. Inceſſantly obliged to ſtruggle with adverſity, equally haraſſed by the perſecutions of his enemies and by thoſe of his own family; continually thwarted in his deſigns, often reduced to extremities the moſt cruel and diſtreſſing *; only ſurmounting one obſtacle to encounter another; and compelled to fight for almoſt every inch of territory he acquired—Such were the toilſome occupations to which Charles was deſtined. This complication of dangers and fatigues, joined to the weighty cares of government—an immenſe burden of themſelves to a monarch jealous of his duties had weakened the ſprings of life; and an immoderate indulgence in amorous gratifications, to which Charles, particularly in his latter years, had recourſe, as an antidote to the painful anxiety which preyed on his mind, on account of his ſon's miſconduct, greatly accelerated the period of his diſſolution.

About Midſummer he was ſeized with a complaint in his face which was ſuppoſed to proceed from the tooth-ach; but a tooth having been extracted, a fever enſued, and his phyſicians began to be apprehenſive of danger. The king's illneſs produced a general conſternation among the miniſters and courtiers, moſt of whom being objects of hatred to the dauphin, dreaded the effects of his anger and revenge. Meanwhile a council was aſſembled, at which it was reſolved to write to the dauphin without delay, in order to inform him of his father's ſituation, and to know his pleaſure. This letter, ſigned by the counts of Main and Foix; the chancellor des Urſins; the lords of Dunois, Laval, Albert, Chabannes, Eſtouteville, du Chaſtel, and five of the principal miniſters, is dated the ſeventeenth of July. That ſame day all the members of the council adopted a propoſal made by the count of Maine, to exert their utmoſt efforts, ſhould the king recover, to promote a reconciliation between him and his ſon. This engagement they confirmed by an oath; they renewed it on the eighteenth, as appears from a letter written by the count of Foix to Lewis the Eleventh*.

Amidſt the tumult which prevailed on the proſpect of a change in the government, a report was raiſed—but on what foundation is not known—that a deſign was formed againſt the king's life; and it has ſince been added, that the dauphin himſelf was the author of it. But an imputation of this nature requires the ſtrongeſt confirmation to enſure belief; whereas, all the contemporary writers are ſilent on the ſubject. An officer of the king's houſhold—whoſe name has not been preſerved in hiſtory—thought it his duty to inform Charles of the danger which threatened him. The agitation into which the unhappy monarch was thrown by the dreadful intelligence, is more eaſily conceived than expreſſed; after reſcuing his country from the oppreſſion of her hereditary foes, after promoting, to the utmoſt of his power, the welfare and happineſs of his ſubjects, to ſee himſelf reduced to the deplorable ſtate of a tyrant trembling with the apprehenſion of meeting the fate he merited, was too much for his fortitude to ſupport. He ſunk beneath the weight of his affliction; and, ſeeing nothing that could endear him to life, in the diſmal proſpect which now preſented itſelf to his view, he reſolved to die. In vain did his miniſters and the members of his council employ the moſt ſtrenuous ſolicitations to diſſuade him from adhering to this fatal reſolution; he was deaf to their remonſtrances, and obſtinately perſiſted in refuſing whatever was offered him. It is not probable that his conduct, in this reſpect, was influenced by the dread of poiſon; ſince, by the rejection of all kind of food, he expoſed himſelf to certain death. To admit ſuch an idea, we muſt ſuppoſe him to have been abſolutely deprived of his ſenſes, and that this was not the caſe is evidently proved by the manner in which he died. At length, the phyſicians, ſeconded by the miniſters of religion, prevailed on him to take ſome nouriſhment; but his ſtomach was now too weak to bear it. Conſcious that his laſt hour was approaching, he fixed his thoughts on a future ſtate; and, after ſettling his wordly affairs, and diſcharging the duties of a chriſtian, he died at Meun-ſur-Yevre, on the twenty-ſecond of July, (1461) in the fifty-ninth year of his age, and the thirty-ninth of his reign †.

Charles was equally generous and brave; amidſt the tumult of war his heart was ever open to the dictates of humanity; moderate and juſt, his arms were only employed in defence of his country, and in recovering the patrimony of his anceſtors. But his martial atchievements alone would be inadequate to juſtify that degree of reſpect and admiration, in which his memory is ſtill holden by the French. The wiſdom and mildneſs of his government form a fairer theme for exultation, and a nobler ſubject of applauſe. To the laws he has not only reſtored their ancient vigour, but gave freſh force. The many ſalutary edicts that were publiſhed, and regulations that were adopted, during his reign, ſufficiently atteſt the truth of this obſervation. In his ſelection of magiſtrates—an object of the higheſt importance to the community—he diſplayed the moſt vigilant attention to the intereſts and happineſs of the people; in inveſtigating the qualifications of the rival candidates, he always made birth give place to genius, and talents to integrity. Sincerely pious, but exempt from bigotry, he ſtrenuouſly defended the rights and liberties of the Gallican church, even from the invaſions of the holy ſee. At the commencement of his reign an exceſſive facility of diſpoſition expoſed him to all the dangers which generally reſult from an implicit confidence in favourites; and betrayed him into the commiſſion of numerous errors; but convinced by experience he corrected his conduct, while the native excellence of his mind ſecured him from falling into the oppoſite extreme: He ſtill remained courteous, affable, merciful and mild. The chief defect in the character of this monarch was a violent propenſity to amorous enjoyments, which in the early part of his life, rendered him indolent and effeminate; and even to the laſt period of his exiſtence, betrayed him into conſtant violations of conjugal duty.

† The circumſtance of the king's refuſal to take food for ſome days previous to his death, has been doubted by the author of "Obſervations on the Hiſtory of France," and by Monſieur Duclos, the modern hiſtorian of the reign of Lewis the Eleventh. Its truth, however, is aſſerted by two contemporary writers—the Continuator of Mouſtrelet, and the author of the Chronicle of Saint-Dennis. To which of theſe moſt credit is due, we pretend not to decide; we ſhall only obſerve, that the improbability of a fact is, of itſelf, inſufficient to counterbalance the poſitive aſſertion of perſons, who may miſrepreſent but who cannot be miſtaken.

Whenever Charles travelled from one part of his dominions to another, he took ſeveral perſons in his retinue to make clothes, which he diſtributed to the poor. His mode of living was ſuitable to his dignity, though his annual expences never exceeded one hundred thouſand livres; and ſuch prudence was diſplayed in the economy of his houſhold, that he had ſaved at his death, two hundred and fifty thouſand livres, which he deſtined to pay a part of the four hundred thouſand crowns, for which the towns ſituated on the river Somme had been pledged to the duke of Burgundy by the treaty of Arras. He was a moſt rigid obſerver of his word: "Sa parole"—ſays a contemporary writer *—"etoit parole "de roi, et tenue pour loi;" in ſhort, he diſplayed ſuch juſtice and moderation, and was ſo anxious to reſtrain the diſorders of the ſoldiery, that his ſubjects may be ſaid to have enjoyed, even amidſt the tumult of war, all the bleſſings of peace.

The inſtant Charles had reſigned his breath, the count of Maine diſpatched three couriers, ſucceſſively, to the dauphin, to inform him of his father's death, and to receive his orders ‡. Meanwhile the miniſters and nobility who were then at Meun appeared loſt in conſternation; whether from a cowardly apprehenſion of exciting the diſpleaſure of his ſucceſſor, or from a criminal neglect which nothing could juſtify nor even palliate, no preparations were made for the interment of the deceaſed monarch. Tannegui du Chatel—nephew to the nobleman of that name, who had ſaved the dauphin from the Burgundian faction at the reduction of Paris—was the only perſon who had the virtue and reſolution to fulfil a duty that was deemed dangerous: By his orders, and at his expence, the body of Charles was firſt conveyed on the (ſixth of Auguſt) to the cathedral at Paris, where the funeral obſequies were performed, and then depoſited in the royal vault at Saint Denis: Immediately after the ceremony, the count of Dunois, who was preſent, exclaimed, "We have loſt our maſter, let every man pro-"vide for his own ſafety."—An exclamation which only ſerved to encreaſe their regret for the paſt, and their apprehenſions of the future. The money which Du Chatel expended on this occaſion was not repaid him by Lewis till ten years after the preſent period *.

The troubles, by which France had been convulſed, for the long ſpace of eighty years, had thrown every part of the kingdom into the moſt dreadful confuſion: and the annihilation of the ſovereign authority appeared to be an almoſt neceſſary conſequence of thoſe civil commotions which raged with ſuch unexampled violence. But they, fortunately, produced a contrary effect; from this dreadful ſtate of anarchy, a new order aroſe in the ſtate, a ſyſtem quite different from the ancient government, and highly advantageous to the extenſion of monarchical influence. By the adoption of a ſyſtem of policy, unknown to their predeceſſors, that of ſowing diſſention among their enemies, the French monarchs ſucceeded in their attempts to curtail the moſt dangerous prerogatives of the nobility, and by the deſtruction of the Ariſtocratic power, confirmed and ſtrengthened the royal authority. They opened the eyes of the people to their true intereſts, which had been ſo long ſacrificed to thoſe of the nobility. The nation, torn by inteſtine commotion, ſought for a ſupport, which they could only find in a ſovereign, always armed, and conſequently in a condition to afford them protection: they accuſtomed themſelves to conſider the king as the centre of the ſtate, as the only point of union to which every member of the community ought to tend. Experience of the paſt muſt neceſſarily have given ſtrength and effect to an opinion which was found to be favourable to public tranquillity. Already had moſt of the great vaſſals of the crown begun to loſe that tyrannical empire which they had ever been accuſtomed to exert over their inferiors, whom they rendered the ſlaves, and victims of their paſſions. It is true, indeed, that the encouragement of appeals from the courts of the barons to that of the king had, in earlier times, given the firſt blow to this monſtrous deſpotiſm; but that cuſtom, introduced for the purpoſe of counteracting the evil effects of the partial and unjuſt proceedings of the feudal juriſdictions, was confined in its influence; it extended only to particular caſes, and conſeqnently afforded relief only to a few individuals, without affecting the generality of the nation. Motives of greater efficacy were requiſite to weaken and curtail the exhorbitant power of the holders of extenſive fiefs, and theſe motives were ſupplied by themſelves. Their reſtleſs ambition, their reciprocal jealouſies, their eternal diſſentions, their frequent revolts, and their flagrant crimes, began to expoſe them to the indignation and even to the contempt, of their own ſubjects. That complication of calamities to which the people had ſo long been expoſed; the many ruinous wars in which they had been compelled to engage; towns reduced to aſhes, villages depopulated, and lands laid waſte;—all theſe tended to demonſtrate, beyond the reach of confutation, the horrid abuſe which the feudal nobles had made of their power. The people, ſorely oppreſſed by a multitude of petty tyrants, inſenſibly began to loſe that reſpect they had been accuſtomed to entertain for their maſters, and, feeling, at once, their ſituation and their conſequence, reſolved to reſiſt a yoke which tyranny had rendered intolerable. The nobility could no longer ſecure any thing more than a conſtrained and precarious obedience; and they were only indebted, for the continuance of their power, to the feeble ſupport of an ancient prejudice which a riſing ſpirit of rational freedom was labouring to deſtroy. Whenever the princes of the blood, and the great vaſſals of the crown, were attacked, their dependents would only render them ſuch ſervices as they had hitherto found it impoſſible to aboliſh. The nobles had diſdained to ſecure the affections of their vaſſals; and they were no longer poſſeſſed of ſufficient authority to extort an implicit ſubmiſſion. The dukes of Burgundy and Brittany, and the count of Foix, were almoſt the only noblemen who ſtill retained an abſolute power in their reſpective territories; and their right to the poſſeſſion of that power the ſovereign conteſted, though he had never attempted to deprive them of it by exertions of violence. The authority of the reſt was extremely limited, and ſoon died away. They were wholly unable to ſupport a war; they could not even take up arms, without ſubjecting themſelves to the riſk of being tried as rebels, and condemned as traitors. The domains of the count of Armagnac and the duke of Alençon had been confiſcated and ſeized, by a legal proceſs; and no oppoſition had been made either to the ſentence or its execution; whereas, but a few years before, it would have been neceſſary to ſubdue the confiſcated territory by force of arms. Such was the rapid progreſs which the royal authority had already made; by the moderation with which it was exerciſed by Charles the Seventh, the nation were prevented from perceiving its whole extent; but under the ſucceeding reign its effects became more ſenſible.

Charles the Seventh was the firſt of the French monarchs who impoſed a new tax, without the conſent of the ſtates general. This innovation did not excite the ſmalleſt murmur; becauſe—ſay the French hiſtorians—the nation were convinced of the neceſſity of an impoſt, deſtined to maintain the tranquillity of the ſtate; but it certainly tended to eſtabliſh a dangerous precedent, as the power of impoſing taxes without the conſent of the people forms one of the leading features of deſpotiſm. Whenever a tax had been raiſed, before this period, for the payment of the troops, the provinces were previouſly applied to for their concurrence, and the duration of the impoſt was generally regulated by the neceſſity which gave riſe to it; but when Charles eſtabliſhed a ſtanding army, he found it neceſſary to ſecure a regular fund, and therefore, of his own authority, rendered the impoſt, levied for that purpoſe, perpetual. The rectitude of his intentions and the prudence of his adminiſtration, having ſecured the confidence of his ſubjects, he met with no oppoſition to his plan; and, indeed, it muſt be obſerved, to his credit, that he adopted every poſſible means to prevent any kind of impoſition on the people. No more money was raiſed than was abſolutely neceſſary for the purpoſe; and the tax was collected in the moſt unexceptionable manner; each pariſh chuſing its own collectors. It was never augmented during the reign of Charles the Seventh; and under Francis the Firſt it was ſtill ſo moderate, that thoſe who were rated higheſt could purchaſe an exemption for twenty ſols each.

It cannot be ſuppoſed that the arts could make any rapid progreſs in times of tumult and diſorder. The art of war, being moſt in uſe, was, of courſe, purſued with the greateſt ardour; and ſome improvement appears to have been made in the means of deſtruction. The uſe of artillery had become common in France, and a ſeparate fund of eighty thouſand livres annually—equivalent to upwards of thirty-three thouſand pounds ſterling—was provided for the ordnance department. The author of the Chronicles of France,* mentions a cannon caſt by John Maugué, at Tours, in 1478, that threw a ball of five hundred pounds from the Baſtile to the bridge at Charenton.

It is probable that bombs and mortars were invented during this period. At the ſiege of Bourdeaux, Bureau, the maſter of the artillery, made uſe of certain flying machines—engins volans—with which he expected to reduce the town to aſhes; and it appears that they produced the ſame effects as the bombs which are now in uſe. Several proofs adduced in ſupport of this opinion may be ſeen in the Memoirs of Literature†; one of theſe will ſuffice to demonſtrate its validity. Robert Valthurius, in a treatiſe on the military art, dedicated to Sigiſmund Pandolphus Malateſta, prince of Rimini, who died in 1475, aſcribes to that prince the invention of the mortar and the bomb, the effects whereof he deſcribes with ſuch preciſion,‡ that it is impoſſible to miſtake him. But if any thing reſembling bombs had really been uſed in France during the reign of Charles the Seventh, it is certain they were ſoon laid aſide, for we find no mention afterward made of that dreadful inſtrument of deſtruction, till the year 1634.

As ſoon as tranquillity was reſtored to the kingdom, the taſte for literature revived. On the death of Charles the Seventh, the rector of the univerſity of Paris offered to attend the funeral proceſſion, with five-and twenty thouſand ſtudents. But the progreſs that was made in the ſciences was but ill proportioned to the ardour with which they appear to have been cultivated; indeed, in no one branch of literature, is it poſſible to diſcover the ſmalleſt ſymptom of improvement.

The admirable art of printing was invented during the fifteenth century, though where, or by whom is not preciſely known. On reading Meerman, Mattaire, Marchand, Palmer, and ſome others, who have written on the ſubject, it appears moſt probable that Laurentius Coſter, keeper of the cathedral at Haerlem, conceived the firſt idea of printing, about the year 1430; and between that time and his death, which occurred in 1440, printed ſeveral ſmall books in that city, with wooden types tied together with threads. As conſiderable emolument was likely to accrue from the knowledge of this art, Coſter was anxious to prevent its promulgation, and to tranſmit it to his family; but in this he was diſappointed, as, about the time of his death, John Geinsfleich, one of his workmen, eſcaped from Haerlem, and taking with him ſome of his maſter's types, retired to Mentz, where, being encouraged and ſupplied with money, by John Fuſt, an opulent citizen, he began to print in 1441: two years after this man, or his aſſiſtant, John Guttemberg, is ſaid to have invented metal types and to have ſet them in frames, an improvement of ſuch importance, that the city of Mentz was thence induced to claim the honour of being the place where printing was invented.

But according to the accounts contained in the memoirs of the French academy, and in the hiſtorical treatiſe on the art of printing, written by M. Fournier, the invention of that art is to be ſolely aſcribed to John Guttemberg, a gentleman of Mentz, who diſcovered it in 1440, during his reſidence at Straſburg, where the event is ſtill commemorated by a jubilee, celebrated in the fortieth year of every century, called the typographical jubilee. Having ſpent his own fortune, and the fortunes of ſome of his aſſociates who had entered into his ſchemes, in attempts to perfect the art he had diſcovered, Guttemberg retired to Mentz, his native place, where he took John Fuſt as a partner. The firſt work of conſequence which iſſued from their preſs was a Bible, bearing no date, but ſuppoſed to have been printed in 1450. The types, although of wood, were made to imitate writing ſo perfectly, that ſeveral copies were ſold as manuſcripts, at an exorbitant price. Fuſt diſpoſed of ſeveral at Paris; where he was proſecuted for having ſold a great number of the ſame work at different prices*. From Mentz this noble art, notwithſtanding the pains which the inventor took to prevent its propagation, by exacting an oath of ſecrecy from all his workmen, was conveyed to other cities of Germany, Holland, and Switzerland, where preſſes were eſtabliſhed nearly at the ſame time.

The improvement of caſting metal types and ſetting them in forms is aſcribed to Schoeffer, ſon-in-law to Fuſt. Fuſt and Schoeffer are ſaid to have been the firſt printers who prefixed their names to the works they publiſhed; and the firſt book to which their name appeared was a Pſalter, in Folio, printed in 1457. The art of printing was introduced into France by Ulric Gering, Martin Krants, and Michael Friburger, three printers of Mentz, who, on the invitation of William Fichet and John de la Pierre, doctors of divinity, went to ſettle at Paris. They had convenient appartments aſſigned them in the college of the Sorbonne, where they continued till 1483, when Gering took a houſe in the rue de Sorbonne, in which he remained till his death. This founder of French typography acquired a conſiderable fortune, one half of which he bequeathed, as a token of his gratitude, to the college of the Sorbonne.

As Charles the Seventh was of low ſtature and had very ſhort legs, he generally wore ſuch a dreſs as was beſt calculated for concealing the defects of his perſon. The faſhion of long garments was accordingly revived during his reign; but, in the firſt years of the reign of Lewis the Eleventh, a total revolution occurred in the article of dreſs. The women, who had been accuſtomed to wear gowns of an immenſe length, cut off their enormous trains, as well as their ſleeves which ſwept the ground. For theſe ridiculous ſuperfluities they ſubſtituted deep borders that were equally prepoſterous. On their heads they wore enormous caps ſurrounded with folds of ſilk or other light materials,—in the form of a turban—almoſt a yard in heighth. In the reign of Charles the Sixth, the head dreſſes of the women were ſo broad—being two yards in breadth *—that it was found neceſſary to make the doors wider in order to admit them; whereas now they were obliged to make them higher.

The change that took place in the men's dreſſes was not leſs remarkable. The long robes were ſucceeded by ſhort jackets that ſcarcely reached the waiſt, which ſat quite cloſe to the body, and were faſtened by a lace to the breeches, which were equally tight. The front of the breeches was decorated with an ornament bearing an exact reſemblance to thoſe parts which decency forbids to name, and for which it ſerved as a caſe. Theſe extraordinary decorations which were called braguettes, were ornamented with fringe and ribbands. To make themſelves appear broad-cheſted the men wore falſe ſhoulders, called mahoitres; their hair was long before, ſo as to ſhade their eye-brows; and the faſhion of wearing long pointed ſhoes was revived. Such was the faſhionable dreſs of the fifteenth century. The contemporary writers, from whom this account is taken add that every body was eager to follow this extravagant mode of dreſs; that even men whoſe profeſſion compelled them to pay more regard to decency in public were no longer aſhamed of an affectation which ceaſed to appear ridiculous becauſe it had become general; ſo that a grave perſonage, who had been ſeen in the morning with a long robe, paraded the ſtreets in an afternoon "dreſſed "like an ape." The ſame authors complain that private citizens adorned themſelves with golden chains, in imitation of kights; that they were no longer able to diſtinguiſh the gentleman from the tradeſman; and that valets as well as their maſters, were covered with ſatin, damaſk and velvet. Theſe particulars by no means tend to confirm the opinion of thoſe who maintain that luxury is the moſt certain indication of opulence in a ſtate. It is impoſſible to diſcover, in the hiſtory of the preſent period, any ſources whence France could have derived ſuperfluous wealth. The arts were ſtill in their infancy; no progreſs had been made in induſtry; no eſtabliſhment of new manufactures had taken place; her commerce was confined, and her navy in ſuch a languiſhing ſtate, that when any naval expedition was projected ſhe was compelled to hire foreign veſſels. Such was the ſituation of France, confined to her territorial riches; yet did ſhe exhibit every external ſymptom of opulence. The precious metals, which were diſplayed with ſuch oſtantatious profuſſion, were then very ſcarce; as muſt appear from the price of every article of conſumption, which ſold, on an average, for ten times leſs than what it produced a century after. Soldiers were the only people who earned more money than men of the ſame claſs do now. That deſcription of impoſts, diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of tailles, only amounted to ſeventeen hundred thouſand livres, whereas, under the following reign, they were augmented to almoſt five millions. In the marriage-contract of Margaret de Rohan, daughter to the viſcount de Rohan, and John, count of Angoulême, grandfather to Francis the Firſt, it was mentioned, that the prince ſhould be paid the ſum of nine tnouſand crowns, part of his wife's fortune which amounted to twenty thouſand: and in the ſame deed, the viſcount, in conſideration of this alliance, ceded to his ſon-in-law the poſſeſſion of certain eſtates, reſerving however, to himſelf the liberty of redeeming them on paying forty thouſand crowns. Theſe two ſums put together formed a capital of ſixty thouſand crowns, or ſeventy five thouſand livres, for the crown was then worth five-and-twenty ſols Tournois. Such was the portion of a princeſs, whoſe grandſon was deſtined to aſcend the throne.

It was during the reign of Charles the Seventh, that the domain of the crown, which had been extremely limited ſince the death of Hugh Capet, began to experience a conſiderable augmentation. That prince, who on his acceſſion to the throne, was confined to the poſſeſſion of the Orleanois Touraine, Berry and a part of Foitou, left his ſucceſſor the free and quiet enjoyment of the patrimony of his anceſtors, encreaſed by the acquiſition of all that part of France which extends from the confines of Poitou to the bay of Biſcay.

LEWIS THE ELEVENTH.

A. D. 1461.] LEWIS was at Geneppe when he received the news of his father's death, and the intelligence is ſaid to have inſpired him with a joy which he affected not to conceal; but though his eagerneſs to ſway the ſceptre was unqueſtionably great, it can ſcarcely be conceived, that a prince who was the moſt conſummate hypocrite of the age, would have ſuffered ſymptoms of exultation, the moſt indecent and unnatural; to eſcape him; ſymptoms, too, which muſt have made the moſt unfavourable impreſſion on all who witneſſed them. This charge, indeed, appears to have been founded rather on a ſuppoſition of what Lewis felt at the time, than on a knowledge of what he diſplayed; and it is worthy of remark, that, though it has been conſtantly advanced by later hiſtorians, it is not even mentioned by one contemporary writer*.

From Geneppe the king went to Maubeuge upon the Sambre, where he performed the firſt act of ſovereignty, by ſummoning the governors of certain provinces to exact from the inhabitants an oath of allegiance, and to ſend him two deputies from each of the principal towns. He then proceeded to Aveſnes, where he had appointed the duke of Burgundy to meet him. A report prevailed that the late king had taken ſome ſteps to deprive Lewis of his lawful inheritance; and, though the conſtitutional laws of the realm preſented an inſurmountable bar to ſuch a proceeding, that prince, conſcious he had given but too juſt grounds of offence to his father, ſeemed to entertain apprehenſions that his ſucceſſion would be diſputed: at leaſt, his conduct, and that of the duke of Burgundy, were calculated to authorize ſuch an opinion. As the duke was to accompany the king to Rheims he ſummoned all the nobility in his dominions to meet him at Saint-Quentin; and the citation was ſo punctually obeyed, that no leſs than one hundred thouſand armed men attended at the appointed randezvous. Such a prodigious number of attendants rather bore the appearance of an hoſtile army preaparing to atchieve the conqueſt of a kingdom, than of the retinue of a ſovereign going to receive the crown, and to take peaceable poſſeſſion of the throne of his anceſtors. But whatever apprehenſions Lewis might have been led to entertain, they were ſpeedily diſpelled by the zealous loyalty which every claſs of people haſtened to ſignalize. No ſooner, however, was one object of apprehenſion removed, than another preſented itſelf to his mind; for it was the fate of this prince to be inceſſantly a prey to ſuſpicion, inquietude, and terror. the duke of Burgundy, at the head of an army of one hundred thouſand men, appeared to be a dangerous friend. His benefactor in adverſity had now become his vaſſal; and this change in their relative ſituations neceſſarily produced, at leaſt on one ſide, a change of ſentiment; the intereſts of the king were far different from thoſe of the dauphin, when a fugitive, and in diſgrace. The embarraſſment of Lewis was greatly encreaſed by the critical ſituation in which he was placed; ſince by betraying ſymptoms of diſtruſt, muſt have inevitably have incurred the cenſure of ingratitude, and moreover expoſed himſelf to the danger of making a formidable enemy, whoſe efforts he would have been wholly unable to reſiſt. But he extricated himſelf from this dilemma by artfully inſinuating to the duke of Burgundy, that the appearance of ſuch a numerous army would, he feared, inſpire his ſubjects with unfavourable ſentiments, which at the commencement of his reign, it was peculiarly his intereſt to avert. The duke, who harboured no ſiniſter intentions immediately diſmiſſed his troops, and took the road to Rheims, accompanied only by four thouſand of his nobles.

* Contin. de Monſtrelet—Chronique de Saint Denis—Chronique de France—Preface de Commines—Pieces Juſtificatives—Hiſtoire de Louis XI. par M. Duclos.—Hiſtoire de la Ville de Paris—Regiſtres du Parlement.

At Aveſnes the king received the deputies from the principal towns, and from the ſovereign courts of juſtice. A funeral ſervice was celebrated in the church of that town for the repoſe of the late king's ſoul; and Lewis attended the ceremony, (accompanied by the duke of Burgundy; the counts of Charolois and Etampes; James of Bourbon, and Adolphus of Cleves) dreſſed in deep mourning; but as ſoon as the ſervice was finiſhed, he aſſumed the regal purple; not, as has falſely been aſſerted, in contempt of his father's memory, but in compliance with a cuſtom which had been adopted in the early ages of the monarchy, and which his predeceſſors had invariably obſerved*.

Nothing remarkable occurred at the coronation of Lewis, which took place at Rheims, on the fifteenth of Auguſt, except that, before he was anointed, he inſiſted on receiving the honour of knighthood from the hands of the duke of Burgundy, which greatly ſurprized all the nobility; becauſe, ſay the contemporary authors, "The king's ſons were always knighted at the baptiſmal font." Indeed the marks of attention which he beſtowed on the duke were carried to a degree of affectation which ſtrongly ſavoured of inſincerity. By his orders, the principal inhabitants of Rheims went to meet the duke at a conſiderable diſtance from the town; at the gates of the city, he was received by the archbiſhop of Rheims, who preſented him with the keys; and a complimentary oration was delivered in his preſence, in which it was obſerved, that to him were the people indebted for the preſervation of their ſovereign. During the whole time that the court remained at Rheims, all orders were received from the duke himſelf.

By theſe extraordinary marks of condeſcenſion, the king thought he amply diſcharged the debts he had contracted as dauphin; but the duke of Burgundy knew him too well to be deceived by his proofs of attention, and profeſſions of friendſhip. "That man," ſaid he, ſpeaking of Lewis to a perſon whom the count of Dammartin had ſent to Rheims to entreat his good offices with the king, "will "not reign long without involving his kingdom in great troubles."

By the twenty-fifth article of the treaty of Arras† it was formally ſtipulated, that the duke of Burgundy ſhould not, during his life, be compelled to pay homage to Charles the Seventh, nor to his ſucceſſors, kings of France; and if in the ſaid treaty, or in any other act whatever, the king had been ſtiled his ſovereign, ſuch title could have no effect on this total exemption from the duties of a vaſſal. If the king ſtrictly adhered to a convention thus preciſe, he could have no poſſible right to exact homage from the duke, unleſs, indeed, the right of Charles to bind his ſucceſſors had been called in queſtion. The duke, however, in order to avoid all poſſibility of a diſpute on the ſubject, voluntarily paid homage to Lewis, not only for thoſe domains which he held of the crown, but for all his poſſeſſions generally and indiſcriminately.

On the day of the coronation, immediately after dinner, the duke of Burgundy knelt to the king, and conjured him, by the ſacred ties of religion and humanity, to pardon all thoſe who, in the preceding reign, had been ſo unfortunate as to incur his diſpl aſure, and to continue in their different poſts ſuch officers as had ſerved the king his father with fidelity. This ſalutary advice, delivered in the humble form of a ſupplication, Lewis would have done well to adopt; but he was too intent on the gratification of his reſentment to comply with a requeſt that interfered with his projects of revenge. His ſoul was a ſtranger to that chriſtian virtue, the forgiveneſs of injuries. He affected, however, to be moved by the duke's entreaties, and accordingly promiſed to pardon what was paſt, excepting only, from the general amneſty, ſeven perſons, whom he did not name. By means of this reſtriction, he reſerved to himſelf the choice of his victims.

On the laſt day of Auguſt* Lewis made his public entry into Paris, where he was received by the inhabitants with every demonſtration of joy, reſpect, and loyalty. When he arrived at the gate of Saint Denis, two children, repreſenting angels, deſcended and placed a crown on his head. A herald, whoſe dreſs was adorned with the arms of the city, introduced to him five ladies on horſeback, who repreſented the five letters which form the word Paris; and recited complimentary verſes. Actors, repreſenting the clergy, nobility, and the third-eſtate appeared in a veſſel fixed againſt the gate, from the maſt whereof iſſued a king, decorated with all the attributes of royalty. All the ſtreets were adorned with pantomimical repreſentations of myſteries; but the moſt extraordinary ſight which attracted the new monarch's attention, was that of three beautiful girls, perfectly naked, ſtationed at a fountain by which he paſſed, in the character of ſyrens, ſinging ruſtic airs accompanied by muſical inſtruments†. After the uſual ceremonies were finiſhed, the king repaired to the hotel des Tournelles, where he eſtabliſhed his reſidence.

Lewis, on his acceſſion to the throne, had entered his thirty-ninth year, an age when youth can no longer be pleaded in extenuation of error. The kingdom was in a flouriſhing and tranquil ſtate; free from domeſtic commotions, and exempt from the danger of foreign invaſion. The ſovereign authority was more extenſive and more reſpected than it had been under any one of his predeceſſors, ſince the elevation of the third race of kings. The errors of his own youth, and the wiſdom and virtues of his father, might have ſerved him as inſtructive leſſons, pointing out what to avoid, and what to imitate. No monarch had ever ſucceeded to the throne with ſimilar advantages, and under circumſtances more propitious. It only depended on himſelf to become happy, by completing the felicity of his ſubjects; aſſured of their attachment, he might eaſily have commanded the eſteem of the neighbouring powers, the admiration of his contemporaries, and the applauſe of poſterity.

With the exception of a few individuals, whoſe laudable attachment to Charles the Seventh had excited the avowed hatred of his ſon, none of the great officers of ſtate, or chief magiſtrates, had any reaſon to apprehend a removal from their ſtations, which they had long enjoyed with honour to themſelves, and advantage to their country. The king had been hitherto ſilent on this head, but immediately after his entry into the capital, he made known his intenſions. He deprived Juvenal des Urſins of the dignity of chancellor, which he conferred on Peter de Morvillers. John de Rohan, baron of Mantauban, was appointed to ſucceed John de Bueil, in the office of admiral, and William de Harcourt in that of chamberlain. The mareſchal de Loheac was ſucceeded by the baſtard of Armagnac, who had juſt been created count of Comminges. The provoſt of Paris, moſt of the judges of the different courts, and the officers of the mint, alſo loſt their places. It ſeemed as if Lewis had reſolved to retain none of the ſervants of his father; and, from the apprehenſion that any one of them ſhould elude his reſearches, he included them all in one general proſcription.

Couſinot, bailiff of Rouen, a magiſtrate of great merit, who had rendered very eſſential ſervice to the ſtate, was impriſioned; and Chabannes, count of Dammartin, was obliged to conceal himſelf in order to avoid a ſimiliar fate. This almoſt total ſubverſion of fortunes and dignities, kept the minds of the public in a ſtate of continual agitation, while the perſon who occaſioned it was not more tranquil himſelf. The prince who ſuffers the ſuggeſtions of caprice to ſilence the dictates of reaſon and equity, and whoſe conduct is influenced by the prevailing paſſion of the moment, can neither be happy nor free. wretched, indeed, muſt be his ſituation, who with the inclination poſſeſſes the ability to oppreſs.

Lewis was not more anxious to ruin all ſuch as had enjoyed the favour of his father, than to protect thoſe who had incurred his diſpleaſure. On his acceſſion to the throne, he ordered the duke of Alençon to be releaſed, and he, ſoon after, reſtored him to all his former poſſeſſions, honours and dignities. John of Armagnac, who had been condemned by the parliament, alſo obtained the reſtitution of his confiſcated territories. Such were the firſt exertions which Lewis made of his power; and but a ſhort time elapſed before he found reaſon to repent a conduct, which was equally impolitic and unjuſt.

While he was thus occupied in incurring the hatred of his ſubjects, he ſpared no pains to eſtabliſh harmony and tranquillity among his neighbours. By his urgent ſolicitations with the duke of Burgundy, he induced him to receive the count of Saint Paul into favour, and he likewiſe effected a reconciliation between that nobleman and the houſe of Croi; though he muſt have known that, by ſuch a meaſure, he could not fail to excite the ſecret reſentment of the count of Charolois. In ſhort, before he had completed the firſt month of his reign, he had contrived to lay the foundation of an almoſt general diſcontent.

At length, Lewis left Paris to viſit his mother at Amboiſe; but before his departure, he had an interview with the duke of Burgundy, to whom, in the preſence of the princes of the blood, and many of the nobility, he renewed his profeſſions of friendſhip and eſteem, repeating his declarations, that to him he was indebted for his crown and his life. The three princes parted with every appearance of mutual ſatisfaction; and after this interview the duke returned to Flanders, and the count of Charolois repaired to Burgundy.

Among the numerous complaints preferred by the factious and diſcontented againſt the old adminiſtration, the want of economy in the management of the revenue, and the intolerable weight of taxes, had not been forgotten. Such accuſations, indeed, have in all ages, and in almoſt all countries, been the inſtruments employed by wicked and deſigning men to ſeduce the people from their duty, by impoſing on their credulity; knowing their aptitude to believe that all who are diſaffected to the government, muſt be anxious to promote their welfare and to afford them relief. As theſe reports had been propagated by the adherents of Lewis, it was expected that, on his acceſſion to the throne, he would rather diminiſh than augment the taxes; but almoſt immediately after he had received the intelligence of his father's death, he ordered a freſh tax to be levied throughout his dominions. On his arrival at Rheims, he made the moſt magnificent promiſes to the inhabitants, and ſolemnly ſwore that he would never ſubject them to any new impoſt; but when he left the town, he forgot his oath. The inhabitants, ſurpriſed to find the leaſe of the Gabelles and other exactions, publickly renewed, in direct violation of the king's promiſe, flew to arms, broke open the offices where the regiſters were kept, tore the regiſters, maſſacred the revenue-farmers, and burnt their contracts. This ſedition, however, was ſoon repreſſed; eighty of the inſurgents were ſeized by the troops; and ſix of them, with the leaders of the revolt, were hanged. The ſame ſpirit of oppoſition evinced itſelf in ſeveral other towns, particularly in Angers, Alençon, and Aurillac in Auvergne; but by timely exertions of vigour it was ſpeedily quelled.

The king ſtopped but a few days with his mother, and then repaired to Tours, where he received a viſit from the count of Charolois, on his return to Burgundy. That prince experienced the moſt extraordinary marks of diſtinction during his reſidence at the French court: Lewis, not content with defraying his expences, and thoſe of his houſhold, and with procuring him every amuſement the age would afford, diſplayed an anxiety to gratify every wiſh he expreſſed. On his departure, he appointed him his lieutenant-general in Normandy, with a ſalary of ſix-and-thirty thouſand livres. Before the count returned to Bruxelles, he went to take poſſeſſion of his new government, where the inhabitants, by the king's expreſs orders, paid him the ſame honours as if he had been their ſovereign. But while Lewis thus loaded the count of Charolois with careſſes, he ſecretly confirmed, in violation of the moſt ſolemn oaths, the alliance which Charles the Seventh had contracted with the people of Liege, the avowed enemies of the houſe of Burgundy.

Now that he was poſſeſſed of ſupreme power, and, conſequently, free to diſplay his humours without fear of contradiction, Lewis betrayed a decided preference for thoſe diſhonourable intrigues, and crooked ſyſtems of policy, to which he had been addicted from his youth. Inconſtant and capricious, his actions ſeemed to be regulated by the whim of the moment, without any regard to propriety, or conſideration for the future*. Pope Pius the Second had made ſeveral vain attempts, during the late reign, to procure the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction; and being acquainted with the diſpoſition of the new monarch, who, while dauphin, had promiſed to give him ſatisfaction on that head, he ordered the biſhop of Arras, whom he had recently appointed his legate à latere in France, to remind him of his promiſe. That prelate accordingly repreſented to the king, that, by a compliance with the requeſt of his holineſs, he would ſtrengthen his own authority; that he would always be able to diſpoſe of the livings, by his recommendation to the pope, who would be bound in gratitude not to refuſe him any thing he might aſk; that when the princes and nobility had no longer any influence in the elections, they would loſe the only means they poſſeſſed of acquiring partiſans among the clergy; and that there would always be a legate in France, to whom his majeſty might apply for all the favours he wiſhed to obtain from the holy ſee.

The kingdom of Naples, which had formerly belonged to the houſe of Anjou, had been uſurped by that of Arragon, and was now poſſeſſed by Ferdinand, a natural ſon of Alphonſo, the late king. The duke of Calabria, ſon to René, the titular monarch of Naples, Sicily, and Jeruſalem, found the inclinations of the Neapolitans favourable to his pretenſions; and the biſhop of Arras, imagining that Lewis would be anxious to place his kinſman on the throne of Naples, aſſured him, that the pope had reſolved to inveſt the duke with that kingdom. His holineſs, indeed, had no ſuch intention; but the prelate would have promiſed ſtill more, had he deemed it neceſſary to the ſucceſs of his project.

In ſhort, the biſhop exerted his eloquence with ſuch effect, that the king, who ever diſplayed a willingneſs to revoke any act of his father's, granted all he requeſted. Had the pontiff himſelf dictated the letters of revocation, he could not have made uſe of expreſſions more favourable to the unlimited authority of the holy ſee, and more repugnant to the dignity of the throne, the rights and prerogatives of the Gallican church, the wiſdom of the laws, and the honour of the magiſtracy. The king, after aſſuring the pope of his filial obedience, declared that he deſired nothing more earneſtly than to fulfil the promiſe he had made before his acceſſion to the throne, to aboliſh the Pragmatic Sanction, which, having been eſtabliſhed in a time of revolt, was injurious to the holy ſee. "Our counciller," ſays Lewis, alluding to the biſhop of Arras; "has convinced us that "this conſtitution, while it attacks your authority, tends to encourage the licen- "tiouſneſs of our prelates."—"Although moſt men of knowledge endeavour to "diſſuade us from our deſign, we have, according to your requeſt, abrogated "this Pragmatic Sanction, and caſt it out from our dominions. Exert then your " power, in future, in our kingdom as you pleaſe; and if any perſons ſhall re-" ſiſt you, we promiſe your holineſs, on the word of a king, to execute your " commands, in ſpite of all oppoſition or appeal, and we will repreſs and

" reſtrain all thoſe who ſhall diſobey your orders *." It was thus that the king, by the ſtrongeſt demonſtrations of unlimited obedience, anſwered the ambiguous careſſes of the artful pontiff, who, in a brief addreſſed to the biſhop of Arras, charged that prelate to aſſure his deareſt ſon, the king of France, that he began to feel an inclination to love him wonderfully †.

But Lewis, who believed himſelf to be the moſt ſkilful and profound politician of the age, had ſoon the mortification to find, that he had been duped by the pope; for Pius, having obtained his ends, refuſed to ratify the engagement which his legate had contracted for placing the duke of Calabria on the throne of Naples. Enraged at the diſcovery, he reſolved to turn the pontiff's arts againſt himſelf; and he accordingly ſuffered his parliament to carry into execution the Pragmatic Sanction, which he had ſo ſolemnly revoked.

While the king was at Tours, he received ambaſſadors from the duke of Brittany, who came to regulate the form of homage their ſovereign was to pay for his duchy ‡; this point being ſettled, the duke himſelf went to Tours, and ſubmitted to the uſual ceremony. The king, who was jealous of his intimacy with the count of Charolois, ſpared no pains to gain his confidence. In the hope of attaching him to his intereſts, he declared him his lieutenant-general in Maine, Anjou, Touraine, and Normandy, although he had juſt conferred the government of this laſt province on the count of Charolois. If his object was to ſow diſſention between the two princes, he did not reap from this ſhallow artifice the advantage he expected. Soon after the duke's departure, the king repaired to Brittany, under pretence of performing a pilgrimage to the ſhrine of ſome ſaint; but the real object of his journey was, to examine the ſtate of the duchy, and to promote a marriage between Frances of Amboiſe, ducheſs-dowager of Brittany, and the duke of Savoy §; but the duke of Brittany, aware of his deſigns, found means to prevent their execution.

Previous to his journey to Brittany, the king had aſſigned the duchy of Berri, as an appanage to his brother Charles, with the uſual clauſe of reverſion to the crown in default of male heirs; and accompanied by a promiſe to make ſome more ample proviſion for him at a future time. This promiſe ſupplied the young prince with a pretext to prefer ſuch claims as beſt coincided with his ambitious plans; and a penſion of twelve thouſand livres, in addition to his duchy, being deemed an inſufficient income for th ſon of a king, the public, diſguſted with Lewis, loudly exclaimed againſt that monarch's injuſtice to his brother.

The conduct of Lewis to Anthony de Chabannes, count of Dammartin, was calculated to encreaſe ſtill farther the popular diſcontents. That nobleman, tired with the life of a fugitive, repaired to court, and deſired the king would immediately order him to be tried with the utmoſt rigour of the law. He was charged with having falſely accuſed the king, while he was dauphin, of having conſpired againſt his father; and on this charge his judges were baſe enough to pronounce him guilty of high treaſon, in conſequence of which he was condemned to die; but Lewis changed his puniſhment into perpetual impriſonment, and he was accordingly commited to the Baſtile; his effects were confiſcated, and moſt of his eſtates were given to Charles de Melun, governor of Paris, who had been chiefly inſtrumental in procuring his condemnation.

A. D. 1462, 1463.] Margaret of Anjou, the unhappy queen of England, had embarked for the continent, ſome time after the fatal battle of Touton, to ſolicit ſuccours and aſſiſtance from her foreign connections. She paid a viſit to the king at Chinon, who expreſſed the greateſt concern for her misfortunes. During her reſidence at the French court, ſhe ſtood godmother to the only ſon of Charles, duke of Orleans, by Mary of Cleves, his third wife: the king was the godfather, and he gave his own name to the young prince, who afterward aſcended the throne of France, under the appellation of Lewis the Twelfth. But, notwithſtanding the profeſſions of friendſhip which the king made to Margaret, all he could be perſuaded to grant to her earneſt ſolicitations, were a loan of twenty thouſand livres, and a ſupply of two thouſand troops, under the command of Brezé, ſeneſchal of Normandy, who is ſaid to have entertained for the queen more tender ſentiments than pity and compaſſion *. With this inadequate ſuccour—for which too, the intereſted monarch made her ſign, in her huſband's name, a truce for one hundred years, and a promiſe to reſtore the city of Calais; Margaret embarked for England about the end of the year 1462; and, after a tedious and tempeſtuous paſſage, arrived off Tinmouth; but being prevented from landing there, ſhe again put to ſea, and her fleet being overtaken by a ſtorm, many of the ſhips were ſtranded near Bamburgh Caſtle, and the veſſel in which the queen was, with difficulty, reached the port of Berwick. The French troops effected a landing in Holy Iſland, where they were ſoon attacked by a ſuperior force, and moſt of them either killed or taken; but their leader, with ſome other officers, made their eſcape, and joined the queen†.

The defeat of the royaliſts at Hexham completed the misfortunes of Margaret, who, after that battle, ſailed from England with her ſon, and a choſen band of faithful followers, and arrived ſafe at Sluys in Flanders. The duke of Burgundy received her with great hoſpitality; and, after loading her with valuable preſents, ſent a guard to eſcort her into Lorrain, where her brother, the duke of Calabria, then reſided. Brezé, who was preſent at the battle, effected his eſcape to Alnwick, where he was beſieged, and, after a brave reſiſtance, conſented to ſurrender the place, on condition of being permitted to return to France with the ſmall remains of his troops.

A revolt of the Catalonians, who had renounced their allegiance to Juan, king of Arragon—a monarch ſtained with the blood of his own ſon—and invited the king of Caſtile to become their ſovereign, now attracted the attention of Lewis. He, at firſt, promiſed protection to the inſurgents; but, ſeduced by the offers of Juan, he had a conference with that monarch between Mauleon and Sauveterre, on the confines of Navarre, where a treaty was concluded, by which Lewis engaged to aſſiſt the king of Arragon with a loan of three hundred and fifty thouſand crowns, and a ſupply of ſeven hundred lances; and the important counties of Rouſſillon and Cerdagne, ſubject to redemption, were transferred to him as a ſecurity for the money he advanced. Theſe the king immediately annexed to the domain of the crown, in virtue of the pretenſions of his mother, Mary of Anjou, ſprung from Yolanp of Arragon; but he ſoon after transferred them to the count of Foix, as an indemnity for his claims to the kingdom of Navarre, founded on the rights of his wife, Leonora, who had poiſoned her eldeſt ſiſter Blanche.

The aſſiſtance of Lewis proved of little advantage to the Arragonian monarch, who was defeated in all quarters, by the active exertions of his opponent, Henry the Fourth, king of Caſtile, ſurnamed the Impotent. But this laſt prince was at length perſuaded by his miniſters, who had been ſeduced by Juan, to ſubmit their diſpute to the arbitration of the French king; who pronounced a deciſion, equally diſpleaſing to both parties, and which was reſpected by neither. An interview, on the frontiers of their reſpective dominions, having been agreed upon between Lewis and Henry, the former repaired to Saint Jean de Luz, and the latter to Fontarabia. They advanced to the oppoſite banks of the Bidaſſoa, which ſeparates France from Spain; and their contraſted appearance ſtrongly atteſted the difference of their diſpoſitions.—Henry, luxurious, magnificent, and vain, was arrayed in the richeſt ſtuffs, embelliſhed with gold and precious ſtones, and attended by a numerous train, all equally brilliant. The ſails of the barks, which conveyed them to the French ſide of the river, were alſo decorated with a profuſion of the precious metals. Lewis, whoſe pride, certainly leſs reſpectable, was diſplayed in a ſtudied affectation of the oppoſite extreme, had encreaſed the natural uncouthneſs of his perſon, by a dreſs the moſt vulgar and unbecoming. His under garment, which ſate cloſe to his body, was made of coarſe cloth; and over it he wore a doublet of fuſtian. His hat was extremely ſmall, reſembling the calotte, uſually worn by prieſts, and decorated with a leaden image of the Virgin. The few nobles who attended him, imitated their maſter in the meanneſs of their dreſs. But the wealth which Henry had expended in his ſumptuous preparations, Lewis employed to bribe the miniſters of Caſtile—for the art of making traitors always formed a leading feature in his illiberal and dishoneſt ſyſtem of policy. The two monarchs had a ſhort conference together; and, after a formal renewal of the ancient treaties between the two crowns, they parted with a thorough contempt of each other.

The king had lately reſigned all his pretenſions to the duchy of Luxembourg, in favour of the duke of Burgundy; as well as to the reſtitution of the ſum of fifty thouſand crowns, which his father had paid to the duke of Saxony, and his co-heirs, for the renunciation of their claims. But while he appeared thus anxious to court the favour of Philip, he obſerved a very different line of conduct with his ſon Charles. Uneaſy at the intimate connection which ſubſiſted between that prince and the duke of Brittany, he inceſſantly laboured to promote a breach between them, or at leaſt, to counteract the dangerous deſigns which he imputed to them, by creating embarraſſments which might divert their attention elſewhere. He beſtowed every mark of diſtinction on the lord of Croi; not content with raiſing him to the high office of Grand Maſter, he ceded to him the town and territory of Guines; and, convinced that nothing could give greater offence to the count of Charolois, he ordered this extraordinary inſtance of his favour to be publiſhed by ſound of trumpet, in the ſtreets of his capital. He alſo extended his protection to every perſon indiſcriminately, who had incurred the diſpleaſure of Charles. To this period may be traced the origin of that inveterate enmity which ſoon prevailed between thoſe rival princes, and which only expired with life.

The duke of Burgundy had flattered himſelf that the unconditional homage which he had paid to the king, would be conſidered rather as a mark of reſpect, than as an eſſential obligation; and that no duties of vaſſalage would be required from him that could tend to derogate, in any degree, from the character of an independent prince, which he had ſo long maintained, and was ſtill determined to preſerve*. Some Engliſh ſhips of war having been ſeen cruizing in the channel, the king ſent an ambaſſador to Lewis to ſummon him to declare war againſt Edward, and to publiſh an expreſs prohibition to all his ſubjects to afford that prince any kind of aſſiſtance. This was a mere pretext to ſound the intentions of the duke, ſince, in the preſent ſtate of affairs, no dread of an invaſion could poſſibly exiſt. The moſt important, and indeed, the real object of the embaſſy, was to engage Philip to permit the eſtabliſhment of the Gabelle in his dominions; a propoſition which he rejected in the moſt poſitive terms. He even ſent the lord of Chimey to the king to complain of this conduct, and to beg he would, for the love of him, deſiſt from a pretenſion which he could never admit.

The Burgundian envoy remained ſome time at the French court before he could procure an audience of the king. At length, tired with the delays which he was made to experience, he placed himſelf at the door of the king's apartment, and reſolved not to quit his poſt until he had fulfilled his commiſſion. The monarch, no longer able to avoid him, for once ſuffered his impatience to get the better of his policy, and exclaimed, "What ſort of man then is this duke of Burgundy? Is he "different, or made of different metal from all the other princes and nobility of my king-"dom?" "Yes ſire," replied Chimey, "the duke of Burgundy is indeed different, and "made of different metal from all the other princes of your kingdom, or of the neigh-"bouring countries, for he kept you ſafe, and ſupported you againſt the will and pleaſure "of king Charles your father, whom God pardon, which none of the other princes had "either the inclination or ſpirit to do." The king, confuſed at this unexpected reply, immediately returned to his apartment. The count of Dunois, approaching the lord of Chimey, aſked him how he had dared to expreſs himſelf with ſuch freedom to a prince ſo abſolute as Lewis the Eleventh. "Had I been fifty leagues from "hence," replied the brave Burgundian, "and had thought that the king wiſhed to "ſay to me what he has juſt ſaid of my maſter, I would have inſtantly returned to "make him the ſame anſwer as I have juſt made him." As neither the king nor the duke deemed it prudent to come to an open rupture, this affair was attended with no farther conſequences.

Convinced of the impoſſibility of enforcing his pretenſions by arms, Lewis appeared to renounce them; and this tacit diſavowal ſatisfied Philip, who was already too much haraſſed by the indocility of the count of Charolois, to think of encreaſing his embarraſſment by involving himſelf in freſh difficulties. The favour ſhewn to the houſe of Croi was ſtill the cauſe of that diviſion which prevailed between the father and ſon. As the duke advanced in years, the influence of his favourites encreaſed; and as Lewis, by his liberal donations, had attached thoſe favourites to his intereſt, he might probably have obtained what he aſked, had not the eſtabliſhment of the Gabelle been attended with difficulties almoſt inſurmountable. The bare propoſal to levy that impoſt had formerly occaſioned a general inſurrection in the Low Countries.

But Lewis was more ſucceſsful in another negociation with the duke of Burgundy, the object of which was, to procure the reſtitution of thoſe towns on the river Somme, which had been ceded by Charles the Seventh, at the treaty of Arras: and which, in effect, rendered Philip maſter of Picardy. The meaſure was oppoſed by the count of Charolois; but the influence of John de Croi, the duke's miniſter, and the king's friend, prevailed, and four hundred thouſand crowns were given to recover theſe valuable pledges. Even in this tranſaction, Lewis diſplayed his duplicity: he had promiſed to retain the officers appointed by the duke as governors of theſe towns; but no ſooner was he in poſſeſſion than he diſplaced them, and, at the ſame time, nominated others, whom he knew would be equally acceptable to Philip.

Soon after this negociation was completed, Lewis loſt his mother, Mary of Anjou, who died on the twenty-ninth of November, 1463, in the ſixtieth year of her age. The exemplary conduct, the ſignal virtues, and fervent piety of this amiable princeſs, had attracted univerſal reſpect and eſteem; and her loſs was deeply regretted by the nation. Her death, indeed, could not have happened at a more unfortunate period; for as the king paid conſiderable deference to her advice, ſhe might, poſſibly, have been able to prevent thoſe troubles of which his improper conduct and reſtleſs diſpoſition had laid the foundation. Since his acceſſion to the throne, Lewis ſeemed to have wholly neglected an art the moſt eaſily acquired, and the moſt neceſſary for a monarch to learn, that of ſecuring the affections of his ſubjects.—The prince who ſeeks to confirm his power by the influence of fear, at once betrays the tyrant and the fool; alike ignorant of his duties and his intereſt, he is equally a ſtranger to the obligations impoſed on himſelf, and to the feelings implanted in the heart of man; fortunately for the happineſs of the world, ſuch a flagrant violation of moral rectitude generally carries its own puniſhment along with it. It cannot be too often repeated, nor too ſtrongly impreſſed on the minds of monarchs, that the love of the people conſtitutes the ſureſt and firmeſt ſupport of the throne.

Lewis, by his conduct, had naturally excited the deteſtation of the French; and being conſcious that he merited their hatred, he was in continual dread of feeling its effects. Tormented by the moſt alarming apprehenſions, he was inceſſantly employed in the adoption of means for averting the ſtorm that threatened him. The malecontents were numerous; and, headed by the princes of the blood, and the chief nobility, they only waited for a favourable opportunity to give a free ſcope to their reſentment. The king, meanwhile, though ſenſible of his danger, knew not who were his enemies; he had been apprized, that ſecret aſſociations were formed in different parts of the kingdom; but all his endeavours to diſcover the members of them had proved inefficacious.

The penſioners whom Lewis maintained at the Burgundian court aſſured him, that he had nothing to apprehend from Philip, at leaſt, ſo long as the miſunderſtanding continued to ſubſiſt between that prince and his ſon. The duke had already addreſſed ſome complaints on this ſubject to the ſtates of Flanders aſſembled at Bruges; and deputies were appointed to wait on the count of Charolois, and invite him to return to court. The count received them with kindneſs; and after he had explained the cauſe of his diſcontent, complied with their invitation, and went to his father at Bruges. But this reconciliation proved of ſhort continuance. The ſame ſubject for diſſention ſtill ſubſiſted; the count's averſion for the houſe of Croi was inſurmountable; he had declared them to be his mortal enemies; he had openly accuſed them of conſpiring againſt his life; and he even ſeemed directly to include the king in his accuſations, by obſerving, that he would not deſignate the moſt dangerous enemies who ſought for his death, on account of the horror that muſt neceſſarily be experienced if he named them.

Thus relieved from all dread of interruption from that quarter, Lewis reſolved to direct his attacks againſt the duke of Brittany, who, next to Philip, had inſpired him with the moſt ſerious apprehenſions*. His conduct in this reſpect was influenced as much by the perſonal hatred he had conceived againſt the duke, as by the dread of the connection he knew to ſubſiſt between Francis and the count of Charolois. In order to take the duke of Brittany by ſurprize, he had ſent a ſtrong body of troops, in different detachments, and at different times, to the frontiers of the duchy; and all his meaſures were adopted, and plans conducted with ſo much ſecrecy, that the duke was not apprized of the danger which threatened him, till the arrival of the French chancellor, Peter de Morvilliers, who was ſent to inform him, that the king, "forbade him in future to entitle himſelf, "duke by the grace of God; to coin gold; to levy extraordinary taxes in his do- "minions; to exact from his vaſſals the accuſtomed homage, and to receive "the oaths of allegiance from his prelates." In caſe of a refuſal to comply with theſe deſpotic mandates, the chancellor had orders to declare war againſt the duke.

Francis, who was a weak though a generous prince, was extremely embarraſſed at this unexpected declaration; deſtitute of troops, he affected to ſubmit to the power he was unable to oppoſe, and, by the advice of Tannegui du Chaſtel, who, at the death of Charles the Seventh, had engaged in his ſervice, he told the chancellor, that he did not refuſe to comply with the king's demands, but that they related to objects of ſuch importance, that his conſent alone would be inſufficient to enſure their accompliſhment; that the laws of the country required the concurrence of the different orders of the province; and that he therefore beſought his majeſty to allow him time to aſſemble the ſtates, that he might communicate his intentions to them, ſince by adopting a different line of conduct he ſhould deceive the king, which he would not do on any account. This appearance of condeſcenſion ſo faſcinated Lewis, that he granted the duke a delay of three months, and immediately diſmiſſed his troops.

The count of Maine, and four other commiſſioners, were appointed to regulate the affairs of Brittany. The principal accuſations preferred by Lewis againſt the duke, are too curious to be ommitted, inaſmuch as they diſplay the character of the monarch, and the true motives by which his conduct was influenced in the preſent inſtance. He complained, "That while he was dauphin, the duke "had refuſed to lend him four thouſand crowns; that he had given him no "aſſiſtance in the war with the Catalonians; that he had ſeized the temporalities "of the biſhop of Nantes, which was a thing unexampled in the chriſtian world, "ſince biſhops took the precedency of dukes, and could not poſſibly become their ſubjects; "that he had given orders to his vaſſals to take up arms; and that the duke's "attorney had declared, at Rome, that his maſter was no ſubject of the king's, "and that he would rather receive the Engliſh in his dominions than the French." There were ſeveral other charges, to all of which the duke replied: delays were neceſſarily occaſioned by this means; and, before the matter could be brought to a deciſion, the king's attention was called to another quarter, which compelled him to defer the gratification of his reſentment to a future period.

Lewis had received information that ambaſſadors from the count of Charolois had attended an aſſembly of the ſtates at Nantes, where they had renewed, by two ſeparate treaties, the alliance between Charles and Francis. The count of Saint Paul, and his brother, James of Luxembourg, Tanneguy Duchaſtel, Genlis and Romillé, vice-chancellor of Brittany, were the agents employed to conduct this ſecret negociation. Lewis, reſolved at all events to penetrate the myſtery, cited the count of St. Paul and Genlis to appear before him, to do homage for certain eſtates which they held of the crown of France. After ſome difficulty the latter obeyed the citation; but Lewis had the mortification to find all his ſtratagems for diſcovering the ſecret eluded, and all his efforts to detach the count of Saint Paul from the intereſt of the count of Charolois, fruitleſs and unavailing.

While the king was thus employed, the number of his enemies daily encreaſed. The duke of Brittany no ſooner found himſelf extricated from the embarraſſment into which he had been ſo unexpectedly thrown, than, in conformity to the advice of Duchaſtel, he began to think of providing againſt any future attack. He wrote to all the princes of the blood, and chief nobility; and his letters which were conveyed by meſſengers diſguiſed like monks, contained the moſt urgent exhortations to unite in defence of the common cauſe. He warned them of the king's intention to deſtroy them all one after the other; obſerving, that they might judge, by the treatment which he had recently experienced, of the fate that awaited them; and that the only means of preventing a diſgrace which threatened them all individually, was to act in concert, for the purpoſe of reſiſting oppreſſion. The general diſcontent which prevailed in the kingdom had ſufficiently prepared the minds of the public for the impreſſions which the duke wiſhed them to receive. His emiſſaries returned with the moſt poſitive aſſurances of efficacious ſupport from all thoſe whom he ſolicited to enter into his projects. The confederates reciprocally exchanged vows of fidelity; and the king might count for his enemies moſt of the princes of the blood, and the principal nobility of the kingdom.

A. D. 1464.] Nothing was now wanting to complete the danger to which France was expoſed of a total revolution, but the junction of the duke of Burgundy. Hitherto that prince, who was fond of repoſe, had refuſed to enter into this formidable aſſociation. It even ſeemed impoſſible to perſuade him to ſuch a meaſure, notwithſtanding all the efforts of his ſon for that purpoſe. One falſe ſtep, however, produced what the moſt urgent ſolicitations had failed to effect. The king having received information that the vice-chancellor of Brittany had performed ſeveral voyages to England, Holland and Flanders, thought it would be eaſy to diſcover the views of the princes, if he could once get their agent into his power; he therefore formed the deſign of ſeizing Romillé, who was then in England, on his return to Brittany. This commiſſion was entruſted to the baſtard of Rubempré, a man of bad character; and a ſmall veſſel was accordingly prepared for him, whoſe crew conſiſted of forty determined men.

Rubempré, after cruiſing ſome time in the channel, put into the port of Gorkum, a ſmall town in Holland, ſituated on the river Wael, where the count of Charolois had arrived a few days before. As it was highly improbable that Rubempré ſhould ſtation himſelf at the extremity of Holland, in order to intercept a veſſel on her way from England to Brittany, it has been conjectured *, that he had received intelligence that Romillé was to pay a viſit to the count on his return. Be that as it may, Rubempré having landed with a part of his crew, was known, ſeized, and thrown into priſon, under pretence that he had come to Gorkum with the deſign to carry off the count, and deliver him up to Lewis.

Moſt of the modern hiſtorians of France, and ſome contemporary writers †, have attempted to juſtify Lewis from this accuſation; but all they have been able to alledge in his favour, rather tends to involve the matter in obſcurity than to prove his innocence. Appearances were moſt certainly againſt him. The character of the baſtard of Rubempré; the profound ſecrecy obſerved even by his crew, who received orders to pay him implicit obedience; the place fixed on for the execution of the plan, at which the count of Charolois had but recently arrived; the conduct of Rubempré, who was ſeen loitering about the count's houſe, and examining every part of it; his alarm, which had led him to take refuge in a church, when he thought he was diſcovered; add to theſe conſiderations, the illiberal policy of Lewis, who had recently cauſed Philip, ſecond ſon to the duke of Savoy, to be arreſted, and ſent to Loches, where he was confined for five years, although he had come to the court of France on an expreſs invitation from the king, and under the protection of a ſafe conduct—this combination of circumſtances forms ſtrongeſt preſumptive proof of the guilt of Lewis; a proof which his own diſavowal of the deed is wholly inſufficient to overturn.

At the very time that this plan was diſcovered, the frontiers of Picardy were lined with French troops. The king had repaired to Heſdin, to viſit the duke of Burgundy, who received him with all the honours that were due to his rank. He there requeſted Philip to conſent to the reſtitution of Lille, Douay, and Orchies, which had been pledged to the ancient counts of Flanders for four hundred thouſand livres Tournois, and an annual tribute of ten thouſand; but the duke replied, that thoſe towns had been ceded by the king of France to his grandfather, Philip, duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Margaret, heireſs to the county of Flanders; and that it was ſpecified in the deed of conveyance, that they ſhould only revert to the crown in default of male heirs on the part of Philip. Some other demands preferred by the king were likewiſe rejected. The duke, on his ſide, requeſted the king to receive the count of Charolois into favour; to deſiſt from exacting an engagement from the Flemiſh and Burgundian nobles, on their performance of homage, to ſerve him againſt all men living; and, laſtly, to fulfil ſeveral articles of the treaty of Arras, which had not yet been carried into execution. Lewis immediately left the duke without giving him any anſwer, and the next day ſet out for Abbeville. After remaining a ſhort time at that city, he went to Rouen, and from thence returned into Ponthieu, and ſtopped at the village of Novian, near the foreſt of Creſſy, ſix leagues from Heſdin, where the duke ſtill remained. The two princes did not viſit, and all the correſpondence that paſſed between them was carried on through the means of Anthony de Croi. This coolneſs ſubſiſted till the tenth of October, when the king ſent word to Philip, that he would pay him a viſit the next day.

The count of Charolois, who had juſt cauſed Rubempré to be apprehended, haſtened to inform his father of the circumſtance; for which purpoſe he diſpatched Oliver de la Manche, an officer of his houſhold, with a letter to the duke, containing a particular account of the conſpiracy which, he ſaid, he had detected. He not only accuſed the king of an attempt to ſeize his own perſon, but added, that it was alſo his intention to get the duke of Burgundy himſelf into his power; that it was with this view he had advanced ſo near to the place of the duke's reſidence; and that he had ſtationed ſeveral bodies of troops on the banks of the Somme, who were ready to aſſemble at the firſt notice.

Philip received the count's letter on the very day which the king had appointed for his viſit. Not thinking himſelf in ſafety at Heſdin, where he expected every moment to be ſurrounded, he haſtened to St. Paul, in Artois, leaving the town to the care of his nephew, Adolphus of Cleves, with orders to receive the king in caſe he kept his appointment; but Lewis, being appriſed of his retreat, returned to Normandy. The news of the project which had been formed for ſeizing the duke of Burgundy, and the count of Charolois, was ſoon rendered public by the pains that were taken to promote its circulation. The count's emiſſaries made it the theme of their converſation in all companies; the clergy made the pulpits reſound with it; and the intelligence was quickly conveyed to foreign courts. Meanwhile, Montauban, admiral of France, wrote to the lord of Croi, to engage him to huſh up the affair,* and to releaſe the baſtard of Rubempré; but that nobleman ſent back the letter, and refuſed to interfere in the buſineſs.

The king ſpared no pains to counteract the effects of theſe injurious reports. He ſummoned the deputies from the city of Rouen to attend him, and cauſed an apologetical diſcourſe to be pronounced in their preſence by the chancellor, containing a juſtification of his conduct, and a contradiction of the charge that had been preferred againſt him. Not content with this, he determined to demand ſatisfaction of the duke of Burgundy for the affront he had ſuſtained, and for this purpoſe he ſent the count of Eu, the archbiſhop of Narbonne, and Morvilliers, the chancellor, to Lille, where the count of Charolois had already arrived. The common danger to which they had been expoſed, had produced a reconciliation between Philip and his ſon. The duke gave audience to the French ambaſſadors the day after their arrival, when he was addreſſed by Morvilliers, who began his ſpeech by reproaching the duke of Brittany, who, he obſerved, had ſolicited the alliance of the Engliſh, the ancient enemies of the crown, and had, conſequently, incurred the forfeiture of his life and property, as being guilty of high treaſon: that the king, being informed that this prince had ſent the vice-chancellor of Brittany to England, had thought himſelf entitled to impede the progreſs of ſuch a negociation, for which purpoſe he had commiſſioned the baſtard of Rubempré to intercept "that pernicious agent of the duke's evil deſigns" on his return to Brittany: that the count of Charolois, not content with violating the laws of nations, by impriſoning a man who was entruſted with a commiſſion from the king, had cauſed it to be reported, that Rubempré had gone to Gorkum for the purpoſe of ſeizing his perſon: that Oliver de la Manche, who had been ſent by the count to his father, had been careful to propagate theſe injurious reports in all the towns through which he paſſed: that a monk of Bruges had had the temerity to accuſe his majeſty, in a ſermon, of an attempt on the liberty of the duke and his ſon: that the duke's haſty departure from Heſdin, afforded a ſufficient proof, that this odious accuſation had experienced too much credit: and that the king was of opinion, ſuch a proceeding could originate with no other than the count of Charolois, who was doubtleſs diſcontented at the loſs of his ſalary as lieutenant-general in Normandy. Morvilliers concluded his harrange by demanding, in the king's name, that Oliver de la Manche, and the monk, ſhould be delivered up to him, in order to be puniſhed as calumniators; and that the baſtard of Rubempré ſhould be ſet at liberty. While the chancellor was ſpeaking, the count of Charolois exhibited evident marks of impatience, and was repeatedly on the point of interrupting him; but his father interfered, and ordered him to defer his reply to the next day, and, for the preſent, to leave the taſk of defending his conduct to himſelf.

The duke then addreſſed the ambaſſadors, and began by declaring, in the moſt poſitive terms, that he could not releaſe Rubempré, ſince he had been arreſted in Holland, a principality independent of the king: he then obſerved, that Oliver de la Manche was an officer of the count's houſhold, that he would enquire into his guilt, and adminiſter juſtice accordingly; and, that the monk was "a man "of the church, whom he would not touch on any account."—"I wiſh every "one to know, (continued Philip with warmth) that I never made a promiſe to man or "prince but I performed it to the utmoſt of my power." To ſoften this reproach, which appeared to be indirectly addreſſed to Lewis, he added, with a ſmile, "Tell "the king, I never broke my word, except with the ladies." Philip, it ſeems, was of a facetious diſpoſition; in another part of his anſwer he obſerved, "If my ſon "be ſuſpicious, he does not take after me, who never entertained ſuſpicions of any "man; but he takes after his mother, who often ſuſpected me of loving other "women." Philip concluded his reply by complaining that the king, on almoſt all occaſions, failed to keep his word. A knight then exclaimed, "My lord,

" who is here preſent, only holds the duchy of Burgundy, with the counties of " Flanders and Artois, of the king; but he poſſeſſes, out of the kingdom, the " duchies of Brabant, Luxembourg, Limbourg, and Lotrich; the counties of " Burgundy, Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Namur; beſides many other ex- " tenſive lordſhips, all of which he holds of God alone, although he be not a " king." " I would have it known," interrupted the duke, " that I could have " been a king, had I choſen it."

At the conference that was holden on the ſucceeding day, the chancellor of France renewed his complaints, and repeated his demands of ſatisfaction; but the duke perſiſted in the anſwer he had already delivered, only adding, that he could not diſapprove of his ſon's conduct, in apprehending Rubempré, who, by his ſtrange behaviour, had laid himſelf open to ſuſpicion; that if that ci-devant adventurer, on whom the title of king's envoy had been conferred, was really innocent of the crime imputed to him, he had nothing to apprehend; and that, at all events, he might depend on juſtice being done him.

At length the count of Charolois having obtained permiſſion to ſpeak, began by juſtifying the duke of Brittany, between whom and himſelf, he acknowledged, a cloſe alliance ſubſiſted, but it was a connection of ſuch a nature, as could by no means affect the king. He declared, that he did not complain of the loſs of his ſalary, as lieutenant-general in Normandy, of which he had never received more than one quarter; for that ſince he had recovered his father's favour, he could very eaſily diſpenſe with the benefactions of any other perſon. He obſerved, that the baſtard of Rubempré, whom he had ordered to be impriſoned, was a man of infamous character; that if he were really " the king's legate," as the ambaſſadors had aſſerted, he ought to have paid him a viſit on his arrival at Gorkum, which was certainly not a proper place for the purpoſe of watching a man on his return from England to Brittany; and that it was not probable the duke's envoy ſhould paſs through that town on his way home.

At the laſt audience the chancellor renewed his demands for the releaſe of the priſoner, with which the duke peremptorily refuſed to comply, telling him that he would ſoon ſend ambaſſadors to the king, and that he hoped his majeſty would expect nothing farther from him. Such was the iſſue of an embaſſy, into the particulars of which it was neceſſary to enter, that the reader might be enabled to form ſome judgment of an affair, which had a conſiderable influence on the commotions which ſoon after appeared. When the ambaſſadors took leave of the count of Charolois, he ſaid to the archbiſhop of Narbonne, " Recommend me " moſt humbly to the king's favour, and tell him, that he has made the chancellor " trim me; but that before the expiration of a year, he will repent his conduct." Theſe threats, which were faithfully reported to the king, ought to have opened his eyes; but they had a very different effect on him; he thought that he had nothing to fear from a prince, who had recourſe to vain bravadoes, and whoſe reſentment exhaled in words.

Meanwhile the French malecontents daily acquired freſh ſtrength, and additional confidence; and ſo diſguſted were the people with the tyrannical government of Lewis, that the diſaffection appears to have extended from one extremity of the kingdom to the other. Still Lewis was in the dark as to the authors of theſe dangerous commotions; and, if we except the duke of Burgundy and count of Charolois, he was ſurrounded by enemies the more dangerous, as they were all unknown to him. The intelligence he received from different quarters encreaſed his alarms, but gave him no information. Though the conſpiracy was formed in his capital, at his court, nay almoſt in his preſence, yet he did not perceive it. Contemporary writers relate, that the confederates frequently met in the cathedral at Paris; where a green ſilk lace, faſtened to the girdle, ſerved as their mark of diſtinction. It ſeems wonderful, that a ſecret which had been imparted to ſo many perſons, ſhould be inviolably preſerved for ſo long a ſpace of time. The duke of Bourbon, one of the leaders of the conſpiracy, had paſſed ſome time at court, in order to watch the king's motions. On his departure, he repaired to Lille, in order to fix the wavering reſolution of the duke of Burgundy, who had hitherto refuſed to declare himſelf, notwithſtanding the urgent ſolicitations of his ſon. And he probably would have continued to temporize but for the arrival of the duke of Bourbon, who was himſelf diſpleaſed with the king, for having refuſed to promote him to the dignity of conſtable. This nobleman, who was nephew to the duke of Burgundy by his mother's ſide, had acquired a great aſcendancy over the mind of Philip. He now repreſented to him, in ſuch ſtrong terms, the danger to which all the princes were expoſed, from a monarch, unjuſt and ambitious, who only ſought to raiſe himſelf by humbling them; he urged, with ſo much energy, the neceſſity of uniting their efforts againſt a power that daily became more formidable, that the duke, at length, conſented to levy troops, and to ſend orders to his vaſſals to arm. This was all that the count of Charolois required, from the conviction, that ſuch a proceeding conſtituted an engagement, which precluded the poſſibility of retraction. He now found himſelf at the head of all the forces in his father's dominions, and this important command rendered him, in a certain degree, independant on paternal authority. The firſt exertion of his power was directed againſt the lords of Croi, whom he declared his perſonal enemies, as well as enemies to the ſtate; commanding them, under pain of death, to quit the court, and the ſervice of his father, whoſe favour and confidence they had abuſed. The order was ſo peremptory, that they thought it prudent to ſubmit, and accordingly left the country, without even daring to take leave of the duke. Philip, notwithſtanding the debility occaſioned by the natural infirmities of age, which had almoſt deſtroyed the vigour of his mind, was no ſooner apprized of his ſon's imperious conduct, than he flew into a moſt violent paſſion. In the firſt tranſport of his rage he ſeized a ſpear, and ruſhing out of his apartment, ran from room to room, exclaiming aloud, that he would ſoon ſee whether his ſon would have the audacity to kill his officers in his preſence. His ſervants had the prudence to conceal the keys of the palace gates; and while he was inſiſting on having them broken open, his ſiſter, the duchefs of Bourbon, came up with the ladies of her retinue, and with fome difficulty prevailed on him to return to his chamber. During three weeks he would not fuffer any one to mention his fon's name to him; but having attended a public fermon on the forgivenefs of injuries, he was moved by the arguments employed by the chriftian orator, and, at length, confented to a reconciliation with the count.

A. D. 1465.] The king, convinced of his imprudence, in having allowed time to the duke of Brittany to make preparations for refifting his attack, now refolved to difpoffefs him of his dominions; but before he would proceed to extremities, he deemed it neceffary to offer fome kind of excufe for his conduct. With this view he convened an affembly of the nobles at Tours, which was attended by the king of Sicily; the dukes of Orleans, Bourbon, and Nemours; the counts of Angoulême, Eu, Maine, Nevers, St. Paul, Penthievre, and Tancarville, with many others of the principal nobility. The chancellor Morvilliers, and Dauvet the attorney-general, explained the charges exhibited againft the duke of Brittany, and the arguments which had been offered in his defence. This artful manner of fubmitting the queftion to the decifion of the affembly, feemed the moft likely means of fecuring all their fuffrages. They, accordingly, expreffed their unanimous approbation of the king's refentment, and all joined in condemning the duke, though many of them had already entered into engagements with him. The next day the king himfelf addreffed the affembly; his fpeech contained an apology for his own government fince his acceffion to the throne, and an attack on the adminiftration of the preceding reign. The king of Sicily affured him, in the name of the affembly, that they were all entirely devoted to his fervice; though, at the fame time they offered their mediation to engage the duke of Brittany to return to his duty.

But though Lewis appeared to pay fo much deference to the opinions of his nobles, he very foon took an opportunity of convincing them, that by fo doing he had impofed on himfelf a conftraint which his haughty difpofition could but ill brook. Before the diffolution of the affembly, Charles, duke of Orleans, deceived by the appearance of mildnefs which Lewis had affumed, determined to intercede for the duke of Brittany; he accordingly fpoke in favour of that prince, and endeavoured to extenuate the faults of which he was accufed. The age, fervices, unfhaken fidelity, and irreproachable conduct of the duke of Orleans, had given him the privilege of delivering his fentiments with manly freedom. Conficious of this, he ventured to remonftrate againft fome of the numerous abufes which prevailed in the government. Lewis, who had pronounced a panegyric upon himfelf, could not bear with patience any reflections which tended to convey an indirect cenfure on his own conduct; his ear, unaccuftomed to the voice of truth, was fhocked at its awful found. He loaded the venerable prince with the moft infulting reproaches, publickly accufing him of harbouring criminal defigns, and of taking the part of infurgents, in oppofition to his fovereign. The duke immediately withdrew; and as his mind was too fenfible of difhonour, he funk beneath the preſſure of unmerited inſult, and on the fourth of January expired, in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age, regretted by the whole nation. Beſides two daughters, one of whom was abbeſs of Fontevraud, and the other wife to John de Foix, viſcount of Narbonne, the duke left, by his third wife, Mary of Cleves, one ſon, named Lewis, who had been affianced, in the preceding year, to Jane, the infant daughter of the king.

The duke of Brittany, apprized of the king's intentions to invade his dominions without delay, again endeavoured to ward off the blow by negociation. The confederates had at length completed their long projected ſcheme, and only waited for the ſignal to declare themſelves. At ſuch a conjuncture every moment was precious: the duke therefore diſpatched Tanneguy Du Chaſtel and the vice-chancellor of Brittany, to Lewis; and in order to gain time, theſe ambaſſadors acceded to whatever the king required of them. The duke engaged to comply with moſt of his demands, and very ſoon to pay a viſit to the king at Poitiers. Lewis again ſuffered himſelf to be deceived, and truſting he had at length brought the duke to accede to his own terms, he loaded his ambaſſadors with careſſes; and ſet out on a pilgrimage to Notre-Dame du Pont, in the Limouſin.

As ſoon as the king was gone, his brother Charles, duke of Berry, accompanied by the lord of L'Eſcun, joined the Breton ambaſſadors, who had waited for him at ſome diſtance from Poitiers, and fled to Brittany; breaking down all the bridges he paſſed on the road, from the apprehenſion of being purſued. The retreat of Charles was the ſignal of revolt; and the flames of civil diſcord accordingly burſt out in every part of the kingdom, almoſt at the ſame inſtant.

A manifeſto was immediately publiſhed in the name of the duke of Berry, who, it muſt be obſerved, was only in his ſeventeenth year, explaining the motives of his flight. "He had left Poitiers," he ſaid, "becauſe he had been "apprized of the calamities which prevailed in the kingdom, through the miſ-"conduct of the king's miniſters, who made juſtice ſubſervient to their caprice, "and compelled the judges of the parliament, and other tribunals, to pronounce "ſuch ſentences as they choſe to dictate." After ſtating ſome other grievances, which, he ſaid, diſhonoured the kingdom, and expoſed it to the contempt of foreign powers; he concluded by obſerving, that his ſole object was to procure the diſmiſſion of evil counſellors, and to relieve the people from oppreſſion. All the other princes of the blood diſtributed manifeſtoes to the ſame purport; and as the avowed object of the confederacy was to enforce a ſalutary reform in the government, with a view to eſtabliſh the happineſs and welfare of the nation, on a ſolid and permanent baſis, they gave it the high-ſounding title of THE LEAGUE FOR THE PUBLIC GOOD.

Lewis reſolved to direct his firſt attacks againſt the duke of Brittany; and, with that view, he wrote to the duke of Bourbon to raiſe a body of troops in his domains, and join with him without delay. But he was greatly ſurprized to receive an anſwer from the duke, in which he not only refuſed, in the moſt peremptory terms, to comply with his orders; but proceeded to load him with the moſt bitter reproaches, directing his cenſure againſt every act of his government; accuſing him of having ſubſtituted his own arbitrary will for the laws of the realm; of keeping the princes of the blood, and the moſt diſtinguiſhed of the nobility, at a diſtance from his perſon; of proſtituting his confidence to men who were unworthy to enjoy it; and of treating with contempt all remonſtrance and advice. He then told him, that with a view to correct theſe flagrant abuſes, and to relieve an oppreſſed people, the princes and nobles had entered into a confederacy, in order to enforce a change of meaſures, which would equally tend to his own good, and to the good of his crown. The duke, at the ſame time, took poſſeſſion of the treaſury, ſeized all the money he found there, and put the receiver-general of the finances under arreſt.

Although the duke of Bourbon, in his anſwer to the king, had not mentioned the names of the confederate princes, they ſoon made themſelves known. John, duke of Calabria, Lorraine, and Bar, being diſcontented with Lewis for having refuſed to aſſiſt him in the conqueſt of Naples, was one of the firſt to take up arms, notwithſtanding the exhortations of his father, the king of Sicily. The duke of Nemours, the lord of Albret, the count of Dunois, and even the duke of Alençon, and the count of Armagnac, who were indebted to Lewis for the reſtitution of their honours and eſtates, were among the chiefs of the league, which was ſoon ſtrengthened by the preſence of the count of Dammartin, who effected his eſcape from the Baſtille.

While the princes were engaged in collecting their troops, the moſt formidable of all the confederates, the count of Charolois, had already aſſembled all the forces of the Low Countries, and juſt ſent orders to the mareſchal of Burgundy to ſummon the nobility of that province, as well as of Franche-Comté, to march at a moment's warning. Hitherto the duke of Burgundy had been a ſtranger to the true object of the league; he had given his conſent to levy troops, for the purpoſe of ſecuring the tranquillity of his own dominions againſt the reſtleſs ambition of the king, and had expected that the confederates would act merely on the defenſive *. But as ſoon as the count of Charolois had made every neceſſary preparation, he informed his father of his intention to invade France; telling him, that all the chiefs of the confederacy, united by the ſtrong ties of intereſt, were eager to revenge their common injuries; that their place of rendezvous was under the walls of Paris; and, that all their plans were ſo well concerted, it would be impoſſible for the king to reſiſt their efforts. The duke, at this period, received the duke of Berry's manifeſto, accompanied by a private letter from that prince, which immediately removed his ſcruples, and ſuperinduced his conſent to the adoption of deciſive meaſures. When the count took leave of his father, before he joined the army, the old duke ſaid to him, "Do your duty, my ſon; behave valiantly, and prefer death to flight."

All the malecontents in the kingdom haſtened to join the confederates. The veteran troops, the moſt courageous officers and the moſt experienced commanders quited the king's ſervice, and enliſted under the banners of his opponents. Never had the kingdom been threatened with a revolution more ſudden and complete. From the extremity of Holland and Zealand, from the frontiers of Germany, and the banks of the Maeſe, to the foot of the Pyrenees, the whole ſtrength of the monarchy was united to cruſh the king. Nothing could have ſaved Lewis from deſtruction, had the conduct of his enemies been equal to their reſentment.

Amidſt this alarming concurrence of circumſtances, the genius of Lewis, active, penetrating, and peculiarly calculated to extricate him from difficulties, eminently appeared. He had concluded various treaties with the German and Italian princes; but the only one of his allies on whom he could depend was Franciſco Sforza, duke of Milan, one of the moſt ſkilful politicians, and greateſt generals of the age, who had uſurped that duchy from the houſe of Orleans. To this prince, Lewis had ceded the lordſhip of Genoa, and the town of Savona, to be holden, as fiefs, of the crown of France; on which condition Sforza had accepted them, and his ambaſſadors had done homage for them to the king in his name.

Lewis immediately iſſued orders to the governors of the different towns and fortreſſes in his dominions, to defend them to the utmoſt againſt the attacks of the confederates. Charles de Melun, governor of Paris, armed the citizens of the capital, who, for once, ſignalized their loyalty and zeal. The city was put in the beſt poſſible ſtate of defence; the chains were fixed at the ends of the ſtreets; all the gates but two were blocked up; and proviſions provided for ſeveral months. Some days afterthese precautions had been taken, the mareſchal de Gamaches reinforced the garriſon with a ſtrong body of regular troops. The king was ſo well pleaſed with the conduct of the inhabitants of Paris, that he ſent four of his principal officers to return them thanks for the zeal they had diſplayed; and, at the ſame time, to inform them, "that the Queen intended to "lie in at Paris, as ſhe preferred that city to all the cities in the world." The counts of Nevers and Eu had orders to defend the towns on the Somme, and to oppoſe the count of Charolois, who was expected to make his firſt attack in that quarter; while the count of Maine led a conſiderable detachment into Normandy, to deter the Bretons from inſulting the frontiers of that province. The king, at the ſame time, publiſhed a declaration, promiſing a free pardon to all who, before the expiration of ſix weeks, ſhould quit the rebel army, and return to their duty.

Lewis, after theſe preparatory meaſures, the only ones which, under ſuch circumſtances, he could adopt, placed himſelf at the head of his army, which conſiſted of fourteen thouſand well-diſciplined and experienced troops. As he intended firſt to attack the duke of Bourbon, the leaſt powerful of the confederates, he marched, with great rapidity, through Poitou and Berry, and, after making an unſucceſsful attempt upon Bourges, entered the Bourbonnois, to the great aſtoniſhment of the duke, who was totally diſconcerted by ſuch an unexpected attack.

When the duke of Bourbon firſt raiſed the ſtandard of revolt, he had wholly forgotten to provide for his own ſafety. He had but few troops; his towns, ill garriſoned, and badly fortified, were expoſed to the attacks of a formidable army, for the king's forces were, by this time, encreaſed to twenty-five-thouſand men. In ſuch emergency, his only alternative was flight or ſubmiſſion. The ducheſs of Bourbon, who was ſiſter to the king, went to meet her brother, and exerted her influence with ſo much zeal and addreſs, that ſhe prevailed on him to liſten to terms of accommodation. The arrival of the duke of Nemours, with a body of troops, and of another detachment, ſent by the mareſchal of Burgundy, which was ſpeedily to be followed by a more conſiderable force, rendered the duke difficult as to the conditions of the treaty, and proved the means of prolonging the negociation. He conſented, however, to diſarm; but he broke this convention as ſoon as he found that the count of Armagnac was haſtening to his aſſiſtance, at the head of ſix thouſand horſe. The truce was, accordingly at an end; and the king, vexed at having loſt ſo much time, preſſed the confederates with vigour and effect. The duke, though ſupported by the count of Armagnac, the duke of Nemours, and the lord of Albert, was compelled to fly before the royal army, and ſoon found himſelf reduced to the neceſſity of quitting the Bourbonnois, and ſhutting himſelf up, with his allies, in the town of Rom. Lewis immediately formed the ſiege of that place; with the reſolution, at all events, to bring the war to a ſpeedy concluſion; the princes were obliged to ſubmit, and to conclude a truce, during which it was agreed to adopt the neceſſary meaſures for effecting a general pacification: they engaged to declare againſt the other chiefs of the confederacy, ſhould they ſtill perſiſt in their revolt, and alſo to make the duke of Bourbon, who during the negociation had fled to Moulins, ſign theſe conditions. The king could not place much reliance on the execution of a treaty which was only conditional, and which, in fact, was ſoon violated; but the accounts he received of the motions of the count of Charolois and the duke of Brittany, did not permit him to prolong his ſtay in that quarter. He left a few troops to keep the duke of Bourbon in awe on the ſide of Auvergne and Berry, while Galeazzo, ſon to Franciſco Sforza, his friend and ally, laid waſte Le Foreſt and Le Beaujolois.

The count of Charolois, with an army of twenty-ſix thouſand men, advanced towards the river Somme, while the duke of Brittany directed his march to the banks of the Loire. The confederated princes had fixed their rendezvous in the iſle of France, which was deſtined to be the ſcene of action. The king's object was to prevent a junction, on which the fate of the kingdom evidently depended. At a conjuncture thus delicate, when the ſmalleſt delay might be productive of the moſt important effects, the count of Vendome rendered the moſt eſſential ſervice to Lewis, by refuſing a paſſage through his territories to the Breton troops. This impediment, by occaſioning a loſs of time, proved highly prejudicial to the intereſts of the confederates.

The Burgundian army paſſed the Somme at Bray; and the count of Nevers, and the mareſchal de Gamaches, who had thrown themſelves into Amiens with two thouſand men, in the expectation that the count of Charolois would form the ſiege of that city, ſallied forth for the purpoſe of harraſſing the enemy on their march; but finding all their efforts fruſtrated by the vigilance of the count, the mareſchal made the beſt of his way to the capital.

The count of Charolois met with but few obſtacles to impede his progreſs. The towns of Picardy did not openly declare in his favour, but they admitted his troops, and ſupplied them with proviſions. Neſle, Roye, Montidier, Beaulieu, and Pont-Saint-Maixence, were either taken by ſurprize, or elſe ſurrendered on the firſt ſummons. In all thoſe places, the count, ſtyling himſelf lieutenant-general of the kingdom, under the command of the duke of Berry, publiſhed a general abolition of impoſts, accompanied by a declaration, that the ſole object of the confederated princes was to promote the public good, by effecting a reform in the government. The count continued his march to the iſle of France, where he halted, and eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Saint Denis. He there expected to find the body of troops which he had ordered the mareſchal of Burgundy to levy in that province, and likewiſe to be met by the duke of Brittany, according to appointment, and his aſtoniſhment could only be equalled by his diſappointment, when he had heard that the duke was ſtill at Nantes, and that the forces from Burgundy, finding every paſſage occupied by the royaliſts, could not poſſibly join him. Enraged at this unexpected check, he would have returned to Flanders, had he not been reſtrained by ſhame. Romillé, the vice-chancellor of Brittany, who was with him, endeavoured to moderate his anger, by aſſuring him, that his maſter would ſpeedily join him with a powerful army. That miniſter had ſeveral blank letters, ſigned by the duke, which he filled up with falſe intelligence; by which artifice he amuſed the count, and induced him to give up all thoughts of a retreat, which muſt have entirely diſconcerted the plans of the confederates.

It was propoſed, in a council of war, to endeavour, by a general aſſault, to get poſſeſſion of the capital; but the town was too well fortified to hazard ſuch an attempt. The count of Charolois drew up his troops in order of battle, within ſight of the ramparts, in the hope of intimidating the inhabitants by a diſplay of his power, and of reviving the ancient factions of the Burgundians, of which the remains were ſtill perceptible; but this manœuvre failed of ſucceſs. The mareſchal de Rohaut made a ſally, but was driven back with ſome loſs. A few days after, the count ſent four heralds at arms to the gate of Saint Denis, to demand proviſions, and a paſſage for his troops; while he attacked the ſuburb of Saint-Lazarus, and had nearly forced the barrier, when the arrival of the troops compelled him to retreat.

The king had ſent word to the Pariſians, by Couſinot, bailiff of Rouen, that he would ſoon come to their relief with his whole army; and, indeed, he conſidered the preſervation of the capital as the moſt important object of the war. The count of Charolois had ordered ſome of his emiſſaries to introduce themſelves into the town, and found the diſpoſition of the inhabitants. One of theſe agents, a canon of Arras, was diſcovered by the mareſchal, who allowed him to return to the Burgundian camp, on condition that he would tell the count that letters had juſt been received from the king, containing poſitive information, that he would be at Paris in four days, and then it would be ſeen who was ſtrongeſt. The count pretended to diſbelieve the intelligence, obſerving, that the mareſchal had deceived him too often already.

The Burgundians called another council of war, to deliberate on the meaſures to be purſued at the preſent conjuncture. Many officers were of opinion, that it would be moſt prudent to return, ſince their allies had not fulfilled their engagement; and they obſerved, that if they deferred their retreat, they would find all the paſſages cloſed, from their neglect to ſecure the frontier-towns of Artois and Picardy *; but the count of Charolois rejected theſe timid propoſals, and immediately gave orders to his troops to hold themſelves in readineſs to march, to meet the duke of Brittany. With this view he forced a paſſage over the bridge of Saint Cloud, and croſſed the Seine, in full expectation of being ſpeedily met by the Breton troops.

The king, meanwhile, had left the Bourbonnois, and was advancing, by rapid marches, with the reſolution to prevent a junction that muſt give a decided ſuperiority to his enemies. He called a council, in order to determine whether it would be moſt prudent to attack the duke of Brittany, who was the weakeſt of his adverſaries, and whoſe defeat might intimidate the allies, or to march immediately againſt the Burgundians. The king adopted the latter opinion, the moſt dangerous to follow, but yet the moſt deciſive; ſince, by obtaining a victory over the count of Charolois, the diſſolution of the league, of which he was the principal ſupport, might, it was conceived, be eaſily effected. The monarch's advice was unanimouſly embraced, except by Brezé, ſeneſchal of Normandy, who maintained a contrary opinion: he obſerved, that the count of Charolois was at the head of an army who idolized him; and every man of which would deem it his duty to ſacrifice his life in his defence: that the caſe was very different with the duke of Brittany, whoſe troops were leſs devoted to their leader, and many of whom, having ſerved under Charles the Seventh, would feel a repugnance at fighting againſt his ſon, and might reaſonably be expected to deſert to the royaliſts; and that, by conquering the Bretons, the duke of Berry, whoſe name afforded a ſpecious pretext to the meaſures of the confederates, would fall into the king's power. Theſe reaſons, however, proved inſufficient to ſhake the king's reſolution. Brezé was even accuſed of timidity; but to ſuch accuſations the gallant veteran replied, "That if a battle enſued, he would convince his accuſers "his ſoul was a ſtranger to fear, and that his advice to the king had been influenced by the pureſt ſentiments of loyalty.

The royal army arrived at Châtres, now Arpajon, at the ſame time that the Burgundians reached Longjumeau. The count of Saint Paul, who commanded the van of the latter, advanced as far as Montlhery, where he firſt received intelligence that the king was within half a day's march of him: he immediately communicated this information to the count of Charolois, who choſe the plain of Longjumeau for the ſcene of action, and ordered the count of Saint Paul to quit the poſt of Montlhery, and join the main body.

On the ſixteenth of July (1465) the two armies came in ſight of each other, prepared to decide the fate of the monarchy, and the fortune of Lewis. The royal army was compoſed of warlike troops, well-appointed, and well-diſciplined; the Burgundians, though ſuperior in numbers by one-third, were more formidable in appearance than effect: the nobility, long accuſtomed to repoſe, were wholly inexperienced in the art of war; few of the troops had ſeen any ſervice; and moſt of the men at arms were ill-equipped, and undiſciplined.

Lewis, reflecting on the fatal conſequences of a defeat, was ſtill at a loſs how to act. On the evening of the fifteenth, he had called a council of war, in which it was decided, that the troops ſhould continue their march to Paris, and avoid an action, unleſs the enemy ſhould attack them on the road. The ſeneſchal of Normandy had ſtrenuouſly oppoſed this plan; which made Lewis aſk, "Whether he had not ſubſcribed the league of his enemies?" "They have, indeed, "my ſignature," replied Brezé, "but my perſon is your's." As he left the council he was heard to ſay, that he would bring the king and the count of Charolois ſo near to each other, that it ſhould require the exertion of wonderful ſkill to prevent them from meeting; and he was the better enabled to perform this promiſe, as the command of the van of the army was entruſted to him.

Some awkward manœuvres in the Burgundian army made the count of Charolois loſe the opportunity of attacking the French as they paſſed through the wood of Torſou into the plain. The royaliſts, therefore, had ample time to range themſelves in order of battle behind a thick hedge, that was ſkirted by a wide ditch. The king drew up his troops in three diviſions, forming a centre, commanded by himſelf, and two wings, which he entruſted to the conduct of Brezé, and the count of Maine.

The whole morning of the ſixteenth was paſſed by the two armies in obſerving each other's motions. The royaliſts, who had but little artillery, were extremely galled by the enemies fire. The count of Charolois, having flattered himſelf that the king would begin the attack, had ordered his archers, who were placed in the van, to fix ſtakes, pointed with iron, in the ground before them, to check the enemy's cavalry; but finding the royaliſts determined to remain where they were, he changed his plan, and about one o'clock gave the ſignal of attack. But the troops, inſtead of advancing ſlowly towards the enemy, as they were ordered to do, ruſhed impetuouſly forward through the fields of ſtanding corn which lay between the two armies; ſo that when they reached the ſpot where the French were ſtationed they were quite out of breath. The count of Saint Paul, however, and the lord of Raveſtein, who commanded the left wing of the Burgundians, attacked the French with great fury. Brezé was killed at the firſt onſet; but, undiſmayed by the loſs of their leader, the troops ſuſtained, with great reſolution, the impetuous efforts of the enemy, until the king came to ſupply the place of the ſeneſchal: inſpirited by the preſence of their ſovereign, they preſſed the Burgundians in their turn, and after an obſtinate conteſt, in which Saint Paul and Raveſtein ſignalized their courage, compelled them to retreat to their camp. While the king defeated the left wing of the Burgundians, the count of Charolois attacked the centre diviſion of the royaliſts, which he ſoon routed, and purſued the fugitives half a league beyond the village of Montlhery. He thought himſelf ſure of the victory, when he was told, that the French, after defeating his left wing, were advancing to attack him, and that if he did not ſpeedily retreat, he would be inevitably ſurrounded.

The king, meanwhile, having returned to the field of battle, where he had to ſuſtain a freſh attack from a body of troops, commanded by the baſtard of Burgundy, which had not yet engaged. In this conflict, moſt of the archers of his guards were ſlain, and his own horſe was killed under him, by the baſtard himſelf. This accident occaſioned a general alarm, and it was believed that the king was dead; but his guards reſcued him from the enemy, and carried him in their arms to Montlhery, where ſuch of his troops as had not been totally diſperſed, rallied. Lewis was in the caſtle of Montlhery with his guards, when the count of Charolois, on his return from the purſuit, paſſed by the gates; and that prince muſt inevitably have been taken, ſince he had very few attendants with him, had a proper force been ſent to attack him; but only fifteen or ſixteen archers were employed on a ſervice of this importance, and the count defended himſelf againſt them with incredible valour: notwithſtanding his exertions, however, his attendants were almoſt ſlain; and Saint Belin, bailiff of Chaumont, laying hold of him, exclaimed, "Yield, my lord, I know you well; do not lay us under the neceſſity of putting you to death." At that inſtant, a man at arms, extremely well mounted, arrived to his aſſiſtance, and ruſhing on the French archers, flew moſt of them, and put the reſt to flight. The count immediately haſtened to the field of battle, and knighted his deliverer. He had ſcarcely time to collect a few of his men, before the king returned to the charge, and he again found himſelf in danger of being ſurrounded. Perceiving the count of Saint Paul at a diſtance, with a part of the left wing, which he had rallied, he ſent to him to quicken his pace, but the count continued to move ſlowly forward; and this manœuvre, as Duclos judicioùſly obſerves, ſaved the Burgundians from deſtruction. The corps which Saint Paul commanded did not, when the prince firſt perceived him, exceed fifty men; but by the flowneſs of his pace he had given time to others to come up with him, ſo that when he joined the count of Charolois, he was accompanied by no leſs than eight hundred men at arms. This unexpected ſuccour enabled the prince to renew the combat, and even gave him an advantage, in point of numbers, over the king, who in vain employed the moſt courageous efforts to recover the ſuperiority he had loſt. Three times did he rally his troops; but being deſerted by the count of Maine, and the admiral de Montauban, who fled with their reſpective detachments, the conteſt became very unequal, and had not the day been ſo far advanced, he muſt probably have ſuſtained a total defeat.

The combatants were at length compelled to ſeparate, by the approach of night. The king retired to Montlhery, while the count of Charolois remained in his camp. They had both diſplayed the moſt unequivocal proofs of perſonal valour, though their exertions were but ill ſeconded by their troops. It would de difficult to ſay which obtained the victory; certain it is, that they both thought themſelves defeated at the time; though, the next day, each of them claimed the honour of the triumph*. In the courſe of the battle, in which neither ſkill nor order had been diſplayed, both the French and Burgundians committed a multiplicity of errors, alternately exhibiting exertions of heroic valour, and acts of the baſeſt cowardice. Lewis, though brave himſelf, viewed with indifference the courage of others. "He frequently deprvied one man,"—ſays Commines—"of his place and eſtates, for having run away, to confer them on another, "who had run ten leagues farther." The ſame author relates, that a ſtateſman in the royal army fled as far as Luzignan without ſtopping; while a man of diſtinction on the Burgundian ſide quitted the field, and galloped with equal ſpeed to Queſnoy. The loſs on both ſides, at the battle of Montlhery, did not exceed three thouſand ſix hundred men. A party of the Burgundian fugitives were intercepted by the Pariſians, and all of them maſſacred or taken priſoners. The booty acquired by the aſſailants on this occaſion is ſaid to have been eſtimated at two hundred thouſand crowns of gold†.

The king, overpowered by fatigue, with a mind labouring under the moſt dreadful anxiety, could not contemplate, without horror, the danger of his ſituation. He had but a very ſmall number of troops with him, and he was wholly ignorant of the ſtate of his enemies, who, he had every reaſon to believe had obtained a complete victory. Montlhery was not a poſt of ſufficient ſtrength to reſiſt the attacks of a victorious army, he therefore reſolved on an immediate retreat; and the darkneſs of the night favouring the attempt, he had the good fortune to arrive ſafe at Corbeil early the next morning.

While Lewis was thus anxious to fly from the Burgundians, a council of war was called by the count of Charolois, at which it was propoſed by the count of Saint Paul to burn all the baggage, and retire with precipitation into Burgundy

* Villaret, tom. xvii. p. 94. † Idem.

This propoſal was unanimouſly adopted by all the officers preſent, except the lord of Contay, who maintained, that it would be impoſſible to execute ſuch a plan, ſince it would expoſe the prince to the danger of being deſerted by all his followers; that moſt of them, being natives of the Low Countries, would retire to that quarter, on the very firſt orders they received for decamping; that it would be infinitely more eligible to run the riſk of a ſecond battle, than to incur the danger of a general defection; and, in ſhort, that the only alternative now left them, was conqueſt or death. The count of Charolois immediately embraced an opinion ſo conſonant with his courage, and general orders were accordingly iſſued to prepare for action at break of day; but at the time appointed for a renewal of the conflict, the flight of Lewis was firſt diſcovered by the Burgundians, who aſſerted their claim to victory, by paſſing the whole day under arms. The king, on his ſide, advanced the ſame pretenſions, though on what they could be founded it is impoſſible to conceive. As he had left the enemy maſters of the field, he thought to obviate that plauſive objection to his claims, by the ridiculous obſervation, that "it was not to be wondered at that the count of "Charolois ſhould remain in the fields, ſince he had neither town nor fortreſs "to afford him ſhelter." It muſt be confeſſed, however, that neither party had much cauſe for exultation; though both of them ſecured by the conflict the ſame advantage they had hoped to derive from victory: the king had opened himſelf a paſſage to the metropolis; and the count of Charolois had removed all obſtacles to his junction with the duke of Brittany, who had juſt arrived at Etampes.

Lewis entered Paris on the eighteenth of July, two days after the battle; when he ſupped with Charles of Melun, and ſeveral of the nobility, and ſome of the citizen's wives were admitted to his table. Though on his arrival he was only accompanied by one hundred horſe, he was ſoon joined by ſo many of his troops, that, being unable to find quarters for them all in the city, he was under the neceſſity of forming a camp on the banks of the Seine. He expreſſed his determination to collect his ſcattered forces, and once more to try the fortune of war; but he was ſoon induced to give up a deſign, which prudence forbade him to accompliſh. His preſent object was to provide for the ſafety of the capital. Some partizans of the league having been arreſted, were immediately put to death; and the monarch attended their execution, and urged the executioner to perform his duty with ſpirit and effect.*

Influenced by the ſame motives, he courted the affection of the Pariſians with incredible zeal, neglecting no meaſure which his ſagacity could ſuggeſt for the acquiſition of popularity. He viſited all the principal citizens, entered into familiar converſation with them, and admitted them to his table: he alſo aboliſhed moſt of the impoſts, and confirmed the privileges of the city. At the ſuggeſtion of William Chartier, biſhop of Paris, ſix citizens, ſix members of the univerſity, and ſix judges of the parliament, were appointed to manage the moſt important and moſt urgent buſineſs of the ſtate. When the king had regulated all theſe matters, he went into Normandy, with a view to arm the nobility, and to bring back with him moſt of the troops which he had left for the defence of that province, which, from the abſence of the duke of Brittany he no longer conceived to be in danger.

Meanwhile the count of Charolois having collected his forces, which had been diſperſed at the battle of Montlhery, and effected a junction with the Bretons, advanced towards Paris, accompanied by the dukes of Berry and Brittany. The duke of Burgundy had ſent a conſiderable body of calvary, under the command of Saveuſes, to join him at the gates of the capital: he was farther reinforced by the duke of Bourbon; the count of Armagnac; the duke of Nemours; and the lord of Albret. The duke of Calabria, too, haſtened to join the confederates with a ſmall body of well-diſciplined troops, who had ſerved under him in the Italian wars, and five hundred Swiſs infantry, the firſt ever ſeen in France. The iſle of France was ſcarcely capable of containing this immenſe army, the calvary whereof amounted to one hundred thouſand men. As the princes, in hope that the inhabitants would admit them into the capital, wiſhed to ſpare their property; they made their troops obſerve the ſtricteſt diſcipline; except the forces of the count of Armagnac, who, receiving no pay, were compelled to live at diſcretion; and theſe were ſtationed in the province of Brie, which they laid waſte.

The Pariſians having taken the bridges at Saint Cloud and Charenton, at the time of the battle of Montlhery, the count of Charolois cauſed a bridge of boats to be conſtructed, over which his troops paſſed the Seine: he then retook Charenton and Saint Cloud, and formed a ſemicircular camp, commanding all the northern part of the city, while the king's troops were ſtationed on the oppoſite ſide. The loſs of Charenton might have occaſioned a ſcarcity of proviſions in the capital, but ſuch care had been taken to provide an ample ſtock, that no apprehenſions of that kind were entertained.

Though all the efforts which the count of Charolois had hitherto made to obtain admiſſion into Paris, had proved fruitleſs, yet he did not deſpair of finally accompliſhing his project. He thought that the name of the duke of Berry, on whom the confederates had conferred the title of regent of the kingdom, joined to ſpecious promiſes the hope of a ſalutary reform; and, that the preſence of a formidable army, commanded by the moſt diſtinguiſhed captains in France, would intimidate or ſeduce the inhabitants of the capital, and engage them to declare in favour of a league, which had for its object the public good. It was reſolved to demand a conference with the Pariſians, in order to explain to them the motives which had determined the princes to take up arms; for this purpoſe, letters ſigned by the duke of Berry, were ſent to the parliament, the municipal body, and the univerſity, inviting them to appoint deputies for conducting a negociation.

Deputies were accordingly chofen, who proceeded to the Burgundian camp, under the conduct of the biſhop of Paris, where they were received by the duke of Berry, as the repreſentative of the ſovereign, attended by the count of Charolois, the dukes of Brittany and Calabria, and others of the princes and nobility. The count of Dunois addreſſed the deputies in the name of the confederated princes, "Who," he obſerved, "had long conſidered, with attention, the man-"ners of Lewis, who not only oppreſſed the people by ſuperfluous taxes, and "the exaction of unuſual ſervices, but treated them with the ſame contempt "which he beſtowed on all the nobles of the realm, and deprived them of all au-"thority. They reproached him with making his own will the ſole rule of his "actions; he was the law, the judge, and the parliament." The count remarked, "That he only ſought to ſecure his power by the force of arms, and the exertions "of his troops; that his perſon was ſurrounded, and his favour monopolized, "by perſons of the loweſt extraction, who were meanly obſequious to his wiſhes, "and paſſively obedient to his commands, on which account he raiſed them to an "equality with the princes of his blood: that the kingdom was filled with ſpies "and informers, ſo that no man's life nor property was ſecure: that ſuſpicions the "moſt frivolous were admitted as ſufficient for puniſhing the citizens with exile or "death: that the wild beaſts enjoyed greater freedom and ſafety in France than "men: that the wealth of the kingdom was thrown away on perſons deſtitute of "honour and probity: that they alone obtained penſions; and that the period "was arrived, when almoſt all the property in the kingdom was at the diſpoſal of one "man: that theſe numerous abuſes had induced the princes to take up arms, and "to repair to Paris, to take the general opinion of the French, and to call an "aſſembly of the ſtates, in order to correct the vices which prevailed in the go-"vernment: that Lewis was indeed their king, but that it became their dignity "to exhort and admoniſh him to follow the ſteps of his predeceſſors, to conform "to the laws, and to have compaſſion on the people.*"

The deputies, on their return, repaired to the town-houſe, and reported the reſult of their conference to the inhabitants; adding, that the princes threatened to lay waſte the environs of the capital, if they ſtill perſiſted in refuſing them admiſſion. After ſome deliberation, it was agreed, that the deputies ſhould return to the princes, and aſſure them, that if they would bind themſelves by an oath, to commit no kind of violence, and to pay for every thing they wanted, they were willing, with the king's conſent, to admit them into the town.

At this juncture, the admiral de Montauban arrived at Paris, with a ſtrong reinforcement of troops; and advice was received, at the ſame time, that the king might be ſoon expected. In fact, he arrived a few days after, accompanied by the count of Maine, and all the troops he could collect in Normandy. Lewis being informed of the negociations which had been carried on in his abſence, was extremely enraged at the inhabitants for having preſumed to deliberate without his orders, on the propoſals of the princes. He did not, however, think it prudent to give a full ſcope to his reſentment, but contented himſelf with paſſing a ſentence of baniſhment on the principal conductors of the negociation. He took the government of Paris from Charles of Melun, and beſtowed that poſt, which at this period he conſidered as the moſt important one in his gift, on the count of Eu.

On the king's arrival, the royaliſts, who had hitherto ſtood on the defenſive, made frequent ſallies on the enemy, though Lewis was careful not to riſk a deciſive action. The confederates, finding there were little hopes of reducing the capital, began to be tired of the war; the count of Charolois, too, was anxious to return to the Low Countries, where the people of Liege, at the inſtigation of Lewis, had committed the moſt dreadful depredations. The conſequence of this diſpoſition was, the concluſion of a truce for ſome days, during which it was propoſed to effect a final accommodation. The truce, however, was ill obſerved, eſpecially by the confederates, whoſe troops, no longer ſubmiſſive to the reſtraint of diſcipline, laid waſte the environs of Paris. The king himſelf could ſcarcely contain his troops within the bounds of moderation; thoſe who were ſtationed in the vicinity of the metropolis did as much damage to the farmers as the enemies themſelves did; while the garriſon of Paris, rendered inſolent by a conſciouſneſs of their own importance, treated the citizens with a degree of pride and inſolence, that, under the preſent circumſtances, it was difficult to repreſs *.

The count of Saint Paul having requeſted the king to grant him a conference without the walls, Lewis met him near the ramparts; and on his return he aſſured the Pariſians, that they would not be long troubled with the Burgundians. An attorney who was preſent when he made this declaration, exclaimed, "That "may be, ſire; but meanwhile they are entering our vineyards, and eating our "grapes, and we are not able to prevent them." "It is better," replied the king, "that they ſhould enter your vineyards, and eat your grapes, than that "they ſhould enter Paris, and take your money, and your plate, which you "have concealed in your cellars, and even in the bowels of the earth."

Serious negociations for a peace were now carried on by the count of Maine, and the lord of Précigny, ſecond preſident of the parliament of Toulouſe, on the part of the king; and the duke of Calabria, and the counts of Saint Paul and Dunois, on the part of the confederates. As Lewis was reſolved to effect an accommodation at all events, he only ſtarted difficulties the better to conceal his real deſigns. The princes were ſo exorbitant in their demands, that had he

* The inſolence of the ſoldiers may be collected from the following account of a contemporary author: "Neither the wealth which Paris contains," ſaid they to the citizens, "nor the town "itſelf, belongs to thoſe who reſide in it, but to us ſoldiers; and we would have you to know, that "in ſpite of your faces, (molgre vos viſages) we will keep the keys of your houſes, and turn you "and yours into the ſtreet." Of their licentiouſneſs, the following extract, from the ſame author, may convey ſome idea: "The ſame day two hundred archers arrived at Paris, under the com"mand of captain Mignon; and they were followed by eight bad women on horſeback, accompa"nied by a monk, who was their confeſſor." Chron. de Saint Denis.

granted them without hesi'ation, the sincerity of his conduct might have been justly suspected. Philip de Commines assures us, that he had been advised by his friend, the duke of Milan, to grant every demand which the confederates might be tempted to make, in order to dissolve the league, and to leave it to time to supply him with the means of breaking his promises. A scheme of this nature, in which honour and justice were sacrificed to policy, required no uncommon exertion of genius to invent; and it was so consonant to the disposition of Lewis, that it must naturally have occurred to him.

The only point which was suffered to protract the conclusion of the treaty, was the augmentation of the duke of Berry's appanage. The princes insisted, that the province of Normandy should be ceded to him; but with this demand the king could not prevail upon himself to comply. The situation of that province, which on one side joined the dominions of the duke of Brittany, and on the other extended to within a short distance of those towns on the river Somme, the restitution of which was now required by the count of Charolois, rendered it of the utmost importance; as the possession of it would make it an easy matter for the three princes to join their forces at the first signal, and thus keep the king constantly besieged, as it were, in the centre of the kingdom. Instead of Normandy, Lewis offered to cede the provinces of Champagne and Brie to his brother, reserving only to himself the towns of Montereau—Fautyonne, Meaux and Melun. His offers, however, were rejected, the negociations broken off, and hostilities renewed.

During this war, a custom prevailed, of which we find no example at any earlier period of the French history. The prisoners were exposed to public sale. The chroniclers of the times relate, that several Calabrians were sold at six sols six deniers per head. They were purchased with the view to make a profit by their ransom; and such of the unfortunate victims as were unable to pay their ransom, or as nobody claimed, were hanged§. This was a new branch of commerce, the accursed offspring of avarice, which, like some that are still suffered to subsist, tended to gratify the rapacity of individuals, in contempt of religion, and at the expence of humanity!

The confederates were induced, by a scarcity of provisions, to renew the negociations for a peace; but when it appeared on the point of conclusion, some new incidents occurred to break off the conferences. The governor of Boulogne-sur-Mer had just been executed for a design to set that town on fire, and during the confusion which such an event must necessarily occasion, to surrender the place to the English. Saveuses, a Burgundian general, having frequently obtained permission to go to Peronne to see the count of Nevers, took an opportunity of introducing six hundred men into the town during the night, with whose assistance he secured the citadel. The count of Nevers was suspected of being an accomplice in the plot, though he was made priſoner and ſent to the caſtle of Bethune. Lewis Sobier, governor of Pontoiſe, delivered that place to the duke of Brittany, who, a few days after, was admitted, by a ſimilar inſtance of treachery, into Evreux. The duke of Calabria took Giſors, and the duke of Bourbon reduced Rouen.

§ "On Sunday, at break of day, seven men came to the Boulevard, near the tower of Billy, who "had been taken by the Burgundians, and by them condemned to be hanged, because, since they "had been taken, nobody had offered to purchase them." Additions a la Chronique de Monstrelet.

In preceding wars, occaſioned by internal diſſentions, the nation had been reduced to a more deplorable ſtate; but it never was ſunk ſo low, in point of degradation, as at preſent. Falſehood and treachery appeared on every ſide, nor was the dark proſpect relieved by a ſingle act of virtue *. The French hiſtorians have neglected to trace the ſource of this national corruption; but ſurely it may, with juſtice, be aſcribed to the ſhameful depravity of the monarch himſelf: deſtitute of truth, honour, or probity, Lewis made diſſimulation his ſtudy, and gloried in deceit. That the conduct of a ſovereign has an eſſential influence on the manners of a people, cannot be denied; the diſpenſer of honours and rewards, his favour muſt be courted by ſuch men as are known to correſpond with his taſte, and coincide with his wiſhes: when abſolute,—puniſhment, too, muſt be avoided by a ſimilar attention to his will and caprice; thus are habits, as it were, imperceptibly contracted; and, though in every nation there are, doubtleſs, many individuals who eſcape the general contagion, who acquire not the general biaſs, yet, from the natural propenſity of man to imitate his ſuperiors, the impulſe ſoon becomes univerſal, and conſtitutes what may juſtly be termed the national character. On the minds of thoſe who are born to fill the elevated ſtation of royalty, this important conſideration cannot be too ſtrongly impreſſed; let them reflect, moſt ſeriouſly reflect, on the full extent of their influence: not an action they commit is unobſerved, or indifferent; their vices may tend to involve thouſands in guilt; their virtues may prove the means of happineſs to millions; when ſuch motives to rectitude are duly weighed, they muſt be found irreſiſtible. It is thus that, by the all-wiſe diſpenſations of Providence, to the enjoyment of a ſuperior ſtation the diſcharge of ſuperior duties is invariably annexed.

Preſſed on all ſides, ſurrounded by enemies or traitors, the king reſolved to extricate himſelf from a ſituation thus dangerous, by concluding a peace, which he reſolved to break as ſoon as circumſtances would permit. It was neceſſary, indeed, to adopt ſome deciſive meaſure, for he received daily information of plots formed againſt his perſon. The enemy had found means to circulate ſeditious libels, in which neither the king nor his miniſters were ſpared; and a diſpoſition to tumult appeared in the capital, where Balue, biſhop of Evreux, the king's confidential friend, was attacked, and wounded; and that prelate was only indebted for his life to the ſwiftneſs of his mule.

Lewis now granted all the demands of the confederates, and even ſeemed to anticipate their wiſhes. He told the count of Charolois, who, notwithſtanding a ceſſation of arms which had been agreed on, had made an attempt on the town of Beauvais, that if he were not ſatisfied with the conditions propoſed, he was willing to add the entire ceſſion of the Beauvoiſis. At length peace was concluded on the following terms * :—The duchy of Normandy was ſeized as an appanage, to the duke of Berry, together with the ſovereignty of the duchies of Alençon and Brittany. The count of Charolois obtained all the towns on the Somme, which had been formerly pledged to the duke of Burgundy, to be enenjoyed by him and his immediate ſucceſſor, after whoſe death they might be redeemed by the king of France, on the payment of two hundred thouſand crowns of gold: Lewis likewiſe ceded to the count, as a perpetual inheritance, the diſtricts of Peronne, Roye, and Montdidier, with the counties of Guines and Boulogne-ſur-Mer. The duke of Calabria acquired the towns of Mouſon, Sainte-Menehould, Vaucouleurs, and Epinal, a guard of five hundred lances, to be maintained at the king's expence, and the ſum of one hundred thouſand crowns towards defraying the expences of an expedition for the recovery of the kingdom of Naples. The duke of Brittany had for his ſhare the counties of Etampes and Montfort, with the government of Lower Normandy; he likewiſe obtained a renunciation of the king's claims to the right of regale within the duchy of Brittany. To the duke of Bourbon were allotted the diſtrict of Uſſon, aud a part of Auvergne. The count of Armagnac obtained the reſtitution of certain territories, of which he had been deprived in the preceding reign, with a penſion, and a company of regular troops. The duke of Nemours was appointed governor of Paris, and the iſle of France, with a penſion, and a guard of two hundred lances. The count of Dunois was reſtored to his poſſeſſions, as was alſo the count of Dammartin. The lord of Albret had his claims allowed to certain eſtates, which joined his domains. The count of Saint Paul was inveſted with the dignity of conſtable, which had remained vacant ever ſince the death of Arthur, duke of Brittany; and the lord of Bueil was promoted to the high office of admiral of France. The lord of Loheac was reſtored to the rank of mareſchal of France, and Tanneguy Du Chatel to the poſt of grand ecuyer; and the king alſo engaged to give each of theſe noblemen the command of a company of regulars, by which means they would obtain the diſpoſal of the principal forces in the kingdom. It was farther agreed, that the Pragmatic Sanction ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in its full vigour, and that a council ſhould be appointed for correcting the abuſes in the government, to conſiſt of thirty-ſix members, to be choſen from the three orders of the ſtate.

Such were the principal conditions of the treaties of Conflans and Saint-Maur des Foſſes, which, had they been faithfully executed, would have left Lewis but the vain title of king, deſtitute of authority. Some of his moſt intimate friends having enquired what motives could induce him to ſubmit to ſuch diſadvantageous terms? Lewis replied—"The youth of my brother of Berry; the prudence of my fair "couſin of Calabria; the good ſenſe of my fair brother of Bourbon; the malice of "the count of Armagnac; the great pride of my fair couſin of Brittany; and the in- "vincible power of my fair brother of Charolois *. The king, before he concluded this treaty, entered a formal proteſt againſt it in the court of parliament, as being the reſult of force, and contrary to the rights and intereſts of the crown.

At this period, Iſabella of Bourbon, counteſs of Charolois, died at Bruxelles, leaving only one daughter, named Mary, then in her ninth year, who afterward became ſole heireſs to the vaſt poſſeſſions of her family; and who by her marriage with Maximilian, transferred her rights to the houſe of Auſtria; rights which proved an inexhauſtible ſource of diſpute, and occaſioned the moſt bloody wars, that continued for nearly three centuries.

The chief advantage which Lewis derived from this diſhonourable peace, was a conſciouſneſs of his paſt errors. For ſome time he appeared ſtudious to regain the attachment of the malecontents, by a conduct diametrically oppoſite to that which he had obſerved on his acceſſion to the throne. He aſſumed an affability of manners, and ſeemed to breathe nothing but benevolence, candour, and friendſhip. He liſtened to advice with the apparent docility of a prince diſtruſtful of his own abilities on an object of ſuch importance as the government of a nation. Even his external appearance was changed; he exchanged the mean dreſs he had been accuſtomed to wear, for an apparel more ſuitable to his dignity. He loaded the princes, and other chiefs of the confederacy, with careſſes; received them at his palace, and attended the feaſts to which they were invited by the principal citizens. To pleaſe the count of Charolois, he deprived Morvilliers of the office of chancellor, and conferred it on William Juvenal des Urſins, who had enjoyed it on his acceſſion.

But notwithſtanding theſe appearances of content and ſatisfaction, the king could ſcarcely conceal his impatience to witneſs the ſeparation and retreat of the confederates, Peace was proclaimed at Paris, on the twenty-ninth of October; and the laſt day of that month was appointed by Lewis to receive the homage of the princes, at the caſtle of Vincennes, which the count of Charolois inſiſted ſhould be delivered up to him, as a pledge for the ſafety of his perſon, and thoſe of his allies. His guards were accordingly ſtationed in the avenues, and at the gates of the fortreſs, when the king arrived, attended by a ſlender eſcort. By this appearance of confidence, he wiſhed to inſpire his enemies with an opinion of his candour and ſincerity; and he carried his diſſimulation ſo far, that he had reſolved to ſleep at Vincennes, and had given orders for his bed to be brought from Paris; but the arrival of a meſſenger from the aldermen and provoſt of Paris, requeſting he would return before night, prevented him from accompliſhing his deſign. After the new duke of Normandy, the count of Charolois, and the other princes, had done homage for the poſſeſſions which had been ceded to them by the treaty, the count of Saint-Paul took the oath of allegiance as conſtable of France. An act of oblivion was then paſſed, and the chiefs of the confederacy received a formal pardon from the king for their conduct during the revolt.

On the third of November the long wiſhed-for ſeparation of the princes took place: the duke of Normandy, accompanied by the duke of Brittany, repaired to the province which he had newly acquired; while the count of Charolois took the road to Flanders. The king accompanied the count as far as Villiers-le-Bel, where the two princes paſſed three days, during which time they were equally profuſe of their profeſſions of friendſhip and eſteem, and equally ſuſpicious of each other's deſigns. Lewis, who on his departure from Paris was only accompanied by a ſmall retinue, had left orders for two hundred lances to follow him, in order to eſcort him on his return. The arrival of theſe, juſt as the count of Charolois was going to bed, threw that prince into the moſt dreadful conſternation; and, apprehenſive that the king had formed ſome deſign againſt him, he commanded his troops to arm. Philip de Commines, who was preſent at the time, and who lived alternately at the French and Burgundian courts, obſerves, that the too great familiarity with which they converſed together during three days, far from inſpiring them with friendſhip for each other, only ſerved to encreaſe their diſtruſt, and confirm their mutual averſion. They had acquired too deep a knowledge of each other's ſentiments not to perceive that inſurmountable antipathy which the difference of their diſpoſitions muſt naturally produce. The king, aware of the count's impatience to attack the people of Liege, offered to give them up, and even to aſſiſt him in revenging the injury he had ſuſtained from them—though Lewis himſelf had inſtigated them to the commiſſion of that injury—on condition that the count would renounce all alliance with the other princes, and particularly with the duke of Brittany. The artifice was too ſhallow to impoſe on the count of Charolois, who immediately replied, that nothing could diſſolve the bond of friendſhip which ſubſiſted between him and the duke of Brittany, that he ſhould always be ready to leave the people of Liege to themſelves, in order to fly to the aſſiſtance of that prince whenever the king ſhould attempt to attack him; in ſhort, that their cauſe was the ſame, and their intereſts were inſeparable. This refuſal, however, did not prevent Lewis and Charles from renewing, when they parted, their profeſſions of mutual eſteem, and their proteſtations of living in future in the utmoſt harmony.

Thus terminated the war for the public good, in which, it muſt be confeſſed, the confederates appear rather to have conſulted their own private intereſt, than the welfare or relief of the people. The chiefs of the league, indeed, ſeemed to have forgotten the nation, whoſe welfare had furniſhed them with a ſpecious pretext for taking up arms. The count of Charolois, immediately after he had ratified the treaty of Conflans, ordered that, in all the towns which had been ceded to him, the taxes ſhould be renewed, although at the commencement of the war, he had himſelf aboliſhed them. The other chiefs followed his example; and as the ſupport of ſo large an army on either ſide, had alike exhauſted the finances of the king and of the princes, the kingdom was more burdened with impoſts after the troubles were at an end, than before they began.

Lewis, releaſed from the danger which threatened him, did not think of the ſacrifices he had made—important as they were—too great for the time he had thereby gained to recover from his fears, and to concert his meaſures with more prudence and addreſs. If we except Guienne, and the iſle of France, he now found himſelf almoſt as much confined in his territories, as was Charles the Seventh at the commencement of his reign. Intent on recovering by degrees what he had loſt at once by a ruinous treaty, his only motives for conſolation were derived from his hopes, that the future would make amends for the paſt. The conduct of the princes had reduced him to the neceſſity of conſidering them as the irreconcileable enemies of his power; but ſo long as they remained in a ſtate of union, it was impoſſible to attack any one of them ſingly, without ſpreading an inſtant alarm among the reſt. The king's ſole reſource, therefore, conſiſted in their diviſion, which he could only expect from time and circumſtances, and particularly from the oppoſition of their various intereſts. The ſeeds of that diviſion indeed he had already contrived to ſow, by means of the private treaties, which had been concluded in conſequence of the general agreement *. This multiplicity of conventions, diſtinct from each other, proved an inexhauſtible ſource of difficulties and diſputes, by leaving the contracting parties an opening, either to interpret them to their own advantage, or elude the execution of them.

Lewis haſtened to expreſs his gratitude for the zeal and fidelity of the Pariſians during the late troubles, by confirming all their privileges, aſſuring them, at the ſame time, that ſo far from ever thinking of curtailing their immunities in future, under the idea that they had been extorted from the neceſſity of the times, they would always find him ready to grant them new favours. The particular prerogatives enjoyed by the Pariſians, conſiſted in an exemption from providing quarters for the troops; a liberation from the neceſſity of attending the Ban and Aarriere-Ban, for all ſuch citizens as poſſeſſed fiefs ſubject to military ſervice; and the privilege of not being compelled to anſwer any action brought againſt them elſewhere than in the courts at Paris. The king was now fully aware, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſecure the favour of the people, before he could hope to accompliſh the deſign he had formed on his acceſſion to the throne, to raiſe—in imitation of his father—the ſovereign power on the ruins of the ariſtocracy, a plan of which he never loſt ſight, and for the execution whereof he employed ſuch means as beſt correſponded to his humour and diſpoſition: he viſited the pooreſt citizens, invited them to his table, ſtood godfather to their children, and became a member of their different companies.

* The chief conditions of the accommodation were ſettled at Conflans. It is probable, that all the princes who had joined the league, concluded each of them a ſeparate treaty, in conformity to the generel convention. which is to be ſeen in the proofs annexed to the memoirs of Philip de Commines, without either date or the name of the place at which it was ſigned. The treaty of Saint-Maur muſt be conſidered only as a confirmation and interpretation of ſeveral articles of the peace: ſince peace had been proclaimed at Paris before that treaty was drawn up. Vid. Pieces Juſtificat. pour ſervir a l'Hiſtoire de Louis XI.—Villaret, tom. xvii. p. 155.

But the exercise of absolute power was so congenial to the soul of Lewis, that he was the first to violate the salutary regulations he had adopted, and to exemplify by his conduct the common observation, that between practice and professions the difference is great. Although he had declared, that in future the ancient custom of appointing magistrates, by a plurality of suffrages, should be observed; he now by his own authority removed several, against whom no objection could be made, and replaced them with others of his own nomination. He dismissed Matthew de Nanterre, first president of the parliament, and appointed John Dauvet to succeed him; and, lest any opposition should be made to this appointment, Lewis attended in person while the new president was sworn into office. Robert d'Estouteville was also appointed to the place of provost of Paris, and was admitted, notwithstanding the opposition of James de Villiers, the actual possessor of that post, who appealed from the king's nomination. Several other magistrates and judges belonging to the different courts were likewise dismissed in the same arbitrary manner; and as soon as Lewis had made all the arrangements he thought necessary, he left the capital, and repaired to Orleans. He staid some time in that city, waiting the issue of his secret intrigues for promoting a quarrel between the dukes of Normandy and Brittany, and in order to profit by the divisions which jealousy and avarice had already excited between the dependants of those princes.

The duke of Normandy, in going to take possession of his appange, was accompanied by the duke of Brittany, who in consequence of the services he had rendered him, thought himself entitled to have the entire guidance of his conduct *: the two princes were still at Pontoise, when the king sent the chancellor des Ursins to exact from them a new oath to observe the peace, in conformity to the conditions agreed on, as well at Conflans as at Saint-Maur des Fosses, and at Paris. The duke of Normandy immediately complied with his brother's demand, but the duke of Brittany, refused to give any thing more than a verbal promise; protesting at the same time against that article of the treaty, which provided for the establishment of thirty-six commissioners, who were to reform all abuses in the government, as he could not, he said, acknowledge their authority, without subjecting the independence of his dominions to be called in question. This protest of the duke's supplied the king with a pretext for renewing the protest which he had himself made against the treaties of Conflans and Saint-Maur.

It was easy to foresee that things could not long remain in their present situation. The duke of Normandy was surrounded by a number of noblemen and officers, who had only embraced his cause from the hope of reward. All the places he could bestow were insufficient to gratify their rapacity; while on the other hand the Norman nobility thought themselves entitled to the exclusive possession of all honourable and lucrative posts. They were all equally inimical to the duke of Brittany, who ſought to diſpoſe of every thing at his pleaſure; and this tyrannical behaviour excited a general diſcontent, the dangerous conſequences whereof his friends in vain endeavoured to impreſs on his mind. Tanneguy Duchatel, whoſe prudent advice had already proved of ſuch eſſential ſervice to the duke, having remonſtrated with him on the ſubject, and attempted to diſſuade him from accompanying the duke of Normandy, was diſmiſſed; and the king, ever attentive to profit by the faults of others, embraced this opportunity to regain Duchatel, who ſerved him with zeal and fidelity.

Such was the ſtate of affairs, when the two princes arrived at Sainte-Catherine du Mont, in the vicinity of Rouen, where they intended to ſtop a few days, while the neceſſary preparations were making for the entry of the duke of Normandy into his capital. The premature nomination of Leſcun, by the duke of Brittany, to the government of Rouen, completed the diſaffection which was generally borne to that prince. The murmurs of diſcontent became louder and louder, and at length reached the ears of the duke of Normandy, who was given to underſtand, that it was the duke of Brittany's intention, under the maſk of friendſhip, to keep him in a continual ſtate of dependence. This gave riſe to a diſpute between the princes, which foretold an approaching rupture. John of Lorrain, lord of Harcourt, a nobleman of the firſt diſtinction in the province, aſſembled the inhabitants of Rouen at the town-houſe, where he declared, that the duke of Brittany had formed a deſign for ſecuring the perſon of their prince, and conveying him to his own dominions. The news of this pretended conſpiracy, though wholly deſtitute of probability, ſpread a general alarm: a part of the inhabitants immediately flew to arms, and, haſtening to Sainte-Catherine du Mont, prevailed on the duke of Normandy to return with them to Rouen, leaving the duke of Brittany in the utmoſt aſtoniſhment at this ſudden reſolution. That prince immediately retired to Caen.

The king during theſe tranſactions had remained at Orleans, where he made various changes in the different departments of the ſtate, concealing his real deſigns beneath the veil of apparent tranquillity. As ſoon as he was appriſed of the diſpute between his brother and the duke of Brittany, and of the retreat of the latter, he advanced to the frontiers of Normandy with all his forces, and a formidable train of artillery. At his approach, either treachery or fear procured him admiſſion into the different towns, and he proceeded, without encountering any obſtacle, as far as Pont-à-l'Arche, within three leagues of Rouen. In order to attach the duke of Brittany to his intereſt, or at leaſt to deter him from any attempt to impede the progreſs of his arms, he paid him a viſit at Caen, where a treaty was concluded between them. The duke promiſed to conduct himſelf in future as a ſteady friend and faithful ally, and to ſerve the king againſt all men, except the duke of Calabria and the count of Charolois. Lewis on his part declared, that the proteſt which he had entered againſt the treaties of Conflans and Saint-Maur, was not meant to invalidate thoſe articles which affected the duke, and particularly that which related to the regale. All the nobility who had joined the duke of Brittany, and who ſtill preſerved their attachment to his cauſe—among whom were the counts of Dunois and Dammartin; the mareſchal de Loheac, and the lord of Leſcun—were expreſsly included in the treaty; which, however, was drawn up in ſuch ambiguous terms, that Philip de Commines, on the authority of Lewis himſelf, aſſures us, that neither the king nor the duke perfectly underſtood it.

Lewis returned to Pont-à-l'Arche, in order to preſs the reduction of Rouen, where his brother remained, without friends or experience, and relying ſolely for aſſiſtance on the fidelity of the inhabitants. In this emergency, he firſt applied to the count of Charolois, who being engaged in a war with the people of Liege, was unable to afford him that ſpeedy ſuccour which his ſituation required: he ſent, however, a part of the troops, which were ſtationed on the frontiers of Picardy and Artois, to enter Normandy, and ſecure the town of Dieppe; but the governor of that place had already ſurrendered it to the king. The duke of Normany finding himſelf wholly unable to reſiſt, and being afraid of falling into his brother's hands, reſolved to provide for his perſonal ſafety by a timely flight. He was at firſt tempted to repair to the Low Countries, but the dread of being intercepted by the French troops made him give up that deſign; and, after much heſitation, he applied to the duke of Brittany for a paſſport. The duke granted his requeſt, by deſire of the king, who was fearful of driving the prince to deſpair, leſt he ſhould be tempted, in ſpite of all impediments, to fly for protection to the count of Charolois.

Before the departure of the duke of Normandy, the inhabitants of Rouen had ſent deputies to the king to obtain a general amneſty, and a grant of the ſame privileges which he had confirmed to the Pariſians; but the king replied, that he would conſult with his council, and make them acquainted with his will. The duke's departure put an end to the negociation, and the town immediately ſurrendered. Thus in leſs than ſix weeks was the whole province of Normandy recovered by the king, except the towns of Caen and Honfleur, which were ſequeſtered in the hands of the lord of Leſcun. In the treaty lately concluded between Lewis and the duke of Brittany, it was ſtipulated, that all thoſe who had followed the fortunes of the duke of Normandy ſhould be allowed to retire to Honfleur, there to remain till ſuch time as they obtained a pardon from the king.

A. D. 1466.] Had the king's clemency been equal to his good fortune, this rapid revolution would have been effected without the ſmalleſt effuſion of blood; but, little accuſtomed to pardon, the recollection of his paſt danger, and of the diſhonourable peace which he had been forced to conclude, ſeemed to have redoubled the natural ſeverity of his temper. Thoſe officers and gentlmen who in the late commotions had joined the confederates, and who were not of ſufficient conſequence, of themſelves, to preſcribe terms to the king, were arreſted, and put to death in various ways, without any previous trial. After theſe acts of cruelty, which ſo ſtrongly marked the ſavage diſpoſition of this royal aſſaſſin, Lewis appointed new governors in all the towns he had recovered; and concluded his expedition to Normandy, by a pilgrimage to Mont Saint-Michel, whence he returned to Orleans.

The news of the duke of Normandy's flight, and of the loſs of his new appanage, gave the deepeſt diſpleaſure to the count of Charolois. By compelling the king to cede that province to his brother, he thought he had effectually humbled his pride, and curtailed his power. In fact, both with regard to the revenue it afforded, and the troops it ſupplied, Normandy was always conſidered as equal to one third of the whole French monarchy. The count's mortification too was encreaſed by his total inability, at this period, to enforce a rigid obſervance of the peace; for the war in which he was engaged with the people of Liege took up all his attention. The Liegeois had firſt been inſtigated to attack him by the king of France, who had promiſed them, in letters written with his own hand, ſpeedy and effectual aſſiſtance; but when they found no mention made of them in the treaty of peace, they were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation, and, on the return of the count of Charolois from Paris, they had recourſe to entreaties and ſupplications, and, after various negociations, they were finally compelled to ſubmit to ſuch terms as the prince choſe to impoſe.

Lewis, meanwhile, highly pleaſed with his recent ſucceſs, continued to purſue his plan for ſecuring the favour of the people, and for attaching to his intereſt as many of the nobility as he could *. Deeply verſed in the arts of diſſimulation, he frequently beſtowed his warmeſt careſſes on thoſe whom he had devoted to deſtruction. Anxious to gain the houſe of Bourbon, he gave the hand of his natural daughter, Jane, to Lewis, baſtard of Bourbon, with a dower of a hundred thouſand crowns, and an eſtate which produced ſix thouſand livres a year. He alſo ſecretly aſſured the duke of Bourbon, that he deſigned his eldeſt daughter, Anne, for Peter of Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu. Theſe marks of diſtinction had the deſired effect on the duke, who immediately renounced all his engagements, and ſwore an inviolable fidelity to the king, which he preſerved till his death. The duke was immediately appointed governor of Languedoc, in the place of the count of Maine, who was charged with having maintained a ſecret correſpondence with the confederates, and with various other crimes and miſdemeanours. That nobleman would, probably, have experienced a more ſevere puniſhment, but for the interpoſition of the king of Sicily, whoſe friendſhip Lewis was anxious to preſerve. He had, indeed, juſt agreed to confirm the good underſtanding that ſubſiſted between them, by a marriage between the marquis of Pont, grandſon to the Sicilian monarch, and his own daughter Anne, whom he had ſecretly promiſed to the lord of Beaujeu. The count of Maine was reſtored to favour the following year, at the ſolicitation of the king of Scicily, who pledged himſelf for his fidelity, and engaged, in caſe he ſhould again deviate from his duty, to declare againſt him. About this period, Lewis, who was diſpleaſed with the conduct of Charles de Melun, deprived him of the command of the Baſtille.

* Chron. de France—Cont. de Monſtrelet—Phil. de Com.—Hiſtoire de Louis XI—Pieces Juſtific.

Anthony de Châteauneuf, lord of Lau, was the next perſon who was deſtined to feel the weight of the king's reſentment: this nobleman had enjoyed ſeveral of the firſt offices in the ſtate, and had acquired immenſe wealth; but though he was ſo highly diſtinguiſhed by the favour of his ſovereign, he was nevertheleſs accuſed of maintaining a criminal correſpondence with the enemies of the ſtate. Lewis, at firſt, only paſſed a ſentence of baniſhment upon him, but being found in diſguiſe in the vicinity of Orleans, while the court reſided in that city, he was ſeized and conveyed to the caſtle of Mehun. He was afterward removed to the caſtle of Uſſon in Auvergne, which belonged to the baſtard of Bourbon. The king, being afraid that he would effect his eſcape, ordered that nobleman to confine him in an iron cage; but the baſtard refuſed to execute the commiſſion, and replied, "that if it was his intention to treat his priſoners in that manner, his "majeſty might turn gaoler himſelf." After he had been confined two years, he found means to eſcape; when the chief magiſtrate of Uſſon, the governor of the caſtle, and his ſon, were all hanged for having favoured his evaſion; yet the lord of Lau was afterwards reſtored to favour. But ſuch contradictions perpetually occur in the hiſtory of the preſent reign; and indeed, when a monarch ceaſes to make reaſon and juſtice the rules of his conduct, it cannot well be otherwiſe.

The admiral de Montauban dying about this time, his poſt was conferred on the baſtard of Bourbon. In the month of July, Francis d'Orleans, ſon to the count of Dunois, who had recently returned to court, married Agnes of Savoy, ſiſter to the queen of France: and the king preſented the new-married couple with forty-thouſand crowns, and ſeveral eſtates in Dauphiné. Another of the queen's ſiſters was married to the conſtable Saint Paul. Lewis, anxious to detach that prince from the intereſts of the houſe of Burgundy, gave him the county of Guines, with the lordſhip of Novion, and alſo ſettled on him the reverſion of the county of Eu, in caſe the preſent count ſhould die without male iſſue; but as the king had no right to make ſuch ſettlement, the ſucceſſion of the county devolving to another branch of the family, it never took place. Among other noblemen who were reſtored to favour at this period, was Anthony de Chabannes, count of Dammartin; the ſentence which had been pronounced againſt him, having been previouſly annulled.

The king's brother, meanwhile, deſpoiled of his appanage, and even reduced to the neceſſity of ſelling his plate to procure a wretched ſubſiſtence, complained alike of the indifference of his allies, and the ſeverity of Lewis. The king was uneaſy leſt his reſidence in Brittany might afford the malecontents a pretext to excite a freſh revolt, under the ſanction of his name: he therefore ſent the duke of Calabria to engage him to return to France, with an offer of Rouſſillon and Cerdagne, or the counties of Valentinois and Dios at his option; but Charles had already rejected theſe offers, and even the wretchedneſs of his preſent ſituation could not induce him to accept them. The duke of Calabria had orders in caſe he ſhould fail in his negociation, to ſecure the young prince, and, if poſſible, to take him to Orleans; but he was compelled to return without having fulfilled either part of his commiſſion.

The king at the ſame time ſent La Tremoille to the count of Charolois, to juſtify his conduct to his brother; and though the count was not convinced of its propriety, from the apology offered by the ambaſſador, yet he did not appear inclined to interfere in their quarrel. This was all the king required; and in order to keep the court of Burgundy in the ſame diſpoſition, he again ratified the ceſſion of the towns on the Somme, to which he added ſeveral villages in the Vermandois; he likewiſe endeavoured to keep the attention of the count of Charolois confined to another quarter, by ſecretly engaging the Liegeois and the inhabitants of Dinant to break the peace which had been concluded the preceding year, promiſing to afford them effectual aſſiſtance; while, under pretence of an expected invaſion of France by the Engliſh, with whom he had juſt concluded a truce, he ordered all the troops in the kingdom to aſſemble, and ſuch a prodigious quantity of artillery to be founded, that the church-bells were melted down to ſupply the neceſſary quantity of metal. The count of Charolois, who was then at Peronne, alarmed at theſe formidable preparations, iſſued orders to all his vaſſals to take up arms; but though both princes were fully prepared for the renewal of hoſtilities, the ſeaſon paſſed away in embaſſies and negociations, calculated to amuſe and deceive.

The Liegeois, immediately after they had confirmed their alliance with Lewis, attempted, at his inſtigation, to ſeize the count of Charolois at Saintron; but as they were not ſufficiently ſtrong, they failed in the attempt. As ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, the count levied a powerful army, and was fully determined to make them feel the weight of his reſentment; but he firſt reſolved to puniſh the inhabitants of Dinant, who had alſo violated the treaty which they had concluded with the duk eof Burgundy, by maiing an irruption into the county of Namur: he accordingly formed the ſiege of that city, whoſe inhabitants relying on the protection of the king of France, and the aſſiſtance of their allies, the Liegeois, ſeemed determined to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity. Some of the neighbouring towns, wiſhing to ſave them from the deſtruction with which they were threatened, exhorted them to ſubmit; but they hanged the meſſenger who was ſent with the advice. A young child was then ſent with a letter, from the idea that they would reſpect his innocence; but the inhuman ſavages tore him to pieces.

The count of Charolois, burning with rage and indignation, determined to inflict a puniſhment equal to their crimes. He collected a prodigious train of artillery and ſuch a continual and well-directed fire was kept up from the batteries, that not an edifice in the town eſcaped its effects. In three days the walls were laid open on every ſide, and the towers, ſhaken to their foundations, ſeemed ready to fall. The count had cauſed two bridges to be thrown over the Maeſe, in order to ſurround the city, and to prepare for a general aſſault. The garriſon, aware of their danger, had made their eſcape, and left the inhabitants to encounter the ſtorm, which their raſhneſs had provoked. Conſcious of their inability to reſiſt; they now offered to ſurrender, on conpition that their lives ſhould be ſafe: this propoſal, however, was rejected by the count, who inſiſted on unconditional ſubmiſſion. They accordingly delivered to him the keys of thhe town, which experienced the fate of a place taken by aſſault. The pillage laſted three days; all the male inhabitants, except the old men and children, were then maſſacred, and the town ſet on fire; what the flames had ſpared, the peaſants were employed to demoliſh, ſo that not a veſtige remained to diſcover the place where Dinant had ſtood.

Meanwhile the Liegeois, alarmed at the ardour diſplayed by the count of Charolois in purſuing the operations of the war, had ſent ambaſſadors to the duke of Burgundy, with propoſals for an accommodation. On their arrival at Bovines, where the duke then was, they could ſee the flames reducing to aſhes the habitations of their allies, The terror with which this ſevere chaſtiſement had inſpired them, contributed not a little to make them accept the terms that were offered them, and which were more rigorous than any they had yet ſubmitted to. They accordingly laid down their arms, and delivered hoſtages for the performance of a treaty, which they reſolved to break at the firſt opportunity.

Although the king had apparently obſerved a ſtrict neutrality during this conteſt, yet it was well known that he had inſtigated the Liegeois to take up arms. He ſecretly congratulated himſelf on having found out the means of keeping his rival employed, without any other expence than that of promiſes; for the fate of thoſe whom he ſacrificed to his own intereſted views gave him but little concern. The conſtable Saint-Paul was himſelf too artful not to ſee through the dark policy of Lewis; but, at the ſame time, he entertained too lofty an idea of his own importance to condeſcend to obſerve that nice circumſpection in his conduct, which ſuch a knowledge ſhould naturally have led him to adopt. He accompanied the count of Charolois to the ſiege of Dinant, not with the king's troops, indeed, but with thoſe which he had aſſembled in his own domains. Ambitious to diſplay his power, and anxious to be conſidered rather as a neceſſary ally than as a vaſſal, he was blind to the danger of appearing in the light of a formidable ſubject; for though too weak to ſupport the independence he affected, he was ſtill too great, from the luſtre of his birth, and the extent of his poſſeſſions, to confine himſelf within the narrow limits of paſſive obedience. The king, however, concealed his diſpleaſure, and even appointed the count to the government of Normandy, which he had juſt reunited by his letters patent, to the domain of the crown.

Inceſſant rains, ſucceeded by exceſſive heat, brought on an epidemic diſtemper in France this year, which the people did not fail to aſcribe to the malignant influence of a comet which had appeared ſome time before. In Paris, alone, during the months of Auguſt and September, upwards of forty thouſand perſons periſhed by this dreadful diſtemper, which continued to rage, though with abated violence till the approach of winter. In order to repair the loſs which the capital had thus ſuſtained, Lewis, in the ſucceedidg year, had recourſe to an expedient more ſingular than worthy of imitation: he iſſued a general invitation to perſons of every peſcription to repair to Paris, where, he ſaid, they ſhould be exempt from proſecution for all paſt offences, and admitted to the rights of citizens. The metropolis, by this means, became an aſylum for debtors, thieves and aſſaſſins; none were excepted from the general invitation, but thoſe who had been guilty of high-treaſon. Such an expedient had never ſuggeſted itſelf to the imagination of man, ſince the foundation of Rome; nor is it poſſible to conceive what advantage the king could expect to derive from aſſociating with the Pariſians theſe new inhabitants, who were more capable of corrupting them by the depravity of their manners, than of becoming uſeful to their imprudent protector, or to their fellow citizens.

By the treaty of Conflans it had been ſtipulated, that a council ſhould be formed of thirty-ſix perſons, choſen from the three orders of the ſtate, for the purpoſe of correcting the abuſes in the government; but though a year had paſſed ſince the concluſion of that treaty, no mention had been made of this article, which was almoſt the only one that had the good of the public for its object. The king, in order to efface, in a certain degree, the ſiniſter impreſſions which his conduct was but too well calculated to raiſe, reſolved to ſatisfy the people in this reſpect, at the ſame time he thought, by ſuch a proceeding, to caſt a reflection on his enemies: with this view he appointed twenty commiſſioners, and named the count of Dunois for their preſident. They firſt met at the palace, but the epidemic diſtemper, which raged in the metropolis, compelled them to remove to Pontoiſe. It ſoon, however, became apparent that the king only meant, as a contemporary writer juſtly obſerves, to dazzle the eyes of the vulgar. All the remonſtrances and complaints that were addreſſed to him, he referred to the council, the members whereof were devoted to his will; and not a ſingle reſolution was adopted towards fulfilling the object for which they had met.

A. D. 1467.] In the ſpring of this year the court repaired to Rouen, in order to receive the famous earl of Warwick, ambaſſador from England *. The termination of the ancient diſputes between the two crowns was the avowed object of this embaſſy, which Warwick had ſolicited. That nobleman received the moſt diſtinguiſhed honours from Lewis †, with whom he had ſeveral private conferences, the ſubject whereof was then a ſecret, though it was ſufficiently explained by ſubſequent events. After the earl's departure, who concluded a truce between England and France for eighteen months, the king ſent the archbiſhop of Narbonne and the baſtard of Bourbon to the Engliſh court. Theſe ambaſſadors were highly diſcontented with the reception they experienced from Edward, who made them wait ſix weeks before he granted them audience, and he then referred them for an anſwer to their propoſals, (which related to the eſtabliſhment of a laſting peace,) to commiſſioners whom he promiſed to appoint, though he never fulfilled his promiſe. The ambaſſadors, during their ſtay in England, witneſſed the commencement of a conſpiracy againſt the Engliſh monarch, to which they contributed by their intrigues *.

Lewis, on his return from Rouen, received intelligence of the death of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, who expired on the fifteenth of June. His body was conveyed to Dijon, where it was depoſited in the convent of Carthuſians. The ſurname beſtowed on this prince appears to have been merited by the wiſdom and moderation of his government, as diſplayed in the continued proſperity and happineſs of his ſubjects. He was generous, magnificent, liberal and brave; a ſincere friend, and, his amorous irregularities excepted, a good chriſtian. He had upwards of thirty natural children, but only one legitimate ſon: though he had ever lived in a ſtile of magnificence ſuperior to any monarch in Europe, yet he left immenſe riches; his treaſury was found to contain, at his death, four hundred thouſand crowns of gold, ſeventy-two thouſand marks of ſilver, and other effects to the amount of two millions of livres; all of which, together with his extenſive dominions, devolved on his ſon Charles, count of Charolois.

Lewis, ſuſpecting the duke of Brittany of ſtimulating his brother Charles to reject his propoſals for an accommodation, was anxious to puniſh him by invading his country; but he was deterred from purſuing his ſchemes of revenge, through the fear of an attack from the new duke of Burgundy, whom he could neither ſoothe nor intimidate. That prince was, at preſent, employed in repreſſing an incurſion of the Liegeois, who, regardleſs of their oaths, and incited, as uſual, by the inſidious arts and fallacious promiſes of Lewis, had juſt attacked and taken the ſmall town of Huy, ſituated on the Maeſe, between Liege and Namur.

The duke of Burgundy, juſtly enraged at this infraction of the treaty, would have inſtantly put to death the three hundred hoſtages whom he had received from the people of Liege the year before, but for the interceſſion of the lord of Imbercourt, whom they had taken at Huy, and releaſed on his parole †. He was preparing, however, to march againſt the Liegeois, when the count of the Saint Paul, and Balue, biſhop of Evreux (who had been lately promoted to the rank of cardinal) were ſent to him by Lewis, to inform him, that he muſt deſiſt from all hoſtilities againſt a people who were the allies of his majeſty, and whom his majeſty was bound by treaty to aſſiſt to the utmoſt of his power; but the conſtable added, that if the duke would permit the king to wage war againſt the Bretons, he would willingly renounce his alliance with the Liegeois; to this the duke replied, that as the Liegeois had wantonly violated the truce which they had ſolemnly ſworn to obſerve, he was reſolved to march againſt them, and inflict on them a puniſhment adequate to the offence: with regard to the king's propoſals, he ſhould only obſerve, that he was determined to abide by the conditions of the treaty of Conflans, and that no conſideration ſhould induce him to ſeparate his intereſts from thoſe of the duke of Brittany. Two days after, when he mounted his horſe, and was ſetting out on his expedition, he diſmiſſed the ambaſſadors, desiring them "to beseech the king not to engage in any enterprize against the "duke of Brittany." "My lord," said the count of Saint Paul, "you wage "war at your pleasure against our friends, and yet wish us to remain quiet, with- "out daring to attack our enemies; this cannot be allowed; the king will never "suffer it." "The Liegeois," replied the duke, "are already assembled, and "expect me to bring them to action, before the expiration of three days. If I "lose the battle, I am well persuaded you will do as you please; but if I gain it, "you will leave the Bretons at peace." In a private conversation with the count of Saint Paul, "Fair cousin," said the duke, "you are my friend and my re- "lation; let me, therefore, advise you to take care lest the king should serve you "as he has already served so many others; if you will remain with me, you "shall be welcome." The constable rejected the duke's invitation, but he had afterward reason to repent his refusal.

The town of Saintron being invested by the Burgundians, the Liegeois, with an army of thirty thousand men, hastened to raise the siege; when a desperate action took place, in which the duke of Burgundy obtained a complete victory, killing six thousand of the enemy, and putting the rest to flight. Two ambassadors of the king of France had appeared in person, animating the Liegeois during the battle, though that faithless monarch had refused to send his allies those succours which, by a solemn treaty still extant, he had engaged to supply. After the victory, the garrison of Saintron surrendered at discretion, and ten victims were sent to the duke of Burgundy, to be disposed of at his pleasure: they were all hanged, agreeably to a savage custom which was but too common in the times we are delineating. Tongres experienced a similar fate; and Charles, pursuing his march to Liege, entered that city, levied a contribution on the inhabitants, filled up the ditches, demolished the fortifications, and carried off all the artillery and arms he could find.

The duke of Burgundy immediately marched with his victorious army from the Maese, to the banks of the Somme; and, at the same time, he issued orders to all his vassals, both in Burgundy and the Low Countries, to arm and join him in the environs of Saint Quentin. The duke of Brittany, meanwhile, had made an irruption into Lower Normandy, where he reduced the towns of Bayeux, Caen, and Avranches; the only resistance he experienced was at Saint Lo, whose inhabitants, incited by the exhortations, and encouraged by the example of a woman who resided in the town, flew to arms, and under her conduct attacked and defeated the Bretons. This heroine, whose name has not been preserved in history, is said to have killed several of the enemy with her own hand. Lewis, passing through Saint Lo some years after this event, had the curiosity to enquire after her, and when she came into his presence, he had the meanness to present her, as a reward for her courage and fidelity, with the pitiful sum of twenty crowns*. The duke of Alençon, having joined the duke of Brittany, surrendered to him all the towns in his possession.

* About fifty shillings English.

On the firſt news of this invaſion, the king ſent a ſmall body of troops, under the command of the mareſchal de Loheac, and the baſtard of Bourbon, to ſtop the progreſs of the enemy. He ſoon followed, himſelf, with a more conſiderable force, and having in a ſhort time retaken all the places of which the Bretons had made themſelves maſters, he formed the ſiege of Alençon, which the count du Perche, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Alençon, ſurrendered to him, after expelling the garriſon. The king then entered Brittany, at the head of forty thouſand men, and committed the moſt dreadful devaſtations. Theſe mutual incurſions, by which a tract of country, forty leagues in extent, was laid waſte, were ſuſpended by a truce, during which it was agreed to adopt proper meaſures, as well for ſettling all diſputes between the king and the duke, as for fixing the appanage of prince Charles.

Eager as was the king's deſire to extend his conqueſts, and to humble the duke of Brittany, he had found himſelf compelled to haſten the concluſion of the treaty, by the intelligence he received of the prodigious number of troops which the duke of Burgundy was collecting in Picardy. Alternately preſſed by theſe two princes, he had no ſooner made terms with one than the other renewed his alarms; though he might certainly think himſelf fortunate, in not being expoſed to more ſerious danger, which muſt inevitably have been the caſe, had they combined their projects with greater ſkill, and always acted in conjunction. Such was the king's ſituation during the greater part of his reign, which led a biſhop, who had been long harraſſed by the the litigious diſpoſition of his grand-vicar, to obſerve, that the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany were the king's two grand-vicars. The neceſſary preparations were made for defending the frontiers, and freſh troops were raiſed in every province. The Paris militia were reviewed by commiſſioners appointed by the king; and it was proved, by the muſter-roll, that the capital, notwithſtanding the number of inhabitants which had periſhed during the epidemic diſorder of the preceding year, could ſupply eighty thouſand fighting men, thirty thouſand of whom were campletely armed: the king, however, who was preſent at the review, could not forbear to expreſs his contempt of theſe citizen-ſoldiers, and, with more juſtice than policy, perhaps, to compare them, in certain reſpects, to their wives; and he concluded his ill-timed remarks with ſome obſcene jokes, which it was not becoming in him to utter, nor would it be decent in us to repeat. But while every diſpoſition was making for purſuing the war with vigour, the king, ſenſible of the importance of avoiding a deciſive action, employed every means in his power to effect an accommodation; and as the duke of Burgundy found himſelf left to ſupport the conteſt alone, he was prevailed on, without much difficulty, to conclude a truce.

The king's conduct evidently tended to render the power of the monarch wholly independent of all other authority; and this diſpoſition to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government was, indeed, viſible in all his actions. Yet was he now induced to liſten to the remonſtrances of the parliament, and to paſs the memorable edict, which ſecured, to magiſtrates and other officers of juſtice, the poſſeſſion of their places for life, unleſs vacated by voluntary reſignation, or legal forfeiture*.

A. D. 1468.] In order to juſtify his behaviour to his brother, which had repeatedly ſerved as a pretext both for domeſtic commotions and foreign invaſions, Lewis convened an aſſembly of the three orders of the ſtate, at the city of Tourst. All the princes and nobles of the realm were invited to attend; and ſuch as did not chuſe to be preſent ſent their ambaſſadors and repreſentatives. The king, it is ſaid, named the perſons himſelf whom he wiſhed to be appointed deputies from the different towns; certain it is, that the aſſembly were wholly devoted to his will. The chancellor, Des Urſins, after a prefatory encomium on the nation, and its ſovereign, explained the motives which had induced the king to convene the repreſentatives of the ſtate, in order to conſult on the moſt efficacious means of enſuring the tranquillity of the kingdom. He expatiated on the impoſſibility of defraying the neceſſary expences of the government, if the extenſive province of Normandy were diſmembered from the monarchy, and aſſigned, as an apanage, to his majeſty's brother; obſerving, that the authors of thoſe troubles, by which the ſtate was convulſed, only ſought to render them perpetual, by urging that prince to perſiſt in a pretention which deprived the ſovereign of one-third of the revenues of the crown, and which opened to the enemy one of the moſt important barriers of the kingdom. The aſſembly betrayed no diſpoſition to deliberate or diſcuſs, but acted as if they had only met for the purpoſe of affording a ſanction to the reſolutions which had been previouſly adopted by the king‡. It was unanimouſly decided, "That the province of Normandy could "not, on any pretext whatever, be ſeparated from the domain of the crown; "that, ſince its reunion to the body of the monarchy, the ſovereigns had depri-"ved themſelves, by an irrevocable law, of the power of alienating it; that "Charles the Wiſe had fixed the apanage of a king's ſon at an eſtate producing "twelve thouſand livres a year, and conferring the title of Duke or Count; that "his majeſty, by adding a penſion of ſixty thouſand livres tournois, had given "an uncommon proof of his affection for his brother, and that he ſhould be ur-"gently entreated to declare, that his conduct, in that reſpect, ſhould never be "conſidered as a precedent." It wasthen determined, that the duke of Burgundy, and the other princes of the blood, ſhould be invited to confirm the reſolution of ‡ Nothing can ſet the mean obſequiouſneſs of this ſervile aſſembly in a ſtronger point of view, than the conſideration of their conduct with regard to the king's brother. The duchy of Normandy had been ceded to prince Charles, by the treaty of Conflans; he had ſtrictly complied with the terms of that treaty; he had ſworn to obſerve it; he had renewd his oath when called on by the king for that purpoſe; and he had commited no one act which could, even by the ingenuity of malice itſelf, be conſtrued into an inſtance of diſloyalty: yet had Lewis, in violation of a ſolemn oath, and without the ſmalleſt provocation, commenced hoſtilities againſt him, diſpoſſeſſed him, and treated his adherents as rebels. though every member of the aſſembly was acquainted with theſe circumſtances, not one of them had the ſpirit or honeſty to ſtand forward and avow the truth: on the contrary, they all united in giving their ſanction to the perjury of their ſovereign, and, by equivocation and falſehood, to juſtify what it was their duty to condemn.

the ſtates, with regard to the appanage of prince Charles. The conduct of the duke of Brittany was loudly cenſured: he was accuſed of ſeducing and detaining the king's brother; of taking ſeveral towns in Normandy; and of maintaining a criminal correſpondence with the Engliſh, the ancient and irreconcileable enemies of France. Each of theſe attempts was ſtated to amount to high-treaſon; and the aſſembly unanimouſly decreed, that the duke ſhould be ſummoned to reſtore the places he had uſurped; that in caſe he ſhould refuſe, and that ſufficient proof of his alliance with the Engliſh ſhould be obtained, the king ſhould immediately declare war againſt him. Before the aſſembly was diſſolved, the members promiſed to devote their lives and fortunes to the promotion of the king's deſigns*.

While the ſtates were aſſembld at Tours, Charles de Melun, whoſe deſtruction had long been reſolved on by the king, was brought to trial, for having maintained a correſpondence with, and favoured the plans of, the confederated princes, during the time of the war for the publick good. Some other charges of inferor magnitude were preferred againſt him; and after an irregular trial, and a confeſſion, extorted by the pangs of the rack, he was ſentenced to die, and accordingly ſuffered decapitation.

On the concluſion of the truce, at the cloſe of the preceding campaign, it had been ſettled, that the princes ſhould ſend deputies to Cambray, to endeavour to reſtore tranquillity to the nation through the medium of a general convention. The king, who placed but little reliance on the ſucceſs of theſe conferences, thought of employing more efficacious means for enforcing the reſolutions adopted by the ſtates at Tours. He had the addreſs, in a prorogation of the truce which the conſtable had juſt negociated with the duke of Burgundy, to omit the duke of Brittany, who had always been included in every treaty as the ally of Charles; conſenting, at the ſame time, that no mention ſhould be made of the Liegeois. The duke's conduct in this reſpect did not proceed from neglect or indifference for an ally, whoſe intereſts he had hitherto conſidered as inſeparable from his own, but from a belief that the alliance which the duke of Brittany had recently concluded with the Engliſh monarch, would enable him, without farther aſſiſtance, to check the progreſs of the French arms.

A marriage having been agreed on in the preceding year between the duke of Burgundy and the princeſs Margaret, ſiſter to Edward the Fourth of England, Lewis had exerted his utmoſt influence with the court of Rome to prevent the projected alliance from taking effect; but all his endeavors for that purpoſe having proved ineffectual, and all the preliminaries being finally ſettled, the princeſs embarked at Margate, on the firſt of July, arrived next day at Sluys, and the nuptials were celebrated with great magnificence at Dam, on the ninth of that month†.

Edward, by his treaty with the duke of Brittany, had engaged to furniſh that prince with three thouſand archers for ſix months, on condition that all the conquered places ſhould be delivered to the Engliſh; but Lewis being appriſed of this convention, averted its effects, by the promtitude of his attacks. The French troops under the conduct of the Marquis de Pont, grandſon to the king of Sicily, entered Brittany, while the count of Rouſſillon completed the expulſion of the Bretons from Lower Normandy. The duke immediately aſſembled the provincial militia, and ſent a courier to haſten the departure of the Engliſh auxiliaries. The king, meanwhile, in order perſonally to mortify the duke, had confiſcated all the eſtates belonging to Antoniette de Maignelais, his fovorite miſtreſs, that were ſituated in France, and beſtowed them on Tanneguy du Chatel, of whoſe diſgrace ſhe had been the principal cauſe. The king by this act of injuſtice at once gratified his reſentment, and ſecured the attachment of a man, who was capable of rendering him eſſential ſervice.

The French army, daily encreaſing in numbers, continued to advance by rapid marches into the heart of Brittany. No ſuccours arrived, and the capture of Chantocé and Ancenis, two of the ſtrongeſt towns in his dominions, compelled the duke, however reluctantly, to ſubmit to ſuch terms as the king thought proper to impoſe on him. Some heſitation indeed was produced by the difficulty attending the appanage of prince Charles; but this was ſpeedily removed by the influence of Odet Daidie, lord of Leſcun, who had acquired an abſolute aſcendency over the mind of the prince, and who, being bribed by Lewis, perſuaded him to leave the ſettlement of his apanage to the duke of Calabria, and the conſtable Saint-Paul, and to accept the penſion which had been offered him, till ſuch time as a final arrangement could take place. The duke of Baittany then ratified the treaty, the conditions whereof had been ſettled by the French and Breton plenipotentiaries at Ancenis. He agreed to renounce all alliance whatever that was prejudicial to the king, not even excepting that with the duke of Burgundy. To give greater force to the treaty, it was agreed that the principal nobility on both ſides ſhould affix their ſeals to it.

During theſe tranſactions, the king was at Compiégne, employed in a negociation with the duke of Burgundy, who, on the news of the irruption of the French into Brittany, had reaſſembled his army, and advanced as far as Saint-Quentin. As ſoon as Lewis received the treaty of Ancenis, which was brought to him by a Breton herald, he forwarded it by the ſame meſſenger to the duke of Burgundy. Charles on receiving it could ſcarcely credit his ſenſes; he even threatened to puniſh the herald as an impoſtor; but when he found the proofs too ſtrong to be doubted, his ſurpriſe and indignation were extreme; he vented his rage in reproaches againſt the inſidious policy of Lewis, and the weakneſs of the duke of Brittany. Still, however, he appeared reſolved to purſue his enterpriſe; and the king was obliged to ſubmit to the degrading expedient of purchaſing a peace, for which the duke exacted the ſum of one hundred and twenty thouſand crowns of gold, half of which was paid immediately.

The king was always vain of his talents, and thought it impoſſible to reſiſt the ſuperiority of his genius in political negociations; Cardinal Balue, his favourite miniſter, encouraged this opinion, and endeavoured to perſuade his maſter, that if he could once obtain an interview with the duke of Burgundy, there could be no doubt but that he might turn it to his advantage, by the facility with which he could bend to his views a mind ſo greatly inferior to his own. The propoſal was too flattering to the vanity of Lewis, not to be adopted with eagerneſs; he therefore haſtened to inform the duke of Burgundy, that he was extremely anxious to terminate, by a perſonal conference, all the diſputes which ſtill ſubſiſted between them. Charles was by no means inclined to accept the propoſal; and, as the motive of his refuſal, he alledged his apprehenſions, that the Liegeois might again attack him. Cardinal Balue replied, that he ought to be above any apprehenſions of that kind, ſince in the laſt campaign he had diſarmed them, razed their walls, demoliſhed their fortifications, and totally diſabled them from attempting any thing to his prejudice——Yet the king had juſt ſent agents privately to Liege to excite the turbulent inhabitants of that town to renew hoſtilities againſt the duke; and to aſſure them, at the ſame time, that they might depend on receiving effectual aſſiſtance from France. The duke, however, ignorant of this circumſtance, was at length perſuaded to conſent to the interview; and Peronne, a town of Picardy, in his own poſſeſſion, was accordingly fixed on as the place of conference.

But the king, who had hitherto appeared ſo anxious to promote the interview, now began to heſitate. Some of his moſt faithful miniſters had repreſented to him the dangerous conſequences of the ſtep he was about to take; and on conſulting his own conſcience, he could find no motive for aſſurance. In ſhort, he was on the point of giving up his deſign, when Cardinal Balue, who had conducted the negociation, and was conſequently intereſted in its ſucceſs, uſed all the arguments he could think of to inſpire him with confidence. A letter which the king received at this juncture, from the conſtable, rendered the efforts of the cardinal ſucceſsful *. The count of Saint-Paul informed Lewis, that the duke of Burgundy was reſolved in future to have no other friend or ally than himſelf; and that, beſides thoſe general affairs, the diſcuſſion of which might be left to their miniſters, there were others of ſuch a private nature, that it would be neither ſafe nor proper to entruſt them to any agents whatever. By theſe ſolicitations was the moſt ſuſpicious and deceitful of mankind induced to commit himſelf to the faith of a prince, whom he had invariably endeavoured to delude, and againſt whoſe repoſe his inſidious machinations were at that very moment directed.

Lewis, having entruſted the count of Dammartin with the command of his troops, left Noyon at the beginning of October (1468), and arrived the ſame day at Peronne. He was accompanied by the duke of Bourbon; Peter of Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu; the archbiſhop of Lyons; the count of Perche; the conſtable; the lords of Laigle, Lyon, and Longueville; cardinal Balue; and his confeſſor, the biſhop of Avranches. A few ſervants, eighty archers of the Scotch guard, and ſixty horſe, compoſed his eſcort. On the road he was received by a body of two hundred lances, ſent by the duke of Burgundy to attend him; and that prince alſo went to meet the king. They entered the town, converſing together in a familiar manner, the king's hand being placed on the duke's ſhoulder. Lewis was conducted to an extenſive building, near the caſtle gate, which had been prepared for his reception.

Before the firſt day was paſt, the king began to be ſenſible of the danger into which his imprudence had betrayed him. The troops, which the duke had ordered to be raiſed in his duchy of Burgundy, arrived at Peronne ſoon after Lewis, under the conduct of the mareſchal of that province, who was the king's perſonal enemy. And, as if all thoſe whom he had reaſon to fear, had combined to torment him, Prince Philip of Savoy, whom he had ſo long detained in captiaity, in violation of his proffered word, and of the laws of hoſpitality, entered the town at the ſame time, accompanied by the lord of Lau, who had but juſt eſcaped from confinement; Poncet de la Riviere and Durfé, all ſworn enemies to Lewis. When he ſaw this formidable troop paſs under his window, he was unable to conceal his apprehenſions, nor could the duke by any means quiet him, till he aſſigned him an apartment in the caſtle. As that fortreſs was not ſufficiently ſpacious to contain all his retinue, he took with him only twelve attendants; ſo that he reſigned himſelf entirely to the duke's diſcretion, and deprived himſelf of every reſource, in caſe any attempt ſhould be made to abuſe his confidence. The two firſt days paſſed in conferences between the French and Burgundian miniſters. The king offered to accede to all the demands of the duke of Burgundy, provided that, when ſatisfied with the conditions which immediately affected his own intereſts, he would renounce every other alliance, and bind himſelf, by a ſimilar oath to that which the duke of Brittany had taken, to ſerve him againſt all men. The duke, however, poſitively rejected this condition, obſerving, that he could never think of forſaking his friends and allies.

While the agents on either ſide were employed in deviſing means for removing theſe difficulties, Lewis and Charles appeared perfectly ſattisfied with each other, and the mutual profeſſions of eſteem that paſſed between them, gave reaſon to hope, that a ſpeedy and effectual accommodation would be the conſequence of their interview; but a ſudden and unexpected event occurred to deſtroy theſe pleaſing hopes. The ambaſſadors whom the king had ſent to Liege to excite the inhabitants to take up arms, had fulfilled their commiſſion with alacrity and effect. Lewis, previous to his departure from Peronne, had diſpatched meſſengers with freſh orders to the Liegeois, enjoining them to ſuſpend the projected revolution *; but they arrived too late. The Liegeois, inflamed by his arts, and eager to retrieve the loſs, and to wipe out the diſgrace they had ſuſtained in the preceding campaign, had obeyed his ſummons with promptitude and zeal; and haſtening to Tongres, took poſſeſſion of that town, captured their biſhop, and maſſacred ſixteen canons of the cathedral in his preſence. The unhappy prelate had the mortification to ſee one of theſe eccleſiaſtics, for whom he entertained a particular friendſhip, torn to pieces by the barbarians, who amuſed themſelves by toſſing his palpitating limbs from one to another. The French ambaſſadors were preſent at the time; and not content with being paſſive ſpectators of theſe inhuman acts, they approved them by their ſmiles, and encouraged them by their exhortations.

Intelligence of this event was received at Peronne, on the third day after the king's arrival. Language, the moſt expreſſive would convey but an imperfect idea of the duke of Burgundy's rage: he openly accuſed the king, and after branding him for a perjured traitor, confined him to his apartment. In vain did Lewis call heaven to witneſs his innocence; in vain did he ſwear by The Lamb of God, (his favourite adjuration) that, ſo far from having contributed to the revolt of the Liegeois, if the duke of Burgundy would lay ſiege to that city, he would willingly aſſiſt him. His oaths and proteſtations were alike treated with contempt, and the duke breathed nothing but fury and revenge.

The king's life appears at this period to have been in imminent danger, as moſt of the officers who attended the duke of Burgundy endeavoured to aggravate his reſentment. The next day the duke aſſembled his council, when opinions were divided; ſome of the members adviſed him to make the king conſent to ſuch terms as beſt ſuited his intereſt; while others propoſed to keep him in captivity, to ſend for prince Charles, and to conclude a treaty, in which the intereſt of all the princes of the blood ſhould be equally conſulted. Commines obſerves, that he ſaw the courier ready to depart for Britany with letters to the duke of Normandy; but the duke changed his mind, and the deliberations were renewed.

Meanwhile the captive monarch, alternately preyed upon by fear and repentance, underwent by anticipation all the horrors of death. The dupe of his own miſtaken policy, he found himſelf in the power of an enemy, violent in his temper, and whoſe indignation he had excited by the moſt treacherous conduct. The author of his own deſtruction, the ſhame he experienced at having, himſelf, laid the ſnare into which he had fallen, encreaſed the acuteneſs of his feelings. The ſight of the tower of Peronne, which he could ſee from his windows, made him ſhudder; it was the very place in which the unhappy Charles the Simple had been confined by Herbert, count of Vermandois. Reduced to this dreadful extremity by his own imprudence, he ſpared no pains to repair the error he had committed. He diſtributed large ſums of money among thoſe officers whoſe opinions were moſt likely to influence the duke of Burgundy, by which means he engaged them to preſent his propoſals. He offered to ſubmit to any conditions which the duke might wiſh to impoſe, and to deliver, as hoſtages, for his obſervance of the treaty, the duke of Bourbon and his brother, the count of Saint-Paul, and ſeveral other noblemen. He required that, after the treaty ſhould be ſigned, he ſhould be permitted to retire to Compiégne, whence he engaged to ſend to the Liegeois, and either make them repair the diſorders they had committed, or elſe declare war againſt them. The hoſtages ſeemed to conſent to his propoſals; but Commines, who knew both them and the king, was of opinion, that had they been put to the trial, they would have retracted; and that the king himſelf would have made no ſcruple to break his engagements, and leave them expoſed to the reſentment of the duke of Burgundy. The ſame author, who was at that time chamberlain to the duke, inſinuates, that he was one of thoſe who moſt contributed to moderate the anger of Charles; and this act of friendſhip was afterwards acknowledged by Lewis himſelf.

At length the duke was prevailed on to conſent to an accommodation, the plan of which was immediately preſented to the king, who, after ſome heſitation, ſigned it. But ſtill the danger was not over; Charles, agitated by the moſt violent paſſions, paſſed the third night without undreſſing: he threw himſelf from time to time on the bed; then, ſuddenly ſtarting up, walked to and fro in the room, followed by Commines, who waited for a favourable moment to quell the violence of his tranſports. In the morning his anger ſeemed to be raiſed to the higheſt pitch; he broke out into threats, and appeard prepared to proceed to the moſt dreadful extremities. After pauſing a ſhort time, he ruſhed out of the room, and repaired to the king's apartment; where Lewis, who had been informed of all his motions, was waiting his determination, in a ſtate of anxiety inconceivably wretched. Neither the looks nor geſtures of the duke were calculated to inſpire him with confidence. With a gloomy, but determined countenance, Charles approached, and aſked him, Whether he meant to fulfil the treaty of peace which he had ſigned, and whether he was prepared to bind himſelf by an oath to obſerve it? The monarch, without heſitation, replied in the affirmative. Charles, continuing his interrogations, next enquired, Whether he was determined—agreeably to the offer he had made—to accompany him to Liege, and to aſſiſt him in puniſhing the Liegeois for the inſults offered to him, as well as to all the royal family of France, in the perſon of the biſhop of Liege, who was brother to the duke of Bourbon? The king promiſed to accompany him, and to aſſiſt him in extirminating his ancient allies with any number of troops which the duke ſhould think requiſite. Every obſtacle to an accommodation being now removed, both princes ſwore, on the croſs of Charlemagne, which was called *The Croſs of Victory, to fulfil the terms of the treaty.

The treaty of Peronne was in fact only a renewal of the treaty of Arras, with the addition of ſuch articles of the treaty of Conflans as had not yet been fulfilled. The king, however, farther conſented, by the preſent convention, that the duke of Burgundy ſhould be at liberty to maintain any alliance which he had contracted with the king of England, provided only, that he ſhould not afford any aſſiſtance to that monarch in caſe he ſhould invade France; he alſo releaſed the duke from the obligation of homage for all the territories which had been ceded to him by the treaty of Conflans. In caſe of any violation of the preſent treaty, on the part of the king, it was ſtipulated, that the duke of Burgundy ſhould be abſolved from his oath of allegiance, and exempted from all the duties of vaſſalage; and, that the princes who guaranteed the treaty, releaſed from all obligation to their ſovereign, ſhould be at liberty to join the duke; who on his ſide conſented, in caſe he ſhould fail to fulfil his engagement, that all his dominions ſhould be confiſcated and annexed to the crown.

The appanage of prince Charles, brother to the king, was ſettled at the ſame time, Lewis conſidered it as a ſingular favour, that the duke of Burgundy no longer inſiſted on the ceſſion of Normandy, but contented himſelf with demanding for his friend the provinces of Champagne and Brie. The fact is, that the duke had been led to change his mind in this reſpect, from the recent conduct of his ally, the duke of Brittany, in being frightened into a treaty without waiting for his aſſiſtance. He was aware that the king would always be able to recover Normandy with the ſame facility, and that it would not be poſſible for him to prevent it. This conſideration induced him to believe, that it would be more advantageous to him to procure for the prince the provinces of Champagne and Brie, which would ſecure him a communication between his dominions in the Low Countries, and his duchy of Burgundy. This matter being ſettled, the treaty was ſent to prince Charles, and the duke of Brittany, in order to obtain their acceſſion to ſuch articles as concerned themſelves.

Lewis and Charles now began their march to Liege; and, as that town was ſaid to be in no condition to ſtand a ſiege, it was propoſed, in a council of war, to diſmiſs a part of the troops. Lewis ſupported the propoſal, but it was rejected by the duke; and the event proved the wiſdom of his conduct. The Liegeois having received intelligence of the king's detention, and its conſequences, became ſenſible of their error, when too late to repair it. They now ſaw themſelves expoſed to the rage of a prince whom they had offended beyond all hopes of forgiveneſs, by a repetition of injuries the moſt groſs, and by perpetual violations of treaties the moſt ſolemn. In this emergency they had recourſe to their biſhop, whom they releaſed from captivity, on condition of becoming their mediator with the duke of Burgundy. As their reconciliation was cemented by intereſt, its ſincerity cannot be doubted; for, if the town was drſtroyed, the prelate muſt loſe all he poſſeſſed.

But all the prayers and ſolicitations of the biſhop were ſternly rejected by Charles, who had determined to inflict an exemplary vengeance on that ferocious and turbulent people. The ſituation of the Liegeois had now become deſperate: hopeleſs of aſſiſtance; deſtitute of regular troops; and even unprovided with fortifications, they had no other reſource but what their own courage could ſupply. Their whole garriſon conſiſted of ſix hundred militia, from the diſtrict of Franchemont, a ſmall country in the territory of Liege. With theſe forces they reſolved to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity. This reſolution, indeed, was the effect of neceſſity; for they could expect no quarter, ſince they knew that the duke had made a vow to exterminate them.

The mareſchal of Burgundy, who commanded the advanced guard, had eſtabliſhed his quarters in one of the ſuburbs, where he was attacked by the Liegeois, who made a ſally, under the conduct of John Wild, provoſt of the city, and ruſhed on the Burgudians with ſuch reſiſtleſs impetuoſity, that they bore down all before them: after killing eight hundred, and putting the infantry to flight, Wild retreated in good order, and died, two days after, of the wounds he received in the action. The death of this brave man, the only perſon in the town who was capable of acting as a commander, proved an irreparable loſs to the Liegeois.

The news of this check, of which an exaggerated account was conveyed to the duke of Burgundy at Namur, induced that prince to haſten his march. The ſeaſon was far advanced; the weather was extremely cold; the autumnal rains had rendered the roads almoſt impaſſable, and the troops were encamped in the environs of the city, on a marſhy ground, where they were compelled, in ſome places, to make a circuit of three leagues, in order to keep up the communication between the different poſts. The troops were exhauſted with fatigue, and in want of proviſion, ſo that the duke of Burgundy was almoſt as unable to form a ſiege, as the Liegeois were to ſuſtain one. On the firſt night after his arrival, that prince was attacked in the ſuburbs where he had fixed his reſidence; and though he defended himſelf with great valour, he would have had ſome difficulty in repulſing the enemy, but for the timely arrival of the king, who haſtened to his aſſiſtance with three hundred men at arms, and the archers belonging to his guards, which were the only troops he had been ſuffered to bring with him.

The day after this action, Lewis took poſſeſſion of a ſmall houſe in the ſupurbs, which was only ſeperated from the duke's quarters by a barn, where three hundred Burgundian men at arms were poſted, at once to watch the enemy and the king. The two princes, though apparently reconciled, were ſtill miſtruſtful of each other; Lewis was apprehenſive, that if the Liegeois ſhould prove victorious, the duke would wreak his vengence upon him; and Charles was afraid that the king would take an opportunity to eſcape, or, perhaps attack him in the rear while he was fighting the enemy. Theſe mutual ſuſpicions ocaſioned the aſſault to be delayed, although the ſeverity of the ſeaſon called for the moſt ſpeedy and deciſive meaſures.

Meanwile the inhabitants of Leige, conceiving it impoſſible to prevent the deſtruction of the town, were careful to provide for their perſonal ſafety by a timely departure. Eight days paſſed in trifling ſkirmiſhes, which only tended to fatigue the troops, who, with the duke, remained under arms during the whole time. At length Charles in oppoſiton to the king's advice, reſolved to make a general aſſault; and the army had orders to reſt that day, and to be in readineſs to commence the attack the next morning at eight o'clock. The Liegeois having received advice of this reſolution, determined to anticipate the attack and to profit by that interval of repoſe to execute a plan, which notwithſtanding its temerity had nearly been juſtified by its ſucceſs. In the midle of the night, the ſix hundred militia, all that now remained to defend the place, men of intrepid ſouls, reſolved to conquer or to die, fallied forth from the town, with intent to ſeize the perſons of the king and the duke of Burgandy. The landlords of the two houſes in which thoſe princes were quartered, ſerved them for guides; the night was extremely dark, and as they marched through a hollow way, cut out of a rock, which led from the town to the ſuburb, they paſſed unperceived, and, after they had maſſacred a few centinels, by whom they were challenged, they arrived at the appointed place, where the moſt perfect ſilence and ſecurity prevailed. They muſt infallibly have ſucceeded in their attempt, if they had not ſtopped at a tent which was occupied by the count of Perche, ſon to the duke of Alençon. They ſoon became ſenſible of their error, but it was too late to repair it: the critical moment was paſt; the noiſe they made had ſpread the alarm; and the three hundred men at arms, who were poſted in the barn, were prepared to receive them. The Liegeois ſtill loſt more time, in attempting to force theſe troops; and when they came to attack the two houſes, the king and the duke of Burgundy, whom a quarter of an hour before they might have ſurpriſed in their beds were armed, and in a condition to ſuſtain the firſt ſhock, and to defend themſelves till their troops ſhould come to their relief. On one ſide, deſpair at having ſuffered ſo glorious an opportunity to eſcape, and the greatneſs of the danger on the other, rendered the combat dreadful; and for ſome minutes the victory was doubtful. As Lewis and Charles had only a part of the guards with them, all they could do was to prevent the enemy from forcing their apartments. Even this was a matter of extreme difficulty, and, in ſpite of their utmoſt exertions, the landlord of the houſe where Lewis was quartered, burſt open the door, and made his way to the king's chamber, where he was killed: the monarch, on this occaſion, diſplayed great perſonal courage, and being ably ſeconded by the archers of his Scotch guards, he drove the enemy back; while the duke of Burgundy was equally ſucceſsful on his part. The ſound of arms, the uncertainty whence the danger proceeded, or who was the enemy; the repeated cries of "Long live the king; long live the duke "of Burgundy! kill, kill!" the darkneſs of the night, all tended to encreaſe the confuſion of this dreadful ſcene. The Liegeois, now certain of being defeated, fought like men in deſpair, nor did they ſhrink from the unequal conteſt, till every one of them was maſſacred. The king and the duke of Burgundy met ſword in hand in the middle of the ſtreet, at the head of their reſpective guards; the ſuſpicions which each had entertained of the other, as being the author of this unexpected attack, now vaniſhed, and, after reciprocal congratulations on their happy eſcape, they parted with mutual ſatisfaction.

The duke immediately called a council, in which it was determined to make a general aſſault at the appointed time. The king, who had not been preſent when this reſolution was adopted, ſpared no pains to diſſuade the duke from putting it in force, as well from the wiſh to procure favourable terms for a people whom he was the means of bringing into their preſent perilous ſituation, as from the dread that Charles might make him anſwerable for the conſequences, ſhould he fail in his attempt. But the remonſtrances which the duke's principal confidents, who had been bribed by Lewis, made on the ſubject, were ſo ill received, that they were not tempted to renew them; Charles obſerved, tha nothing ſhould engage him to defer his attack on a town that had neither gates nor walls; that ſuch advice could only be the effect of ill-timed fear, or of a deſign formed to betray him; that the king, however, was at liberty to retire to Namur, and there wait till the town was taken. When the duke's anſwer was reported to Lewis, he replied, "That he would not go to Namur, but remain "where he was, to ſhare the dangers of the day."

While the duke was employed in adopting ſuch meaſures as he thought requiſite to enſure ſucceſs to his plan, ſuch of the Liegeois as had not fled haſtened to leave the town, taking with them as many of their effects as they were able to carry. In ſhort, none were left behind, but old men, women and children, and thoſe whom extreme indigence had rendered, in a manner, inſenſible to the general miſery. That ſuperb city, which but a few months before had reſounded with the rude clamours of ſedition, was now buried, as it were, in conſternation and ſilence. When the troops advanced to the attack, they met with none to oppoſe them; the wretched inhabitants who ſtill remained in the town had fled for ſhelter to the churches; vainly imagining to obtain, from the ſacredneſs of the place, ſecurity againſt the brutal attempts of a licentious ſoldiery.

The town was reſigned to pillage; every diſorder that uſually occurs on ſuch occaſions was committed; every ſpecies of violence which the imagination can conceive was practiſed. Lewis, from the windows of the epiſcopal palace, whither he had retired, beheld the horrid ſcene of deſolation; while his ears were aſſailed by the groans of murdered age, and the ſcreams of violated chaſtity. Conſcious, as he muſt be, that he was the principal author of theſe calamities, his mind, unleſs he were callous to the common feelings of human nature, muſt have been a prey to reflections the moſt horrid; but, faithful to his maxims of policy, he concealed his ſhame and remorſe beneath an appearance of ſerenity, of which no one was the dupe. He dined with the utmoſt tranquillity during the tumult, and expreſſed the greateſt ſatisfaction at the ſucceſs of the day. He launched out into the moſt extravagent commendations of the duke of Burgundy's wiſdom and proweſs; and, leſt they ſhould not be faithfully reported to Charles, he took care to repeat them in his preſence.

A few days after the reduction of Lege, the king ventured to aſk permiſſion to retire; telling the duke, that if he had any farther occaſion for him, he begged he might not be ſpared, but that if that was not the caſe, he ſhould wiſh to go to Paris, in order to regiſter their late convention in the court of parliament. He expreſſed a wiſh, at the ſame time, that they might meet again the following ſummer in Burgundy, and paſs a month together, faiſant bonne chere. Charles, however, was not to be deceived by theſe demonſtrations of friendſhip; Commines, who was preſent, ſays, that he had frequent ſtarts of ill-humour, and could ſeldom refrain from murmuring; yet he complied with the king's requeſt, contenting himſelf with ordering the treaty of Peronne to be again read to him before his departure, and with making him again ſwear to obſerve it. The duke accompanied the king to ſome diſtance from Liege, and when they parted, Lewis enquired of Charles what conduct he expected him to obſerve, if his brother ſhould not be ſatisfied with the counties of Champagne and Brie? "In that caſe," replied the duke," I ſhall "leave you to ſettle the matter by yourſelves, provided, however, that you find "the means of contenting your brother;" an important anſwer, which ſupplied the king with a pretext for eluding the execution of promiſes: but the duke, intent on higher ſchemes, diſdained ſuch vain ſubtilties, convinced of his own ability to make his rival true to his word.

Soon after the king's departure, the duke of Burgundy ordered the city of Liege to be demoliſhed, excepting only, from the general ruin, the churches, and the houſes belonging to the clergy. He then entered the diſtrict of Franchimont, and laid waſte the whole country.

Lewis, meanwhile, continued his march, with incredible rapidity, to the frontiers of his own dominions. The deputies from the parliament, and the other ſovereign courts, had received orders to meet him at Senlis, where the treaty he had concluded with the duke of Burgundy, was read to them by cardinal Balue; and, in order to avoid all remonſtrance on the ſubject, he ſtrictly enjoined them to regiſter it without reſtriction, and in the moſt authentic manner*. This appearance of honour proceeded from the influence of ſhame; he wiſhed to bury in oblivion the late tranſaction at Peronne, and could not ſupport the idea of becoming, from his own folly and imprudence, an object of public deriſion. The magiſtrates did not oppoſe his will, though they delayed to regiſter the treaty for upwards of four months. The proclamation of peace was followed by an ordinance, forbidding all perſons, under the ſevereſt penalties, to utter or publiſh any thing injurious to the honour of the duke of Burgundy.

So truly aſhamed was Lewis, at this period, of having become a dupe to his own arts, that he could not prevail upon himſelf to viſit the metropolis, with the volatile and inconſtant diſpoſition of whoſe inhabitants he was perfectly acquainted; though, in the preſent inſtance, he probably dreaded their propenſity to ridicule more than their promptneſs to revolt. Whether from a wiſh to divert the attention of the Pariſians to other objects, or from a whimſical curioſity to be informed of any jokes that might eſcape them, he ordered all their houſes to be ſearched, and all magpies, jays, and other birds, which ſhould be found there, to be ſeized; and the perſon who was employed to execute this ridiculous commiſſion, had orders to regiſter the names of the citizens, to whom the birds belonged, as well as the words which they had been taught to repeat. Some days after this ſingular ſeizure, he iſſued a proſcription againſt the ſtags, fawns, and cranes, which the citizens uſed to train up in their houſes, as domeſtic animals†.

† Villaret, tom. xvii, p. 319.—Mezeray, tom. p. 452—This laſt author is of opinion, that ſome Pariſian had taught his parrot to ſay, "Peronne," which induced the king to adopt this ſtrange mode of checking their raillery.

A. D. 1469] Though Lewis expreſſed his readineſs to comply with that article of the treaty of Peronne, which had ſtipulated for the ceſſion of Champagne and Brie to his brother, he ſecretly adopted every meaſure which could ſeem to render it illuſive; his agents found little difficulty to ſhake the reſolution of prince Charles, whoſe young mind was ſtill ſuſceptible of any impreſſions which his friends and confidents might ſeek to give it. The Lord of Leſcun, who afterwards enjoyed the title of count of Comminges, was his principal adviſer. This nobleman, being bribed by the king, repreſented to his maſter, that as he was the preſumptive heir to the throne, Lewis having yet no male child, it was his intereſt to reſiſt every effort that could tend to weaken the power, and curtail the influence of the crown; and Charles, perplexed by arguments more ſpecious than ſolid, was eaſily prevailed on to renounce all claims to the ceded provinces, and to accept, in lieu of them, the duchy of Guienne. As ſoon as the duke of Burgundy was appriſed of this negociation, he exerted himſelf with vigour to impede its concluſion. With this view he ſent ambaſſadors to Brittany, who repreſented to the prince, that the proximity of the Low Countries to Champagne would, at all times, enable him to receive aſſiſtance, ſhould his brother be induced, as heretofore, to give him diſturbance; whereas, by accepting, as his appanage, a province that was diſtant from the domains of his allies, he would effectually deprive himſelf of every reſource.

This affair engroſſed the attention of the courts of France and Burgundy for for ſome time. The king maintained, that ſo long as his brother ſhould remain in the power of his enemies, it would not be poſſible for him to enjoy one moment of repoſe; but while he was congratulating himſelf on the ſucceſs of his efforts to detach the prince from their intereſts, he detected an intrigue, the object of which was the deſtruction of all his plans. This incident amply confirms the obſervation we have before had occaſion to make, that it is as much the intereſt as it is the duty of ſovereigns to ſet an example of candour and juſtice to their ſubjects, and to be careful that, in the ſelection of friends and miniſters, purity of manners, rectitude of conduct, and integrity of mind, combine to juſtify their choice. The artful and hypocritical diſpoſition of Lewis had rendered perfidy and deceit the faſhionable vices of the court. Never were ſo many traitors ſeen in France as appeared during his reign. Though fully convinced of the ſuperiority of his penetration, never was prince ſo often deceived! He continually proſtituted his favour to thoſe who were unworthy to enjoy it, and raiſed thoſe to ſplendour and truſt, whom nature deſigned to remain in perpetual obſcurity. Cardinal Balue was now his prime miniſter and chief confident; the management of affairs, both domeſtic and foreign, was entruſted to him; and the king, ſuſpicious as he was, and jealous of his authority, would rather follow the advice of that prelate, than liſten to the perſuaſions of the princes of his blood, or of his moſt faithful ſervants. The reſult of this miſplaced confidence was ſuch as might naturally have been expected from a man deſtitute of principle, and inured to vice: his crimes, indeed, had firſt recommended him to the notice of Lewis; and, as he was apprehenſive that the reconciliation of that monarch with his brother, might effect a diminution of his own credit, he reſolved to prevent it. He had engaged William d'Harancourt, biſhop of Verdun, who was attached to prince Charles, to ſecond his deſign. The king, who made a point of bribing all thoſe who enjoyed his brother's confidence, ſpared no pains to gain this prelate to his intereſts; and the biſhop accordingly promiſed to comply with his wiſhes, though, at the ſame time, he was engaged in aſſiſting the cardinal to counteract them. While the two aſſociates were flattering themſelves with the idea that their perfidious machinations would prove ſucceſsful, and that their characters and their ſituation in life would exempt them from ſuſpicion, a ſervant belonging to the biſhop of Verdun was ſtopped with a packet of letters from cardinal Balue. Among theſe letters, written by the cardinal himſelf, (according to Commines) was one directed to the king's brother, exhorting him to accept no other appanage than that which the duke of Burgundy had obtained for him by the peace of Peronne. This letter was probably intended to be forwarded by ſome other perſon, ſince it is certain, that the meſſenger, when he left Tours, did not take the road to Brittany, and that he had other letters with him, addreſed to the duke of Burgundy, in which the duke was informed, that prince Charles was on the point of concluding an accommodation with his brother; that the king had ſigned a treaty with England and the duke of Brittany, merely with the view of directing his hoſtile operations againſt Flanders; and that if the duke wiſhed to avert the danger with which he was threatened, he had no time to loſe. He was adviſed to fortify his towns in Picardy, to perſuade the king's brother to retire to the Low Countries, and then openly to inſiſt on the full execution of the treaty of Peronne. He was aſſured, that, by the adoption of theſe meaſures, he would be enabled to impoſe ſuch terms as he might chuſe to preſcribe; that the time was favourable for the accompliſhment of his plans; that the counts of Foix and Armagnac were only waiting for a proper opportunity to declare themſelves; that the duke of Bourbon's loyalty was of a doubtful complexion, and that nothing would be more eaſy than to gain the conſtable. That nothing might be left unnoticed which could tend to irritate the duke of Burgundy, Balue gave him an account of all the attacks which the king made on his honour, affirming, that not a day paſſed but Lewis reproached him with the commiſſion of ſome groſs fault, or ſome flagrant crime.

The meſſenger was conducted to Amboiſe, where the court then reſided, and the letters were delivered to Lewis, the violence of whoſe indignation may be conceived from the nature of the offence. The two miniſters were immediately ſummoned to attend him, and they accordingly made their appearance with an air of confidence, that guilt, from long habit and impunity, is too apt to aſſume. But all their impudence forſook them as ſoon as the proofs of their crime were exhibited to their ſight. The culprits were firſt taken to Tours, and from thence were conveyed to the caſtle of Montbazon, where they were committed to the care of John d'Eſtouteville, lord of Torcy. All ſuch as were ſuſpected of being accomplices in their crime, or as were ſuppoſed to be able to throw any light on the ſubject, were likewiſe apprehended. Commiſſioners, preſided by the chancellor, were appointed to try them. The biſhop of Verdun, in the hope of moving the king to mercy, confeſſed his guilt; but cardinal Balue perſiſted for ſome time in his denial of the crimes that were laid to his charge, but finding the proofs too ſtrong to be reſiſted, he at length conſented to make a confeſſion, on condition that he ſhould obtain a pardon. This the king promiſed, but without any intention of keeping his word.

Balue acknowledged, that all the letters and memorials which had been intercepted, were written by him. His wretched ambition had led him to break through all ties of honour and honeſty, in order to maintain the credit he had acquired. By him the duke of Burgundy had been informed of all the ſecrets of government; he had adopted every plan which his ſagacity could deviſe for perpetuating the diſputes between prince Charles and his brother, for encreaſing the hatred which ſubſiſted between the king and the duke of Burgundy, and for extending the power of the latter, in order to render his own ſervices neceſſary to Lewis, and by that means to ſecure his continuance in office. He had encouraged the king to attend the fatal interview at Peronne, in order that the enmity between the two princes might become irreconcilable. He foreſaw the conſequences of that interview*, and he drew up the diſhonourable treaty to which it gave riſe. He, too, was the man who adviſed the duke of Burgundy to accept the king's propoſal to accompany him to Liege, and to make him adhere to it, in order that he might aſſiſt in the deſtruction of his own allies.

Crimes of this magnitude were certainly deſerving of the ſevereſt puniſhment, but the interference of the pope ſaved the lives of the culprits, who were confined in two iron cages, eight feet ſquare†, which they had themſelves invented. After a captivity of twelve years they both obtained their liberty, and the cardinal was even reinſtated in the biſhoprick of Angers, and in ſome other of his church preferments.

Soon after the detection of this plot, the king concluded the negociation with his brother, who, at length, was prevailed on to accept the duchy of Guienne, and to reſign all pretenſions to the more important provinces of Champagne and Brie. But before prince Charles left Brittany, he ſigned a private treaty with the duke, of which the king received immediate information, although he concealed his knowledge of it.

The two brothers were ſo miſtruſtful af each other's integrity, that precautions the moſt extraordinary were deemed requiſite to provide againſt he machinations of treachery and fraud. The croſs of Saint Lo, a ſacred relic, holden in the higheſt eſtimation, and to which the ſuperſtitious terrors of the age had attached the power of inflicting death, within the year, on any one who, after having invoked it to ſanction an oath, ſhould be guilty of perjury, was conveyed, with great ſolemniny, by two prieſts, from Angers to the epiſcopal palace at Xaintes; where the duke of Guienne ſwore by it, in preſence of the count of Dammartin, and others of the French nobility, never to make, himſelf, nor to conſent to the making by others, any attempt on the liberty or life of his brother, king Lewis *: he farther engaged never to liſten to any propoſal conconcerning his marriage with the princeſs Mary, daughter to the duke of Burgundy, without the expreſs and free conſent of his brother. Lewis, by impoſing this laſt condition on Charles, exacted from that prince a degree of ſubmiſſion, which, when dauphin, he himſelf had refuſed to pay to his father; though, it is certain, that the conſequences to be dreaded from ſuch an alliance juſtified his interpoſition, in the preſent inſtance.

† One of theſe iron cages which has preſerved the appellation of Cage Balue, is ſtill to be ſeen at the caſtle of Loches. Theſe horrid places of confinement were much in vogue during the reign of Lewis the Eleventh. That monarch cauſed a vaulted dungeon to be conſtructed at the caſtle of Pleſſis-les-Tours, immediately under his own ſtudy, ſo that he could diſtinctly hear the groans and complaints of the wretched priſoners. This dreadful abode of miſery was provided with an iron door, and the aperture for the admiſſion of light and air was extremely ſmall. The dungeon ſubſiſted ſo late as the middle of the preſent century. Nouvelles Obſervations ſur l'Hiſtoire de France.

After this agreement had taken place, the king propoſed an interview with his brother; for which purpoſe he cauſed a bridge to be conſtructed over the river Bron, near the caſtle of Charon; in the center whereof a loſy barrier was erected, with a grated window. Thither the king repaired, attended only by the duke of Bourbon; the lord of Bueil; Charles de Cruſſol, feneſchal of Poitou, and nine other perſons, all unarmed. His guard conſiſted only of four Scotch archers, without their bows and quivers. The reſt of his troops, to the number of four thouſand, were ſtationed at the diſtance of a mile from the bridge: the retinue of prince Charles was equally ſlender; he was welcomed, by Lewis, with profeſſions of eſteem and fraternal affection, but all his ſolicitations for permiſſion to paſs the barrier, were firmly rejected by the ſuſpicious monarch. The next day, however, they had a ſecond interview, in which none of thoſe precautions were obſerved. It paſſed, like the firſt, in abject ſupplications for pardon, on the one ſide, and the warmeſt teſtimonies of friendſhip and attachment on the other.

Prince Charles now viſited his new apanage, and could not forbear expreſſing his diſpleaſure at the limits which his brother had aſſigned to the duchy of Guienne; he found himſelf ſurrounded, on all ſides, by ſtrong fortreſſes, which, though properly belonging to the province, the king had reſerved for himſelf; the towns which had been ceded to him had, after the expulſion of the Engliſh, obtained ſuch conſiderable privileges, that the revenue of the duchy was reduced almoſt to nothing; Lewis, too, had taken from the prince the direct homage of the counts of Foix, Armagnac, and Albret, who had always holden immediately of the dukes of Guienne. By this new arrangement, the prince was deprived of his moſt powerful vaſſals, and his revenues were rendered inſufficient for the proper ſupport of his rank and conſequence, ſo that he was wholly expoſed to the mercy of the king, who might, whenever he choſe, deſpoil him of his apanage.

The complaints preferred by the prince, on this occaſion, greatly embarraſſed the king, who was determined to make no conceſſion which might prove a ſource of anxiety to himſelf, and who yet perceived the neceſſity of ſatisfying his brother*. In order to accompliſh this object, he conferred ſome farther favours on Charles, which, while they wore an appearance of liberality, could not fail to render odious the perſon who received them, ſince he muſt infallibly be ſuſpected of having ſolicited them. Lewis ceded to his brother the county of Soule, and the town of Mauleon, which were in poſſeſſion of the count of Foix; the diſtricts of Verdun and Riviere, with the county of Gaure, which he detached from the province of Languedoc; the ſovereignty of the counties of Eſtrac, Perdriac, and Bigorre; and, in order to increaſe the duke's revenue, he revoked the privileges which had been granted to the different towns in Guienne, and reſigned them to him in the ſame ſtate in which they were under the domination of the Engliſh. In return for theſe conceſſions, he exacted from his brother a formal renunciation not only of all his pretentions to the Limouſin, Angoumois, and Poitou, but likewiſe to the homage of the counts of Foix, Armagnac, and Albret; promiſing, at the ſame time, that if his future conduct was ſuch as he ſhould approve, he might depend on feeling, in a ſtill more extenſive degree, the effects of his liberality. The young prince, moved by theſe ſpecious profeſſions, promiſed all he deſired, and ſeemed reſolved to deſerve his confidence and eſteem.

But the principal difficulty was yet to be removed; Lewis had no male child; his brother, who was preſumtive heir to the throne, was of a proper age to be married, and the malecontents had urged him to caſt his eyes on the only daughter of the duke of Burgundy. From this, however, he had been deterred, by the interpoſition of Lewis, who now flattered him with the proſpect of obtaining the crown of Caſtile†. Henry the Impotent, the preſent king of Caſtile, had only one daughter, whoſe title to the crown no one could have diſputed, if the legitimacy of her birth had not been expoſed to ſerious doubts. It was reported, that Henry, who had, by exceſs of debauchery, deſtroyed his own powers of generation, anxious to have an heir, had introduced one of his favourites into the queen's bed, and that the princeſs Jane was the offspring of that infamous connection. This report obtained ſuch general credit, that the ſtates of the kingdom made no ſcruple, even during the king's life, to declare his ſiſter Iſabella ſole heireſs to the crown of Caſtle. From that moment the hand of Iſabella was eagerly courted by various princes; but Ferdinand, only ſon to the king of Arragon, was preferred to the reſt by the princeſs and her partiſans; though her brother Henry ſpared no pains to prevent an union with a prince, who, he feared, might become a too formidable neighbour. Affairs were in this ſituation, when Lewis ſent the cardinal of Albi to Madrid, to propoſe the marriage of the duke of Guienne with one of the two princeſſes. He had orders firſt to aſk the hand of Iſabella, but if his ſuit were rejected, to conclude an alliance with Jane; only exacting from her father a promiſe, that he would publicly acknowledge her for his daughter and heireſs. Henry liſtened to the ambaſſador's propoſals, without betraying any diſpleaſure at the preference that was given to his ſiſter over his daughter; and he permitted the cardinal to apply to Iſabella for her conſent to the marriage. The princeſs, however, who had retired to Madrigal, where her partiſans were aſſembled, not only rejected the propoſals of the French ambaſſador, but, in diſobedience to the orders of her brother, celebrated her marriage with Ferdinand. The cardinal then proceeded, in compliance with his inſtructions, to demand the hand of Jane, and to exact from Henry a public acknowledgment of her legitimacy; with which demands the Caſtilian monarch chearfully complied.

This embaſſy alarmed the enemies of Lewis; and the duke of Burgundy, aware of the importance of interrupting that harmony which ſeemed to ſubſiſt between the two brothers, preſſed the duke of Guienne to accept the hand of his daughter; though he by no means intended to beſtow it on him*. Lewis, who had ſpies in all the neighbouring courts, was ſoon apprized of the duke of Burgundy's intentions; and as he knew the mind of his brother to be weak and irreſolute, he immediately diſpatched de Bueil, du Bouchag, and Doriole to remonſtrate with him on the impropriety of confiding in the promiſes of a prince who under the ſpecious maſk of friendſhip, endeavourcd to diſmember the monarchy, and probaly hoped to get poſſeſſion of the throne. Soon after this, the count of Saint Paul, brother to the conſtable, and the lord of Remiremont, arrived at the court of the duke of Guienne, as ambaſſadors from the duke of Burgundy. They complimented the prince on the acquiſition of his new appanage, and enquired whether the king had fulfilled all the conditions of the treaty of Peronne; they then complained of certain reports which had been propagated to the prejudice of their maſter, accuſing him of having been deſirous to ſecure the king's perſon for a time, in order to have a favourable opportunity for deſtroying his brother. They obſerved, that the duke's conduct ſet him too far above imputations of that nature, to permit him to believe that he ſtood in need of juſtificaton; all his actions tended to demonſtrate, that he had ever had the intereſts of the prince, his ally, more at heart than his own; and in order to prove, they ſaid, the warmth of his friendſhip, in a manner more unequivocal, their maſter had ſent him the order of the Golden Fleece, with an offer of his daugther's hand, and the liberty of fixing the terms on which their alliance ſhould be contracted.

The duke of Guienne, after he had privately conferred with his brother's ambaſſadors, on the ſubject of theſe propoſals, replied to the count of Saint Paul and the lord of Remiremont, that he was highly obliged to his couſin, the duke of Burgundy, for this new mark of attention; that having met with nothing that ſuited him in the different treaties which had been made for ſettling his apanage, he had accepted the duchy of Guienne, where he lived contented; that the reports of which the duke complained had never reached his ears, and, he was convinced, they were wholly undeſerving of attention; that having been honoured by his brother with the collar of the order of Saint Michael, he neither would nor could wear any other; that he was fully ſenſible of the advantages of the propoſed alliance, but that he could not contract an engagement of that nature without the king's conſent; that he was reſolved, in future, to be the friend of his friends, and the enemy of his enemies; and not doubting that the duke of Burgundy entertained the ſame ſentiments, he ſhould certainly preſerve his friendſhip for him.

This anſwer, ſo far from being ſatisfactory in itſelf, was followed by a circumſtance, which ſeemed to promiſe an open rupture: the duke of Guienne, when the Burgundian ambaſſadors took their leave, neglected to make them the uſual preſents. Lewis triumphed at this circumſtance, and his joy encreaſed when he learnt that his brother was coming to pay him a friendly viſit. The queen, the ducheſs of Bourbon and her daughter, with every perſon of diſtinction then at court, went forth to meet the duke; the king loaded him with careſſes, and during the whole time that he remained at court, Lewis paid all the expences of his houſehold, and made conſiderable preſents to his officers; Garnier remarks*, that he did not even forget his waſherwoman, to whom he gave fifty crowns. Perhaps ſhe was handſome, and might therefore be ſuppoſed to poſſeſs ſome influence over the mind of her maſter.

In the midſt of amuſements, Lewis never loſt ſight of buſineſs; he now reſolved to profit by the favourable diſpoſition of his brother, to intereſt him in the re-eſtabliſhment of the ſovereign authority, in the ſouthern provinces†. Gaſcony was, at this time, divided between ſeveral potent vaſſals, whoſe ſituation, at the extremity of the kingdom, joined to the calamities of former reigns, had rendered them almoſt independent of the crown. At the head of the moſt ſeditious of theſe were the princes of Armagnac. John the Fifth, chief of this illuſtrious houſe, the moſt ancient in Europe, had excited the public indignation by revolting againſt his ſovereign; by his marriage with his own ſiſter, and by the depredations and other acts of violence which he continually committed on his neighbours; he kept a ſtanding army, and being unable to ſupport them by other means, he ſuffered them to commit what devaſtations they choſe on the ſurrounding country. While the king was in confinement at Peronne, he had ſecretly endeavoured to perſuade the Engliſh monarch to attempt the recovery of Guienne, offering to admit him into all the towns in his poſſeſſion, and to join the Engliſh with fifteen thouſand diſciplined troops; but having failed in his efforts to ſtimulate Edward to this enterpriſe, he had maintained a criminal correſpondence with the enemies of the ſtate, and fomented new diſorders in the interior parts of the kingdom. Lewis, appriſed of theſe attempts, but unable, at the time, to apply an effectual remedy, offered the count ten thouſand livres to diſmiſs his troops. The count took the money, but kept his men. This conduct rouſed the king's reſentment, and he had now an additional cauſe for anxiety; he was afraid that the count of Armagnac, notwithſtanding the precautions he had taken to prevent him, would have art enough to inſinuate himſelf into the good graces of the duke of Guienne, by chuſing him for his Lord Paramount, and would, by that means, ſooner or later, excite him to revolt. Lewis, while he carefully concealed this laſt ſubject of apprehenſion from his brother, repreſented to him of what conſequence it was to the good order and tranquillity of the ſtate, not to ſuffer ſuch attempts to paſs with impunity; and, for the purpoſe of engaging him to ſecond his views, he promiſed to augment his appanage with the ſpoils of the culprit. He then ſent the count of Dammartin, with a ſtrong body of forces, to execute his orders, after inveſting him with more ample powers than ever were eutruſted by a monarch to a ſubject. Dammartin was authoriſed to receive informations againſt the rebel and all his accomplices; to confiſcate their property; to prohibit the count of Foix, the lord of Albret, and the duke of Nemours, from raiſing troops, in future, without an expreſs commiſſion from the king: in ſhort, he was empowered to diſpoſe, at his pleaſure, of the eſtates and effects of the parties accuſed; to puniſh, pardon, or reward. The king promiſed to ratify all the proceedings of his general.

At the approach of a formidable army, commanded by an experienced captain, the count of Armagnac loſt his courage, and only thought of providing for his own perſonal ſafety, by retiring into the territories of his ally, the king of Arragon. The garriſons and inhabitants of the different towns, finding themſelves forſaken, only reſiſted long enough to ſecure their pardon and the preſervation of their privileges, ſo that Lewis, in a very ſhort time, and without bloodſhed, obtained poſſeſſion of the whole country.

By the count of Armagnac's precipitate flight, the duke of Nemours was left to ſuſtain the whole weight of the monarch's reſentment. This nobleman, ſon to Bernard d'Armagnac, governor to Lewis, had been brought up with the king, and was long honoured with his favour: he had even been created duke and peer of France, an honour which was, in thoſe days, confined to the princes of the blood. But theſe marks of friendſhip having proved inſufficient to ſecure his attachment, he had ſtood forward as one of the moſt zealous promoters of the league for the public good. Surrounded in the Bourbonnois, and reduced to the neceſſity of negociating with the king, he had ſworn, on the croſs of Charlemagne, to obſerve an inviolable fidelity towards him; yet, in violation of his oath, he had joined the army of the confederated princes at the ſiege of Paris; and at the councils, which were holden under the walls of the capital, he had ever adviſed the rejection of all moderate meaſures. Compelled to acquieſce in the treaty which put an end to that conteſt, he had again ſworn, on the Crown of Thorns, and all the ſacred relics contained in the royal chapel, that nothing ſhould, in future, induce him to ſwerve from his attachment to the king; and that, ſhould he ever be apprized of any plot againſt his ſacred perſon, he would inſtantly reveal it: this oath was no better obſerved than the former. The duke had been an accomplice in all the acts of violence committed by the count of Armagnac, the head of his houſe; and Lewis, enraged at ſuch repeated inſtances of perfidy, had cauſed him to be declared guilty of high-treaſon, and publicly proclaimed a traitor. Dammartin now advanced with his troops in order to enforce this ſentence, while Nemours, juſtly alarmed at his ſituation, employed the protection of thoſe very men who had been ſent to puniſh him. He was allied to the houſe of Bourbon; three of whoſe members, Gilbert de Bourbon, dauphin of Auvergne; Peter de Bourbon, lord of Beaujeau; and the baſtard of Bourbon, admiral of France, were with the royal army: theſe powerful friends, who were joined by the count of Dammartin, ſucceeded in their efforts to appeaſe the king's indignation; but while Lewis pardoned the paſt offences of the duke, all poſſible care was taken to deprive him of the ability to renew them.

It was ſtipulated, that if at any future period he ſhould violate the oath that was now exacted from him, he ſhould be liable to be tried even for the crimes for which he had received a pardon; that he ſhould not avail himſelf of his privilege as a peer, but muſt conſent to be tried as a private individual; that his lands and lordſhips ſhould be confiſcated, and irrevocably united to the crown; and, that all his officers, both civil and military, ſhould ſwear to obey him no longer than he himſelf ſhould continue to pay proper obedience to his ſovereign. Farther to enſure his fidelity, the king placed a garriſon of his own in moſt of his fortreſſes, which the duke was compelled to maintain. While Dammartin was employed in reducing to obedience the refractory vaſſals of the crown, the king ordered the parliament of Paris to proceed againſt the fugitive count of Armagnac; who was accordingly convicted of high treaſon, and all his property confiſcated; but Lewis, faithleſs to his word, diſtributed his eſtates among the principal officers who had ſerved in the expedition, and only aſſigned to the duke of Guienne the ſtrong fortreſs of Lectoure.

This ſtroke of authority, at a time when the king was ſuppoſed to be rendered incapable of any exertion of vigour, excited the moſt ſerious alarms at the court of Brittany*. That province was expoſed, from its ſituation, to the danger of a ſudden invaſion, ſimilar to that which had juſt completed the ruin of the houſe of Armagnac; the duke, therefore, haſtened to adopt ſuch meaſures as he deemed neceſſary for his own defence. He ſtrengthened the fortifications of his towns; he applied for aſſiſtance to England; he ſent ambaſſadors to the duke of Burgundy; and he endeavoured to communicate a portion of his own anxiety to all the neighbouring powers. In fact, Lewis would certainly have treated him with as little ceremony as the count of Armagnac, had the reduction of Brittany been a matter of equal facility with the confiſcation of that nobleman's territories; but that not being the caſe, he reſolved to humble the prince he could not ſubdue.

* Hiſtoire de Bretagne, par Lobineau.

As ſome pretext, however, was neceſſary for attacking him, he had recourſe to an expedient which no one but himſelf could have deviſed; this was, to ſend the duke the order of Saint-Michael (which Lewis had lately inſtituted:) if he accepted it, he muſt bind himſelf to the king by new oaths, the execution of which he would immediately be called on to fulfil; and if he refuſed it, his refuſal would be conſtrued into an affront, for which the king would demand ſatisfaction. Ambaſſadors were accordingly diſpatched to Brittany with the inſidious offer: the duke, extremely ſurpriſed, ſuffered ſome petulant expreſſions to eſcape him; but, on cool reflection, he rejected the proffered mark of diſtinction with firmneſs and reſpect: alledging, as the motive of his refuſal, that his unwillingneſs to contract an obligation, with the extent whereof he was unacquainted, had induced him to ſubmit the ſtatutes of the order of Saint-Michael to the examination of his council, who had found ſeveral of the articles—which he ſpecified—to be incompatible with his rank and privileges.

Lewis did not ſtop to diſcuſs the validity of theſe objections, but immediately cauſed a report to be propagated of a projected invaſion of Normandy by the Engliſh; and having collected the troops of the neighbouring provinces, he advanced to the frontiers of Brittany. The duke, perceiving his intentions, prepared to defend himſelf, and claimed the aſſiſtance of his allies. The duke of Guienne repreſented to the king, that after the engagements he had contracted with the duke of Brittany, he could not abandon him without covering himſelf with ſhame; he, therefore, exhorted him not to interrupt the harmony which prevailed in every part of his dominions, but to terminate, by a treaty, any diſputes which might have ariſen between him and the duke. This was all Lewis deſired; the French and Breton plenipotentiaries accordingly met at Angers, where a treaty was concluded, by which the duke of Brittany formally renounced every alliance which could tend to diſturb the tranquillity of the kingdom. Lewis inſiſted that all the Breton nobility ſhould gurantee the treaty, in the hope of alluring ſome of them to enter into his ſervice. Among thoſe who took this ſtep was the viſcount of Rohan, a young nobleman of the moſt promiſing abilities, who was afterwards ſo much diſtinguiſhed under the appellation of mareſchal de Gié.

A. D. 147c.] Three days after the concluſion of the treaty of Angers, the duke of Brittany concluded another treaty, at Etampes, with the duke of Burgundy*. Lewis, however, felt no anxiety on this account, as he flattered himſelf that he had effectually ſecured the attachment of the lord of Leſcun, who governed Brittany, while the duke paſſed his time in amorous dalliance with his fair miſtreſs, Antoinette de Magnelais.

The duke of Burgundy, however, continued to watch with attention all the motions of Lewis; and that monarch, when he aſſembled his troops to attack the duke of Brittany, having ſummoned ſeveral Burgundian nobles to ſerve in perſon in his army, under pain of losing the fiefs which they enjoyed in France, Charles took that opportunity to send an embassy to the French court. His ambassadors, Crequi, Carondelet, and Murin, complained of the conduct of the king's officers, in demanding the personal attendance of the Burgundian nobility, as a manifest violation of the treaty of Peronne; and of the attack made by the king on the duke of Brittany, who was in such strict alliance with the duke their master, that their cause was the same. The king, they said, could not plead ignorance of that alliance, since he had himself approved and confirmed it by the treaty of Peronne. On these two points, therefore, they demanded immediate and complete satisfaction.

Lewis, having heard their complaints, immediately dispatched Guy Pot, bailiff of Vermandois; William de Courcillon, and James Fournier, with his answer to the duke. On their arrival at the Burgundian court, they declared to Charles, that on a report being propagated of a projected invasion of Normandy by the English, the king had issued the usual orders to his vassals, without either specifying or excepting any person whatever; that nevertheless, it had not been his intention to molest the subjects of the duke; and that he had just given the most positive orders to prevent any such molestation.

"As to what has passed in Brittany," said the ambassador, "the king cannot "conceive what objections you can start to his conduct. Has he injured the duke "in any manner? Has he even threatened him? The duke alarmed himself "without reason; he was, probably, discontented with some of the clauses of "the treaty of Ancenis, and therefore besought the king to conclude a new "treaty. How did his majesty act on the occasion? Although he knows that the "duke is his subject; and that, after all, he is neither one of the first princes "of the blood, nor one of the most powerful vassals of the crown, yet he con-"descended to comply with his requests, and to give him this new mark of his "friendship. The treaty was concluded at Angers, where every point was "settled by mutual consent.

"After having thus answered your complaints," pursued the ambassador, "permit the king to ask you, in his turn, What he ought to think of the warmth "with which you espouse the quarrels of the duke of Brittany? What relation "have the duchies of Burgundy and Brittany to each other? On what is this "strange union founded, and what can be its object? The king himself, you say, "acknowledged its validity, by signing the treaty at Conflans: you certainly "know, that the king entered a protest against that treay, which he declared null "and abusive, as being the work of violence and rebellion. If, notwithstanding "its invalidity, the king has still inviolably fulfilled every article which relates to "yourself, you must regard his conduct, in this respect, as a flattering distinction, "for which you ought to be obliged to him; but which cannot, by any means, "authorise you to demand its observance in every point. Let us suppose, how-"ever, for a moment, that this treaty exists in full force, and has not been "affected by subsequent treaties; what advantage can you expect to derive from

" it? Though the duke of Brittany and yourſelf engaged mutually to aſſiſt " each other, yet both of you ſwore allegiance and obedience to the king, " your ſovereign. Which of the two oaths ought to be moſt reſpected? One " is only an arbitrary convention, ſubordinate to a firſt engagement; while the " other is a ſacred duty, contracted at your birth, not to be diſpenſed with on " any account, not to be limited by any other convention; a duty, in ſhort, in- " herent in the domain, in the rank, and in the perſon. The nearer a ſubject is " placed to the throne, by his birth and dignities, the ſtronger are the engage- " ments which he contracts with his ſovereign; and what man in France has en- " gagements of more importnnce than the duke of Burgundy, a prince of the " blood, and the firſt peer of the realm?

" Recollect your origin, prince, and the titles on which your greatneſs is " founded, and you will then feel more ſenſibly the whole extent of your duties: " the air which you breathe, the rank which you enjoy, the power to which " you have atained—you are indebted for them all to the monarchs of France. " King John conferred the duchy of Burgundy on the founder of your family: " Charles the Wiſe obtained for him the heireſs of Flanders; and in order to " facilitate the marriage, he generouſly ceded to him the towns of Douai, Lille, " and Orchies. Yet, notwithſtanding theſe advantages, the dukes of Burgundy " never would have maintained the dignity to which they had been exalted, had " not Charles the Sixth gone in perſon to ſubdue the Flemiſh rebels, and to " re-eſtabliſh your grand-father in the poſſeſſion of his dominions. Services of " ſuch importance cannot be ſo ſoon effaced from your memory; but, were " it neceſſary to recall them to your mind, and to adduce the moſt authentic " proofs in ſupport of our aſſertions, we need only to refer to the archives of " the chamber of accounts at Paris, where thoſe proofs have been carefully " preſerved. But, in reminding you, prince, of the benefactions of his an- " ceſtors, the king has no intention of reproaching you: on the contrary, he " is ready to confer freſh favours on you, whenever, from a due attention to " your real intereſts, you ſhall convince the French, that you have not forgotten " who you are, nor from whom you are deſcended."

As ſoon as the ambaſſador had concluded his ſpeech, Hugonet, bailiff of Charolois, began a methodical reply; but the duke, tired with his prolixity, interrupted him, and finiſhed the anſwer himſelf. " The king," " ſaid Charles, reminds " me that I am of the blood of France: is not the duke of Brittany, then, " whoſe deſtruction he has reſolved on, of the ſame blood? He declares, that " he has entered a proteſt againſt the treaty of Peronne; as if the faith of " treaties could be annulled by ſuch vain formalities. He has, doubtleſs, forgot- " ten that precious maxim of one of his anceſtors—That, though good faith were " baniſhed from the reſt of the earth, ſhe ought ſtill to retain her habitation in the breaſt " of princes." He adds, " That I owe him loyalty and obedience; but do the " titles he has aſſumed give him the right to excite my ſubjects to revolt, " and to take under his protection all the criminals in my dominions? He relates

" the ſervices which his anceſtors have rendered to mine; but does he then make " no account of the ſervices of equal importance which mine have rendered to " his? Services by which they acquired, and deſerved the fortune which they " have tranſmitted to me, and of which he now wiſhes to diſpoſſeſs me. Will " he dare deny, that he has opened his dominions to the perfidious Liegeois, and " aſſigned them an eſtabliſhment on the frontiers of my provinces? How many " of them are now reſident in the county of Rhetel? Let him, therefore, no longer " hope to deceive me by artful ſpeeches, and deceitful profeſſions: the duke of " Brittany is my ally; and I will defend him!"

From ſuch warm remonſtrances on both ſides, the moſt ſerious conſequences were to be apprehended; but Lewis; who had already ſacrificed ſo much to obtain a peace, was reſolved not to engage in a war, unleſs with a certainty of conſiderable advantage. Fortune ſoon furniſhed him with ſuch an opportunity, and it came from a quarter whence he had leaſt reaſon to expect it.

Richard Nevile, the famous earl of Warwick, whoſe valour and popularity had ſo eminently contributed to the depoſition of his lawful ſovereign, and the elevation of his rival, the uſurper Edward, to the throne of England, being diſguſted with the conduct of the latter, had recently deſerted his cauſe, and was now labouring to deſtroy that very fabric which he had taken ſuch pains to erect. In the proſecution of this plan he was ſtrenuouſly ſupported by the duke of Clarence, (Edward's brother) who had married his eldeſt daughter, and who was highly diſcontended with the king for the decided preference which he gave to the queen's relations over his own. On the twenty-fourth of March, (1470) the Engliſh monarch publiſhed a long declaration at York, ſummoning his brother and Warwick to appear before him on the twenty-eighth, to anſwer to the charges which had been exhibited againſt them; and, as they did not chuſe to obey the citation, a ſecond declaration was publiſhed at Nottingham, on the thirty-firſt of March, proclaiming them rebels and traitors, offering rewards for apprehending them; and prohibiting all perſons, under the ſevereſt penalties, from aſſiſting them and their adherents*.

Clarence and Warwick, unable to reſiſt the ſuperior forces of Edward, were compelled to leave the kingdom; and having effected their eſcape to Dartmouth, they there embarked for Calais, of which Warwick was governor. The deputy governor, to whom the earl had entruſted the command of the place during his abſence, was one Vauclair, a Gaſcon, who ſeeing Warwick return in the deplorable ſtate of an exile, refuſed him admittance, and would not even ſuffer the ducheſs of Clarence to land, though ſhe had been taken in labour, and delivered of a ſon, on ſhip-board. With difficulty was permiſſion extorted from him to carry two flaſks of wine to the veſſel for her uſe; but as he was a man of ſagacity, he deemed it prudent to make a ſecret apology to Warwick, whom he aſſured, that his conduct was entirely influenced by motives of perſonal regard and zeal for his ſervice. He ſaid, that the fortreſs was ill-ſupplied with proviſions; that he could place no reliance on the fidelity of the garriſon; that the inhabitants, deriving their principal means of ſubſiſtence from their commercial intercourſe with England, would certainly declare for the eſtabliſhed government; that the place, in its preſent ſituation, was unable to reſiſt the attacks of the duke of Burgundy on the one hand, and thoſe of England on the other; and that, by ſeeming to preſerve his loyalty to Edward, he ſhould acquire the confidence of that prince, and ſtill keep it in his power, when a proper opportunity ſhould occur, to reſtore Calais to its ancient maſter. Whatever were the real intentions of Vauclair, his conduct was ſo highly approved both by Edward and the duke of Burgundy, that the former gave him the government of Calais, and the latter granted him a penſion of one thouſand crowns; on which he took a ſolemn oath to remain faithful to the king, and to reſiſt every ſolicitation that could tempt him to ſwerve from his duty.*

It is uncertain whether Warwick was ſatisfied with the apology of Vauclair, or ſuſpected him to be guilty of a double infidelity; but he ſeemed to be entirely convinced by his arguments; and having ſeized ſome Flemiſh veſſels, which he found laying off Calais he ſailed towards the coaſt of Normandy, and arrived at Honfleur on the ſecond of May.

Lewis, alarmed at the cloſe connection of Edward with his two inveterate enemies, the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany, received with tranſport the only man who was capable of effecting a revolution in England. He could have wiſhed, indeed, that inſtead of diſembarking at the mouth of the Seine, Warwick had retired to the leſs-frequented ports of Cherbourg and Grandville, which belonged to the Baſtard of Bourbon, admiral of France; for foreſeeing the complants and reproaches to which the protection afforded to the earl would neceſſarily give riſe, he was anxious to have it in his power to ſay, that that protection was probably the conſequence of a private aſſociation, and confraternity of arms between the admiral and Warwick; an aſſociation, authorized by the laws of chivalry, and of which the ſovereign ought not to take cognizance. He, therefore, ordered Dupleſſis Bouré to engage Warwick to proceed to the ports of Lower Normandy, under pretext that he would there be leſs expoſed to the obſervations of the conſtable, who acted as a ſpy to the duke of Burgundy†.

The predictions of Lewis were ſpeedily verified, by the receipt of a letter from the duke of Burgundy, who, at the ſame time, wrote to the parliament, and to the citizens of Rouen, to demand reſtitution of the prizes which had been made on his ſubjects, and to complain of the protection accorded to his enemy, the earl of Warwick. This letter, from a ſovereign prince to a ſubject town, may appear extraordinary; but it muſt be remembered, that, in thoſe times, the municipal towns bore a ſtrong reſemblance to ſmall republics, ſubordinate to the ſame monarchy. They raiſed taxes for their own uſe; had land and ſea forces, which they had the right to employ in revenging their own quarrels; and some of them even concluded commercial treaties, and treaties of alliance, with foreign powers *. The citizens of Rouen, after they had acquainted the king with the contents of the duke's letters, replied, that it was not their province to take cognizance of any disputes which might have arisen between the earl of Warwick and the duke of Burgundy; that they were convinced the king, their sovereign, would do nothing contrary to subsisting treaties; that it was a matter of public notoriety, that the Burgundian vessels, which had been taken by the earl, had been afterward re-taken by the English fleet, and restored to their true owners, so that they could not possibly, as the duke, deceived probably by false reports, had represented, have been exposed to public sale. Charles, dissatisfied with this answer, wrote to them a second time, observing, that it appeared strange to him, that the citizens of Rouen should be so well acquainted with what passed at sea between Warwick and the English fleet, and yet be so ignorant of what was actually passing under their eyes on the river Seine, where three large Burgundian vessels were then laying; that, if any opinion might be formed of the future by the past, it was clear that Warwick would be careful not to offend his good friends in England, and would seek to make himself amends for such restraint, by attacking the Flemish; but that, with the aid of God, he would put a stop to his depredations, and would neither spare his enemy, nor those who should give him assistance.

In proportion as the duke's warmth and impetuosity encreased in this business, the greater appearance of moderation and impartiality did Lewis affect. He told the Burgundian envoys, who had been sent to claim the prizes, that the demand was a just one; but that, in an affair of which he was wholly ignorant, he could not possibly dispense with the observance of the usual forms of justice; he, therefore, referred them to the judges of the admiralty, who, being apprised of his intentions, contrived, by various expedients, to prolong the cause, and, at last, came to no decisive resolution. Meanwhile, a number of French privateers secretly joined Warwick's squadron, and daily made fresh captures. The duke, who saw the drift of this conduct, wrote the following laconic epistle to the Bastard of Bourbon, and the archbishop of Narbonne, who were at the head of the admiralty.

"Archbishop, and you, admiral—the ships which you tell me have been equip" ped by the king for the purpose of cruising against the English, have already " attacked the vessels of my subjects on their return to my dominions; but, by " St. George, if an immediate stop be not put to such proceedings, I will my" self—with the aid of God—supply the remedy—without your permission or " your reasons, or your forms of justice, for they are too arbitrary, and too " long. CHARLES."

* Garnier, tom. xvii. p. 396.

The duke ſoon put his threats in execution; and without any other declaration of war, ſeized and confiſcated all the goods belonging to the French, throughout the whole extent of his dominions; and, on a vague report that the admiral of France was watching an opportunity to ſet fire to the Flemiſh fleet, in the ports of Holland, he ordered all his officers to get their ſhips in immediate readineſs, to form a junction with the combined fleets of England and Brittany, and to attack Warwick wherever they might find him. On the receipt of this news, Lewis became ſenſible, that his perfidious conduct would no longer be tolerated, and that he muſt either diſmiſs Warwick, or ſubmit to have the coaſt of Normandy inſulted by the three combined ſquadrons; but before he parted from the earl, he reſolved to bind him more forcibly to his intereſts; hoping, through his means, to overturn the eſtabliſhed government of England, and to effect the reſtoration of the exiled houſe of Lancaſter. The animoſity which had ever ſubſiſted between that unfortunate family and this powerful earl was ſo inveterate, as ſcarcely to allow a hope that a reconciliation could ever take place. The father of Warwick had been executed by orders from Margaret of Anjou; he had himſelf twice reduced Henry to a ſtate of captivity; had promoted the baniſhment of the queen; had put to death all her moſt zealous partiſans, either in the field or on the ſcaffold; and, in ſhort, had drawn down ſuch calamities on her houſe, as no future ſervices could, in appearance, poſſibly compenſate. For this reaſon, when Warwick had firſt adopted the reſolution of depoſing Edward, he had no intention of reſtoring his rival to the throne; but meant to confer the regal dignity on his own ſon-in-law, the duke of Clarence. Of this deſign he was accuſed by Edward, in his long declaration, publiſhed at York; and it had obtained univerſal credit with the people of England. Finding, however, that his project was ill-received, and would be equally oppoſed by the Yorkiſts and Lancaſtrians, he was now reduced to the neceſſity of adopting the plan propoſed by Lewis, which was, to effect the reſtoration of king Henry. To render this more palatable to Warwick, and to reconcile him, in ſome meaſure, to that flagrant contradiction of principles which his conduct muſt neceſſarily diſplay to the world, it was propoſed, that the adminiſtration of government, during the minority of young Edward, Henry's ſon, ſhould be entruſted conjointly to the earl of Warwick and the duke of Clarence; that the prince of Wales ſhould eſpouſe the lady Anne, Warwick's ſecond daughter, and that the crown, in failure of male iſſue from that prince, ſhould deſcend, at his death, to the duke of Clarence, to the total excluſion of Edward and his poſterity.

When theſe arrangements were fixed, meſſengers were ſent to conduct queen Margaret, and her ſon Edward, from their obſcure reſidence in Lorraine, to the court of France. An union of intereſts ſuperinduced an union of ſentiments in the queen and Warwick, which effectually ſtifled all emotions of hatred. Margaret willingly acceded to the terms propoſed; the marriage of the prince of Wales with the lady Anna Neville was celebrated, to the apparent ſatisfaction of all the parties concerned in this unexpected alliance; a treaty, offenſive and defenſive was concluded between young Edward. in the name of his father, and Lewis, which was to remain in force till the total deſtruction of the houſe of Burgundy ſhould be effected * ; and the whole was confirmed, on either ſide, by the moſt ſolemn oaths.

The joy which Lewis experienced on the ſucceſs of his project, was greatly encreaſed by the birth of a ſon, who afterwards ſucceeded to the throne, under the appellation of Charles the Eighth. As the king had long been extremely anxious for this event, he had made a vow, in caſe it ſhould occur. to offer up, at the ſhrine of the Virgin, at Pui in Anjou, the image of a child, compoſed of ſolid ſilver, and in weight equal to the weight of his ſon, when he ſhould have attained his eleventh year. He accordingly appropriated the ſum of one hundred and ſixty thouſand crowns of gold for that purpoſe.

As ſoon as the rejoicings that took place on this occaſion were over, the king, under pretext of performing a pilgrimage to Saint Michael's Mount, went into Normandy, in order to ſuperintend the embarkation of Warwick, and to be ready to provide a remedy for any accident that might occur. On his return to the caſtle of Pleſſis-les-Tours, his uſual place of reſidence, he addreſſed a circular letter to all the principal towns in the kingdom, commanding each of them to ſend him two of their beſt informed merchants, whom he wiſhed to conſult on the intereſts of commerce. When theſe deputies were aſſembled, he explained to them the conduct of the duke of Burgundy, and the riſks they muſt run by continuing to repair to the dominions of a prince who had juſt confiſcated, in violation of every principle of juſtice, all the merchandize belonging to the French ; he then expatiated on the advantages to be derived from his alliance with England, and concluded by aſking their advice. In conſequence of the deciſions of this aſſembly, he forbade all future intercourſe between his ſubjects and thoſe of th duke of Burgundy; and in order to repair, as much as poſſible, the loſſes which the merchants and others would ſuſtain, from ceaſing to frequent the fairs at Antwerp, he eſtabliſhed two free fairs in the city of Caen, where all foreign coins were to paſs ; and, for the purpoſe of inducing foreigners to attend theſe fairs, he renounced, in their favour, the Droit d'Aubaine, and accorded them the privileges of natives.

The king of England, meanwhile, ſecure in the imaginary inability of Warwick to diſturb his government, had diſbanded his army, and reſigned himſelf wholly to the enjoyment of thoſe ſenſual pleaſures, to which he was ſo much addicted. Even the frequent warnings of the duke of Burgundy, who apprized him of the ſtorm that was gathering †, were inadequate to rouze him from this dangerous ſtate of ſecurity. A vain confidence in his own proweſs, and in the affections of his ſubjects, had rendered him incapable of ſound reflection, and induced him to declare, that he ſhould be perfectly ſatisfied could he once ſee Warwick ſet foot on Engliſh ground.

* Garnier. † Phil. de Commines, tom. i. p. 193.

Edward had not long to wait for his defired fatisfaction; Warwick landed at Dartmouth on the thirteenth of September, where he was joined by fuch numbers of his adherents, that in a few days he was at the head of a formidable army. The Engliſh monarch was then in the north of England, when he received the news of Warwick's deſcent; and ſo far was he from being diſcouraged at this event, that he ſent a meſſage to the duke of Burgundy, whoſe fleet was then at ſea, to keep a ſtrict watch, that he might prevent the earl's eſcape. A few days, however, proved ſufficient to convince him, that his expectations were vain as his confidence was groundleſs. His camp was betrayed, in the vicinity of Nottingham, by the ſecret adherents of the houſe of Lancaſter, and the partizans of Warwick; and Edward himſelf, with difficulty, effected his eſcape to the coaſt of Norfolk, where he put to ſea on the third of October.

But Edward's danger did not ceaſe with his embarkation: The Eaſterlings' or Hanſe Towns, were at war both with France and England; and ſome of their ſhips hovering on the Engliſh coſt, eſpied the king's veſſels, gave chaſe to them, and had nearly overtaken them, when they were ſo fortunate, as to enter, in ſafety, the port of Alcmaer in Frieſland. He had fled from England with ſuch precipitation that he had carried nothing of value along with him; and the only reward which he could beſtow on the captain of the veſſel that brought him over was a robe lined with ſable, and the promiſe of an ample recompence, if fortune ſhould ever become propitious to him.

The unexpected arrival of Edward greatly embarraſſed the duke of Burgundy, who heſitated, for ſome time, whether he ſhould afford protection to the fugitive monarch, or abandon him to his fate. There were ſtrong arguments to be offered on both ſides of this queſtion. During the bloody wars between the rival houſes of York and Lancaſter, Charles had long eſpouſed the cauſe of the latter, from which he was himſelf deſcended by his mother's ſide. At his court, the wretched remains of the Lancaſtrian party found refuge. "I have ſeen them in ſuch great "poverty," ſays Philip de Commines, "before the ſaid duke (of Burgundy) knew "they were there, that thoſe who aſk alms are not ſo poor; for I have ſeen a "duke of Cheſter walking without ſhoes, in the train of the ſaid duke, begging "his bread from houſe to houſe, without making himſelf known." The hope of acquiring the ability to keep France in awe, and to repel the inſidious machinations of her unprincipled monarch, had induced the duke of Burgundy to court the alliance of the victorious party. He had married Edward's ſiſter, and though he did not withdraw his protection from the Lancaſtrian fugitives, he had neglected no meaſure which could tend to concilitate the friendſhip of the Engliſh monarch. He had recently accepted the order of the Garter, and, ſo long as fortune continued to ſmile on Edward, Charles, from policy, though not from inclination, had remained firmly attached to him; the caſe was now different, that prince was in a perilous ſituation, and it was even poſſible that he might involve, in his own ruin, whoever ſhould attempt to afford him protection. Flanders, the richeſt province in the dominions of Charles, was indebted for its opulence and its exceſſive population to its numerous manufactures, the raw materials for which were imported from England; if Charles ſhould come to an open rupture with that kingdom, he was aware that the commmerce carried on by his Flemiſh ſubjects muſt experience an interruption, and in that caſe it was much to be apprehended, that that turbulent people, already diſcontented with the loſs of a part of their privileges, would ſecretly favour the inſidious intrigues of Lewis, and eagerly embrace ſuch an opportunity for revolt. To what dangers muſt Charles have been expoſed, if, while his fronti rs were attacked by the combined forces of England and France, he ſhould likewiſe have the enmity of his own ſubjects to encounter? All theſe conſiderations urged him not to receive Edward. On the other hand, his mind revolted at the idea of reſigning to his evil fortune a ſuppliant prince, his kinſman and ally; nor was he wholly without his fears, that ſuch an ungenerous mode of proceeding might even prove prejudicial to his intereſt. Warwick was his perſonal enemy, and a forced reconciliation appeared to be almoſt equally dangerous with an avowed enmity. In this delicate conjuncture the duke ſteered a middle courſe, which, though on great occaſions, it ſeldom proves ſucceſsful, and generally, indeed, is the expedient of a weak mind, anſwered his purpoſe. He received Edward in private, and, in public, affected to eſpouſe the victorious party; he ſent Commines to Vauclair, the governor of Calais, whoſe time-ſerving diſpoſition had now led him to declare for Warwick, to repreſent, that the alliance which ſubſiſted between the Engliſh and Burgundians was of a nature not to be broken by a change of ſovereigns; that it was an alliance between the two nations, and had for its excluſive objects the intereſts of commerce; that the Burgundians were didifferent whether Henry or Edward ſwayed the Engliſh ſceptre, and they would not interfere in revolutions which only affected the private fortune of a monarch. Charles likewiſe addreſſed a letter to the people of England, with this ſingular ſuperſcription, *To you my friends, in which he repeated the ſame arguments, adding, that being himſelf deſcended from the houſe of Lancaſter, he had never failed to intereſt himſelf deeply in every thing which affected the fortunes of that family; that the moſt diſtinguiſhed chiefs of the party were ſtill at his court; and that his only object in contracting an alliance with the oppoſite party, was to favour and confirm the commercial intercourſe that ſubſiſted between the two nations.

Lewis, during theſe tranſactions, had not remained inactive; he had concluded a new alliance with the Swiſs; he had diſpatched a ſolemn embaſſy to Henry the Sixth, who had heen recently taken from priſon, and replaced on the throne, and procured that monarch's ratification of the treaty which had been ſigned, in his name, by Warwick and young Edward; he cauſed the greateſt honours to be paid to that prince and his mother, Margaret of Anjou, and had made preparations for ſending them to England, to the aſſiſtance of a monarch, too feeble of himſelf to direct the helm of ſtate: nor was he leſs attentive to domeſtic arrangements; the utmoſt efforts of his policy were requiſite to fix the wavering mind of his brother; to repreſs the attempts of the duke of Brittany, his rival's avowed partizan; to ſecure the attachment of the duke of Bourbon, and of the princes of the houſe of Anjou, who dreaded any augmentation of the ſovereign power; and, finally, to inſpire the nation with a deſire of renewing the war, ſo that, whatever might be the event, he ſhould himſelf be exempt from reproach.

Hitherto the king had ſtrictly forbidden all obſervations and ſtrictures on the treaty of Peronne, but he now began to cauſe writings to be circulated, in which the perfidy of the duke of Burgundy, and the treachery of cardinal Balue, were cenſured in the ſtrongeſt terms. The parliament of Paris, who had evinced the greateſt repugnance at regiſtring the treaty, ſeized, with avidity, the opportunity which now occured for violating its conditions: they encouraged appeals from the Flemiſh tribunals, and ſent one of their officers to Flanders, with citations to ſome of the duke's ſubjects to appear at Paris; Charles very properly threw the officer into priſon, as well as one of the preſidents of the parliament of Paris, who had been ſent to receive informations, while ſuch of the Flemings as had appealed to the parliament were executed as traitors to their country. Theſe acts of violence were highly pleaſing to Lewis, as he imagined they would furniſh him with a pretext for reproaching his rival with being the cauſe of the rupture he meditated. The diſtricts of Vimieu, Foulois, and Beauvois, had been ceded to the duke of Burgundy by the treaty of Peronne, ſubject to the obligation of homage; and as Charles had taken poſſeſſion of thoſe diſtricts without complying with the ſtipulated condition, which, indeed, he had never been called on to fulfil, the parliament declared that he had forfeited all right to them, and, accordingly, ſent two of their members to take poſſeſſion of them.

Haraſſed by theſe attempts, Charles wrote to the king and to the parliament; but finding his remonſtrances treated with contempt, he ſummoned the king of Sicily and the duke of Brittany, either to enforce the obſervance of the treaty of Peronne, which they had guaranteed, or to declare in his favour, according to the engagement which they had contracted. Lewis, on his ſide, immediately ſent envoys into Brittany, with orders, after concerting meaſures with the lord of Leſcun, to repreſent to the duke, that while the king was ſtudious to fulfil, with the utmoſt punctuality, all the terms of the treaty of Peronne, Charles had not yet done homage for the terrritories which had been ceded to him; that he had even neglected to procure the ſignatures of the Burgundian nobles, who were to have guaranteed the treaty; that, without any previous declaration of war, he had confiſcated all the merchandiſe belonging to the French merchants, throughout his dominions; that he had recently impriſoned two officers of the parliament of Paris; that he had accepted the order of the Garter, and had, conſequently, declared himſelf the knight of an Engliſh monarch; and, finally, that he afforded protection to Edward, the uſurper of the Engliſh throne, and the avowed enemy of the houſe of Lancaſter. The envoys required, that the duke of Brittany, as a vaſſal of the crown, ſhould join his arms to the king's, in order to compel Charles to give full ſatisfaction for all theſe offences.

Though the charges exhibited by the king againſt the duke of Burgundy were all of them falſe, frivolous, or miſrepreſented, they nevertheleſs threw the duke of Brittany into the greateſt embarraſſment. His inclination prompted him to an immediate declaration in favour of Charles, his friend and ally; but ſome prudential conſiderations led him to reject all precipitate meaſures, and to act with more than uſual moderation. For more than a century, the dukes of Brittany had been chiefly indebted for the ſupport of their power and independence, to the aſſiſtance which they derived from England, and from their alliance with the dukes of Burgundy; but Francis the Second now found himſelf in a ſituation, in which he had nothing to expect from the Engliſh, but to ſee his coaſts inſulted by their ſquadrons, while the armies of France forced an entrance into the heart of his dominions. He had no forces to oppoſe to ſuch a powerful combination, and the duke of Burgundy was too much embarraſſed with his own affairs, to afford him that ſpeedy and effectual aſſiſtance which his circumſtances ſeemed to require. Reduced to this dilemma, Francis reſolved to temporiſe; he determined to deceive the king, by appearing to declare in his favour, and by actually endeavouring to give him a temporary advantage over his rival, with the view to bring them both, imperceptibly, as it were, to liſten to ſuch terms as would occaſion much future embarraſſment to Lewis, at the ſame time that they would ſecure, from regal encroachments, all the princes and nobility in the kingdom. This he meant to effect, by renewing the propoſal for a marriage between the duke of Guienne and the heireſs of Burgundy: the repugnance of Charles to that connexion was well known, but it was ſuppoſed, that in his preſent embarraſſed ſituation he would rather liſten to the ſuggeſtions of intereſt than the dictates of inclination*. The duke of Guienne, who, ſince the birth of a dauphin, had no longer the ſame motives for wiſhing to inſinuate himſelf into the king's good graces, was extremely anxious for the alliance. The French princes and nobles, who held penſions, places, or domains under the crown, and who only expected to be favoured by the king ſo long as their ſervices ſhould be neceſſary to him, were ſtudious to alarm his fears, and to increaſe his inquietude. The principal author and ſecret contriver of this intrigue, was the famous conſtable de Saint Paul, a man of genious, deep, artful, and deſigning, who having more to loſe or to hope for than the reſt of the nobility, was always careful to ſupply matter for diſſention between Charles and Lewis: brother-in-law to the king, firſt officer of the crown; an able politician, and an intrepid warrior; he poſſeſſed greater conſequence than any ſubject in the realm. His credit at the Burgundian court, where he had alſo enjoyed places of the higheſt importance, was equally great; his ſons and his brother ſtill commanded the troops of Charles; and as he was himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong fortreſſes on the confines of either territory, he hoped to derive from the troubles which he ſought to promote, a conſiderable augmentation of fortune, and the eſtabliſhment of an independent ſtate. After he had exhauſted all the arts of perſuaſion to obtain the duke of Burgundy's conſent to a marriage, which he repreſented as the only poſſible ſecurity for public freedom, he had recourſe to more powerful means; and ſeeking to make Lewis the inſtrument of his deſigns, he urged the neceſſity of profiting by a conjuncture, which might never more occur, when England and France were about to unite their forces, for humbling a proud prince, who threatened the monarchy with a total ſubverſion; and the better to remove the king's miſtruſt, and to fix his irreſolution, he promiſed not only to put him in poſſeſſion of the towns on the Somme, but to make all Flanders, and the principal towns in Brabant, riſe in his favour.

Lewis, with all his boaſted penetration, was unable to pierce this myſtery; he lent a favourable ear to the ſolicitations of the conſtable, and engaged in a war, with the ſecret motives for which he was totally unacquainted. Already were his troops advancing towards the confines of Picardy, while a great number of emiſſaries were ſent into Burgundy and Flanders, to corrupt the fidelity of the officers and citizens, when a ſcruple occurred to the mind of Lewis, and retarded his operations. The treaty of Peronne had been regiſtered, without any reſtriction, in the ſovereign courts, and guaranteed by all the princes and nobility in the kingdom. Whether Lewis was afraid to break, of his own authority, an act which had thus become in a certain degree, a national act, or whether, from the uncertainty of his ſucceſs in the war, in which he was about to engage, he was unwilling to take the conſequence upon himſelf; he convened an aſſembly of the notables at Tours. Before this aſſembly, the duke of Burgundy's conduct, both previous to, and after the treaty of Peronne, was ſet forth; the king's impriſonment, in violation of a promiſe confirmed by an oath; the odious conditions ſtipulated for his releaſe; the rights of the crown openly violated; the French merchants deſpoiled of their effects; the officers of juſtice thrown into confinement; hoſtilities committed on the coaſt of Normandy, without any previous declaration of war; and the order of the Garter accepted from the hands of the moſt formidable enemy to the French nation. To theſe complaints, which were preferred in the king's name, the count of Eu, the laſt deſcendant of the houſe of Artois, added another of a more private nature; he ſaid, that the duke of Burgundy unjuſtly held from him the town of Saint Valeri, which conſtituted a part of his lawful inheritance, becauſe he had refuſed to take an unconditional oath of allegiance to him. After hearing theſe charges, this proſtituted aſſembly, without any inveſtigation of their merits, and, indeed, with a certain knowledge that many of them were falſe, and others, far from being criminal, were perfectly juſtifiable, declared the duke of Burgundy to be duly convicted of high trea-

*ſon, and referred all farther proceedings, in this caſe, to the parliament of Paris. The parliament ſent one of their bailiffs to cite the duke to appear before them, but Charles threw the man into priſon, and after keeping him ſome days in confinement, diſmiſſed him without an anſwer. Although the duke was now fully aware of the king's deſigns, he did not expect to be attacked before ſpring, and had, therefore, as the winter was already far advanced, diſmiſſed his troops. But he was extremely ſurpriſed to learn, from a private meſſenger, diſpatched to him by the duke of Bourbon, that he had not a moment to loſe, as the royal army had actually marched, and his ſubjects were ripe for a revolt. He was alſo informed, that ſome traitors had been ſuborned to make an attempt on his life; and this information was ſoon confirmed by the ſudden evaſion of the duke's natural brother Baldwin, who eſcaped to the court of France, where Lewis aſſigned him a ſplendid eſtabliſhment, in reward of his infamous conduct†.

Charles immediately iſſued the neceſſary orders for re-aſſembling his troops; and, in the mean time, he advanced, at the head of five hundred horſe, to the frontiers of Picardy. Here he had the mortification to learn, that the town of Saint-Quentin had opened its gates to the conſtable of France‡; enraged at the news, he ſent a herald to ſummon the conſtable, as his ſubject, to repair to his army, and on a refuſal, couched in terms of inſolence, he confiſcated all his eſtates in Picardy and Artois. The conſtable revenged himſelf on his own children, who were in the duke's ſervice, by ſeizing all the lands they poſſeſſed in France.

A. D. 1471.] Roye was the next town which, through the perfidy of its governor, the lord of Foix, ſurrendered to the French arms§; and Amiens ſoon followed its example. Charles, after the loſs of this laſt place, no longer thinking himſelf in ſafety at Dourlens, retired to Arras, where he had appointed the general rendezvous of his troops. As the enemy had already paſſed his frontiers in Picardy and Burgundy, he was aware of the danger to which he ſhould be expoſed, if, while he was oppoſing the French in thoſe quarters with all his forces, the Engliſh ſhould make an attack either on Flanders or Holland. In order, therefore, to avert that danger, he reſolved to find them employment at home, and, if poſſible, to promote a ſecond revolution in England.

Edward, who, ſince his flight, had hitherto reſided in Holland, after his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Burgundy, had in vain ſolicited her huſband to take ſome deciſive ſteps in his favour, demanded an interview with Charles, which his preſent apprehenſions induced him willingly to grant. At this conference, Edward repreſented that delays muſt prove extremely prejudicial to his intereſts, as his friends and adherents in England would gradually forſake his cauſe, while the power of his enemy Warwick would daily receive confirmation and ſtrength: that the duke, therefore, ought either to afford him ſpeedy and effectual aſſiſtance, or wholly abandon him to his evil fate. In order to inforce this remonſtrance, he imparted to Charles a ſecret engagement which his brother Clarence had contracted with him; he reminded him of the oath which he himſelf had taken to aſſiſt him, ſhould he ever ſtand in need of his aſſiſtance; and he deſired him to conſider, that, by aiding him in his diſtreſs, he would act for the benefit of his own family, which might one day be in want of equal ſupport, and, at the ſame time, reap the glory of having reſtored a near relation to his throne. He ſolemnly promiſed to unite with him, in oppoſition to France, as ſoon as he ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in his regal dignity; he remarked, that the neutrality which the duke had hitherto obſerved, could be productive of no poſſible advantage, nor even prevent Lewis and the earl of Warwick from adopting ſuch meaſures as would be equally deſtructive to his power and repoſe. This expoſtulation was not fruitleſs; the duke of Burgundy tho' ſtill afraid to furniſh Warwick with a plauſible pretext for attacking his dominions, contrived an expedient, which enabled him to accommodate the fugitive king without incurring the riſk of a rupture with England. He cauſed four large veſſels to be equipped, in the names of ſome private merchants, at the free port of Terveer in Zealand; to which he added fourteen ſhips, ſecretly hired from the Eaſterlings, or Hanſe-Towns*. This ſquadron, together with a ſum of money, he delivered to Edward, who immediately ſet ſail for England, on the eleventh of March (1471), with an army of fifteen hundred men, partly compoſed of Engliſh fugitives, and partly of Flemiſh. No ſooner was Charles informed of his departure, than he iſſued a proclamation, prohibiting all his ſubjects from affording him aſſiſtance, under the ſevereſt penalties. He then haſtened to place himſelf at the head of his army, which was now aſſembling, and amounted to eighty thouſand fighting men.

In the French army, commanded by the king himſelf, where the young duke of Lorraine; the lord of Leſcun, with a body of Breton nobles; and the duke of Guienne, who, in the belief that the war had been undertaken on his account, had thought his preſence neceſſary to accelerate its concluſion. This laſt prince, during the march, diſpatched a private meſſenger to the duke of Burgundy, with theſe words written with his own hand, and encloſed in a ball of wax:—Take care to ſatisfy your ſubjects, and be under no uneaſineſs, for you will find friends. Charles could not miſtake the meaning of this meſſage, he knew what was required of him; the conſtable, with whom he was apparently reconciled, inceſſantly urged him to avert the ſtorm which threatened him by giving his conſent to his daughter's marriage with the king's brother, aſſuring him, at the ſame time, that the French nobility only waited for that event to abandon the king, and form a freſh union more durable than that which had ſhaken the throne during the war for the public good. The duke of Brittany had entered into the conſtable's views, and in order to ſuperinduce the compliance of Charles, he exaggerated the danger of his ſituation; ſent him word, by a meſſenger, that the king maintained a coreſpondence with the citizens of Antwerp, Bruges, and Bruxelles; and that he had even determined to beſiege the city of Ghent, where the duke then was. But Charles ordered the meſſenger to tell his maſter that he was miſinformed, and that he (the duke) was then on his road to paſs the Somme, and offer the king battle.

In fact, after various feints, he ſuddenly attacked Pequigni, a well-fortified town, which commanded a bridge on the Somme. The place was taken by aſſault, and ſuch of the garriſon as eſcaped the ſword, were made priſoners; the the citadel, after a ſiege of three days, was likewiſe reduced*. Charles, encouraged by the ſucceſs of this firſt attempt, made his whole army paſs the Somme, and continuing his march towards Amiens, fixed his camp between that city and the royal army. Never did he prove the juſtice of the epithet raſh, which had been beſtowed on him, better than at preſent; his anxiety to bring Lewis to action made him forget that, by thus leading his whole force beyond the Somme, he left his dominions open to the excurſions of the garriſons of Amiens and Saint-Quentin; rendered the opproach of convoys a matter of extreme difficulty, and expoſed his troops to the danger of periſhing by famine. This ſingle error decided the fate of the campaign, and might, poſſibly, have effected the total ruin of Charles, had he had an enemy to encounter leſs miſtruſtful, and leſs cautious, than Lewis. The conſtable, the mareſchal de Rohault, and the lord of Cruſſol, left Saint-Quentin, pillaged the rich provinces of Artois, and returned, laden with booty. Dammartin ſallied forth from Amiens to attack a large convoy, which he diſperſed, and conducted ſixty waggons into the town, laden with all kinds of ammunition; frequent ſkirmiſhes occured, in which the Burgundians were generally defeated; one, however, of a different deſcription took place, in which the French, under the conduct of Dammartin, were worſted, and that nobleman with difficulty ſaved his life.

The diſadvantageous poſt which the duke of Burgundy had inconſiderately choſen between the royal camp, and a garriſon ſo numerous as that of Amiens, made moſt of the French officers urgent with the king to accept the battle, which Charles daily offered; this was particularly the advice of Dammartin, the moſt experienced general of the age, who offered to make a ſally with his garriſon, and atrack the enemy in the rear, while Lewis engaged them in front. This project had ſo many partizans, that Lewis could not refuſe to aſſemble a council of war, in order to deliberate thereon. De Beuil, who was the firſt that was called upon for his opinion, obſerved, that having never ſerved with ſo large an army, he had not learned in what manner the manœuvres of ſuch a cumbrous maſs were to be regulated; that the French and Engliſh armies, which had ſignalized themſelves by ſuch famous exploits in the preceding reign, had ſeldom exceeded ten thouſand men, and bore no reſemblance to "that horrible multitude "which was now aſſembled, and which might, with greater propriety, be termed "a people than an army;" that he could not foreſee what would be the event of a battle, but he was ſtill leſs able to conceive by what means diſorder and confuſion would be avoided. Dammartin repreſented, that the enemy would be expoſed to the ſame inconvenience, ſince they were equally numerous, and not ſo well diſciplined; he obſerved, that, in order to avoid all partiality, it would be proper for every man to deliver his opinion in writing. This advice was adopted, and it was determined by a majority of voices, to bring the enemy to battle; but when they came to regulate the plan and order of attack, the diſpute was renewed, and the council ſeparated without coming to any concluſion. Lewis, who had only aſſembled a council of war, out of deference to thoſe who had propoſed to fight, and who had no ſerious intention of expoſing himſelf to the riſk of an action, was highly pleaſed with this difference of opinion. He perſiſted in his firſt deſign, continuing to haraſs the enemy, by intercepting their convoys, and confining his own troops within fortified camps, where he could not be compelled to engage againſt his will. Plenty reigned in his camp, as well as in his walled towns; while the Burgundians were expoſed to all the horrors of famine, and their numbers daily diminiſhed by deſertion and diſeaſe. The uneaſineſs which Charles experienced on this account, was greatly encreaſed by the intelligence which he received from Burgundy: the troops which he had left for the defence of that duchy, had been defeated in ſeveral rencontres with the French, who were commanded by the dauphin of Auvergne, and the mareſchal of Comminges; and the whole province was now expoſed to the deſtructive excurſions of the enemy, without the ſmalleſt proſpect of relief. Charles carefully concealed this news from his army, whom he amuſed with fictitious accounts of imaginary victories; but, ſenſible that the diſſipation of this error, which could not long be avoided, would only render the truth more dreadful, he was compelled to have recourſe to a meaſure, which, though his haughty diſpoſition could ill brook it, neceſſity enforced. He condeſcended to ſolicit a truce, and, in order to enſure a compliance with his requeſt, he ſent word to Lewis, that he was ſurpriſed a prince ſo wiſe as himſelf ſhould have engaged in a war, of the true motives whereof he was ignorant; but, that he was willing to communicate to him the particulars of an intrigue, which would equally excite his diſpleaſure and aſtoniſhment: the duke then entered into an explanation of ſeveral circumſtances relating to the plan of the French nobles, and concluded by aſking him, whether, after what he had heard, he meant to drive him to extremities? Lewis was mortified and aſhamed at having become a dupe to his brother, and repented of his conduct in having haſtily engaged in an enterpriſe, whence, he now conceived, that nothing but diſgrace could enſue. His natural proneneſs to ſuſpicion and miſtruſt, made him exaggerate the danger of his preſent ſituation; he loſt ſight of his enemy, though reduced to a ſtate of humiliation, and to the neceſſity of ſuing for a favour, to think only of the perils to which he had been expoſed, and with which he was ſtill threatened. It occurred to his mind, that Edward, after he had triumphed over his enemies in England, might ſeek to recover Normandy; that the duke of Burgundy, conſulting his real intereſts, might accede to the wiſhes of the duke of Guienne, and his partiſans; and, that they might all join in a confederacy to deſpoil him of his authority, and, perhaps, of his rank.

On the other hand, he could not perceive, that Charles had only applied for a truce, in order to extricate himſelf from a perilous ſituation, and to put himſelf in a condition to renew the war with greater advantage; but the danger, from this quarter, was diſtant, whereas the other was urgent; it was neceſſary to come to a deciſion, and Lewis conceived that the beſt thing he could do, under the preſent circumſtances, was to comply with the duke's requeſt for a truce, which was accordingly concluded, on the twelfth of May, for one year; and the allies of either party were allowed three months to conſider whether they choſe to accede to it or not.*

This truce was equally diſapproved by ſuch of the king's ſubjects as had remained faithful to him, and by thoſe whoſe profeſſions of attachment had only ſerved as a maſk for their treachery. As they were all ignorant of the real motives which had led him to adopt a meaſure ſo contrary, in appearance, to the true intereſts of the ſtate, they aſcribed it to others, which neither did honour to his underſtanding, nor to his courage. The Pariſians ſtuck up papers in the metropolis, in which they inveighed, moſt bitterly, againſt the king's counſellors; while the duke of Brittany, unable to conceal the contempt with which the conduct of Lewis had inſpired him, publicly ſtigmatized him with the ignominious appellation of "The Royal Coward." The duke of Burgundy was, perhaps, the only one who did him juſtice, but he remained ſilent on the ſubject, and was, indeed, ſo humbled at the ſtep he had been compelled, through his own imprudence, to take, that he ſhut himſelf up for ſome time in his tent. Lewis, not thinking it prudent to develope the myſtery diſmiſſed his troops, and took the road to Tours. He paſſed through the metropolis, and being apprized of the general diſcontent of the Pariſians, he viſited the principal citizens, and, by diſplaying that affability of manners which he ſo well knew how to aſſume, endeavoured to quiet their murmurs. On his arrival in Touraine he received intelligence of the new revolution which had juſt taken place in England.

Edward, after an ineffectual attempt on the coaſt of Norfolk, had landed, not without oppoſition, at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire. Finding no inclination in the people to receive him, he publicly declared, that he had relinquiſhed all thoughts of the crown, and came only to recover the eſtates of his family. At York, he could not gain admiſſion till he had taken a ſolemn oath, in the preſence of the mayor and aldermen, that he had no intention to claim the crown, an oath which he renewed at the high altar of the cathedral†. But this perjured uſurper no ſooner found himſelf ſufficiently ſtrong to throw off the maſk, than he avowed the true object of his enterpriſe, and aſſumed the title which he had ſolemnly renounced.

The ſubjects of Henry and the friends of Warwick were alike infected with the general ſpirit of perfidy which ſo ſtrongly marked theſe degenerate times: Warwick's brother, the archbiſhop of York, facilitated the entrance of Edward into London, and delivered his ſovereign into the hands of an implacable rival. At Barnet, the two armies met, but the defection of the duke of Clarence, joined to ſome other untoward and unforeſeen circumſtances, proved fatal to the earl of Warwick, who, after a deſperate action, in which he diſplayed his uſual intrepidity, ſuſtained a total defeat, and periſhed in the field. With him periſhed the hopes of his party. Margaret, the illuſtrious and unhappy conſort of Henry, ſtill deſtined to be the ſport of fortune, had landed at Weymouth, on the evening of this fatal day. Buoyed up as ſhe was with the flattering hopes of being reſtored to the ſplendour of royalty, and to thoſe domeſtic comforts, and that mental felicity, to which ſhe had ſo long been a ſtranger, when appriſed of the fatal events which had juſt taken place, all her wonted fortitude forſook her; ſhe ſunk ſenſeleſs on the floor, and remained ſpeechleſs and inanimate for a conſiderable time. When ſhe revived, yielding to the dictates of deſpair, ſhe took refuge in a ſanctuary, with the deſign to effect her eſcape into France. But on being joined by many of the Lancaſtrian nobles, ſhe reſumed her former ſpirit, and determined to defend, to the utmoſt, the ruins of her fallen fortunes. At Tewkeſbury, however, her hopes were finally deſtroyed; her troops, through the impetuoſity of the duke of Somerſet, were defeated, and ſhe and her only ſon, the prince of Wales, fell into the hands of the victor. Edward, whoſe ſoul was a ſtranger to every virtuous impulſe, whoſe mind never afforded even a momentary reſidence to any principle of honour, threw Margaret into the Tower, where her wretched huſband was already confined, and cauſed her ſon to be murdered in his preſence.—Perjury and aſſaſſination were never neglected by this inhuman prince, when they could tend either to the gratification of his revenge, or his ambition. The death of Henry was all that was now wanting to quiet his apprehenſions and confirm his power; and that monarch was, accordingly, found dead in his apartments in the Tower, in little more than a month after the battle of Tewkeſbury.

This revolution in England was the means of producing another in the fortune and condition of the French princes. The duke of Burgundy, who, during the late campaign, had acted chiefly on the defenſive, was now preparing for a renewal of hoſtilities on a more extenſive plan; while Lewis, who had then profited by his alliance with Henry and Warwick, to keep the duke of Brittany in awe, finding himſelf without allies, and perceiving the number of his enemies daily encreaſe, now renounced all ſchemes of conqueſt, and only thought of diſconcerting the projects of his adverſaries.

Although the unexpected concluſion of a truce had deranged the plans of thoſe who were anxious to promote a marriage between the duke of Guienne and Mary of Burgundy, yet it did not make them deſpair of finally accompliſhing the object of their wiſhes*. They flattered themſelves that the humiliating ſituation to which Charles had been reduced, would convince him of the neceſſity of ſecuring allies; and, in this hope, they renewed their ſolicitations, and preſſed him, with greater earneſtneſs than before, to comply with the general wiſh of the nobility, and to cement, by a marriage ſo univerſally deſired, a confederacy, of which he himſelf muſt inevitably reap the principal advantages. Thus urged, Charles evinced a diſpoſition to favour their deſigns, though nothing, in fact, was farther from his thoughts. Meanwhile, the duke of Guienne, aſſured of ſucceſs, was no longer ſtudious to preſerve appearances with his brother. In vain did Henry, king of Caſtile, at the inſtigation of Lewis, inſiſt on the celebration of his marriage with his daughter Jane, to whom that prince had been affianced, and urged him to ſhew himſelf to his new ſubjects; the duke, who had only conſented to that alliance the better to deceive his brother, poſitively refuſed to fulfil the engagement which had been contracted in his name. He liſtened only to thoſe who talked to him of his intended connection with the princeſs Mary, which he thought ſo far ſettled, that he ſent the biſhop of Montauban to Rome, to ſolicit the neceſſary diſpenſation from the pope.

Lewis had ſome ſuſpicions of what was going forward, but he was ſtill ignorant of the principal circumſtances of the intrigue, as well as of the names of the parties who were engaged in it; but he obtained, by accident, that information which his utmoſt endeavours had proved inadequate to procure. Oliver le Roux, whom Lewis had ſent to the court of Caſtile, had received orders on his return to ſtop ſome time at the court of the count of Foix, in order to ſound the inclinations of that prince, and, if poſſible, to extort from him ſome uſeful intelligence. It ſo happened, that Le Roux was put into the ſame apartment which had been occupied, but a few days before, by Henry Miles, envoy from the duke of Brittany. In the corner of this chamber he perceived a heap of papers torn in pieces, and being impelled by an irreſiſtible curioſity to read them, he ſucceeded in his attempts to join the different pieces, ſo as to be able to peruſe their contents; and, finding they were diſpatches of importance, he did not fail to communicate them to the king*. From one of theſe diſpatches it was diſcovered, that the duke of Guienne and his partiſans offered, as the firſt condition of the treaty of alliance, to reſtore to the duke of Burgundy the towns of Saint Quentin, Roye, and Amiens. Another contained the plan of an offenſive league between Charles and Edward, who agreed to divide between them the richeſt provinces in the kingdom; Edward was to take poſſeſſion of Normandy and Guienne, while Charles ſecured Champagne and the Iſle of France. Theſe different projects alarmed Lewis, and divided his attention; but what diſturbed him moſt was the fatal marriage of his brother with the heireſs of Burgundy. Having learned that the duke of Guienne had already ſolicited a diſpenſation from the pope, he immediately diſpatched an ambaſſador to his holineſs, to requeſt that he would either refuſe it, or, if he had already granted it, that he would inſtantly revoke it; and, in order to ſuperinduce a compliance with his requeſt, he allured the ſovereign pontiff with the proſpect of a revocation of the Pragmatic Sanction.

While the king was thus endeavouring to attach the pope to his intereſt, he ſent the lord of Bouchage into Guienne, with orders to concert his plans with Beauveau, biſhop of Angers, one of his brother's favourites. This envoy repreſented to the prince, that he would expoſe himſelf to inevitable deſtruction, by violating an oath taken upon the true croſs of Saint Lo; "*The danger attending which violation was ſo great, that he would infaillibly die within the year, which had invariably been the caſe with all thoſe who had perjured themſelves upon the ſaid croſs." He then obſerved to the prince, that he ought not to conſider the heireſs of Burgundy as ſuch an advantageous match, for, although the duches had hitherto proved ſterrile, it was ſtill poſſible ſhe might give birth to a ſon, in which caſe the young princeſs would have put a very moderate fortune; that he ought not to loſe ſight of his rights to the crown; rights the more important as the king had but one ſon, and he was of a delicate and feeble conſtitution; that it was his intereſt, therefore, to oppoſe, with all his power, the daring enterpriſes of the duke of Burgundy; that he could not be ignorant of the calamities which the houſe of Burgundy had brought upon France, in the preceding reigns; that Charles, who inherited the ambition and the hatred of his anceſtors, no longer admitted any bounds to his pretenſions, but viſibly aimed either at ſecuring the throne for himſelf, or, at leaſt, of diſmembering the monarchy; that the king could ſcarcely perſuade himſelf that his brother had any ſerious intentions of forming an alliance with the common enemy; but that, in order totally to diſpel his fears on that head, he ought to baniſh from his preſence all thoſe faithleſs ſervants who only made uſe of his name to frame the moſt dangerous plots: that they had already preſſed the duke of Calabria, the lord of Beaujeau, and the ducheſs of Savoy, to enter into a league againſt the king; that they even talked of recalling the count of Armagnac, who had been formally proſcribed by repeated ſentences of the ſovereign courts; and that ſuch meaſures were, in fact, to be conſidered as real hoſtilities.

The duke of Guienne made no direct anſwer to theſe obſervations; but the lord of Leſcun to whom he had entruſted the government of his duchy, contrived an effectual expedient for defeating their effects. He propoſed that the prince ſhould marry the younger daughter of the count of Foix, and ſent to aſk the king's conſent to this match, which Lewis was careful not to grant. The count of Foix, independent of the country whence he derived his title, poſſeſſed the county of Bigorre, and the principality of Bearn; his children were heirs to the kingdom of Navarre; he had already married one of his daughters to the duke of Brittany; and if the duke of Guienne had married the other, all thoſe princes might have formed an alliance, which would only have left the monarch a doubtful and precarious authority over a conſiderable part of the kingdom. Unwilling, however, to alienate the affections of a powerful family, and to augment the number of his enemies, he would not openly reject his brother's demand; but wrote to Bouchage, ordering him artfully to elude the propofal—"Exert all the five ſenſes which nature has giving you, on this buſineſs," ſaid the anxious monarch, "if you ſucceed, you will put me in paradiſe."

Apprehenſive leſt, by his rejection of every match that was propoſed to him, it ſhould be imagined he meant always to keep his brother unmarried, an intention that could not fail to appear odious and tyrannical; and no longer daring to preſs his marriage with Jane of Caſtile, becauſe he knew the prince's repugnance to a wife whoſe very birth was an object of diſpute, Lewis, at length, propoſed his eldeſt daughter, Anne of France, who was already promiſed to Nicholas, duke of Lorraine. To induce his brother to accept this propoſal, he offered to cede to him, on the day of his marriage, Rouergue, Angoumois, the Limouſin, and Poitou; and to appoint him lieutenant-general of the kingdom, with a guard of five hundred lances, to be paid out of the royal treaſury. But the duke juſtly concluded that theſe offers were too ſplendid to be ſincere; and as he was aware of the motive which had influenced his brother to make them, he did not condeſcend even to notice them.

After having employed to no purpoſe all the reſources of policy, Lewis, who had now loſt all hopes of either curing his brother's ſuſpicions, or of conquering his obſtinacy turned his batteries againſt the duke of Burgundy himſelf; but as he was ſenſible that Charles was actuated by ſentiments of hatred and revenge, he was afraid to make any direct overtures, which might perhaps be rejected, and would, in that caſe, certainly be rendered public by the duke. In order to obviate this inconvenience, he ſent a private perſon to Burgundy; who had orders to tell the duke, as from himſelf, that having had occaſion to viſit the court of France on ſome affairs of his own, he had an opportunity of entering into familiar converſation with the king, when the duke's name having been caſually mentioned, Lewis had appeared to be impreſſed with ſentiments of eſteem and admiration for that prince; that, agreeably ſurprized at finding the monarch thus favourably diſpoſed, he had ventured to tell him that Charles did not entertain a leſs favourable opinion of him, and that he would prefer his friendſhip to that of the princes who had ſo baſely abandoned him in the hour of neceſſity; that this diſcourſe had given the king ſuch pleaſure, that he could not refrain from obſerving that Charles and he were formed to be friends, and that if they had been more ſenſible of their intereſts, they would have always lived in harmony with each other, and have aggrandiſed themſelves at the expence of their reſpective enemies: that he had drawn up a plan of reconciliation, and that he ſhould already have communicated it to the duke, could he have hoped that it would experience a favourable reception from Charles, but that hitherto he had ſtrong ground for complaining of the unwillingneſs betrayed by that prince to repoſe any degree of confidence in him.

Charles's anſwer, who probably ſaw through this ſhallow artifice, was partly ſerious and partly ironical; he obſerved that theſe fine profeſſions but ill-accorded with the intelligence which he received from other quarters; that the king, if he had any real deſire to become his friend, had it in his power to prove, in a very obvious manner, the ſincerity of his intentions; that he ſhould begin by reſtoring Saint Quentin, Amiens, and the other places which he had taken from him, in violation of ſubſiſting treaties; and that objects, ſo trifling in their nature, ſhould not be ſuffered to operate as impediments to the deſigns of a prince who had ſuch vaſt projects in contemplation. This anſwer was interſperſed with many popular maxims, and trite obſervations.

Charles had, at this period, attained the ſummit of proſperity; the diſgrace which he had experienced in the laſt campaign having been productive of more ſolid advantages than he could poſſibly have expected to derive from the moſt brilliant ſucceſs. Immediately after the concluſion of the truce, he had convened the ſtates of all the different provinces in his dominions, with the view to convince them that the king had only been induced to attack him in the hope of finding him wholly unprepared for reſiſtance; that he ſhould always be expoſed to the ſame danger, unleſs Burgundy, in imitation of France, ſhould adopt the mode of eſtabliſhing a regular body of troops: he obſerved, that to preclude the poſſibility of being taken by ſurpriſe, and to ſecure the fortunes of individuals from the ſudden depredations of the enemy, it was only neceſſary to grant an adequate ſupply for paying eight hundred lances, the annual expence whereof might amount to one hundred and twenty thouſand crowns. The ſtates accordingly granted the new ſubſidy, without reflecting on the conſequences to which it might lead; they ſoon, however, became ſenſible of the fault they had committed: Charles, whoſe ambition encreaſed in proportion to the means of gratification, doubled and even tripled the ſtipulated number of troops, and encreaſed the original grant of one hundred and twenty thouſand crowns to five hundred thouſand. His court had become the center of political negociations; his alliance was courted by all the neighbouring princes; and the only difficulty he experienced conſiſted in the choice of propoſals, all advantageous in themſelves, but incompatible with each other. The dukes of Guienne and Brittany, the conſtable, and ſeveral other great vaſſals of the crown, urged him to break the truce, and engaged to make the people riſe in his favour: they offered him, as a preliminary to the treaty, the reſtitution of Amiens and Saint Quentin; but they required that the duke ſhould cement the alliance by the marriage of his daughter with the duke of Guienne, and by an abſolute renunciation of his plan for introducing the Engliſh into France.

On the other hand, Edward, who ſeemed diſpoſed to enforce his pretenſions to Guienne and Normandy, and who could not hope to ſucceed in his attempts to ſubdue thoſe provinces, without the aſſiſtanee of the duke of Burgundy, propoſed to divide the kingdom of France between them*; but he wiſhed firſt to be aſſured that the duke would not marry his daughter to the king's brother, otherwiſe he declared he would join Lewis in order to prevent an union that muſt prove more fatal to England than to France. The objections of the Engliſh monarch to the projected marriage between the heireſs of Burgundy and the king's brother, were not devoid of foundation: as Lewis had but one ſon, whoſe health was in a doubtful ſtate, the duke of Guienne was ſtill conſidered as heir to the throne; and, on this ſuppoſition, the Engliſh had juſt reaſon to be alarmed at the proſpect of an alliance which muſt one day have united the vaſt poſſeſſions of the houſe of Burgundy to the crown of France, for what hopes could they then entertain of recovering Normandy and Guienne?—How could they even expect to keep Calais, the only place which they now poſſeſſed on the continent?

Edward's demand perfectly accorded with the ſecret views of Charles, who had never any intention of giving his daughter to the duke of Guienne; but he knew not what reliance to place on a political connection with a monarch ſo indolent as Edward, and a government ſo unſettled as the Engliſh. Beſides, in that caſe he muſt renounce all alliance with the French princes, and even expect to ſee them join their ſovereign. Theſe being appriſed of the obſtacles which Edward oppoſed to their plans, ſent the lord D'Urfé to the duke, to repreſent to him, that they were ſufficiently powerful to make the king accede to whatever conditions they might chuſe to impoſe; that his alliance with Edward would only tend to diſgrace him in the opinion of the nation; and, they finally obſerved, that if he ſeriouſly thought of introducing the Engliſh into France, he could have no regard for the welfare of the kingdom:—This reproach appeared ſo extraordinary to the duke, that he could not refrain from laughter:—"I have a greater "regard," ſaid Charles, "for the welfare of the kingdom than M. D'Urfe imagines, "for inſtead of one king that France now has, I wiſh ſhe had ſix!"

Lewis, unable to penetrate the ſecret deſigns of the duke of Burgundy, with regard to his daughter's marriage; and ignorant, probably, of the obligations which he had contracted with the king of England, was alſo anxious to open a negociation; not with the intention of concluding any treaty, but merely with the view of amuſing his enemy, and of preventing him, as long as poſſible, from adopting any deciſive meaſure. The anſwer which his obſcure agent had received from Charles, was by no means ſufficient to deter Lewis from the purſuit of his ſcheme; and when he imagined that the duke's curioſity was raiſed to the pitch he wiſhed it to attain, he ſent him the plan of a peace, of which the following were the principal articles: that "A treaty of confederation and fraternity," ſhould be concluded between the king and the duke; that the duke ſhould accept the order of Saint Michael, and the king that of the Golden Fleece; that the dauphin ſhould marry the duke of Burgundy's daughter, and, in caſe any thing ſhould occur to prevent that connection from taking place, that Charles ſhould engage not to give her to the duke of Guienne; that the king ſhould give up the conſtable and the count of Nevers, with all their poſſeſſions, to the duke; in return for which conceſſion the duke ſhould, on his part, equally abandon the dukes of Guienne and Brittany to the king's diſcretion; and, that the king ſhould reſtore to the duke of Burgundy, the towns of Saint-Quentin, Amiens, Roie, and Montdidier.

Of all theſe conditions, the laſt was the only one which Charles was willing to accept; he therefore reſolved, if poſſible, to ſecure that as a preliminary to the projected treaty, and then to give his ſentiments on the others. With this view he affected to approve the project of reconciliation, and even appointed plenipotentiaries to confer with the king's envoys; but, as he was aware that fear was the only motive which could induce Lewis to court his friendſhip and alliance, he wiſely concluded that by encreaſing his apprehenſions, he ſhould facilitate the concluſion of the treaty; thus while he continued the negociation, he haſtened to conclude an offenſive and deffenſive alliance with Ferdinand and Iſabella, the ſovereigns of Caſtile, and with Juan, king of Arragon, father to Ferdinand. This laſt prince declared, that although in his former treaties with France, he had engaged to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality in any conteſts which might ariſe between Lewis and Charles, yet he thought himſelf ſufficiently authorized, by the conduct of the king of France, to revoke the promiſe he had made; that, in future, he would, on all occaſions, eſpouſe the quarrels of the duke of Burgundy, who, on his ſide, engaged to conſider the intereſts of Burgundy and Arragon as inſeparable; and both princes agreed to conclude neither peace nor truce with France, but by mutual conſent.

Strengthened by this alliance, the duke of Burgundy immediately iſſued a declaration, which ſet forth that the king, by an infraction of the treaty of Peronne, had incurred the penalty denounced, by a particular article of that treaty, againſt either of the contracting parties, who ſhould be guilty of any violation of its terms; and that, therefore, all the provinces and dominions of the houſe of Burgundy were wholly exempted from the juriſdiction of the French parliament, and from the obligation of homage to the king. In conſequence of this declaration, the duke erected a ſovereign court at Malines, to decide in all caſes of appeal; and forbade his ſubjects under pain of death, to apply in any caſe whatever to the parliament of Paris.

Lewis, feigning ignorance of this declaration, ſent Peter Doriole, and the lord of Craon, to confer with the duke's miniſters, on the ſubject of the propoſed reconciliation; and theſe envoys had orders to obtain a renewal of the truce which was about to expire, and, at the ſame time, to delay, by every means in their power, the final concluſion of the treaty.

While the king thus ſought to amuſe his moſt formidable enemy, he directed his principal attention to Guienne, which he had reſolved immediately to invade. As he wiſhed to employ Tanneguy du Chatel on this ſervice, and was afraid to leave the province of Rouſſillon, of which that nobleman was governor, without ſome experienced general, eſpecially at a time when it was liable to be attacked by all the forces of Arragon, he engaged du Lau to procure, by an offer of twenty-four thouſand crowns, the ceſſion of that government from du Chatel. The offer was accepted; but du Chatel expreſsly ſtipulated that, in caſe he ſhould be compelled, on any account, to leave France, he ſhould be at liberty to retire into Rouſſillon, and to exert the authotity of governor; a precaution which plainly ſhews what little confidence was placed in Lewis, even by thoſe whom he honoured with his confidence.

All ſuch as were diſcontented with the government, and all the perſonal enemies of Lewis*, now repaired to Guienne, which was deſtined to become the ſcene of war. They were all received with great cordiality by the duke, who, endeavouring to ſtrengthen his party by the acquiſition of allies, had lately recalled the count of Armagnac, and reſtored to him a part of his former poſſeſſions. The duke of Nemours and the count of Foix ſecretly ſupported his cauſe, and incited the nobility and inhabitants of the principal towns in the neighbouring provinces to riſe in his favour. In ſhort, the duke and his friends appeared firmly reſolved to repel with the utmoſt vigour any attack that might be made by his brother, and even to revenge ſuch an inſult by carrying the war into the heart of his dominions. The determined ſpirit, and the general fermentation which prevailed on this occaſion, were chiefly owing to the indefatigable exertions of the lord of Leſcun, whoſe active genius and intriguing diſpoſition rendered him a worthy opponent of the artful and hypocritical Lewis. This nobleman had endeavoured to incite to an unanimity of ſentiment and action, the courts of Guienne, Brittany, Arragon, Savoy and Burgundy, whoſe united efforts might threaten France with deſtruction on every ſide. But in Guienne, where oppoſition might have been leaſt expected, he experienced contradictions which his utmoſt zeal and abilities were ſcarcely able to overcome. Colette de Jambes, lady of Monſoreau, being jealous of the miniſter's influence and power, had contrived to form a party againſt him, at the head of which was the lord of Malicorne, the duke's principal favourite. This lady, who, if the accounts of contemporary writers may be credited, was, both in mental and perſonal endowments, the moſt accompliſhed woman of the age, had, at a very early period of her life, been married to Lewis d'Amboiſe, Viſcount of Thouars; but, after her huſband's death, ſhe had conceived an attachment for the duke of Guienne, by whom ſhe had two daughters. As the chief object of Leſcun's plan was to procure a wife for the duke, it is not to be wondered at that ſhe ſhould have raiſed up every oppoſition to it in her power; that miniſter, however, ſeemed to acquire freſh zeal from the obſtacles which he had to encounter, and perſevered, in the purſuit of his ſcheme, with aſtoniſhing diligence. Lewis, on his ſide, made his troops advance, and gave his final orders to his generals; Dammartin was to make an irruption into the duchy on the ſide of Gaſcony, Cruſſol on the ſide of Saintonge, and Tanneguy du Chatel on the ſide of Poitou.

While affairs were in this critical ſituation, and the flames of war were ready to extend from one extremity of the kingdom to the other, while the formidable oppoſition which Lewis had to expect in Guienne, had diſabled him from putting the other parts of his dominions in a proper ſtate of defence, and while that monarch had juſt cauſe to fear the united attacks of three powerful enemies; an event occurred ſo unexpected and myſterious, that it could not fail to be aſcribed to the infernal machinations of a prince, to whom it was productive of ſuch ſignal advantages. Intelligence was received in the French army that the lady of Monſoreau was at the point of death, and that the duke of Guienne was alſo dangerouſly ill. It has always been believed that they were both poiſoned by eating a peach which had been previouſly prepared for the purpoſe; and that John Faure de Vercors or Verſois, a Benedictine monk, abbot of Saint John d'Angeli; and an officer of the duke's houſhold, named Henry de la Roche, were the authors, or rather the inſtruments employed in the perpetration of this crime. It appears, however, that, immediately after its commiſſion, no ſuſpicions were entertained of them, as the monk continued in favour, and was even appointed one of the executors of the lady of Monſoreau; but, it muſt not be forgotten that he wrote to the king on the ſubject, informing him that his brother had but a few hours to live, as appears from a letter written by Lewis to the count of Dammartin.*

In proportion as the duke of Guienne grew weaker, his ardour for the accompliſhment of his plans encreaſed: he diſpatched couriers to his allies; put his towns and fortreſſes in a proper ſtate of defence, and iſſued orders for the immediate collection of his troops in every part of his apanage. Fearful of being abandoned at this critical period, he exacted a new oath of allegiance from his officers, by which they bound themſelves to ſerve him againſt all men, not excepting the king. Many of them, however, ſenſible of his approaching end, refuſed to take the oath, and haſtened to make their peace with Lewis.

A. D. 1472] The king, who only wanted to gain time, ſent freſh ambaſſadors to the duke of Burgundy, with a propoſal to ſubmit the difference between them to arbitration; and with an offer to accept the pope's legate as the umpire. He, at the ſame time, endeavoured to intimidate the duke of Brittany, who was ſtrengthening the fortifications of his towns, and arming his ſubjects. But Francis ſent a ſpirited anſwer to the king, reproaching him with his duplicity, and his inſidious attempts to diſturb the tranquillity of his dominions; after which he conjured the duke of Burgundy not to diſappoint the hopes of his allies by any farther delays.

Lewis, informed of theſe ſolicitations, and perceiving, by the duke of Burgundy's preparations, that he might expect to be immediately attacked, ſent orders to his plenipotentiaries to accede to any terms which Charles might wiſh to impoſe. A treaty was accordingly concluded, by which the king conſented to reſtore the towns of Amiens, Saint Quentin, Montdidier, and Roye, to the duke of Burgundy; and to give up to him the conſtable, and the count of Nevers, a prince of the houſe of Burgundy, but an avowed enemy to the reigning branch, which had deſpoiled him of a part of his poſſeſſions: the duke, on his ſide, conſented to renounce all alliance with the dukes of Guienne and Brittany. Neither party had the ſmalleſt intention of fulfilling the terms of this agreement; the object of Charles was to get poſſeſſion of the towns which had been taken from him, after which he meant publicly to declare, that he pardoned the conſtable, and the count of Nevers, and therefore expected that the king would be equally indulgent to the dukes of Brittany and Guienne, otherwiſe he ſhould march to their relief. The intention of Lewis was only to gain time, and, immediately after his brother's death, to declare that he did not think himſelf bound to keep his word with a prince who had not dealt openly with him.

The treaty was no ſooner ſigned than Charles demanded immediate poſſeſſion of the towns which were to be reſtored to him; but the plenipotentiaries not being authoriſed to comply with his demand, adviſed him to make his army advance to the frontiers, and to ſend ſome confidential ſervant to the king, to exact from him an oath to obſerve the treaty, and to procure the neceſſary orders for the evacuation of the places in queſtion; but, the lord of Quingei, who was intruſted with this commiſſion, was unable to obtain any ſatisfactory anſwer from Lewis, who continued to put him off from day to day. The duke of Guienne was, by this time, at the point of death, and the natural goodneſs of his diſpoſition led him, in his laſt moments, to diſmiſs all ſentiments of hatred from his mind, and to aſk from his brother the ſame forgiveneſs of injuries which he ſo willingly extended to him: he appointed Lewis his ſole legatee, earneſtly beſeeching him to confirm a few legacies which he had bequeathed to ſome old ſervants of approved fidelity. His death ſpread conſternation and alarm throughout his palace; and moſt of thoſe who had hitherto perſevered in their attachment to the unfortunate prince, now courted the good graces of his tyrannical brother. Malicorne, his chief favourite, was the firſt to convey the welcome tidings to Lewis, and to acquaint him with the laſt requeſts of his deceaſed maſter. Leſcun, however, perſiſted in his hatred of a monarch, whom he had now but too great reaſon to deteſt; he had diſcovered the aſſaſſins of the prince, and thrown them into irons, when finding their infamy detected, they confeſſed their guilt, and openly accuſed the king of having inſtigated them to the commiſſion of the dreadful deed. Leſcun being compelled to quit Guienne, took the two criminals with him to Brittany, where he delivered them to the duke, with this ſolemn exhortation: "In order "to revenge the beſt of maſters, and moſt faithful of friends, I reſign into your "hands theſe traitors, who have baſely taken away the life of their lawful prince, "in the hope that you will make a ſignal example of them. Think on what "you owe to the memory of a prince who ſo richly deſerved your friendſhip: "his ſoul now demands from God an exemplary vengeance on theſe his aſſaſſins: "may he ſee, from the manſions of the dead, in what manner I fulfil my en-"gagements!" "They ſhall have the reward they merit," replied the duke;

"and would that thoſe who urged them to the commiſſion of the crime were "equally in my power; they ſhould not eaſily eſcape."

Lewis, pretending that by his brother's death he was releaſed from the neceſſity of fulfilling the engagements which his plenipotentiaries had contracted with the duke of Burgundy, now openly declared to the lord of Quingei, that he ſhould not confirm a treaty, in the concluſion of which the duke had diſplayed a want of candour, and betrayed the moſt pernicious deſigns *. Charles, enraged at the idea of having thus ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by the ſhallow arts of his rival, gave a full ſcope to his reſentment, and publiſhed a violent manifeſto, in which he recapitulated the particulars of the plot, which, at the king's inſtigation, had been formed againſt his life, by his natural brother, Baldwin, John de Chaſſa, and John d'Arſon; he added, that Lewis, perſiſting in his infamous deſigns of of deſtroying all the princes of the blood-royal of France, had juſt cauſed his brother to be put to death, by poiſon, witchcraft, and diabolical invocations, as was proved by the confeſſion of the two culprits whom he had ſeduced. For theſe two attempts, purſued the duke, one againſt the firſt peer of the realm, the other againſt the firſt prince of the blood, he deſerves to be pronounced guilty of homicide; of high-treaſon againſt the crown, the princes of the blood, and the public welfare; a traitor, a parricide, and an idolator; each of theſe aſſertions he ſupported by quotations from the ſcriptures, from the Decretals, and from the fathers of the the church; and he concluded by exhorting all chriſtian princes to unite their arms againſt this common enemy.

This manifeſto, however, which was diſtributed in every town in the kingdom, produced but little effect. Lewis, intent on the reduction of Guienne, did not deign to anſwer it; and he even ſuffered the long ſpace of eighteen months to elapſe, before he adopted any meaſures for clearing himſelf from the heavy accuſations which had been preferred againſt him. At the expiration of that period, he appointed commiſſioners to try the two criminals, who were ſtill confined in the Breton priſons; but while they were engaged in the inveſtigation of this infamous tranſaction, the abbot of Saint John d'Angell was found dead in his cell, with evident marks of violence about his perſon; what became of the other culprit, Henry de la Roche, is not known; nor have any of the proceedings of the commiſſioners, nor the other examinations of the criminals, been preſerved. It was commonly believed, however, that the king had not ſcrupled to conceal the firſt crime, by the perpetration of a ſecond, and every part of his conduct, no leſs than his character, tended to confirm this belief. It was juſtly obſerved, that he had made no attempt to juſtify himſelf till after he had effected a reconciliation with the duke of Brittany, and had drawn the lord of Leſcun into his ſervice; and that the criminals had diſappeared at ſuch a critical period, it was impoſſible to ſuppoſe they had died a natural death. It was likewiſe remarked, that Lewis d'Amboiſe, one of the commiſſioners, was, ſoon after, promoted to the biſhopric of Albi; and that Peter de Sacierges, who had officiated as ſecretary to the commiſſion, was made a maſter of requeſts. It muſt be confeſſed that all theſe circumſtances amount only to a preſumptive evidence, but then the preſumption is ſo ſtrong, that, combined with the known diſpoſition of Lewis, and other conſiderations which naturally preſent themſelves to the mind, it appears to us irreſiſtible. Brantome relates a ſtory, which, were it better authenticated, would ſettle the matter beyond all poſſibility of diſpute: he pretends, that the ſecret of this murder was diſcovered by means of a fool who had lived with the duke of Guienne, and on his death had been taken into the king's ſervice. "This good king," ſays the jovial hiſtorian, "being one day at Cleri repeating his prayers and oriſons "at the ſhrine of the Virgin, whom he called his good patroneſs, and none being "preſent at the time except this fool, who was at a little diſtance from the king, "and whom his majeſty believed to be ſtupid, ſo vain, and ſo fooliſh, that he "could pay no attention to any thing that was ſaid, he proceeded thus to pray "aloud—Ah! my good lady, my little miſtreſs, my great friend, in whom I "have always placed my truſt, I beſeech you to pray to God for me, and to be-"come my advocate with him, to intreat him to pardon me my brother's death, "whom I cauſed to be poiſoned by that wicked abbot of Saint John: to you, "my good patroneſs and miſtreſs, I confeſs my crime." It is needleſs to comment on the improbability of this ſtory, which Brantome acknowledges to have received from an old canon of eighty, who had, himſelf, heard it from another perſon; but if it does not tend to the confirmation of the king's guilt, it certainly does not diminiſh its probability.

After his brother's death, Lewis entered Guienne, which he reduced without the ſmalleſt oppoſition*; the inhabitants of the different towns only ſtipulating for the preſervation of their privileges. Theſe the king chearfully confirmed, it being a maxim with him to favour the growth of the municipal government, which he juſtly conſidered as the firſt cauſe of the humiliation of the ariſtocracy. He even granted permiſſion to the inhabitants of Rochelle to carry on a free trade with the Engliſh and the other enemies of the ſtate, a privilege which might tend to the introduction of a neutral power, and the eſtabliſhment of an independent republic in the heart of the monarchy. He again made the city of Bourdeaux the ſeat of the parliament, which, on the ceſſion of Guienne to his brother, had been transferred to Poitiers; and finding his preſence neceſſary in another quarter, he even concluded an accommodation with the count of Armagnac, and conſented to leave him in poſſeſſion of that part of his territories to which he had been lately reſtored by the duke of Guienne. He then appointed the lord of Beaujeu, governor of the province, and marched towards Brittany with an army of fifty thouſand men.

The duke of Brittany, though he had ſpared no pains to put his dominions in a proper ſtate of defence, ſtill found himſelf unable to cope with an enemy ſo powerful as Lewis; and as he was in daily expectation of a ſtrong reinforcement from England, he reſolved to propoſe a ſhort truce to the French monarch, during which, he obſerved, effectual means for a final accommodation might be adopted. The king, conſcious of his ſuperiority in the arts of negociation, accepted the propoſal; not perceiving, that by that means he would loſe the favourable moment for action, and that his enemy was only ſeeking to gain time in order to facilitate the reception of thoſe ſuccours which he expectected from his allies.

The duke of Burgundy, meanwhile, had ſpread devaſtation throughout the fertile province of Picardy; with an army of eighty-thouſand men he had paſſed the Somme, and inveſted the town of Neſle*, whoſe inhabitants maſſacred the herald which he had ſent to ſummon them to ſurrender. In revenge for this barbarous act, Charles, after he had reduced the place, inhumanly ordered the garriſon and citizens to be maſſacred, without diſtinction of age or ſex; ſome few, who had eſcaped the rage of the ſoldiery, had their right hands cut off, and were ſent, in that ſituation, to the king; after which the town was reduced to aſhes.

The garriſons of Roye and Montdidier, terrified by the fate of their fellow ſoldiers, reſigned thoſe towns to the victor, whoſe next attempts were directed againſt Beauvais. That place, though deſtitute of troops, reſiſted his efforts; and neither the demolition of the ſuburbs, nor the formidable force of the enemy could induce the brave citizens to ſurrender. Even the women here performed prodigies of valour; they lined the walls in thoſe parts which were moſt open to attack, and expoſed themſelves to every kind of danger. One of theſe heroines forced a ſtandard from the enemy, and bore it off in triumph to the town. This vigorous and unexpected defence gave time for the arrival of troops, which was facilitated by the neglect of Charles completely to inveſt the place. The duke was now foiled in every attack; a ſtrong body of forces, detached by the king, under the command of Dammartin, harraſſed his troops, and intercepted his convoys; and, after a general aſſault, in which he was repulſed with the loſs of one hundred and twenty killed, and one thouſand wounded †, he raiſed the ſiege, entered the country of Caux, ſeized the towns of Eu, and Saint Vallery, delivered Longueville to the flames, and extended his deveſtations as far as the gates of Rouen, before which city he remained four days, in order to fulfil his engagement with the duke of Brittany, who had appointed that ſpot for the junction of the two armies.

While the duke was thus employed in committing devaſtations in Normandy, the garriſons of Amiens and Saint Quentin had penetrated into the heart of his dominions, and laid waſte the country with fire and ſword. The war, too, raged with equal violence in Champagne and Burgundy: the count of Rouſſi, eldeſt ſon to the conſtable, who commanded the duke's army at the ſame time that his father was placed at the head of the French troops, carried desolation into the environs of Tonnerre, Joigny, Troyes, and Langres, burning all the towns and villages which fell into his hands. The duchy of Burgundy was exposed to similar depredations from the dauphin of Auvergne, who commanded for the king in that quarter; and such were the acts of violence committed on either side, that an ancient chronicler observes, the French and Burgundians, mad with rage, were less eager to make conquests, than intent on mutual destruction*. The duke of Burgundy, urged by the solicitations of his subjects, the ravage of his provinces, the dearth of provisions which prevailed in his army, and his desire of inflicting vengeance on the constable for sacking his towns, at length found himself compelled to leave Normandy, and return to the banks of the Somme, where he reviewed his army, which had suffered so much in this fruitless expedition, as to be wholly inadequate to any enterprise of importance.

Lewis, in reward of the valour and fidelity displayed by the citizens of Beauvais, to whom he chiefly ascribed the success of this campaign, granted them privileges equal, if not superior, to those which were enjoyed by the nobility †: he allowed them to hold fiefs, and rere-fiefs, exempt from the usual contributions, and from all the services attached to that species of possession; he accorded them a general exemption from all imposts whatever, except such as they might levy themselves for the support and repair of their fortifications; and he allowed them a total freedom of choice in the election of their municipal officers. The women, who had signalised their courage and fidelity, in, at least, an equal degree with the men, were not forgotten; it was ordained, that, at an annual festival to be celebrated at Beauvais, in honour of Saint Angadresme, whose relics had been exposed on the walls during the siege, the women should take precedency of the men, both in the procession and at church; that, as well during this ceremony, as at any other time they chose, they might wear silks, furs, and belts of gold; ornaments which had hitherto been confined by the laws to people of distinction, and which the citizens' wives had been long anxious to acquire the privilege of wearing; and, lastly, Lewis granted to Jane Fourquet, the young heroine who had taken the standard from the enemy, and to Colin Pilon, whom she had just married, a total exemption from taxes throughout the kingdom.

The truce between the king and the duke of Brittany having expired, Lewis entered the dominions of Francis, and reduced Chantocé, Machecou, and Ancenis‡. He then advanced as far as Pouancé, and offered battle to the duke, who was alike unwilling to risk an action, and to conclude a peace. Being compeled, however, by his subjects to sue for an accommodation, he appointed Souplainville and Desessarts, two friends of the lord of Lescun, who still governed the councils of Brittany, to treat with the king. Lewis, who was anxious to attach Lescun to his interest, from the conviction that he then should have nothing to apprehend from the side of Brittany, gave the deputies a carte-blanche for themselves and their friends. Leſcun aſked and obtained the government of one half of the duchy of Guienne; the county of Comminges; the order of Saint Michael; a penſion of ſix thouſand livers, and a gratification of twenty-four thouſand crowns. Souplainville procured for himſelf a preſent of ſix thouſand crowns, and a penſion of twelve hundred livers; with the offices of mayor of Bayonne, bailiff of Montargis, and ſome other places of authority in Guienne. Deſeſſarts was appointed bailiff of Meaux, maſter of the rivers and foreſts in Champagne and Brie, with an annual penſion of twelve hundred livres, and an immediate gratification of four thouſand crowns. The duke of Brittany, himſelf, obtained a penſion either of ſixty or eighty thouſand livers, for authors differ as to the ſum; and on theſe conditions he concluded a truce for a year, and conſented to leave the towns which Lewis had reduced in the poſſeſſion of that monarch, till ſuch time as a final treaty of peace ſhould be ſigned. The only ſtipulation which he made in favour of his ally, the duke of Burgundy, was, that he ſhould be allowed to accede to this truce if he choſe it; and of this privilege Charles was induced, by the ſtate of his army, and by ſome other conſiderations, ſo far to avail himſelf, as to conſent to a ceſſation of arms for a few months.

About this period Phillip de Commines, the hiſtorian, quitted the court of Burgundy, and entered the ſervice of Lewis*, as he has neglected to explain, in his memoirs, the reaſons for this deſertion of a maſter who had loaded him with honours and rewards, and to whoſe family he was indebted for the diſtinction which he enjoyed, his conduct is juſtly expoſed to the charge of ingratitude.

A. D. 1473.] The ſucceſs of the king's arms during the laſt campaign, had by no means reſtored tranquillity to France. The count of Armagnac, undiſmayed by his former diſgrace, obſerving that the king was engaged in Brittany, that the duke of Burgundy was ſuffered to ravage Picardy and Normandy, and the king of Arragon was preparing to attack the county of Rouſſillon, thought the moment favourable for obtaining poſſeſſion of Lectoure, which was then regarded as the key to Guienne and Gaſcony. For this purpoſe he corrupted ſome of the officers of the garriſon, by whoſe means he ſecured the place and its governor, the lord of Beaujeu, whom Lewis had appointed his lieutenant-general in Guienne.

At the ſame time, the king of Arragon made an irruption into Rouſſillon, and exhorted his old ſubject to ſhake off the French yoke, and to return to their lawful ſovereign. The citizens if Perpignan, moved by his exhortations, flew to arms, and compelled du Lau, the governor of the province, to ſhut himſelf up in the citadel. The example of the capital was followed by ſeveral other towns; Elne Argiles, and Canet expelled their garriſons, and Salies, Collioure, and the citadel of Perpignan, were ſoon the only places that remained in poſſeſſion of the French.

The uneaſineſs which Lewis experienced on the receipt of this news, was farther encreaſed by entelligence, that the duke of Alençon, a prince of the blood, and father-in-law to the count of Armagnac, had entered into a negociation with the duke of Burgundy, for ſurrendering to that prince all the towns and fortreſſes he poſſeſſed in Normandy and Maine; a meaſure which, had it taken effect, muſt have been attended with the moſt ſerious conſequences. In this delicate conjuncture, Lewis was at a loſs how to act; his firſt care, however, was to perſuade the duke of Burgundy to prolong the truce for a year, which he effected, with ſome difficulty, through the mediation of the duke of Brittany, whoſe good offices he had ſecured by the voluntary reſtitution of the town of Ancenis, and by the payment of one quarter of his yearly penſion.

Another enemy which Lewis had to encounter, was Nicholas d'Anjou, duke of Lorraine, and titular duke of Calabria, who had been affianced to the princeſs Anne, daughter to the king, but, who having conceived a diſguſt at the conduct of Lewis, in offering the hand of his deſtined bride to the duke of Guienne, had retired into Flanders; where Charles had ſought to attach him to his intereſt by making him a tender of his daughter, the ſole heireſs to all his dominions. The king, however, was freed from all apprehenſions from that quarter, by the death of Nicholas, who expired ſuddenly, not without ſuſpicions of having been poiſoned.

Immediately after the prolongation of the truce, the king ſecured the perſon of the duke of Alençon, whom he delivered into the hands of the parliament of Paris. But the count of Armagnac was a more formidable enemy, ſince he had thrown a ſtrong garriſon into the caſtle of Lectoure, and made every preparation for an obſtinate defence. Lewis, not daring to leave his frontiers expoſed to the attacks of the duke of Burgundy, employed the militia of the ſouthern provinces to reduce the count; but after that nobleman had ſuſtained a ſiege of two months, the ſeaſon being far advanced, and the king of Arragon having embraced the opportunity to complete the reduction of Rouſſillon, the king ſent orders to his generals to open a negociation with him. The terms required by the count, were theſe: he demanded a ſafe conduct that he might appear at court, and juſtify himſelf to the king, with regard to the crimes of which he was accuſed; ſuch an eſtabliſhment for the counteſs, his wife, as would enable her to live in a manner ſuitable to her rank and birth; a general amneſty for all his followers and partiſans; and a confirmation of the privileges of the citizens and other inhabitants of Lectoure. Theſe conditions were immediately accepted by cardinal Jouffroi, biſhop of Albi, who commanded the expedition, and, in order to give the greater ſolemnity to the agreement, that prelate is ſaid to have broken a conſecrated wafer, one half of which he gave to the count, and the other he ſwallowed himſelf.—Every thing being thus arranged, they were proceeding to fulfil the articles of the capitulation, when the king's troops, profiting by the ſecurity of the garriſon, entered the town, and forced their way to the count's houſe, where one Gorgias maſſacred him with his poignard. For this abominable act of treachery, which Lewis himſelf had doubtleſs commanded, that execrable tyrant rewarded the aſſaſſin with a ſilver cup filled with money, and a commiſſion in his own guards. The counteſs of Armagnac, and her female attendants, were ſtripped by a brutal ſoldiery; the houſes of the citizens were pillaged; their wives and daughters raviſhed; and the old men and children inhumanly maſſacred; after which the town was reduced to aſhes. That nothing might be wanting to complete the horror of the ſcene, the counteſs, who was pregnant, was dragged to the caſtle of Buzet, where the ſavages compelled her to ſwallow a noxious draught, calculated to deſtroy the infant in her womb; and which, in the ſhort ſpace of two days, put a period to her own exiſtence. Several of the count's partiſans were afterwards brought to the ſcaffold.

After the death of the count of Armagnac, Lewis made a fruitleſs attempt to recover the county of Rouſſillon; foiled by the talents and courage of the old king of Arragon, he was compelled to accept a truce for two months; and, after throwing ſupplies into the citadel of Perpignan, and the towns of Salies and Collioure, the army returned to France.

The duke of Burgundy had been induced to conſent to the prolongation of the truce with France, by an opportunity which preſented itſelf at that time for extending his dominions on the ſide of the Rhine *. From Sigiſmond, the prodigal and voluptuous duke of Auſtria, he acquired, for the ſum of eighty thouſand German florins, the county of Ferrette or Pfirt, and the Landgraviate of Alſace, ſubject to redemption by that prince or his heirs; and, by the will of Arnou, duke of Gueldres, he ſucceeded to that duchy, and to the county of Zutphen, to the prejudice of Adolphus, who, on account of his unnatural conduct, had been diſinherited by his father.

Lewis profited by this interval of repoſe to marry his two daughters; Anne, the eldeſt, who had been affianced to the duke of Lorraine, he gave to Peter of Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu, and preſumptive heir to the duke of Bourbon. The youngeſt, Mary, who was greatly inferior to her ſiſter, both in perſonal and mental endowments, married the duke of Orleans, the firſt prince of the blood, to whom ſhe had been promiſed in her infancy. Each of the princeſſes had one hundred thouſand crowns aſſigned them for their marriage portion.

During a fruitleſs negociation for a peace that was opened between Lewis and the duke of Burgundy, the conſtable perceiving the impoſſibility of a perfect reconciliation between ſuch inveterate rivals, reſolved to make ſome attempt towards the eſtabliſhment of that independence to which he had ſo long aſpired. With this view he had the audacity to expel the king's troops from the town of Saint Quentin, of which he was governor, to introduce a garriſon of his own, and to exact an oath of allegiance from the inhabitants. Lewis, enraged at the rebellious conduct of this powerful ſubject, immediately ſuppreſſed his penſions, and ſeized on all the eſtates which he poſſeſſed in France; but, on cool reflection, theſe proceedings appeared to him imprudent, ſince they might force the conſtable to claim the protection of the duke of Burgundy; he, therefore, determined to temporiſe, and expreſſed a willingneſs to liſten to the conſtable's juſtification.—Saint Paul then informed him, by letter, that having detected a correſpondence between the duke of Burgundy and the garriſon of Saint Quentin, the only mode that occurred to him of preſerving the place from the attempts of the enemy, was to take poſſeſſion of it himſelf, and garriſon it with troops and officers on whoſe fidelity he could rely. Lewis, pretending to be a dupe to this artifice, endeavoured to draw the conſtable to court, by ſending him word that he wiſhed to conſult him on matters of the higheſt importance. But Saint Paul was too well acquainted with the king's diſpoſition to fall into the ſnare; he declined the interview, and entered into a private negociation with the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany, and with ſome of the diſcontented nobility of France.

A. D. 1474.] At the commencement of this year, one John Hardy had formed a plan for poiſoning the king, at the inſtigation, it is ſaid, of Ithier, a rich merchant, who had formerly been in the ſervice of the duke of Guienne, but, ſince the death of that prince, had retired into Flanders. Two of the king's domeſtics, to whom Hardy had applied for aſſiſtance in the proſecution of his ſcheme, revealed it to Lewis, and the criminal was accordingly tried by the municipal officers of Paris, who ſentenced him to be quartered alive. Soon after this event, the truce between the king and the duke of Burgundy was prolonged to the firſt of May, 1475.

The prolongation of this truce alarmed the king of Arragon, with whom Lewis had lately concluded a fraudulent treaty, which he reſolved to break on the firſt favourable opportunity that ſhould occur. In order to ſound his intentions, the Arragonian monarch ſent ambaſſadors to France, to complain of the conduct of the French governors, who were guilty of continual infractions of the treaty; and, if they ſhould find it impoſſible to obtain redreſs, they were then to aſſert the claims of Arragon to Rouſſillon and Cerdagna. Lewis refuſed an audience to theſe ambaſſadors, and referred them to a council whom he had appointed to receive their complaints. The council, in compliance with the inſtructions they had received, put them off from time to time, on the moſt frivolous pretexts, and, in ſhort, convinced them, by their conduct, that the chief object of their embaſſy muſt remain unaccompliſhed. Finding this to be the caſe, they proceeded to enforce the pretenſions of their maſter to the diſputed territories. The counties of Rouſſillon and Cerdagne had always—they obſerved—formed a part of the kingdom of Arragon, till the treaty of 1462, when they had been firſt ceded to the king of France, on condition that he ſhould pay the Arragonian monarch the ſum of three hundred thouſand crowns, and ſupply him with ſix hundred lances, and a ſuitable train of artillery, till ſuch time as he ſhould have completed the reduction of Catalonia; that the king of France, however, had not only neglected to fulfil this laſt part of the agreement, but had even fomented the revolt of the Catalonians, and openly ſent ſuccours to John of Anjou, duke of Lorraine, who had placed himſelf at the head of the rebels.

Theſe were facts that would not admit of confutation; but Lewis was neither to be ſwayed by reaſon or juſtice, in oppoſition to the ſuggeſtions of intereſt. The ambaſſadors therefore were diſmiſſed, but means were found to detain them on the road, till ſuch time as a French army had entered Rouſſillon, and reduced the town of Elne, the governor of which they beheaded. They then took Figuieres, and proceeded to inveſt the ſtrong town of Perpignan.

Freſh conferences were now opened between the king and the duke of Burgundy; and their plenipotentiaries, having met at Bouvines, unanimouſly agreed to conſider the conſtable as the chief obſtacle to the concluſion of a peace; it was he, they obſerved, who, in order to gratify his own inſatiate ambition, had been the firſt promoter of the war for the public good; it was he who had firſt ſuggeſted the idea of a marriage between the duke of Guienne and the princeſs of Burgundy; and it was he who had engaged the king to break the treaty of Peronne, by promiſing to put him in poſſeſſion of Amiens and Saint Quentin: ſince that time, they added, he had been ſtudious to foment the animoſity which ſubſiſted between the king and the duke, by calumnious aſſertions, and by falſe reports; a perfidious friend, a dangerous ſpy, fertile in the invention of plots and ſtratagems, he would never, they averred, permit the reſtoration of peace and concord. His ruin, was therefore, reſolved on; and Lewis, who had not forgotten his audacity, in the affair of Saint Quentin, chearfully confirmed the reſolution of the plenipotentiaries. It was agreed that the king ſhould cede to the duke of Burgundy, Saint Quentin, Ham, and Bohain; and that the duke ſhould, in return, ſecure the conſtable, and deliver him up to Lewis; but notwithſtanding every precaution that prudence could ſuggeſt for keeping ſecret the principal object of this negociation, the conſtable gained intelligence of what was in agitation. He immediately wrote to the king, obſerving, that the duke of Burgundy, enraged at his inability either to ſurpriſe or ſeduce him, was endeavouring to promote his ruin, but as it would be an eaſy matter for him to juſtify his conduct, he entreated the king not to force him to an involuntary acceptance of the duke's offers. Lewis, whoſe ſuſpicions were ever awake, imagined that the duke of Burgundy had, himſelf, informed the conſtable of the object of their negociation, in order to induce him to court his protection; and, under this impreſſion, he diſpatched a courier to his plenipotentiaries, ordering them to retract any offers they might have made; and, at the ſame time, he accepted the conſtable's propoſal for an interview, which accordingly took place, on a bridge, between La Fere and Noyon, where the ſame precautions were adopted that had been employed to ſo little purpoſe, at the fatal conference on the bridge of Montereau.—Lewis liſtened with attention to the conſtable's juſtification of his own conduct, and pretending to be convinced by his arguments, he loaded that imperious vaſſal with careſſes, and permitted him to return. But the deep diſſimulation of Lewis was not unmarked by the penetrating eye of Saint-Paul, who now plainly perceived that his deſtruction was fully reſolved on. He had but one means of averting the impending danger; which was, by ſurrendering the towns in his poſſeſſion to the duke of Burgundy, but in that caſe he muſt have renounced his favourite project of independence, and have ſubmitted to the mercy and caprice of a maſter to whom he had given juſt cauſe for offence. The obſtinate ſtruggle which took place in his mind between fear and ambition, prevented him from adopting any deciſive reſolution. Three times did he invite the Burgundian troops to take poſſeſſion of Saint Quentin, and as often did he ſhut the gates againſt them.

The duke of Alençon was now brought to trial by the parliament of Paris, and being convicted of conſpiring againſt the ſtate; of maintaining a criminal correſpondence with the enemies of the kingdom; of homicide; of confiſcating the current coin of the realm; and of an intent to deliver his towns to the duke of Burgundy; he was pronounced guilty of high treaſon, and condemned to die.—All his poſſeſſions were declared to be forfeited to the crown *. His puniſhment, however, was changed into perpetual impriſonment, and the greater part of his eſtates were reſtored to his ſon, the count of Perche. The duke died in priſon, about two years after his trial.

An inſurrection of the people of Bourges, on account of an extraordinary tax for the repair and ſupport of the fortifications of that city, though ſpeedily quelled, alarmed the jealous and ſuſpicious temper of Lewis, who conceived it to be the effect of ſome general plan for overturning his government. He therefore eſtabliſhed an armed inquſition in Bourges; the members whereof had full power of life and death over all the inhabitants, of whatever rank; and they were ſtrictly enjoined by Lewis, to be diligent in their ſearch, and ſevere in their puniſhments; the tyrant even deſignated ſome of the principal citizens, who, he deſired, might be hanged at the doors of their own houſes. Fortunately, the commiſſioners were more juſt and merciful than their ſovereign; ſome few only of the inſurgents were executed, though many of the inhabitants were baniſhed, and ſtill more of them fined. The municipal officers were depoſed; and a mayor and twelve aldermen choſen in their ſtead; the king reſerving to himſelf the right of naming them.

But the attention of Lewis was ſoon called to objects of a more alarming nature, to dangers of greater magnitude, which threatened no leſs than the ſubverſion of his throne, and the deſtruction of the monarchy. We have already obſerved, that immediately after the defeat of the Lancaſtrians by Edward the Fourth, that monarch had propoſed to aſſiſt the duke of Burgundy in conquering the kingdom of France, but that the duke had then been induced to reject the propoſal, through fear of offending the French nobility, with whom he had formed an alliance. This objection, however, being now removed by the death of the duke of Guienne, the project was revived. Edward, ſtill ſtimulated by a ſpirit of revenge againſt Lewis, for the aſſiſtance which he had already afforded to the houſe of Lancaſter, and urged by his fears for the protection which he might ſtill afford to the friends of that family, determined to attack his dominions; and, though the conduct of the duke of Burgundy, during Edward's exile, had not been ſuch as could inſpire him with any ſentiments of eſteem for that prince, the political intereſts of their ſtates proved the means of maintaining a cloſe connection between them; and they agreed to unite their arms in making a powerful invaſion of France. A league was accordingly formed, in which Edward ſtipulated to paſs the ſeas with an army exceeding ten thouſand men, and to make an incurſion into the territories of Lewis; Charles promiſed to join him with all his forces; the king of England was to lay claim to the crown of France, and to obtain, at leaſt, the provinces of Normandy and Guienne; while the duke was to acquire Champagne, and to exonerate all his dominions from the burthen of homage to the French monarch; and neither party was to make peace without the conſent of the other*.

The duke of Brittany alſo joined the league, and was to obtain the county of Poitou as his portion of the ſpoil; he required to be ſupplied with a body of Engliſh troops, to the amount of three thouſand; and promiſed to do more good to the cauſe of the confederates in one month, by the ſecret correſpondence which he maintained in France, than the combined forces of England and Burgundy could effect in ſix; for which purpoſe, however, he deemed it neceſſary to diſſemble with Lewis †. The conſtable, too, was not idle on this occaſion; he ſecretly engaged to receive the Engliſh into Saint Quentin, and into the other towns which he occupied on the river Somme.

If Charles had been as careful in the regulation of his own conduct, as he was in directing the future operations of his allies; if he had employed the interval of tranquillity allowed him by the truce in forming alliances with the neighbouring princes, in diſciplining his troops, and in preparing magazines; if, intent on his principal object, he had rejected all ſchemes that were foreign from it; it is certain that France would have been expoſed to the moſt eminent danger, and that Lewis, in ſpite of his courage and activity, muſt, infallibly, have been ſubdued. Independent of the combined forces of England, Burgundy, and Brittany, he had to dread the efforts of the conſtable, whoſe office, birth, fortune, and abilities, gave him a great influence over the minds of the French nobility. The duke of Bourbon was diſcontented with the king, and was alſo the friend and ally of the houſe of Burgundy; Rene d'Anjou, titular king of Sicily, aſcribing all his loſſeſs and misfortunes to Lewis, had already conceived a deſign of making Charles his heir; the duke of Nemours was enraged at the humiliation he had lately experienced, and at the aſſaſſination of his kinſman, the count of of Armagnac; the ducheſs of Savoy, ſiſter to Lewis, allured by the hope of marrying her ſon to the heireſs of Burgundy, had embraced the party of Charles, and had prevailed on the duke of Milan to follow her example; the king of Naples, whoſe ſon was at the court of Burgundy, might be reckoned as another enemy; and the king of Arragon, and his ſon prince Ferdinad, were actually at war with France. What forces could Lewis have oppoſed to enemies thus numerous and powerful? His attempts to defend one province muſt have left all the others open to attack; the moſt ſplendid victory could only have ſecured the preſervation of a town, while a ſingle defeat might have proved fatal to the monarchy. Charles, who was the ſoul of the confederacy, had it now in his power to decide on the fate of France; but, hurried away by the native impetuoſity of his mind, and by his inordinate ambition, he had not courage to reſiſt the deceitful allurements of fortune: with a view to extend his dominions on the ſide of Germany, and to forward the accompliſhment of his favourite project, the erection of his territories into a kingdom, he undertook to reſtore the biſhop of Cologne, who had been depoſed by the people *. This engaged him in a war with the whole Germanic body; and the obſtinate defence made by the ſtrong town of Nuiz on the Rhine, in the ſiege of which his whole army was employed, diſabled him from fulfilling his treaty with Edward, and, of courſe, diſconcerted all his projects, with regard to the conqueſt of France.

Lewis, meanwhile, formed an alliance with the Swiſs cantons, and promoted a reconciliation between them and Sigiſmond, duke of Auſtria, who was anxious to recover the county of Ferrette, and the Landgraviate of Alſace, which he had pledged to the duke of Burgundy. All the Imperial towns on the Upper Rhine joined this confederacy, and, as they had an evident intereſt in preventing Charles from forming any eſtabliſhments in their vicinity, they ſupplied Sigiſmond with the ſum that was requiſite for the redemption of his territories. Charles refuſing to accept the money, the allies entered the county of Ferrette, and reſtored it to the duke of Auſtria; the Swiſs then penetrated into Franche-Comte, defeated the provincial militia, took the towns of Blamont and Gramont by aſſault, and, after cutting in pieces a body of troops under the command of the count of Romont, a prince of the houſe of Savoy, returned to their mountains laden with booty.

A. D. 1475] During theſe tranſactions, the king of England had been employed in making the moſt formidable preparations for his projected enterpriſe, and in forming farther alliances in order to enſure its ſucceſs. He concluded treaties with the emperor, and with Ferdinand, king of Sicily; he alſo prolonged the truce with Scotland to the year 1515, and ſecured the friendſhip of the Scots, by concluding a contract of marriage between their prince and his then youngeſt daughter, the princeſs Cecilia, both of them infants. All the neceſſary preparations being, at length, completed, Edward ſailed from Sandwich about midſummer, and landed ſafe at Calais with a powerful army, conſiſting of fifteen hundred men at arms, and fifteen thouſand archers, attended by all the principal nobility of England. His firſt ſtep was to diſpatch a herald to Lewis, to claim the crown of France, and to deliver him a defiance, in caſe of refuſal. Lewis, inſtead of ſuffering his reſentment to dictate an anſwer to the proud challange he had received, gave the herald who brought it the moſt cordial reception; he aſſured him that he entertained the higheſt reſpect for his maſter, the king of England, who, he knew, had been urged to undertake the preſent expedition by the duke of Burgundy, and the conſtable; whoſe advice had been influenced by the moſt intereſted motives, and who would not fail to abandon their ally, the moment their own private views ſhould be gratified. Lewis then made the herald a preſent of three hundred crowns; and promiſed him the farther ſum of one thouſand, if he would employ his good offices in effecting an accommodation. The herald, who was a native of Normandy, won by the condeſcenſion not leſs than the liberality of Lewis, readily promiſed to promote his views to the utmoſt of his power; and adviſed him to addreſs all his propoſals for peace to the lords Howard and Stanley, who had great influence over Edward, and who were averſe from his preſent conduct. The French monarch then committed the herald to the care of Philip de Commines, with a ſtrict charge to ſpare neither pains nor expence in making him contented with his reception.

The king now exerted himſelf to the utmoſt in order to put his kingdom in a proper ſtate of defence, and no reſources were neglected which human foreſight or activity could ſupply. The army which he ſent into Rouſſillon, was ſtill engaged in the ſiege of Perpignan, which would probably have reſiſted every attempt to reduce it, but for the death of Henry, king of Caſtile, which called off the attention of the king of Arragon to another quarter. The dreadful ſituation to which the town was, by this time, reduced, may be conceived from the circumſtance of a woman, who, having loſt one of her children by hunger, cut the body into pieces, and uſed it as the means of preſerving her own life, and that of her remaining child *. The inhabitants, unable any longer to ſupport their complicated diſtreſſes, capitulated, and obtained the liberty, for ſuch as ſhould not chuſe to remain in the town, to retire into the territories of the king of Arragon. Lewis, enraged at the reſiſtance he had experienced, ordered the moſt opulent citizens of Perpignan, and all the principal nobility in the environs, to be maſſacred; but Bouſile, who had been appointed governor of the province, exerted, on this occaſion, the humanity of a Chriſtian, and the dignity of a man; he peremptorily refuſed to obey the orders of this vindictive and blood-thirſty tyrant; and, by a ſpirited remonſtrance, ſaved the deſtined victims from unmerited deſtruction.

The king, by the reduction of Perpignan, being enabled to form a junction of his forces, ordered his whole army to advance to the frontiers of Picardy; where they ſpeedily reduced the towns of Tronquoi, Montdidier, Roie, Brai-upon-Somme, and Corbie. They then penetrated into the province of Artois, burnt a number of fortreſſes, and advanced to the very gates of Arras. The garriſon, of that town, having made an injudicious ſally, ſuſtained a total defeat, and James de Saint-Paul, brother to the conſtable, was taken a priſoner, with ſeveral other officers of rank.

Manuſc. de le Grand.

Edward, in the mean time, had advanced into Picardy, expecting to be joined by the forces of the duke of Burgundy, according to the promiſe of that prince; but the army which Charles had led into Germany was, from the attacks of the enemy, and from the hardſhips of a winter campaign, rendered wholly unfit for farther ſervice. To pacify Edward, who was greatly diſguſted with his conduct, the duke repaired in perſon to the Engliſh camp, apoligized for this breach of treaty, and aſſured him that the conſtable would ſurrender to him the ſtrong town of St. Quentin; but when the Engliſh army approached that place, Saint-Paul fired upon them from the ramparts, and, by an unexpected ſally, put great numbers of them to death. The duke of Burgundy, who was ſtill with the Engliſh army, being neither able to account for this ſingular conduct of the conſtable, nor to ſupport the ſevere reproaches of the Engliſh monarch, departed abruptly, and left Edward in a violent rage, beſtowing execrations on his treacherous allies, and expreſſing his diſguſt at an expedition from which he was not likely to derive either honour or emolument.

During theſe tranſactions, a man arrived at Compiégne, from the Engliſh camp, who aſked to ſpeak with the king; he proved to be a lacquey in the ſervice of the lord of Graſſai, and having been the firſt priſoner that was taken, he was diſmiſſed, according to a cuſtom which then prevailed, without a ranſom. On quiting the camp, he had met the lords Howard and Stanley, who had given him ſome money, and told him to recommend them to the good graces of the king, his maſter, in caſe he ſhould find an opportunity of ſpeaking to him. Proud of his commiſſion, the man reſolved on fulfilling it without delay; and immediately after his arrival at Compiégne; though the night was far advanced, he inſiſted on ſeeing Lewis; but his requeſt was refuſed; and being taken for a ſpy, he was thrown into priſon. Lewis however, having paid him a viſit, ordered him to be releaſed, and determined to ſend him as a herald to Edward. The man, whoſe name was Merindot, having received his inſtructions, and being provided with the dreſs of a herald, which he was ordered not to put on till he ſhould approach the Engliſh camp, leſt, the object of his miſſion being diſcovered by the partiſans of the duke of Burgundy, he ſhould be prevented from proceeding, ſet out on his journey. The preſent diſpoſition of Edward was highly favourable to the ſucceſs of his negociation; and he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that that monarch was induced to hold a council in his camp, near Peronne, on the thirteenth of Auguſt, in which the poverty of the army, the near approach of winter, and the treacherous neglect of his allies, were urged as ſtrong incitements to the negociation of a truce; and a commiſſion was, accordingly, given to lord Howard and three others, for that purpoſe. The admiral of France, Saint-Pierre and the biſhop of Evreux, were appointed by the king to confer with the Engliſh plenipotentiaries.

Lewis, anxious to bring this affair to a ſpeedy termination, ordered Doriole, who had ſucceeded to the high office of Chancellor, on the death of Juvenal des Urſins, to affix the great ſeal to ſix blank ſheets of parchment, which he meant to employ for the purpoſe of attaching Edward's chief miniſters and counſellors to his intereſt *. He then ſent the chancellor, with Matthew Beauvarlet, and Michael Gaillard, to Paris, to prepare what money he wanted; and theſe commiſſioners obtained from the parliament all the different ſums which had been lodged in that court till ſuch time as the pretenſions of the various claimants could be eſtabliſhed; but they were obliged to enter into a private obligation to reſtore them, whenever they ſhould be called upon for that purpoſe. The preſidents of the parliament alſo borrowed, in their own names, of James Erlan, two thouſand crowns, which they delivered to the commiſſioners, who pledged themſelves for the repayment of the money before the firſt of October following. Theſe facts, with many others of a ſimilar nature, which occur in the Hiſtory of France, prove that the king never borrowed money in his own name; and that thoſe whom he appointed to borrow for him, were obliged to become ſecurity for the re-payment, and actually to pay the money, if the king neglected to pay it himſelf. By this means the ſtate never contracted any debts.

MS. de le Grand.

As Lewis was reſolved on peace, the plenipotentiaries experienced no obſtruction in the accompliſhment of their taſk; and a truce, for ſeven years, was concluded on the ninteenth of Auguſt, on ſuch terms as the Engliſh choſe to preſcribe, which certainly were not very honourable to Lewis. It was ſtipulated—That the king of France ſhould pay the ſum of ſeventy-five thouſand crowns to the king of England, within fifteen days; that he ſhould, moreover, pay him fifty thouſand crowns a-year, during their joint lives; that the dauphin of France, when of age, ſhould marry the princeſs Elizabeth, one of Edward's daughter's; and that Edward ſhould withdraw his army from France, as ſoon as he ſhould have received the ſeventy-five thouſand crowns. In this truce ſuch of the allies as choſe to accede to it were comprehended†. By one article of the treaty, Lewis engaged to pay Edward fifty thouſand crowns, for the releaſe of Margaret of Anjou; in conſequence of which, that unfortunate princeſs was ſuffered to return to her native country, where ſhe ſpent the remainder of her days in tranquil privacy, till the year 1482, when ſhe died. This act of generoſity would reflect honour on Lewis, did not his ſubſequent conduct to the relations of Margaret, afford juſt grounds for believing that he was entirely ſwayed by motives of intereſt‡.

When every point had thus been amicably adjuſted, an interview took place between the two monarchs, on a bridge over the Somme, at Pequigni, near Amiens, in the center whereof a ſtrong barrier was erected, and where ſuch other precautions were adopted, as the treacherous ſpirit of the times ſeemed to juſtify. Edward and Lewis here ſwore, in the moſt ſolemn manner, to a ſtrict obſervance of the treaty; after which, they paſſed ſome time in friendly and familiar converſation.

Lewis was not only anxious to acquire the friendſhip of Edward, but the confidence of the Engliſh nation, and of the chief perſons in the Engliſh court. With this view he was profuſe in the diſtribution of preſents; he beſtowed annual penſions, to the amount of ſixteen thouſand crowns, on ſeveral of Edward's favourites; on lord Haſtings, one of two thouſand crowns; on the lords Howard, Stanley, and others, in proportion; and theſe noblemen were not aſhamed thus to receive the wages of corruption from a foreign potentate. Lord Haſtings, indeed, refuſed for ſome years, to give a receipt for his penſion, that no proof of his infamy might be preſerved in the public regiſters of France. As the two armies, after the concluſion of the truce, remained ſome days in the vicinity of each other, Lewis ſent the Engliſh troops a preſent of three hundred cart-loads of the beſt wine his country produced; he likewiſe admitted them freely into Amiens, the place of his reſidence, where he defrayed all their charges, ordering every inkeeper to ſupply them with whatever they ſhould require, without exacting any payment. In conſequence of this indulgence, they flocked thither in ſuch multitudes, that above nine thouſand of them were once in the town at the ſame time, when they might have eaſily ſecured the king's perſon; but Lewis concluding, from their diſſolute manner of living, that no danger was to be apprehended, was careful not to betray the ſmalleſt ſigns of ſuſpicion or miſtruſt; and when Edward, informed of this diſorder, deſired him to ſhut the gates againſt them, he replied, that he never would conſent to exclude the Engliſh from any place where he reſided; but that Edward, if he pleaſed, might recal them, and fix his own officers at the gates of Amiens to prevent their return*.

The extreme eagerneſs of Lewis to acquire the confidence and friendſhip of the Engliſh, had induced him to make ſome imprudent advances, which afterwards cauſed him no ſmall trouble to evade. During the conference on the bridge of Pequigni, he told Edward, that he ſhould be glad to be favored with a viſit from him at Paris, where he would introduce him to the beauties of that metropolis; and, ſhould any offences requiring pardon be the conſequence of ſuch introduction, he would aſſign him the cardinal de Bourbon for a confeſſor†, who would not fail to give him abſolution. This hint made a deeper impreſſion than Lewis intended. Lord Howard, who accompanied him on his return to Amiens, told him, in confidence, that if he were ſo diſpoſed, it would be very poſſible to perſuade Edward to take a journey with him to Paris, where they might indulge themſelves in mirth and recreation. Lewis, at firſt, pretended not to hear the offer, but, on Howard's repeating it, he expreſſed his concern, that the war in which he was engaged with the duke of Burgundy, would not premit him to wait on his royal gueſt, and do him the honours he intended. "Edward," ſaid he, privately, to Commines, "is a very handſome, "and a very amorous prince: ſome lady at Paris may like him as well as he ſhall "like her, and may invite him to return thither in another manner. I am very " glad to have him, for a friend and brother, beyond the ſea; but I am not fond " of his company; his predeceſſors took up their reſidence ſomewhat too long at " Paris and in Normandy. It is better that the ſea be between us."

Lewis, anxious to haſten the departure of the Engliſh, paid, without delay, the ſtiplated ſum, when the Engliſh monarch embarked at Calais, and arrived at England on the twenty-eighth of September. Thus ended an expedition which had given ſuch ſerious alarm to the king of France, and which had been attended with ſuch conſiderable expence, that the money he had received from Lewis, together with his penſion, formed but a very inadequate compenſation to Edward, who could only boaſt of having humbled his adverſary. But that adverſary, regarding intereſt as the ſole teſt of honour, not only bore his humiliation with patience, but conceived that he had obtained a very important advantage over Edward, by purchaſing his departure on ſuch eaſy terms. This, indeed, was a ſource of triumph to Lewis, though he was careful to conceal his joy, and ſtrictly prohibited his courtiers from treating the Engliſh with that mockery and deriſion to which he thought they had fairly ſubjected themſelves. One evening, however, when he was off his guard, his exultations got the better of his prudence, and he indulged himſelf in raillery at the eaſy ſimplicity of Edward and his council; but, while he was talking, he perceived a man ſtanding in one corner of the room, who had overheard all his converſation. He proved to be a Gaſcon merchant, ſettled in England, who had come to aſk the king's permiſſion to export a few pipes of wine, without paying the uſual duties. Lewis was immediately ſenſible of his indiſcretion, and he offered the Gaſcon ſuch advantages in his own country, as engaged him to remain in France. " It is but juſt," ſaid the king, " that I " ſhould pay the penalty of my talkativeneſs*."

Edward, previous to his embarkation, had ſent to appriſe the duke of Burgundy of the truce which he had concluded with Lewis, and to inform him, that he was at liberty to accede to it if he choſe†. But Charles told his envoys, that he had not invited the Engliſh into France to procure him a truce, but merely to furniſh them with the means of repairing their former loſſes; that he had believed Edward to be worthy of the rank he enjoyed, but after his late conduct, he was at liberty to depart as ſoon as he thought proper; and to convince him, purſued the duke, that I ſtand in no need of his aſſiſtance, I engage to conclude neither peace nor truce with France, till three months after his return to England. He was not, however, faithful to his word, for, yielding to the earneſt ſolicitations of Lewis, he was prevailed on to ſend plenipotentiaries to Soleure, a ſmall town in the duchy of Luxembourg, where a truce for nine years was ſigned between France and Burgundy, on the thirteenth of September. The conſtable was the firſt victim of the reconciliation between the two princes; Charles ſwore never to pardon him, and engaged, if he ſhould fall into his hands, to deliver him up to the king; in return for which Lewis engaged to cede to the duke the towns of Saint

Quentin, Ham and Bohain, with all the treaſures which the conſtable had amaſſed. Lewis farther promiſed to give no aſſiſtance, either directly or indirectly, to the young duke of Lorraine, whom he had incited to take up arms againſt Charles; he alſo engaged to aſſiſt Charles againſt the emperor, the citizens of Cologne, and all their adherents. Edward, who was preparing to embark for England, when he heard of this negociation, ſent Thomas Montgomery to the king, to entreat him to make no conceſſion to his proud vaſſal, and to tell him, that if he ſtood in need of aſſiſtance, he would himſelf return in the enſuing ſpring, with all his forces, and aid him to ſubdue the duke of Burgundy. This offer, however, Lewis deemed it prudent to reject.

At the ſame time that the king ſigned a truce with the duke of Burgundy, he prolonged one which he had concluded, about ſix months before, with the king of Arragon, for a year; and, immediately after, he entered into an offenſive and defenſive league with the king of Portugal, againſt prince Ferdinand and his father; by which he engaged to lead an army into the kingdom of Arragon, after Alphonſo ſhould have effected the expulſion of Ferdinand from the kingdom of Caſtile.

Although the duke of Brittany had, as an ally, been comprehended in the truce which Lewis had ſigned with the king of England and the duke of Burgundy, and although Edward had expreſsly declared to the king himſelf, that if any attack were made on the duke, he would aſſiſt him with all his forces, yet Lewis reſolved to profit by the preſent interval of tranquillity to make him accede to ſuch terms as he ſhould chuſe to dictate. Francis unable to oppoſe his efforts, appointed plenipotentiaries, who ſigned a treaty with Lewis; by which the duke renounced all alliance with the enemies of the ſtate, and engaged to aſſiſt the king with all his forces in defence of the kingdom, whenever called on for that purpoſe, but not to march beyond the limits of his duchy.

Lewis now profitted by the abſence of the duke of Burgundy, who was engaged in an attempt to reduce the ducy of Lorraine, to execute his ſchemes of revenge againſt the conſtable. Saint Paul, appriſed of his intentions, renounced all his projects of independence, and only thought of ſaving his life. In this emergency he applied to Charles, to whom he offered to ſurrender all the places in his poſſeſſion, provided he would afford him protection. The duke, notwithſtanding his late engagements with the king, accepted his offer, granted him a ſafe conduct, and ſent a body of troops to take poſſeſſion of Saint Quentin. But he was anticipated by Lewis, who ſuddenly advanced, with twenty thouſand men, to the gates of that town, ſome of whoſe inhabitants he had previouſly engaged in his intereſt; and, at his approach, Saint-Paul fled to Mons. Saint Quentin then opened its gates to the king, who, with equal facility, acquired poſſeſſion of Ham, Bohain, and Beaurevoir. When Lewis had thus diſpoſſeſſed the conſtable of all his places, he called upon Charles to fulfill the conditions of the treaty of Soleure. Charles was then engaged in the ſiege of Nancy, and as he was at a loſs how to act, he wiſhed to defer his anſwer till he had reduced that city, but

Lewis inſiſted on an immediate reply, and ſent orders to the lord of Craon, to advance, with a ſtrong body of troops, to the confines of Lorraine. The duke of Burgundy, conſcious of his inability to complete the reduction of that province, if oppoſed by the king of France, ordered Hugonet and Imbercourt to repair to Mons, and at the expiration of eight days to deliver up the conſtable to the king's envoys. He expected before that time to be maſter of Nancy, when he might ſend a counter order to his miniſters; but the place held out ſome days longer than he expected, and the counter-order arrived three hours too late. The conſtable was delivered into the hands of the admiral of France, and the lord of Saint Pierre, who had advanced to the frontiers to receive him: he was thence conveyed to Paris, and having been convicted of high-treaſon by the parliament, he ſuffered decapitation. Lewis ceded the towns of Saint Quentin, Ham, and Bohain to Charles, with all the treaſures and moveable effects of the conſtable, reſerving only for himſelf the eſtates which Saint-Paul poſſeſſed in France. On this occaſion Lewis obſerved, "*That he and the duke of Burgundy had been engaged in a fox-chace; that Charles had carried off the fox's ſkin, which was valuable, but that the fleſh, which was good for nothing, had fallen to his ſhare."

A. D. 1476.] Charles had, by this time, added the country of Lorraine to his former dominions; but though he poſſeſſed the courage and ambition of a conquerer, he had neither the prudence nor policy of a ſtateſman. Ever ardent in his enterpriſes, and ſwayed by a reſiſtleſs impetuoſity of temper, he liſtened to the complaints of the count of Romont, whoſe territories the Swiſs had invaded, and inconſiderately engaged in a war with that virtuous and hardy people, who were formidable from the poſſeſſion of that courage which freedom inſpires, as well as from their exemption from the luxurious vices of their continental neighbours.

In vain did the Swiſs endeavour to deprecate the wrath of Charles; he was deaf to every propoſal, however ſubmiſſive or advantageous, and entered, with his troops, a bleak and mountainous country, which could only recompenſe his hazard and toils with an abundant harveſt of barren laurels. After reducing ſome inconſiderable places, he laid ſiege to Granſon, which was defended by a garriſon of five hundred Swiſs, who, after a ſpirited reſiſtance, ſurrendered at diſcretion.—Charles immediately conſigned them to the provoſt of his army, who hanged four hundred on the neighbouring trees, and drowned the reſt in the lake of Neuchatel. Soon after the town had ſurrendered, the duke was informed that an army of Swiſs was advancing to attack him; but he diſregarded the intelligence, and purſued his march. As the chief ſtrength of his army conſiſted in cavalry, he muſt certainly have cruſhed the enemy, could he have drawn them into the even plain; but he was no ſooner convinced they were really approaching, than he imprudently entered the defiles of the mountain, where there was no room for his forces to act; the conſequence of this imprudent ſtep was a general diſperſion of his troops, who fled with the utmoſt precipitation. After this victory, the Swiſs re-took Granſon by aſſault, when they took down the bodies of their countrymen from the trees to which they were ſuſpended, and replaced them with an equal number of Burgundians.

Charles had ſo long been accuſtomed to the ſmiles of fortune, that he could ill brook the frowns of the fickle goddeſs. His late diſgrace had ſuch effect on his mind, that it brought on a ſevere fit of ſickneſs; but determined on revenge, he ſpeedily raiſed a freſh army, and formed the ſiege of Morat, in the canton of Friburg, a ſmall town, but ſtrongly fortified, and defended by a garriſon of eighteen hundred men.* The duke was repulſed in three different aſſaults; and, after he had paſſed fifteen days before the place, he was informed that the Swiſs army, reinforced by the confederate cities of the Upper Rhine, was advancing to give him battle. Highly pleaſed at the intelligence, he haſtened to reconnoitre the enemy, but his uſual precipitation prevented him from aſcertaining their numbers, which amounted to thirty thouſand infantry, and four thouſand cavalry, whereas his own forces did not exceed twenty-five thouſand effective men. He was adviſed by his officers, to raiſe the ſiege of Morat, and fix his camp in an open plain, where his cavalry, having full ſcope for exertion, would give him a great advantage over the enemy; but his blind rage led him to reject this prudent council, and leaving two hundred lances to guard his lines, he advanced to meet the Swiſs, who were commanded by Rene, the young duke of Lorraine, whoſe territories the duke of Burgundy had ſeized.

On the approach of Charles, Rene poſted his infantry behind a thick hedge, impervious by the cavalry; while Charles ſent his free archers, ſupported by a body of horſe, to diſlodge them; but this manœuvre, failing of effect, cauſed the loſs of the battle; for attempting to withdraw his archers, who were ſeverely handled by the enemy, protected, themſelves, by the hedge, he threw his whole army into diſorder, and the Swiſs, profiting by the occaſion, ruſhed forward and compleated their confuſion. From ſixteen to eighteen thouſand of the Burgundians were left dead on the field; and amongſt them were the count of Marle, one of the ſons of the late conſtable de Saint Paul; James du Mas; Grinberghe, Roſembois, Mailli and Bournonville, all brave and experienced officers.

Charles was now afraid that Lewis, his iveterate and moſt dangerous enemy, would avail himſelf of the preſent conjuncture to break the truce and attack his dominions; he therefore ſent the lord of Contai to ſound his intentions, and to inſpire him, if poſſible, with ſentiments of juſtice and generoſity †. Lewis promiſed to obſerve the truce, from a conviction, that he could not more effectually atchieve the deſtruction of the duke, than by abandoning him to his own unbridled paſſions, and by leaving him to purſue the war againſt the Swiſs, which he ſtill perſevered in with incredible obſtinacy; but he attacked him in a manner leſs honourable, and more inſidious, by endeavouring to corrupt his beſt officers. The count of Campobaſſo, a native of Naples, and exiled from his country as a partiſan of the houſe of Anjou, held the principal place in the favour of Charles; and Lewis, being informed that this man had ſome cauſe for complaint againſt the duke, endeavoured to ſeduce him from his ſervice. Campobaſſo offered more than was required of him; he promiſed to deliver up his maſter to the king, alive or dead. Lewis, either from abhorrence of his treachery which diſſolved all ties between a prince and his ſervant, or from a belief that the plan had been concerted with the duke himſelf, revealed the deſign to Charles. But the character of Lewis induced the duke to deſpiſe the intelligence: "If it were "true, the king would never impart to me ſo important a ſecret," was the reply of Charles; who even redoubled his marks of confidence and attachment to the perfidious Neapoliton.

* Commines—Meyer—Chron. Scand.—Haraeus Annal. Brab. † Commines—Le Grand.

The duke of Burgundy, overwhelmed with ſhame and indignation, paſſed his melancholy hours at La Riviere; abandoning himſelf to deſpair, he ſuffered his beard and nails to grow, refuſed to change his dreſs, and ſecluded himſelf from the ſight of his moſt confidential miniſters. His extreme anxiety occaſioned an affection of the heart, which prevented the free circulation of the blood, and reſiſted the efforts of medical ſkill. The duke of Lorraine, ſecretly aſſiſted by Lewis, took this opportunity to recover his native dominions; and the rapid progreſs of his arms, with the reduction of Nancy, roufed Charles from his lethargy, and made him haſten to the relief of that province. He determined to inveſt the capital; but, as the winter was far advanced, his moſt experienced officers adviſed him to ſtation his troops in ſome of the neighbouring towns, and to wait patiently till the garriſon of Nancy ſhould have conſumed all their proviſions, when they would be obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. But theſe tardy meaſures by no means accorded with the eager impatience of Charles, who liſtened only to the dictates of indignation; ſo that, notwithſtanding the inclemency of the ſeaſon, and the general diſcontent of his troops, he gave orders to open the trenches. He then ſhut himſelf up in his tent, and left Campobaſſo to direct the operations of the ſiege. This Italian traitor, who, it was believed had once ſuffered from the ungovernable rage of Charles the indignity of a blow, determined, at all events, to betray the duke; having failed in the application to Lewis, he now offered his ſervices to the duke of Lorraine, to whom he promiſed to give ſufficient time to collect his troops, and even to deliver, for a ſtipulated reward, his maſter to him, alive or dead.

The money which Rene had received from Lewis had enabled him to raiſe an army of eight thouſand Swiſs, which was joined by conſiderable reinforcements from the confederate cities of Germany, and by ſeveral detachments of French troops, who, by the orders of Lewis demanded to ſerve as volunteers, ſo that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of eighteen or twenty thouſand men. The Burgundian army, on the contrary, was ſo weakened by the loſſes they had ſuſtained during the ſiege, by ſickneſs and deſertion, that when it was reviewed by the count of Chimai, it was found to contain only three thouſand effective men. When the count informed Charles of this circumſtance, who was wholly ignorant of the ſtate of his camp, that prince burſt into a tranſport of rage, and exclaimed—" Were I alone, I would fight the enemy!"—At length, however, the duke opened his eyes to the danger of his ſituation, when he immediately diſpatched orders to the governors of his provinces, to ſend him a reinforcement of troops, and to arm all his vaſſals without delay; but before theſe orders could even be received by thoſe to whom they were addreſſed, the enemy appeared in ſight. On their approach, the count of Campobaſſo quitted the Burgundinn army with his company, which conſiſted of two hundred lances, and went over to the duke of Lorraine; the next day his example was followed by two other Italian captains. The Germans and Swiſs deteſting this perfidy, and thinking it a diſgrace to hold any commerce with ſuch traitors, refuſed to admit them into their ranks, and compelled Rene to diſmiſs them. Campobaſſo and his treacherons companions, being obliged to leave the camp, took their poſt on the bridge of Bouxieraes, in order to cut off the retreat of ſuch of the Burgundians as ſhould eſcape the ſword of the enemy.

A. D. 1477] Charles, whoſe army was now reduced to little more than two thouſand men, called a council of war, the members whereof were unanimous in their opinion on the neceſſity of raiſing the ſiege, and avoiding an action; they adviſed Charles, if he were averſe to the evacuation of the province, to intrench himſelf under the walls of Pont-a-Mouſſon, and there wait for the reinforcements which muſt ſoon arrive from Hainaut, Brabant, and the duchy of Luxembourg; and they repreſented to him, that all delays muſt neceſſarily turn to his advantage, ſince his army would daily acquire an acceſſion of ſtrength; whereas that of the enemy, being chiefly compoſed of mercenary troops, would ſoon diſperſe from want of pay and ſubſiſtance.

The duke of Burgundy, who appears, at this period, to have acted under the influence of infatuation, paid no attention to advice, which nothing but the moſt fatal preſumption, or inſanity itſelf, couuld have rejected. He reminded his officers of the glory they had acquired by their former atchievements, and bade them recollect the ever-memorable ſiege of Nuiz, when, with an army inferior, in the proportion of one to three, he had braved the undivided forces of the empire." If we have ſince, " purſued Charles, " ſuſtained ſome loſſes, they have not " afforded any opportunity of triumph to the enemy, who have hitherto kept " themſelves encloſed in inacceſſible places, not daring to face us in the open " field; ſhall we now then, when the opportunity for which we have been ſo " long anxious occurs, heſitate one mement to attack them?—In ſhort, to " whatever ſituation fortune may reduce me, it ſhall never be ſaid that I fled be- " fore a child:"—Alluding to the duke of Lorraine.

On the morning of the fifth of January, Charles left his lines and advanced towards the enemy; the rival armies ſoon met, and though the cold was exceſſive, and the ſnow fell in great abundance, the action immediately commenced. The event was ſuch as might naturally be expected from the extreme diſproportion of numbers; Charles after fulfilling all the duties of a great general, and a brave ſoldier, was at length attacked by Charles de Beaumont, feneſchal of Saint Die; having already received ſeveral wounds, and now finding himſelf faint with loſs of blood, he called out to his adverſary, who did not know with whom he was engaged—"Save the duke of Burgundy;"—but Beaumont, who was deaf, thinking he ſaid "Long live Burgundy," aimed a furious blow at his head, which felled him lifeleſs to the ground. Beſides the duke of Burgundy himſelf, there periſhed in this action, his virtuous kinſman, De Bievres; Contai, diſtinguiſhed for his inviolable attachment to his ſovereign; and the lords of Croi and Vieuville. The principal priſoners were Anthony and Baldwin, baſtards of Burgundy; the counts of Naſſau, Rhetel and Chimai; Joſſe de Lalain; the Marquis of Rothelin; young Montaigue; Oliver de la Marche, and the brave Galliot*.

Immediately after the action, the duke of Lorraine entered his capital, amidſt the acclamations of his ſubjects. It was not known what had become of the duke of Burgundy, as he was not among the priſoners, and no one knew that he was killed; it was generally believed that he had fled. But the next day his death was aſcertained by a page, who had been taken by Campobaſſo on the bridge of Bouxierres, and who had ſeen him fall. Being conducted to the ſpot, the body was found covered with blood and dirt, and the face ſo diſfigured, that his own brother only knew him by ſome private marks; by a ſcar in the neck, from a wound which he had received at the battle of Montlheri, and by the extreme length of his nails, which had not been cut ſince the period of his firſt defeat. While the body laid in ſtate at Nancy, the duke of Lorraine, who went to view it, took the lifeleſs hand of his departed kinſman, and burſting into tears, exclaimed—"Fair couſin, God reſt your ſoul, you was the cauſe of great uneaſineſs, and "of great grief to us." Charles was interred, with all the honours due to his rank, in the chapel of Saint Nicholas, whence his remains were transferred, in 1550, to the church of Saint Donatus, at Bruges. Thus periſhed, in the forty-fifth year of his age, Charles, the laſt duke of the royal branch of Burgundy, to whoſe name the juſt appellations of—"the Bold, the Terrible, and the Raſh"—had been annexed by his people. The death of this prince forms an epoch in the general hiſtory of Europe; ſince it produced an important change not only in the affairs of his own dominions, but even in thoſe of all the neighbouring princes; and greatly contributed to the formation of a political ſyſtem, which, in ſubſequent times, became an object of univerſal attention.

The king was at the caſtle of Pleſſis-les-Tours, when he received the news of the duke of Burgundy's death: the fall of an enemy affords, to a baſe and abject mind, a theme for exultation, and a ſubject for triumph; ſuch a mind was that of Lewis, who was neither anxious to repreſs, nor careful to conceal the ſenſations of joy which he experienced on this occaſion. He immediately diſpatched couriers to all the different towns in the kingdom, to all the perſons of diſtinction, and particularly to the duke of Brittany, to inform them of the happy event. He performed a pilgrimage to the ſhrine of the Virgin, at Pui in Anjou, and, as a mark of his gratitude, promiſed to ſurround the tomb of Saint Martin with a ſilver baluſtrade.

The death of Charles opened a wide and flattering proſpect to the ambition of Lewis. His daughter, Mary, ſole heireſs of the houſe of Burgundy, had been ſucceſſively promiſed by her father to ſeveral different princes, according as their alliances were favourable to the ambitious projects he entertained. This rendered the union with her an important object to all the potentates of Chriſtendom; and the eſſential advantages of acquiring poſſeſſion of her territories, at that time the moſt opulent and beſt cultivated of any on this ſide the Alps, were perfectly underſtood. As ſoon, then, as the untimely death of Charles opened the ſucceſſion, the eyes of all the European princes were turned towards Mary; and they felt themſelves deeply intereſted in the choice which ſhe was about to make of the perſon on whom ſhe would beſtow that rich inheritance.

Lewis, from whoſe kingdom ſeveral of the provinces which ſhe poſſeſſed had been diſmembered, and whoſe dominions ſtretched along the frontier of her territories, had every inducement to court her alliance. He had likewiſe a good title to expect the favourable reception of any reaſonable propoſitions he ſhould make with reſpect to the diſpoſal of a princeſs who was the vaſſal of his crown, and deſcended from the royal blood of France. There were only two propoſitions, however, which he could make with propriety: the one was the marriage of the dauphin, the other, that of the count of Angouleme, a prince of the blood, deſcended from a younger branch of the houſe of Orleans, with the heireſs of Burgundy. By the former he would have annexed all her territories to the crown, and have rendered France the moſt reſpectable monarchy in Europe; but the great diſparity of age between the two parties, Mary being twenty, and the dauphin only eight years old; the avowed reſolution of the Flemings, not to chuſe a maſter poſſeſſed of ſuch power as might enable him to form projects dangerous to their liberties, together with their dread of falling under the odious and oppreſſive government of Lewis, were obſtacles in the way of executing this plan, which it was vain to think of ſurmounting. By the latter, which might have been accompliſhed with facility, Mary having diſcovered ſome inclination to a match with the count of Angouleme, Lewis would have prevented the dominions of the houſe of Burgundy from being conveyed to a rival power; and, in return for ſuch a ſplendid eſtabliſhment for the count of Angouleme, he muſt have obtained, or would have extorted from him, conceſſions highly beneficial to the crown of France. But Lewis had ſo long been accuſtomed to the intricacies of an infidious policy, that he could not be ſatisfied with what was obvious, and ſimple; and was ſo fond of artifice and refinement, that he brought himſelf to conſider theſe as his ultimate object, not as the means only of conducting affairs.* From this principle, no leſs than from his unwillingneſs to aggrandiſe any of his own ſubjects, or, perhaps, from the deſire of oppreſſing the houſe of Burgundy, which he hated, he neglected the ſtraight path, which would naturally have been purſued by a prince of leſs art and inferior abilities, and followed one more ſuited to his own genius.

He propoſed to render himſelf, by force of arms, maſter of thoſe provinces which Mary held of the crown of France, and even to puſh his conqueſts into her other territories, while he amuſed her with inſiſting on the impracticable match with the dauphin. Having previouſly corrupted the leading men in the provinces of Burgundy and Artois, he ſent an army into the former, under the command of the prince of Orange, whom he had allured into his ſervice by ſplendid promiſes; the lord of Craon, and Charles d'Amboiſe, lord of Chaumont. Theſe generals were accompanied by the biſhop of Langres; John de Caulers, William Allegrin, and Peter Tarquain, judges in the court of parliament; who were inveſted with full powers to take poſſeſſion of the province in the king's name. Theſe deputies addreſſed themſelves to the ſtates of Burgundy, who were then aſſembled at Dijon, and ſummoned them to acknowledge the authority of Lewis, within the ſpace of twelve days at fartheſt.

The king maintained that his claim to the duchy of Burgundy was not to be diſputed, ſince that duchy had been ceded, as an appanage, by king John to his ſon Phillip; and it was a law, generally received, that no appanage could be poſſeſſed by a female, but, in default of heirs male, muſt revert to the crown. To this plea it was objected by Mary, and her council, that the duchy of Burgundy was different from all other appanages, inaſmuch as it never had conſtituted a part of the domain of the crown, and therefore it ought not to be annexed to it; they, moreover, urged, that ſhould this objection with regard to the duchy be over-ruled, ſtill there were ſeveral lordſhips in Burgundy, to which the king could have no poſſible claim; the county of Charolois had been purchaſed of the count of Armagnac by one of Mary's anceſtors; the counties of Maçon and Auxerre, too, had been ceded to her grandfather, Philip the Good, by the treaty of Arras, and it was expreſsly ſtipulated in the deed of ceſſion, that it was to deſcend to his heirs, male and female; of this part of her inheritance, therefore, there could be no poſſible pretenſion for deſpoiling her: theſe reaſons, however, were deemed inſufficient by the ſtates, who had been bribed by Lewis to betray their ſovereign, and, on the twenty-ninth of January, the whole province took the oaths of allegiance to the king of France.

During theſe proceedings in Burgundy, another army had advanced to the frontiers of Picardy, ſecured the towns on the Somme, and puſhed its conqueſts into the province of Artois. Abbeville, Arras, Ham, Rohain, Saint Quentin, Montdidier, Montrueil, and Peronne, were either furrendered to Lewis through the treachery of their governors, or elſe opened their gates in conſequence of his intrigues with the inhabitants.

In purſuance of the plan which he had adopted for deceiving the heireſs of Burgundy, by proteſtations of friendſhip and propoſals of marriage, while he was employed in deſpoiling her of her provinces; he ſent one Oliver, who from his barber had become his chief favourite, in the capacity of an ambaſſador to Ghent*. This man had orders to ſeduce the inhabitants of Ghent from their duty to Mary, and, if poſſible, to excite an inſurrection; but his deſign being diſcovered, the populace threatened to throw him into the river, ſo that he was obliged to decamp with precipitation.

Soon after this event, Hugonet, chancellor of Burgundy; Guy de Brimieu, lord of Imbercourt; the biſhop of Térouanne; the count of Grandpré, and Gruthuſe, arrived at the French court, as ambaſſadors from Mary. They came to inform the king, that the young princeſs had taken the reigns of government into her own hands, and had appointed a council, conſiſting of the ducheſs-dowager, the lord of Raveſtein, Hugonet, and Imbercourt; ſhe, therefore, requeſted his majeſty to addreſs himſelf to them whenever he had any propoſals to make, or affairs to negociate with her, and to give no credit to applications from any other quarter. The letter, containing this information and this requeſt, was written partly by Mary herſelf, partly by the ducheſs-dowager, and partly by the lord of Raveſtein†. The king, after he had read the letter, aſked the ambaſſadors, What elſe they had to communicate? and on their reply that they had nothing farther to impart, he expreſſed his ſurpriſe, declaring it was his intention to marry the dauphin to their young miſtreſs, and, conſequently, to take charge of her dominions; that he expected to govern all thoſe provinces which were to revert to the crown, in his own name, but that the others he ſhould only keep till the princeſs came of age and did homage to him. The ambaſſadors making no reply, the king added, that the only means of preventing the continuance of a bloody war, and of ſecuring the inheritance of Mary, was by accepting the propoſals he had juſt made. The ambaſſadors perſiſted in affirming that they had no inſtructions on that head; but Hugonet and Imbercourt, who had the chief management of public affairs, thought it prudent to yield to the neceſſity of the times. They ſaw the king at the head of a numerous army, poſſeſſed of greater power than all his enemies united, and he no ſooner appeared than all the towns opened their gates to him: whereas the ducheſs of Burgundy was wholly deſtitute of ſupport; ſhe enjoyed, as yet, but a precarious authority; her country was drained both of men and money; while the towns refuſed to obey her, and inſiſted on the reſtoration of their ancient privileges. In this ſituation, they conceived that a marriage with the dauphin would be the moſt fortunate event that could occur for their ſovereign; and as they had no doubt of the king's ſincerity, they promiſed to acceſerate the concluſion of the buſineſs as much as poſſible; and, for this purpoſe, they conſented to ſurrender the province of Artois into the hands of Lewis, on condition that it ſhould be reſtored to Mary, after ſhe had done homage, unleſs ſhe ſhould marry any of the king's enemies, in which caſe the province was to be annexed to the crown of France.

Although Hugonet and Imbercourt had exceeded their power in ſigning this treaty, yet their conduct had certainly been ſwayed by the beſt of motives. Soon after their return to Flanders, Mary, whoſe only reſource conſiſted in the attachment of her ſubjects, aſſembled the ſtates at Ghent, who promiſed to protect her, but fixed the diminution of her power as the price of their protection. They created a council of regency, who ſeized the reigns of government, and ſent ambaſſadors to the king, to requeſt he would obſerve the treaty of Soleure, and protect the heireſs of Burgundy, as, by that treaty, he was bound to do. Lewis received them with extreme coolneſs; and when they obſerved, that it was the intention of the ducheſs to regulate her conduct, in future, by the advice of the ſtates; the king interrupted them—"Stop"—ſaid he—"you are deceived; I know the "intentions of your miſtreſs better than you do; and, ſo far from ſubmitting to "be guided by the advice of the three eſtates, ſhe has already formed a ſecret "council, compoſed of perſons who are averſe from peace, and who will diſa-"vow you." The ambaſſadors thinking themſelves inſulted, affirmed that they had advanced nothing but what they were able to prove, and offered to ſhew their inſtructions: "And I"—replied Lewis—"can ſhew you a letter, the writing of "which you muſt know, and which will convince you that Mary has repoſed her "confidence in four perſons, by whoſe advice alone her conduct is regulated."—He then not only ſhewed them the letter, but allowed them to take it away with them. The ambaſſadors immediately returned to Ghent, and ſhewed the letter to the ſtates of Flanders, who reproached their ſovereign with duplicity; excited a popular inſurrection; and, having ſeized Hugonet and Imbercourt, brought them immediately to trial, tortured them with extreme cruelty, and, unmoved by the tears and entreaties of Mary, beheaded them in her preſence.*

Lewis, who probably had only meant, by his treacherous conduct, to excite an inſurrection in Flanders, was extremely enraged when he heard of the death of the two miniſters; he declared the inhabitants of Ghent guilty of high treaſon; annulled the ſentence they had pronounced againſt Hugonet and Imbercourt, and took the children of the former under his protection. His indignation was greatly encreaſed by the conſideration that their death diſconcerted the meaſures he had adopted with regard to the province of Artois†. To counteract the efforts of this event, he immediately raiſed a powerful army, and, after leaving a ſtrong garriſon in Arras, advanced againſt Heſdin. In the courſe of this expedition, Lewis diſplayed the cruelty of his diſpoſition; twelve deputies from Arras he cauſed to be ſeized and executed, after he had received them with kindneſs, and regaled them with apparent hoſpitality; he violated the faith of treaties, and after a town had capitulated, he would frequently ſelect ſuch as he knew to be moſt attached to their lawful ſovereign, and put them to death, in cool blood. Yet ſtill his progreſs was rapid; the important city of Cambrai opened her gates to him, while the addreſs of his favourite, Oliver, procured him poſſeſſion of Tournay. At the ſiege of Bouchain, death had nearly put a ſtop to all his ambitious ſchemes, for Tanneguy du Chatel was killed by a cannon ball as the king was leaning on his ſhoulder. Bouchain, however, was reduced to the neceſſity of capitulating; and le Queſnoi was taken by aſſault. Aveſne, making an obſtinate reſiſtance, Lewis, who was ever more formidable from his ſtratagems than his arms, invited the principal officers of the garriſon to his camp, under pretence of holding a conference, while Dammartin ſtormed the town, and reſigned it to pillage*.

Another army, under the command of Deſquerdes and du Lude, laid ſiege to Saint Omer, which was valiantly defended by Philip, ſon to Anthony, baſtard of Burgundy. Lewis, enraged at the gallant reſiſtance made by this youthful warrior, threatened to maſſacre his father, before his eyes, unleſs he ſurrendered the place; but Philip replied—That, tenderly as he loved his father, he would ſtill do his duty, nor ever conſent to deliver up a town with the defence whereof he had been entruſted. The king did not think proper to put his threats in execution; but the war continued to rage with greater violence than ever; he ſent four thouſand mowers to Dammartin, adviſing him to treat them with a few barrels of wine, in order to encourage them to deſtroy every thing that came in their way, and he deſired that the country might be ſo effectually deſtroyed, that the inhabitants might never wiſh to return to it†.

So long as the war was confined to the provinces of Burgundy, Luxembourg, Hainaut, and Artois, the Flemings were rather pleaſed than diſpleaſed at the ſucceſs of the French arms; they kept their princeſs in a kind of captivity, and as they did not like to ſee their ſovereigns poſſeſſed of too much power, they would not have been ſorry to ſee her reduced to the rank of counteſs of Flanders. But when the French approached their frontiers, and the garriſon of Tournay ſpread devaſtation throughout their country, they then perceived the neceſſity of defending themſelves from the attacks of ſuch dangerous invaders, and accordingly levied an army of twenty thouſand men. At a loſs for a leader, they fixed their eyes on Adolphus of Gueldres, who, by his unnatural conduct, had obliged his father to diſinherit him. They took him from priſon to place him at the head of their troops; and encouraged him by a promiſe to give him their princeſs in marriage, if he ſucceeded in delivering their country from the deſtructive incurſions of the garriſon of Tournay. Stimulated by ſuch powerful motives, Adolphus directed his march to that city; but a diſpute ariſing between the militia of Ghent and that of Bruges, his army was thrown into confuſion, and the garriſon of

*. Commines—Henterus—Chron. Scand.—Le Grand. † Garnier, tom. xviii. p. 306.

Tournay ſeized this opportunity to make a vigorous ſally, in which the Flemings were defeated, and Adolphus loſt his life.

While Lewis was thus endeavouring, by a conduct the moſt baſe and perfidious, to diſpoſſeſs the heireſs of Burgundy of her lawful inheritance, the ſtates of Flanders had opened a negociation with the emperor, Frederick the Third; and they now concluded a treaty of marriage—which Lewis in vain attempted to prevent—between their ſovereign, and his ſon, Maximilian, archduke of Auſtria. The illuſtrious birth of that prince, as well as the high dignity to which he had the proſpect of ſucceeding, rendered the alliance honorable for Mary; while, from the diſtance of his hereditary territories, and the ſcantineſs of his revenues, his power was too inconſiderable to excite the jealouſy or fear of the Flemings. Thus Lewis, by the caprice of his temper, and the exceſs of his refinements, put the houſe of Auſtria in poſſeſſion of that noble inheritance; and loſt an opportunity which he never could recal, of making that important acquiſition, which would have rendered him the moſt formidable potentate in Chriſtendom. Thus, too, the ſame monarch who firſt united the interior force of France, and eſtabliſhed it on ſuch a footing, as to make it formidable to the reſt of Europe, contributed, far contrary to his intention, to raiſe up a rival power, which, during two centuries, thwarted the meaſures, oppoſed the arms, and checked the progreſs of his ſucceſſors.

During the celebration of theſe important nuptials, the French troops ſpread over the Netherlands, reduced to aſhes the towns of Orchies, Turquoin, Freſne les Buſſeaux, Saint-Sauveur, Marchiennes, and Harbec. In Burgundy, too, the flames of war raged with equal fury; John, prince of Orange, whom Lewis had allured to his ſervice by a promiſe to make him his lieutenant-general in Burgundy, and to reſtore his family poſſeſſions, finding himſelf deceived by that monarch, who refuſed to fulfil his promiſes, excited a revolution in the duchy, and procured from Mary the dignity which had been withholden from him by Lewis. Two Burgundian captains, Claude and William de Vaudrai, collected a body of troops, and ſeiſed the towns of Veſoul, Rochefort and Axonne. Craon, whom Lewis had appointed governor of Burgundy, with unlimited power, attempted to retake Veſoul, but the garriſon made a ſally during the night, and cut his whole army to peices. When the king was informed of this revolution, he was unable to reſtrain his anger; he wrote immediately to Craon, ordering him, in caſe he could get the prince of Orange into his power, either to burn him alive, or elſe to hang him firſt, and then commit his body to the flames. He ordered a criminal proceſs to be inſtituted againſt the prince, who, though abſent, was pronounced a traitor, and as ſuch condemned to die. The prince, however, continued his operations, and, in a ſhort time, expelled the French from all the places they poſſeſſed in the county of Burgundy, except the town of Grai, of which an old warrior, of the name of Salazar, was governor. This place was inveſted by Chateau-Guyon, who had a numerous body of cavalry, and ſome regiments of infantry under his command, and daily expected to be joined by freſh reinforcements. Craon, however, prevented the junction of theſe troops, by defeating the army under Chateau-Guyon, whom he made priſoner; but, while he was obtaining this advantage in the county of Burgundy, Toulonjon and Marigni entered the duchy, reduced ſeveral towns, and excited a general ferment. The towns, however, were ſoon retaken by Craon, who, having expelled Toulonjon and Marigni from the duchy, returned to the county, and defeated a detachment of the garriſon of Dale. Not doubting but that the inhabitants, alarmed at this diſaſter, would ſoon ſurrender the place, he laid ſiege to it, and, after he had battered the walls for a week, he ordered an aſſault to be made, without conſidering whether the breach was practicable; in conſequence of this neglect, he was repulſed with loſs; in the ſecond aſſault he was equally unſucceſsful, and in the two he loſt a thouſand men. Having received intelligence that the enemy were advancing to give him battle, he raiſed the ſiege with precipitation, and retreated towards the duchy, but he was overtaken by the two brothers, de Vaudrai, who attacked the French, and obtained a complete victory. The victors then formed the ſiege of Grai, but as they could not expect to reduce, by open force, a place ſo ſtrongly fortified, ſo advantageouſly ſituated, ſo well ſupplied with proviſions and ammunition of all kinds, and defended, moreover, by ſuch an experienced officer as Salazar, they began by corrupting the inhabitants, and having eſtabliſhed a correſpondence in the town, they approached the walls one windy night, and, planting their ladders, about ſixty of the moſt determined mounted the wall, and opening one of the gates, introduced their companions. The whole army entered the town, before the French could aſſemble their troops; Salazar, perceiving that the citizens had joined the enemy, ſet fire to the place, in the hope that his men would effect their eſcape, during the confuſion which the conflagration muſt neceſſarily occaſion; but they all of them periſhed; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that he could ſave his own life, and reach Dijon in ſafety.

Theſe loſſes made the king determine to attend to the propoſals of Maximilian; although there was no proſpect of concluding a peace, Lewis thought a truce might be of uſe to him, as it would give him time to repair the loſſes he had ſuſtained in Burgundy; to aſcertain with greater preciſion the reſources of his new adverſary; and to ſound the diſpoſitions of the neighbouring powers.

Maximilian, almoſt immediately after the celebration of his nuptials, had ſent ambaſſadors to the king to complain of his violation of the treaty of Soleure, in attacking the dominions of the houſe of Burgundy; at the ſame time, he offered to make peace with Lewis, and declared that if his propoſal ſhould be rejected, the king would find that he neither wanted courage nor ability to defend himſelf. Lewis replied, that he had only taken up arms to defend the rights of his crown, as he was bound to do by his coronation oath; that Mary kept from him provinces which had reverted to the crown on the death of Charles, the late duke of Burgundy; that ſhe was in poſſeſſion of others, for which ſhe ought to pay homage; and that he was willing to conclude a truce, provided the ſacrifice of his lawful rights ſhould not be required as the price of it. He accordingly appointed plenipotentiaries to confer with thoſe of Maximilian; and theſe miniſters having met at Lens, concluded a truce, without expreſſing any term for its duration, and ſtipu'ating that only four days notice ſhould be given by either party who ſhould be inclined to break it. This truce was ſtrictly obſerved in the Netherlands, but it was not publiſhed in Burgundy. Lewis, inceſſantly harraſſed by complaints from that province againſt Craon, and imputing to the avarice of that general all the calamities of the war, deprived him of his government, and baniſhed him to his own eſtate. He was ſucceeded by Charles D'Amboiſe, better known by the name of Chaumont, who, to great military talents, joined the more amiable endowments of an humane, diſintereſted, and virtuous mind.

The ardour with which Lewis had engaged in the war, had not made him loſe ſight of other matters equally eſſential to the promotion of his ambitious projects. Foreſeeing that the authority of Maximil an would no ſooner be acknowledged in the Netherlands, than that prince would endeavour to ſecure the Engliſh monarch in his intereſt, he prudently reſolved to anticipate him. With this view he ſent the archbiſhop of Vienne, and three other envoys to England; and he took care to embark with them a conſiderable ſum of money, as well for diſcharging arrears of Edward's penſion, as thoſe of his miniſters and favourites. Theſe golden arguments proved ſo convinſive, that the archbiſhop found no difficulty in prolonging the truce, which was originally concluded for only ſeven years, but which it was now agreed to continue during the life of the two kings, and for one year after*. Lewis alſo concluded treaties of alliance with the duke of Lorraine, and the republick of Venice.

Spain was now the only power from whom the king had any reaſon to apprehend an attack; and in order to remove theſe apprehenſions, and to be at liberty to direct his whole force againſt the houſe of Burgundy, he reſolved to acknowledge Ferdinand and Iſabella as the ſovereigns of Caſtile, on which condition he obtained the prolongation of a truce which he had before concluded with thoſe princeſs. Adolphus, king of Portugal, who had always flattered himſelf that Lewis would enable him to enforce the pretenſions of his neice Jane to the throne of Caſtile, and who had been ſome time at the court of France, ſoliciting the neceſſary aſſiſtance for that purpoſe, was no ſooner appriſed of this treaty, than he gave up his cauſe for loſt, and even began to entertain apprehenſions for his perſonal ſafety, which the coolneſs he experienced at the French court was but too well calculated to confirm. Impreſſed with theſe ideas, and having no other mode of returning to Portugal but by a French veſſel, he gave it out that he intended to retire from the world, and to conſecrate the remainder of his days to prayer and penitence. He wrote to his ſon, prince Juan, bidding him an eternal adieu, and ordering him to proceed to his own coronation without a moment's delay; and after he had ſent off the letter, he left the court, and retired to ſome private place. It was reported that he had undertaken a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, but he was ſought for with ſuch care, that his reſidence was diſcovered in a village near Honfleur. Lewis, having received intelligence from his ſpies, that Ferdinand and Iſabella were actually engaged in a negociation with Maximilian, became anxious to oppoſe the extenſion of their power, by means of a rival, who, though frequently defeated, was ſtill formidable; he, therefore, preſſed Alphonſo to return to his dominions, and made the province of Normandy defray the expence of his voyage. On the return of Alphonſo, his ſon reſigned, with chearful alacrity, the ſceptre he had ſo lately aſſumed; nor could the reiterated commands of his father ſuffice to make him replace the diadem on his brows.

The ſanguinary diſpoſition of Lewis encreaſed with his years; he had nouriſhed an inceſſant deſire of vengeance againſt James d'Armagnac, duke of Nemours, one of the firſt nobles of the realm, and who appeared a zealous confederate in the "League for the public good:" he was alſo accuſed of having maintained a correſpondence with the late conſtable, and of having joined the dukes of Brittany and Burgundy in inviting the Engliſh into France. The duke, to avoid the reſentment of his implacable maſter, had retired to the fortreſs of Carlat, in the mountains of Auvergne; whither the lord of Beaujeu was ſent with a powerful army. The ducheſs of Nemours, daughter to the count of Maine, and couſin-german to the king, had juſt lain-in; and a falſe report, that her huſband had fallen into the hands of the enemy, having reached her ears, occaſioned her almoſt inſtant death. The duke, diſtracted at the loſs of a conſort whom he highly cheriſhed, gave himſelf up to deſpair; and though Carlat was deemed an impregnable fortreſs, and he had been careful to ſupply it with ſufficient proviſions for a conſiderable length of time, he entered into a negociation with the lord of Beaujeu, and reſigned himſelf into his power, on the moſt ſolemn aſſurances that his life ſhould be ſafe, and that he ſhould be allowed the privilege of juſtifying his conduct. But Lewis, who diſregarded all thoſe ties which even men of common honeſty reſpect, cauſed his noble priſoner, in violation of this ſolemn contract, to be thrown into a cold damp dungeon, at the caſtle of Pierre-enciſe, where, we are told, the hardſhips he ſuſtained made his hair turn perfectly white*; he was then conveyed to the Baſtile, and ſome vague accuſation of an attempt to corrupt his guards were uſed as a pretence for confining him in an iron cage. Commiſſioners were appointed to try him, but the king, diſpleaſed with their diſpoſition to lenity, referred the deciſion of the cauſe to the parliament of Paris, to whom the commiſſioners were afterwards joined, with ſome other judges of the provincial courts. Three members of the parliament, having ſpoken in favour of the priſoner, were immediately deprived of their places by the king's arbitrary will; and when the parliament remonſtrated on the illegality of this proceeding, they were fever. ly reprimanded by the tyrant. Not even the ſhadow of a proof was produced againſt the duke: but he was unhappily allured, by the hopes of mercy, to make an ample confeſſion, on which alone his condemnation was pronounced. Being declared guilty of high-treaſon, he was ſentenced to loſe his head, and his property was confiſcated to the crown. The king's inhumanity extended beyond the ſentence; by a refinement of cruelty, unprecedented in the annals of tyranny, he commanded the duke's two ſons—the eldeſt of whom had but juſt completed his ninth year—to be placed immediately under the ſcaffold prepared for the execution, that the blood of the father might drop on the heads of his children*. It is degrading to human nature to find men capable of executing commands ſo truly diabolical!

The inſufficiency of the proofs which had been adduced againſt the duke of Nemours led the king, immediately after his execution, to publiſh an edict, by which all perſons who ſhould be privy to any plot formed againſt the perſon of the king, the queen, or the dauphin, and who ſhould not deliver up the author of ſuch plot to juſtice, were declared guilty of high-treaſon, and ſubjected to the puniſhment annexed to that crime.

A. D. 1478, to 1480] Soon after the publication of this edict, the king annexed the county of Boulogne to the crown; but a difficulty occured on the occaſion: this territory was a fief ſubject to the county of Artois, and as the king was not in poſſeſſion of the whole of that province, and might, poſſibly, on the concluſion of a peace, be compelled to reſtore the towns he had taken to the houſe of Burgundy, Artois being a part of Mary's inheritance, which could not be diſputed on the ſame ground as the duchy of Burgundy, he would, in that caſe, become a vaſſal to one of his own vaſſals. To obviate this objection, Lewis, in virtue of his royal authority, transferred the ſovereignty of the county he had juſt annexed to the crown, to the Image of the Virgin, which was holden in great eſtimation at Boulogne; to this image he preſented a golden heart, in weight equal to thirteen marks, as a feudal tribute, and bound his ſucceſſors to do homage to the image, and to pay the ſame tribute on their acceſſion to the throne†.

Of all the alliances which Lewis had been ſtudious to form, the moſt advantageous was that which he concluded with the Swiſs; excluſive of a penſion of twenty thouſand livres which he conſented to pay them, he deſtined an equal ſum to be diſtributed annually among the principal men of the nation, by which well-timed liberality he acquired ſuch credit with the Swiſs, that they not only engaged to make no oppoſition to the conqueſt of Franche-Comté, but even to aſſiſt him in reducing it; and they likewiſe conferred on him the title of Firſt Ally of the cantons.

While the king was thus anxious to ſecure the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of the neighbouring powers, he ſpared neither pains nor expence, to allure to his ſervice ſuch of the Burgundian nobility as ſtill remained attached to Mary and Maximilian. With this view he ceded to Anthony, Baſtard of Burgundy, the county of Oſtrevant, the hundred of Bapaume, and the lordſhip of Bouchain; and he was equally generous to all the traitors whom he had already detached from the ſervice of their lawful ſovereign. But while he was thus liberal in his gifts, he took care to oppreſs his people, by an almoſt annual increaſe of impoſts. He this year claimed from the ſtates of Languedoc, an additional contribution of two hundred and ſixty thouſand four hundred and twenty-four livres, which ſum, he ſaid, was abſolutely neceſſary to enable him to unite to the crown the provinces of Burgundy, Artois and Flanders, which were unjuſtly withholden from him.

* Garnier, tom. xviii. p. 340. † Idem.

Conſcious, however, of the invalidity of his claims to the two laſt provinces, he had recourſe to the moſt curious expedient for procuring a title. He cauſed a criminal proceſs to be inſtituted againſt the late duke of Burgundy, for felony and treaſon, in order to obtain a ſentence of condemnation againſt him, which would be attended with a confiſcation of all the territories which he had holden of the crown of France. The preparations for this trial of a dead vaſſal alarmed Mary and Maximilian, who claimed the aſſiſtance of the empire; and Frederic accordingly ſent a remonſtrance to Lewis on the injuſtice of his conduct, but it was not by arguments that he was to be deterred from the purſuit of his ambitious projects.

The king opened the campaign by the ſiege of Conde, a ſmall town, but important from ſituation, as it lay between Tournay and Valenciennes: as the garriſon only conſiſted of three hundred men, it was ſoon obliged to ſurrender. Immediately after its reduction, Maximilian, having aſſembled the militia of Flanders, and the auxiliary troops which he had received from the emperor, advanced as far as Valenciennes with the view to bring the king to a deciſive action. But Lewis, unwilling to riſk, on the event of a battle, thoſe ſolid advantages which he had derived from his diſhoneſt policy, diſtributed his forces in the fortified towns, and retired to Cambrai. He ſoon after concluded a truce with Maximilian, by which he conſented to reſtore all the places he had taken in Hainaut and Franche-Comté; to withdraw his troops from Tournay, and to evacuate the town of Cambrai.

The public, who were unacquainted with the king's motive for ſigning ſuch a treaty, at a time when he was rather in a ſituation to preſcribe terms than to make conceſſions, loudly cenſured his conduct. But Lewis, alike heedleſs of the cenſures and complaints of his people, continued to purſue his own ſyſtem of policy. The conſiderations by which he had been influenced in the concluſion of the late truce, were theſe: he had received information that Maximilian, profiting by the opportunity afforded him by a meeting of the imperial diet, had repreſented, in ſtrong terms, the conſequences of the king's attempts on provinces which were not holden of the crown of France, and had acquired a great number of partiſans; that the emperor Frederic having terminated all his diſputes with the king of Hungary, that monarch had engaged to ſend him a ſupply of the empire againſt the Swiſs, if they continued to furniſh France with troops; and, laſtly, that a league was forming againſt France, into which not only the princes of the empire, but the Venetians, the kings of Arragon and Caſtile, had promiſed to enter. He therefore prudently reſolved to diſarm theſe princes by an appearance of moderation, and by a voluntary ceſſion of places which, ſooner or later, he muſt have been compelled to ſurrender, ſince he could have no poſſible pretenſions for retaining them. This ſhew of juſtice and equity, by effecting a diſſolution of the German league, ruined the hopes of Maximilian, and reduced him to the forces of his own territories. The motive which ſuperinduced the evacuation of Tournay was equally politic: the garriſon of that town, by incommoding the Flemings, obliged them, in their own defence, to preſerve their allegiance to Maximilian; the king therefore imagined, that ſo ſoon as the danger ſhould be removed to a greater diſtance, and they ſhould have nothing to fear for themſelves, their ſpirit of ſedition would return, and far from ſeconding the efforts of their prince, they would encreaſe his embarraſſment, and rejoice in his diſgrace. The event juſtified his opinion.

The latter years of the reign of Lewis were paſſed in alternate hoſtilities and negociations, the former marked by no event of importance, the latter diſtinguiſhed only for a ſpirit of treachery and decit, that was viſible in every tranſaction in which that infamous monarch had any concern. His interference in the affairs of Italy forms a ſingle exception to the general remark. The wealth of the family of Medici, acquired by trade, and the magnificent ſpirit of the firſt Coſmo, gave him ſuch an aſcendency over his countrymen, that though the forms of a popular government were preſerved, he was in reality the head of the commonwealth.—A conſiderable degree of his power he tranſmitted to his deſcendants; his grandſons, Laurence and Julian, having rendered themſelves obnoxious to pope Sixtus the Fourth, that pontiff did not ſcruple to engage ſome envious citizens of Florence in a conſpiracy againſt their lives. The church was fixed on as the ſcene of action; Julian periſhed by the daggers of the aſſaſſins, but Laurence was preſerved amidſt the tumult by the zeal and fidelity of his friends. At the ſame moment the troops of Sixtus entered the territories of Florence, and extended their devaſtations to the gates of the city. The houſe of Medici, unequal to the conteſt, implored the protection of the king of France. Lewis, though the ſlave of ſuperſtition the moſt abject, aſſerted, on this occaſion, the pretenſions of Laurence againſt the ſovereign pontiff; and the court of Rome, after an ineffectual diſplay of thoſe arts for which ſhe was celebrated, was compelled to recall her cenſures, and yield to the powerful mediation of the king of France.

The ſovereignty of Genoa, which had been formerly ceded by France to the duke of Milan, was now again offered to the acceptance of Lewis, who wiſely refuſed the dangerous honour: to the ambaſſadors who were ſent to make him the offer, he returned this laconic anſwer—"The Genoeſe give themſelves to me, and "I give them to the devil!"

The king's turbulent and ſuſpicious ſpirit would never ſuffer him to be at eaſe ſo long as there was a prince or nobleman in his dominions, poſſeſſed of ſufficient power and authority to enforce reſpect and to render himſelf formidable. Though the duke of Brittany had obſerved a perfect neutrality during the late hoſtilities, Lewis ſeiſed ſome of his towns, and, in order to intimidate the duke into a compliance with whatever demands he might chuſe to prefer, he purchaſed, of the remaining heirs, all the rights of the houſe of Ponthievre to the duchy of Brittany*. He alſo ſuborned a man of infamous character, whoſe name was Doyac, to ſtand forward as the accuſer of the duke of Bourbon; and the parliament of Paris diſplayed a willingneſs to favour the nefarious projects of their ſovereign. But the popularity of the duke of Bourbon ſecured him from the wicked attempt; while the perjury of Doyac, which ought to have incurred the ſevereſt puniſhment, was rewarded by Lewis with the government of Auvergne.

In 1479, Lewis made an attempt to complete the reduction of Franche-Comté. Chaumont d'Amboiſe, with a ſtrong body of troops, after defeating the militia of the province, laid ſiege to the town of Dole; which, having been betrayed by the garriſon, was immediately reduced to aſhes, while the citizens were inhumanly maſſacred by the French. Moſt of the other towns, intimidated by this act of ſeverity, opened their gates on the approach of the troops. In the Low Countries, however, the French were not equally ſucceſsful. Virton, a ſtrong town in the duchy of Luxembourg, was retaken by the mareſchal of Burgundy; at the ſame time that Maximilian, with an army of twenty thouſand men, laid ſiege to Terouanne. The mareſchals Deſquerdes and de Gié, were ſent to oppoſe this formidable force; and at the village of Guinegatte the hoſtile armies met. The German cavalry were broken by the impetuous charge of the French, who, inconſiderately, purſued them to a great diſtance, while the archers, thinking the day was won, haſtened to ſeize the enemy's baggage; but the count de Romont, who commanded the Flemiſh infantry, immediately attacked them, and put them to flight, ſo that the cavalry, on their return from the purſuit, found the enemy in the poſſeſſion of the field. Yet the ſlaughter appears to have been nearly equal on both ſides. Lewis ſoon obtained a more deciſive advantage, by the capture of fourſcore veſſels belonging to the Flemings, which were taken by admiral Coulon, and carried into the ports of Normandy.

Maximilian, weakened by the loſs he had ſuſtained at the battle of Guinegatte, was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Terouanne, and to confine his hoſtile operations to the reduction of the fortreſs of Malaunoi, the governor of which he cauſed to be hanged. Lewis, in revenge, ordered his grand provoſt to ſelect fifty priſoners, of the higheſt rank, ſeven of whom were executed on the ſame ſpot where the governor had ſuffered; ten were hanged before the gates of Douai, ten before Liſle, and as many before Arras. After theſe acts of barbarity, ſo congenial to the ſoul of Lewis, that monarch cloſed the campaign by reducing ſeventeen fortified caſtles and villages, in the county of Guines, all of which he firſt plundered and then reduced to aſhes.

A. D. 1481.] Lewis began to be tired of a war whence he could not hope to derive any farther advantage; and the means of retaining the conqueſts he had already made, now ſolely occupied his thoughts. But nature was oppreſſed by this continual and unwearied application to buſineſs; frequent fainting warned him to prepare for a future ſtate; and at a village, near Chinon in Touraine, he was ſeiſed with a fit of apoplexy: he remained ſome time ſpeechleſs and motionleſs, and though his voice and intellects returned, his health was conſiderably impaired.

But this attack, far from inſpiring Lewis with ſentiments adapted to his ſituation, only ſerved to render him more ſuſpicious, miſtruſtful, and deſpotic. When he felt the firſt ſymptoms of the diſorder, he had moved towards the window of the apartment, but his attendants imagining the air would be prejudicial to him, ſeiſed him in their arms, and conveyed him to the fire ſide. This effect of their concern for his ſafety, was now conſtrued into an act of preſumption, that merited puniſhment; and the faithful attendants ware accordingly diſmiſſed from their places, and baniſhed from court. The king, jealous of his authority, was apprehenſive, leſt his officers, by accuſtoming themſelves to contradict him on points of indifference, ſhould, by degrees, take upon themſelves the principal management of affairs, under pretence that he was not in a condition to conduct them himſelf.

The death of Charles, count of Maine, the laſt prince of the ſecond houſe of Anjou, who had lately ſucceeded to a part of the dominions of René, titular king of Sicily, added, at this juncture, the county of Provence to the crown; but while Lewis was employed in ſecuring this new acquiſition, a ſecond ſtroke of an apoplexy again warned him of his approaching end. He revived, however, and performed a pilgrimage to Saint-Claude but though this journey was apparently undertaken from motives of religion, its real object was a matter of policy: viz. to reſtore tranquillity to the dominions of the houſe of Savoy, and to releaſe the young duke from a ſtate of domeſtic captivity. As ſoon as he had accompliſhed this object, and declared himſelf the protector of his infant nephew Charles, he returned, conſiderably exhauſted by a journey, the length of which was ill proportioned to the weak ſtate of his body.

A. D. 1482, 1483.] Though arrived at the laſt ſtage of life, when all ſchemes of ambition ought to have been totally expelled from his mind, the death of Mary of Burgundy, from a wound which ſhe received from a fall from her horſe in hunting, and which her modeſty prevented her from diſcloſing even to her huſband*, again directed his thoughts to the inſidious machinations of a diſhoneſt policy. He excited the inhabitants of Ghent, with whom he had long maintained a ſecret correſpondence, to revolt, and urged them to profit by the preſent occaſion for the full recovery of their ancient privileges. They ſo far liſtened to his advice, as to take the two infant children of Mary from their father, and to ſend a deputation to Paris to ſue for peace.

The deputies were received with the utmoſt magnificence, and though the capital was then expoſed to the deſtructive ravages of peſtilence and famine, falſe joy and artificial plenty were exhibited wherever they went. Soon after their departure, the king reſolved to accompliſh a project which he had formed for procuring the hand of Margaret of Auſtria, the infant daughter of Mary and Maximilian, for his ſon, the dauphin. The hatred of Maximilian, formed, indeed, a ſerious obſtacle to his wiſhes, but an event ſoon occurred, by which he was enabled to ſurmount it.

The biſhop of Liege had brought up in his family a young orphan of diſtinction, named William de la Mark, who, from the ferocity of his manners, had acquired the appellation of *The Wild Boar of Ardennes. This youth, after committing various acts of violence, aſſaſſinated the biſhop's chancellor, in his palace, and almoſt in ſight of his maſter. The prelate, juſtly enraged, baniſhed the culprit from the territory of Liege. Although the puniſhment was greatly inadequate to the crime, la Mark breathed nothing but vengeance, and repairing to the court of France, he offered his ſervices to the king, engaged to promote, in his favour, an inſurrection of the Liegeois, and to open an entrance for the French into Brabant. Lewis, who never refuſed protection to villainy, where his intereſt was concerned, received la Mark with diſtinction, conferred on him the title of his lieutenant and governor in the county of Liege, and gave him a company of one hundred lances, with a ſum of thirty thouſand livres, to enable him to levy recruits. After every thing was prepared for his departure, the king proclaimed a revocation of his gifts, and publiſhed an order for him to quit the kingdom. This was done for the purpoſe of more effectually deceiving the biſhop of Liege; the project accordingly ſucceeded; la Mark approached Liege, corrupted the magiſtrates, ſeduced the troops, excited a revolt, and, to crown his infamy, aſſaſſinated his benefactor. He then entered the city of Liege in triumph, and perſuaded the inhabitants to declare for France. The French troops had, during theſe tranſactions, entered Artois, and reduced, through the treachery of the governor, the ſtrong town of Aire.

Alarmed at theſe loſſes, and having no army then ready to oppoſe the progreſs of the French, Maximilian was prevailed on to conſent to the marriage of his daughter with the ſon of his unprincipled foe. By the treaty ſigned on this occaſion, it was ſtipulated, that the young archduke, Philip, ſhould, on aſſuming the reigns of government, do homage to the king for the county of Flanders.—That, ſhould Philip die without poſterity, his ſiſter Margaret, wife to the dauphin, ſhould ſucceed not only to Flanders, but to Hainaut, Brabant, Luxembourg, Holland, and the duchy of Gueldres; and if Margaret ſhould not become wife to the dauphin, or ſhould die without poſterity, then the counties of Burgundy,

* Commines—Le Grand.

Artois, Maçon, Auxerre, and Troyes, ſhould revert to her brother Philip, who ſhould do homage for the ſame; but, in that caſe, the towns of Liſle, Douai, and Orchies, ſhould be reſtored to the king; and finally, that the king, immediately after the treaty ſhould be ſigned, ſhould reſtore his conqueſts in Luxembourg, and Hainaut; ſhould recall all the French who were then in the country of Liege, and ſhould engage to afford no farther aſſiſtance either to William de la Mark, or to the Liegeois. By the concluſion of this treaty, which was fully ratified by either party; and by the death of the king of England, which occurred about the ſame time, Lewis was freed from all his enemies, and had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing his dominions reſtored to a ſtate of perfect tranquillity.

As the king found his health declining apace, he had, during theſe tranſactions, paid a viſit to the dauphin, who was kept almoſt in a ſtate of captivity, at the caſtle of Amboiſe, where—except the officers of the houſhold—none were permited to approach him but ſervants and perſons of the meaneſt condition. Lewis was accompanied by ſeveral of the princes, and others of the nobility, in whoſe preſence he thus addreſſed his ſon—"My ſon, I know not what term the Supreme Being "has preſcribed to the duration of my exiſtence, but age and habitual infirmities "warn me it is time to prepare for my laſt hour. Both my own wiſhes and the "laws of the realm deſignate you for my ſucceſſor; learn, then, the full extent "of the obligations which that title impoſes. You are deſtined to aſcend the "firſt throne in the world, and to bear the appellation of Moſt Chriſtian King; "for that rank, and for that auguſt prerogative, you are indebted to your "anceſtors, who, by their valour, and their zeal in the cauſe of religion, "have exalted themſelves above all the princes in Chriſtendom.——If you "are anxious to partake the glory which they have ſo well deſerved, let your bo-"ſom be inſpired with a noble ardour and endeavour to reſemble them. Their "example, my ſon, will ſuffice to teach you what to do, mine will better inſtruct "you what to avoid; for, although with the aid of the Almighty, and with the "aſſiſtance of our brave ſubjects, the ſceptre of France has not ſuffered degrada-"tion in my hands; although I have ſucceſsfully defended the rights of the crown, "and have even extended the limits of this kingdom; yet muſt I not conceal my "faults: this confeſſion may tend to your inſtruction better than any advice I can "give you. Know, then, my ſon, that on my acceſſion to the throne, having de-"prived of their places thoſe officers who had ſerved the ſtate, and the king my "father, with zeal and fidelity, that inconſiderate ſtep has cauſed torrents of tears "and blood to flow, and has embittered my whole life. My ſon, the confeſſion "which I now make ought to render you more wiſe. The flame is not ſo far ex-"tinguiſhed, but that it may be eaſily rekindled, unleſs, by a conduct more pru-"dent than mine was at that period, you ſucceed in gaining the confidence of your "faithful ſubjects; promiſe, then, that when you aſcend the throne, you will, "in all matters of importance, take the advice of the princes of your blood, and "members of your council; that you will not deprive any one of his place, unleſs "he ſhall have previouſly been found guilty of prevarication; and as what I now "require of you, is of the utmoſt importance, reflect ſeriouſly before you give "me your anſwer."

The dauphin then retired into an adjoining apartment, with the lord of Beaujeu, his governor, and the officers of his houſhold, and in a few minutes he returned, and ſwore to fulfil the promiſe which the king exacted from him. The particulars of this interview were committed to paper, and tranſmitted to all the ſovereign courts in the kingdom. Lewis then ſent to the duke of Orleans, and made him ſwear that he would not oppoſe any of the regulations which he might chuſe to eſtabliſh, with regard to the regency, and that he would not engage his relations, the duke of Brittany and the count of Foix, to aſſiſt him in exciting troubles in the kingdom, and in procuring for himſelf a greater ſhare in the adminiſtration than it ſhould pleaſe the king to aſſign him. Both the duke's oath and the dauphin's were inſerted in the regiſters of the parliament. It is rather extraordinary that Lewis ſhould expect that others would be bound by an engagement which —notwithſtanding its ſolemnity—he himſelf had invariably treated with contempt.

As Lewis approached nearer to the grave, his terror at the thoughts of his diſſolution increaſed; although in the dreadful ſituation to which ſickneſs had reduced him, death ought rather to have been conſidered as a friend than a tyrant, yet were all his hours moſt anxiouſly employed in the hopeleſs endeavour to prolong a miſerable exiſtence. All the precautions which he had hitherto adopted with the view to preſerve himſelf from the ſecret machinations of his enemies, now appeared inſufficient. At the moſt happy periods of his life, he was attended, wherever he went, by a body of troops and a train of artillery; and, ſince the aſſaſſination of the Medici and the duke of Milan, he had always armed himſelf with a pike, which a page carried at his ſide in the day, and which the king placed at the head of his bed during the night. But when he found his ſtrength too far exhauſted, by age and ſickneſs, to ſuffer him to make uſe of this weapon in caſe of attack, he reſolved to ſhut himſelf in ſome inacceſſible place.

His favourite reſidence of Pleſſis-les-Tours was, after much conſideration, choſen for the purpoſe of retirement; he cauſed the caſtle to be ſurrounded by a broad and deep ditch, over which were thrown two bridges, that were never let down but at one particular hour; within the ditch an iron railing was erected, the walls of the fortreſs were covered with iron ſpikes, and the gates defended by baſtions. A guard of four hundred archers paraded round this gloomy priſon night and day, with orders to fire on any one who ſhould dare to approach without firſt making himſelf known. Eighteen thouſand caltrops were diſtributed on the neighbouring plains, to prevent the approach of cavalry; and in the interior court of the caſtle were two rows of large iron chains, with cannon-balls faſtened to the end of them, to which criminals, often for the moſt trivial offences, were faſtened. Theſe chains were called Les fillettes du roi. The avenues which led to this abode of miſery were lined, on either ſide, with gibbets inſtead of trees, on which Triſtan the provoſt—who was truly worthy to adminiſter to the rage and caprice of a ſanguinary tyrant—cauſed the wretched victims of his maſter's ſuſpicions and revenge, to be placed. No one reſided in the caſtle, except four or five officers, who, by their tyrannical conduct, had become the objects of public execration, and who from their expectations of falling, on the death of Lewis, into the hands of juſtice, were moſt intereſted in the prolongation of his life. The princes of the blood, and even the king's own daughters, were forbidden to enter the place, without an expreſs invitation. When Anne of France, her huſband, the lord of Beaujeu, and the count of Dunois brought the young dauphineſs from Flanders, Lewis, having deſcried from the windows of his palace their numerous train, was greatly alarmed, and immediately ſent ſome of his officers to ſearch them, in the apprehenſion that they might have arms concealed beneath their clothes.

But though Lewis had thus ſecluded himſelf from the world, he took care that the world ſhould not forget him; inſtead, however, of deſerving attention by acts of virtue, he only ſought to render himſelf conſpicuous by his vices. Every day, and almoſt every hour, were orders the moſt abſolute and tyrannical diſpatched to different parts of the kingdom. He diſmiſſed, without any reaſon, all his old ſervants; and the new ones who ſucceeded them, were ſoon diſmiſſed in their turn; when aſked the motive of this conduct, his reply was—Nature takes delight in variety. Nor were theſe ſudden diſmiſſions confined to his houſhold, for there was ſcarcely a poſt in the kingdom, from the higheſt to the loweſt, but experienced a ſimilar change.

Lewis was equally anxious to engage the attention of foreigners, whom he, alſo, wiſhed to believe that his health was perfectly re-eſtabliſhed. He ſent envoys or ambaſſadors to foreign courts on the moſt frivolous pretexts; and theſe repreſentatives of ſovereignty had often no other buſineſs to negociate, than the purchaſe of ſome trifling article for their maſter. From Spain, he exported at a great expence, mules and ſporting dogs; from Italy, horſes and curioſities; from the kingdoms of the north, elks, rein-deer, and furs; and young lions, and other ſcarce animals, from the coaſt of Africa; and, as his only object in purchaſing theſe articles was to make people talk of him, his agents could not oblige him more than by paying a moſt extravagant price for them. They were conveyed to the palace with great pomp and parade, and when they arrived, he did not even deign to look at them.

All the ſtores of medicine were exhauſted in vain to reſtore his drooping health; no remedy which the ſkill of the regular profeſſor could ſuggeſt, or the ingenuity of the daring empiric deviſe, was left unemployed; we are told by a contemporary writer, that among other remedies, he was ordered to drink the blood of a child, in order to correct the acrimony of his own; and, that a great number of children were, accordingly, bled for the purpoſe. As hunting had always conſtituted his principal amuſement when he was in health, he now ordered a number of large rats to be caught and turned looſe in his apartments, where he hunted them with cats. But as he ſoon became tired of this kind of amuſement, his attendants deviſed another more ſuitable to his ſituation. They aſſembled the peaſants of Poitou, and dividing them into bands, diſtributed them in the meadows round the caſtle, where ſome of them played on their ruſtic pipes, while others danced and ſung; Lewis looked at them from the different windows of the palace, and endeavoured to partake of their innocent pleaſures; but if he perceived that any one took notice of him, he inſtantly retired, and did not dare to appear at the window again that day.

As all human remedies had proved inefficacious, he had recourſe to others of a different deſcription: he ſent to different parts of Europe, for all the relics he could procure which were holden in any tolerable degree of eſtimation. Friar Roſat, a monk of Lombardy, and five or ſix of his brethren, brought him a great number from Italy; and he not only paid all the expences of their journey, but received them moſt magnificently. Some canons of Cologne obtained, in exchange for ſome curious relics, the confirmation of a rich donation which he had already made to their cathedral. A poor tradeſman, from Aix-la-Chapelle, received ſixty livres for a ſmall ſilver image, which he ſaid had touched ſome very famous relics. The king ſent two thouſand crowns to Saint James in Galicia, and he ſent to Marſeilles for the ring of Jobin. The holy oil from Rheims was taken to him with great ceremony, and he obtained permiſſion from the pope to be anointed with it a ſecond time; but the wily pontiff exacted for this indulgence —which had already cauſed an inſurrection at Rome—the ceſſion of the counties of Valence and Die, in Dauphiny, to which the church of Rome had preferred ſome obſolete claims.

It is very extraordinary that, impreſſed as the mind of Lewis certainly was with the fear of death, and, moreover, a ſlave to the moſt abject ſuperſtition, its moſt prominent and moſt diſguſting features ſhould ſtill have retained their former ſtrength. Having recommended himſelf to the prayers of Bourdeille, archbiſhop of Tours, that prelate thought the opportunity favourable for impreſſing him with a due ſenſe of his errors; and he accordingly repreſented to him, with a truly apoſtolic zeal, that the moſt acceptable offering he could make to God would be that of a contrite heart; that gifts to the church could not expiate ſins; that he had violated the privileges of the church by illegal acts of violence againſt its miniſters; that he had either impriſoned or expelled from their ſees, the biſhops of Laon, Séez, Caſtres, Coutances, Saint-Flour, and Pamiers, whoſe only offence was that of being connected, either by the ties of blood or friendſhip, with ſome perſons who had incurred the king's diſpleaſure; that he had deſpoiled ſeveral families of their patrimony; and that he had retained, againſt all law and equity, the inheritance of the houſe of Tremoille.

Lewis, enraged at the freedom of his cenſures, replied, that he had aſked him for prayers and not for advice; that ſuch complaints were an attack on the ſovereign authority, and bore a ſtrong reſemblance to threats; that Bourdeille meddled with too many affairs; and that he defied him, and all the prelates he had mentioned, to find any flaw in his conduct. The king then ordered the chancellor to inſtitute a proceſs againſt the archbiſhop and the other prelates; and Bourdeille was finally compelled to aſk pardon, for having diſcharged his duty.

But though Lewis—as he told the archbiſhop—aſked for prayers and not for advice, yet did he wiſh for thoſe prayers leſs for the ſalvation of his ſoul, than the re-eſtabliſhment of his health. As he felt an inconvenience from the north-wind, whenever it blew for ſome days together, he ordered general proceſſions to Saint-Denis; but being aſhamed to avow his weakneſs, he commanded the prayers, that were ſaid on thoſe occaſions, to be offered up for the health of the king and the dauphin, and for the preſervation of the fruits of the earth. We are told that his chaplain was, one day, reciting an oriſon to Saint Eutropius, and when he came to pray "for the health of the ſoul and of the body," he was interrupted by the king, who told him he ought not to aſk for ſo many things at a time, and requeſted him only to pray for the health of the body. There is a letter of his ſtill extant, addreſſed to Peter Cadouet, a monk; in which he ſays—"Maſter "Peter, my friend, I requeſt you with all poſſible earneſtneſs to pray inceſſantly "to God, and our lady of Salles, in my behalf; that it may pleaſe them to ſend "me a quartan ague, for I am afflicted with a malady which my phyſicians tell "me cannot be removed without it; and as ſoon as I have it, I will let you "know."

But while the king, depending on the efficacy of prayers, proceſſions and relics, neglected the proper means of concilitating the mercy of God whom he had grievouſly offended by the magnitude of his offences, a third ſtroke of an apoplexy (on Monday, the twenty-fifth of Auguſt) fruſtrated all his hopes of life. He lay motionleſs ſo long, that it was believed he was dead; on his revival, he forbade his attendants, however ill he might be, to mention the word death in his preſence, ſince he did not think he ſhould have reſolution to hear it; "It will "ſuffice," ſaid he, "to ſay, ſpeak little; I ſhall underſtand what you mean." This prohibition, however, was diſregarded; and his favourite, Oliver le Daim, accompanied by a phyſician, and a hermit, who had come from Calabria to aſſiſt him with his prayers, approached his bed, and appriſing him that he had but a ſhort time to live, adviſed him to think of his conſcience. But Lewis, as if anxious to diſſemble to the laſt, replied, without betraying any emotions of terror;—"I hope that God will aſſiſt me, for I am not ſo ill as you think I am."

From this moment, however, he appears to have been convinced of the certainty of his ſpeedy diſſolution; he ſent for the lord of Beaujeu, whom he had appointed, conjointly with Anne of France, to govern the ſtate during his ſon's minority, and imparted to him his laſt will: he then diſpatched the chancellor to the dauphin of Amboiſe, and told all who went to ſee him, to go to the king, and ſerve him with fidelity. He ſent alſo for the mareſchal Deſquerdes, and adviſed him never to loſe ſight of the dauphin, for the firſt ſix months; he ordered him to give up all thoughts of the plan they had concerted together for taking Calais from the Engliſh, and not to moleſt the duke of Brittany, who, in future, he he ſaid, would only ſeek to live in peace; he added, that what would have been proper, had he lived, would be extremely dangerous during a minority; and, beſides, that the kingdom ſtood in need of a peace for five or ſix years, in order to recover its ſtrength.

At length he complied with all the forms required by the Catholic religion, and received the ſacrament; he ſaid, that on account of the particular devotion which he had always entertained for the holy Virgin, he ſhould not die till Saturday; in fact, he expired on that day, which was the thirtieth of Auguſt, 1483, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age, exclaiming, with his laſt breath—"Our "lady of Embrun, my good miſtreſs, aſſiſt me." He was buried eight days after his deceaſe, at the church of Notre-Dame, at Cleri.

To mark the different ſhades of vice; to diſtinguiſh the moſt prominent features of infamy, from thoſe of inferior magnitude, is a taſk unpleaſant in itſelf, and one from which neither amuſement nor inſtruction can be derived: yet what elſe can be done in the delineation of a character, in which not a ſingle good quality appears? That diſpoſition to tyranny which Lewis evinced at an early period of his life, and which he was more ſtudious to encourage than anxious to repreſs, affords ſtrong grounds for believing that, at whatever period he had been called to aſcend the throne, his reign muſt have abounded with ſchemes to oppreſs his people, and to render his own power abſolute.—Subtle, unfeeling, and cruel, a ſtranger to every principle of integrity, and regardleſs of decency, he ſcorned all the reſtraints which a ſenſe of honour, or the deſire of fame, impoſe even upon ambitious men. Sagacious, at the ſame time, to diſcern his true intereſt, and influenced by that alone, he was capable of purſuing it with a perſevering induſtry, and of adhering to it with a ſyſtematic ſpirit, from which no object could divert, and no danger could deter him.*

In proportion as Lewis the Eleventh ſtripped the nobility of their privileges, he added to the power and prerogative of his crown. In order to have ſuch a body of ſoldiers at his command, as might be ſufficient to cruſh any force which his diſaffected ſubjects could draw together, he not only kept on foot the regular troops which his father had raiſed, but took into his pay ſix thouſand Swiſs, at that time the beſt diſciplined and moſt formidable infantry in Europe†. From the jealouſy natural to tyrants, he confided in theſe foreign mercenaries, as the moſt devoted inſtruments of oppreſſion, and the moſt faithful guardians of the power he had acquired. That they might be ready to act on the ſhorteſt warning, he, during the latter years of his reign, kept a conſiderable body of them encamped in one place.

Great funds were requiſite, not only to defray the expence of this additional eſtabliſhment, but to ſupply the ſums employed in the various enterpriſes which the reſtleſs activity of his genuis prompted him to undertake. But the prerogative that his father had aſſumed, of levying taxes without the concurrence of the ſtates-general, and which he was careful not only to retain but to extend, enabled him to provide, in ſome meaſure, for the encreaſing charges of government.

What his prerogative, large as it was, could not furniſh, his addreſs procured. He was the firſt monarch, in Europe, who diſcovered the method of managing thoſe great aſſemblies, in which the feudal policy had veſted the power of granting ſubſidies and of impoſing taxes. He firſt taught other princes the fatal art of beginning their attack on public liberty, by corrupting the ſource from which that liberty ſhould flow. By exerting all his power and addreſs in influencing the election of repreſentatives, by bribing or intimidating the members, and by various changes, which he artfully made in the form of their deliberations, Lewis acquired ſuch entire direction of thoſe aſſemblies, that, from being the vigilant guardians of the privileges and property of the people, he rendered them tamely ſubſervient, in promoting the moſt odious meaſures of his reign. As no power remained to ſet bounds to his exactions, he not only continued all the taxes impoſed by his father, but made immenſe additions to them. Charles the Seventh levied taxes to the amount of one million eight hundred thouſand livres. Lewis the Eleventh raiſed four millions ſeven hundred thouſand livres. The former had in pay nine thouſand cavalry, and ſixteen thouſand infantry; the latter augmented the cavalry to fifteen thouſand, and the infantry to twenty-five thouſand.*

In conſequence of an extenſion of territory, by acquiſitions of various kinds that were made during the reign of Lewis, France was formed into one compact kingdom, and the ſteady unrelenting policy of that prince not only ſubdued the haughty ſpirit of the feudal nobles, but eſtabliſhed a ſpecies of government, ſcarcely leſs abſolute, or leſs terrible than Eaſtern deſpotiſm.

But fatal as his adminiſtration was to the liberties of his ſubjects, the authority which he acquired, the reſources of which he became maſter, and his freedom from reſtraint in concerting his plans as well as in executing them, rendered his reign active and enterpriſing; and from this era, the kings of France, no longer fettered and circumſcribed at home by a jealous nobility, have exerted themſelves more abroad, have formed more extenſive ſchemes of foreign conqueſts, and have carried on war with a ſpirit and vigour long unknown in Europe.

The military order of Saint Michael was inſtituted, by Lewis the Eleventh, in 1469; it conſiſted of thirty-ſix knights, the ſovereign included; beſides a chancellor, a ſecretary, a treaſurer, and a herald. Lewis alſo inſtituted two parliaments, that of Bourdeaux, which his father had promiſed to eſtabliſh, in 1462; and the parliament of Burgundy, in 1476.

* Commines.

An important diſcovery was made in the chirurgical art during this reign;—the mode of curing the ſtone by the operation of cutting. An archer of Meudon, who had been long afflicted with this dreadful diſeaſe, was, in 1474, convicted of various robberies, and condemned to die: but the phyſicians and ſurgeons of Paris repreſented to the king that a great number of perſons, of all ranks, being afflicted with the ſtone, it would be expedient to try, on this man, whoſe life was already forfeited to the laws of his country, an experiment which might prove of advantage to ſociety. Lewis complied with their requeſt; and the operation was performed with ſuch ſucceſs that the man was perfectly cured in a fortnight; when the king not only granted him a pardon, but aſſigned him a reward.

CHARLES THE EIGHTH.

A. D. 1483.] CHARLES, either from the delicacy of his conſtitution, or from motives of jealouſy, had been deprived of all the advantage of education; the orders of his father, to prevent his application to ſtudy, had been ſo rigorouſly enforced, that, on his acceſſion to the throne, he could neither read nor write.—Aſhamed of his ignorance, the youthful monarch no ſooner became his own maſter, than he purſued his ſtudies with indefatigable zeal; he even acquired a taſte for books, and engaged Robert Gaguin, general of the Mathurins, to tranſlate, for his uſe, the commentaries of Ceſar, and the life of Charlemagne. It was eaſy to perceive, from the admiration which he betrayed on peruſing the account of the martial atchievements of thoſe heroes, that a thirſt for military glory formed one of the leading features of his mind. But his utmoſt efforts proved inadequate to ſupply, in a full degree, the want of an early education; he always retained an invincible repugnance to buſineſs; diſplayed a want of penetration in his choice of miniſters, and abandoned himſelf, without reſerve, to favourites who, too often, abuſed his confidence: but, with theſe failings, Charles was frank, generous, and magnanimous; and "So good"—ſays Phillip de Commines—"that a better creature never exiſted!"

Although, by the laws of the realm, Charles was of age to aſſume the reins of government ſince he had entered his fourteenth year, yet it was not deemed prudent to entruſt them to ſuch feeble hands. Lewis, therefore, had, by his will, ordained, that the adminiſtration ſhould be veſted in his eldeſt daughter, Anne of France, wife to Peter de Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu; the king had been influenced in his choice, by the conſideration that the princes of the blood would not think themſelves degraded in being ſubjected to a princeſs who, by her birth, was placed above them: that Anne, moreover, could nave no intereſt in defrauding the lawful heir of his right, ſince her ſex precluded her from wearing the crown herſelf, and her huſband could have no poſſible claim to it; and, laſtly, that if, notwithſtanding all the precautions he had taken, civil commotions ſhould ariſe, nobody was better calculated for quelling them than herſelf. In fact, all the hiſtorians of that age concur in deſcribing her as poſſeſſed of profound genius, a ſtrong mind, and all the graces peculiar to her own ſex, combined with all the virtues that characteriſe the greateſt of the other.

Theſe conſiderations, however, were inſufficient to deter thoſe who had, as they ſuppoſed, ſtronger claims to the regency, from ſtanding forward to aſſert them; and to proteſt againſt the partial and improper conduct of the late king. The chief of theſe competitors was the queen-dowager, whoſe claims were founded on the rights of nature, and on cuſtoms fundamentally eſtabliſhed and univerſally obſerved ſince the commencement of the monarchy. Lewis, although he had married againſt his father's commands, had never a ſincere attachment for his wife, whom he treated with the utmoſt brutality, generally confining her in ſome diſtant fortreſs, and holding no commerce with her but ſuch as was merely ſufficient for the purpoſe of procuring heirs. But neither the unworthy treatment which that princeſs experienced from her tyrannical huſband, who withheld from her thoſe careſſes which he laviſhly beſtowed on the meaneſt of his ſubjects, nor the order which Lewis is ſaid to have given on his death-bed, to prevent her from approaching her ſon, and to baniſh her into Dauphiné, could deprive her of her rank, or debar her of her rights. And there is every reaſon to believe that the reins of government would have been placed in her hands, had ſhe been earneſt in the aſſertion of her claims; but the retired life to which ſhe had been ſo long accuſtomed, had rendered her averſe from the buſtle of the world; and her death, which occured within three months after the deceaſe of Lewis, delivered Madame—for by that appellation was the eldeſt daughter of the king now diſtinguiſhed—from a dangerous rival, and encouraged the pretenſions of other competitors.

The firſt of theſe was Lewis, duke of Orleans, firſt prince of the blood, who had been compelled, by the late king, to marry his daughter Jane, a princeſs whoſe perſon was extremely diſguſting, and ſo deformed, that ſhe was ſuppoſed to be incapable of bearing children. The illuſtrious birth of his conſort afforded but a poor compenſation for her natural defects, in the opinion of a young prince who is repreſented as a model of beauty, and as being extremely addicted to pleaſure, during the life of Lewis the Eleventh; but the death of that monarch and that of the queen, the youth and inexperience of his ſucceſſor, and the general diſcontent of the nation, all combined to furniſh him with a favourable opportunity for diſcloſing his real ſentiments. It was requiſite that he ſhould firſt endeavour to ſet aſide ſo much of the late king's will as related to the regency of Madame; after which he would find no difficulty in procuring a divorce from his wife, in contracting a marriage that might ſecure him the poſſeſſion of a ſovereignty, and in enforcing his claims to the duchy of Milan. The execution of theſe various ſchemes, however, ſurpaſſed the ſtrength of his mind; and, it is probable, he would have been induced to abandon them had he been left to himſelf; but he had a friend who was capable of giving him advice, and who perſuaded him to perſevere in the proſecution of his plans. This friend was the count of Dunois, ſon to the celebrated baſtard of Orleans, whoſe talents for political negociations are ſaid to be unequalled. The duke was farther ſupported by the count of Angouleme, his couſin-german; his brother-in-law, the viſcount of Narbonne; his couſin, the duke of Brittany; the duke of Alençon, and many others of the nobility, who were eager to pay their court to the preſumptive heir to the throne. Independent of the oath which Lewis the Eleventh had exacted from the duke, binding him to an obſervance of his will, with regard to the regency, two other motives for excluding him from that dignity were now urged; firſt—That as he was preſumptive heir to the throne, it would not be prudent to intruſt him with the care of the king's perſon; and ſecondly, that as he was ſtill a minor, having but juſt completed his twenty-third year, and not old enough to be entruſted with the diſpoſal of his own property, it could not be expected that the management of the public revenue ſhould be confined to him.

Theſe objections to the duke of Orleans induced the duke of Bourbon, againſt whom no ſuch objections could be urged, to ſtand forward as a claimant. Though of the blood royal, he was ſo far removed from the throne, that there was no danger of his aſpiring to aſcend it; his age, his experience, the ſervices he had rendered the ſtate under Charles the Seventh, the perſecutions he had experienced from Lewis the Eleventh, all ſpoke in his favour. If, ſaid he, the duke of Orleans be excluded on account of his youth, with what propriety can Madame be preferred, who is equally young, and of a ſex unfit for command? If, on the contrary, Madame has only been choſen to favour her huſband, and the lord of Beaujeu is to govern the ſtate under the name of his wife, can I ſuffer—purſued the duke—my younger brother, whoſe claims are ſo inferior to my own, to obtain a preference over me, and to acquire a right to command me?

The two competitors repaired to court, each of them followed by a powerful party. Madame endeavoured, by the beſtowal of honours and rewards, to make them deſiſt from their purſuit; on the duke of Orleans ſhe conferred the government of Paris, the Iſle of France, Champagne and Brie, with a ſeat in the council; the count of Dunois was appointed governor of Dauphiné; and the dignity of conſtable and lieutenant general of the kingdom, which he had been long anxious to obtain, was conferred on the duke of of Bourbon.

But the princes were unwilling to barter their claims for ſuch precarious emoluments; they, therefore, filled the council with their creatures, and thwarted all the meaſures of the new government. Perceiving, however, that the prudence of Madame roſe ſuperior to all their manœuvres, they united in a requeſt that the ſtates-general might be convened, and the arrangement of the adminiſtration be left totally to them*.

This propoſal threw Madame, and all thoſe who were really attached to the king, into the utmoſt conſternation, as they imagined it was only advanced with the view to ſet the nation in a ferment, in order that the princes might profit by the general confuſion. They had received intelligence, that the duke of Orleans had entered into an aſſociation with the duke of Brittany and the arch-duke Maximilian, the two greateſt enemies to the ſovereign power; and that he had ſent to Italy to ſolicit the young duke of Lorraine to return to France, and claim the ſucceſſion of his grandfather, René of Anjou. Their terror too was encreaſed, on conſidering what had recently paſſed in the neighbouring kingdoms. They had not forgotten, that, on the death of Charles the Bold, the ſtates of Flanders had poſſeſſed themſelves of the ſupreme power, had kept their lawful ſovereign in a ſtate of captivity, and had maſſacred her two principal miniſters in her preſence; that, on a more recent occaſion, the duke of Glouceſter had procured a declaration from the parliament of England, tending to baſtardiſe his nephews, whom he afterwards murdered, and to place the diadem on his own brows. Tho' the duke of Orleans was not capable of ſuch a flagrant act of villainy, yet was it impoſſible to ſay to what lengths his impetuous paſſions, inflamed by the artful ſuggeſtions of his perfidious adviſers, might carry him. It was afterward diſcovered that Peter Landois, prime miniſter to the duke of Brittany, had fabricated papers, and compoſed a memorial, in which he had attacked the legitimacy of Charles the Eighth. He affirmed that Lewis the Eleventh deſpairing to have a ſon, and wiſhing to detach from his brother's party the chief nobility of the kingdom, who did not heſitate to expoſe their lives and fortunes in his defence, becauſe they conſidered him as preſumptive heir to the throne, had compelled the queen to adopt this child. Landois did not deny that Charles might be the king's ſon; but he maintained, that the queen not being his mother, he could have no right to the crown.

Whatever danger might attend a convention of the ſtates under ſuch circumſtances, a formal refuſal to convene them would have been ſtill more dangerous. The people, who muſt ſoon have been made acquainted with it, would have immediately been led to conclude, that government had no intention of redreſſing their grievances, and would, perhaps, have proceeded to extremities. If the princes, in that caſe, had joined the people, Madame muſt have been loſt without reſource, and the young monarch might, poſſibly have been involved in her ruin. Though preſſed on all ſides, ſhe continued, for ſome time, to elude the propoſal; but finding that the princes were determined, of two evils ſhe choſe the leaſt. The ſtates were accordingly ſummoned to meet on the firſt of January, 1484.

at Orieans; but, the conſideration that that city was the capital of the appanage of the duke Orleans, and that the loyalty of its inhabitants might therefore be juſtly ſuſpected, induced Madame to change the place of meeting to Tours. Tranquillity was now re-eſtaſtabliſhed at court; the princes directed their attention to the election of deputies at the provincial aſſemblies; while Madame, who, during this interval, remained in poſſeſſion of the ſovereign authority, endeavoured to ſecure the ſuffrages of the people by more honourable means than that of corrupting their repreſentatives.

She began by confirming the judges and other magiſtrates in the poſſeſſion of their reſpective poſts* ; and then directed her attention to the means of affording relief to the people. But before ſhe diminiſhed the receipts, ſhe wiſely took care to leſſen the expences. The ſix thouſand Swiſs that had been taken into pay, by Lewis the Eleventh, ſhe prudently diſmiſſed, and, after paying all that was due to them, ſent them back, in an honourable manner, to their own country; ſhe likewiſe diſbanded ſeveral companies of the national troops. By the adoption of theſe good and ſalutary meaſures, Madame was enabled to relieve the people, by remitting the laſt quarter of the taxes of the preſent year, at the ſame time that ſhe promiſed them a more conſiderable diminution which was to take place as ſoon as proper regulations could be made with regard to the demeſnes of the crown. To forward this plan, all the numerous grants made by the late king were revoked, and orders were diſpatched to the treaſurers of the different provinces to reunite them to the royal domains.

Madame, apprehenſive that the people might be led to believe that ſhe would inſtil into the mind of her brother the ſame principles of government which ſhe had ſeen practiſed in the preceding reign, was careful to obviate ſuſpicions of that nature, by the adoption of a very different line of conduct. Lewis having, on mere ſuſpicions, ſentenced a great number of perſons to impriſonment or exile, his daughter ordered the priſon doors to be thrown open, recalled thoſe who had been baniſhed, and loaded with favours ſuch as her father had perſecuted with the greateſt inveteracy. The Prince of Orange, who had been hanged in effigy for having promoted a revolution in Burgundy, was now reſtored to the poſſeſſion of his eſtates in Franche-Comté: D'Urfé and Poncet de la Riviere, whom Lewis had always regarded as his perſonal enemies, were promoted to places of truſt and importance: Philip of Savoy, count of Breſſe, was recalled from Germany, where he had been compelled to ſeek an aſylum, and admitted to a ſeat in the council; and, laſtly, having received information of the offers which had been made by the princes to the duke of Lorraine, ſhe diſpatched a courier to that prince, who was then in Italy, where he commanded the Venetian forces, to exhort him to repair to court, promiſing to reſtore him the inheritance of his grandfather, René of Anjou.

* Godefroi.

At the ſame time that Madame endeavoured to conciliate the affections of thoſe whom her father had perſecuted, ſhe deliver d into the hands of juſtice his two greateſt favourites, Oliver le Daim and John Doyac, to whom he had been moſt liberal in his donations, and whom, on his death-bed, he had particularly recommended to his ſon. Among a variety of crimes of which Oliver le Daim was accuſed, the following ſeems moſt to have fixed the attention of the judges. A gentleman having been arreſted by the king's orders, and being threatened with death, his wife applied to the favourite to intercede in his behalf. Her youth, her charms, and her tears, made a ſtrong impreſſion on Oliver; but incapable of harbouring any generous ſentiment, he demanded the enjoyment of her perſon as the reward of the ſervice ſhe required. This infamous propoſal was, at firſt, rejected by the lady, with the diſdain it was calculated to incur; but having obtained permiſſion to viſit her huſband in priſon, ſhe was overcome by his tears and intreaties, and, at length, conſented to purchaſe his life with the ſacrifice of her own honour. Oliver, however, being afraid that as ſoon as ſhe had obtained the favour ſhe aſked, ſhe would abſent herſelf, for ever, from his ſight, procured an order from the king to put the priſoner to death; and he commiſſioned Daniel, one of his ſatellites, to put the unfortunate gentleman in a ſack, and throw him into the river. The crime was diſcovered by ſome fiſhermen, who drew up the body in their nets, and the lady had now the mortification to perceive, that the very means which ſhe had employed for ſaving the life of her huſband had proved the cauſe of his death. So long as Lewis lived ſhe kept her grief to herſelf, conſcious that the publication of her ſhame would be productive of no poſſible advantage; but after the death of that tyrant, ſhe boldly ſtood forward, and demanded juſtice on the aſſaſſin of her huſband; and Le Daim, having confeſſed the crime, was hanged, together with his accomplice Daniel.

Doyac, who had been a common informer, and who had been employed by Lewis to calumniate the duke of Bourbon, eſcaped the gallows, but to undergo a puniſhment equally ignominious, and more painful: he was ſentenced to be whipped in different parts of the metropolis, to have one ear cut off, and his tongue pierced with a hot iron. He was then conveyed to Montferrand in Auvergne, the place of his birth, and the ſeat of his pretended triumph over the duke of Bourbon, where he was again whipped, loſt his other ear, and was afterwards baniſhed the kingdom.

Cottier, the king's phyſician, was involved in the ſame diſgrace with the other favourites of Lewis; but his inſupportable pride and his extreme avarice formed the only grounds of accuſation againſt him: he was deſpoiled of all the eſtates which he had extorted from his maſter, and was ſentenced to pay a fine of fifty thouſand crowns*.

ſtates general being aſſembled, the ſeſſions was opened by the following ſpeech from William de Rochefort, chancellor of France:

"My lords, ever ſince the acceſſion of his preſent majeſty to the throne, he "has been extremely anxious to meet the repreſentatives of the people; and the "motives of this anxiety I will now explain to you.

"He wiſhed for an opportunity of expreſſing his gratitude for the joy which "you evinced on his acceſſion; in that, indeed, you only followed the example "of your generous anceſtors, who were ever diſtinguiſhed for their zealous at- "tachment to their ſovereigns. It is the peculiar characteriſtic of a Frenchman, "to love his king, to be ever ready to ſacrifice his life and fortune in his defence, "and never to deſpair of his country's ſafety, ſo long as he can preſerve his law- "ful ſovereign; while other nations are eternally floating between obedience and "revolt, and deſert their monarchs on the moſt trivial ſubject of diſcontent, or "the moſt diſtant proſpect of danger. Read their hiſtories; you will ſcarcely "find two or three ſucceſſive monarchs who have left their heirs in quiet poſſeſſion "of the throne; and without going farther for proofs of what I advance, exa- "mine what has lately paſſed in England. Edward, at his death, left two fair "ſons, the hopes of the nation; but inſtead of being ſuffered to aſcend the "throne of their anceſtors, they have been baſely maſſacred, and their aſſaſſin "has been rewarded with the crown. You, Frenchmen, have no ſuch act of "atrociouſneſs to bluſh for: open your annals; you will there find that infant "ſovereigns have been more honoured and better ſerved than the moſt abſolute "monarch; and you will admire a people whoſe attachment to their kings has "been moſt conſpicuous at thoſe periods in which their kings have ſtood in "greateſt need of their aſſiſtance. It is to this unſhaken fidelity you are indebted "for the glorious advantage of being the firſt people in the world; for what "other nation can preſume to compare themſelves with you? In the earlieſt ages, "the Gauls, your anceſtors, ſpread the terror of their arms over every part of "the continent; they founded colonies in Italy, on the banks of the Da- "nube, and even in Aſia. Though the diſſentions which prevailed between "them proved the means of ſubjecting them to the Romans, they inflicted a "dreadful vengeance for the defeat they ſuſtained; it was the ſword of the Gauls "that enabled Julius Cæſar to enſlave his country. In the ſequel, the Franks, "incorporated with the Gauls, delivered the church of Rome from the yoke of "the barbarians, laid the firſt foundation of her power and greatneſs, and re- "eſtabliſhed the weſtern empire, which had long been overturned. Fired with "a holy zeal, they flew to the defence of their brethren oppreſſed by the infi- "dels, fixed their ſtandards on the walls of Jeruſalem, and reduced Paleſtine, "Syria, Sicily and Greece. How glorious it is to command a people at once ſo "generous and ſo brave! It is to your affection, to your virtues, that the king "feels himſelf indebted for the ſplendour of his rank; and a deſire to expreſs "his gratitude on this account was one of his chief motives for aſſembling you.

" A ſecond motive not leſs powerful was his deſire of ſeeing you, of offering " himſelf to your ſight, and of encreaſing, thereby, the mutual affection by " which you are united; contemplate, then that auguſt prince, on whom the " country now relies for its ſafety. Let not his youth alarm you: Solomon, the wi- " ſeſt of kings, was young when he mounted the throne; Scipio, who obtained the " conſular dignity before he had reached the age required by the laws, repaired " the loſſes of the Roman republic, and made her triumph over her moſt formi- " dable enemy. Saint Lewis, whoſe reign forms ſo glorious an epoch in our " hiſtory, was not older than your king when he aſcended the throne. In privi- " leged minds prudence is not incompatible with wiſdom: your ſovereign, young " as he appears, knows how to act with propriety, and in whom to place his con- " fidence; of this you may judge by the third motive which induced him to aſ- " ſemble you.

" He was anxious to explain to you the conduct he has obſerved ſince his ac- " ceſſion, to communicate his future deſigns, and to aſſociate you with him, in " a certain degree, in the government. Immediately after his father's death, " he ſent for the princes of the blood, who inſtantly obeyed his ſummons, and, " by their advice, he confirmed all the officers in the kingdom in the poſſeſſion of " their reſpective poſts, that the public ſafety might not be endangered, and that " the adminiſtration of juſtice might ſuffer no interruption; he alſo entruſted the " management of the revenue to perſons of acknowledged probity. Being in- " formed that the domains of the crown had, by inconſiderate alienations, been " greatly diminiſhed, he granted letters-patent for revoking all ſuch gifts; for it " it is not his intention to drain the purſes of his ſubjects, nor to overload them " with impoſts. He means to begin by appropriating the revenues of the domain " to defray the expences of his houſhold, and other ſtate charges; and only to " demand of his faithful ſubjects ſuch contributions as are indiſpenſably requiſite " for the defence of the kingdom. His firſt and moſt ardent wiſh is to ſee his " people contented and happy: and the promotion of their welfare and felicity " was the ſole object he had in view in the reforms which he has already made.— " As the nation incurred a great expence by keeping ſix thouſand mercenaries in " conſtant pay, he has ſent them back to their own country; he has alſo diſmiſſed " ſeveral companies of the national troops, whoſe aſſiſtance cannot be wanted ſo " long as the kingdom ſhall be at peace; and in order to ſecure the continuation " of tranquillity, he has ſent ambaſſadors to all the neighbouring powers, either " to renew the old treaties, or to contract new ones. Theſe occupations have " not prevented him from directing his attention to two other objects of impor- " tance—the legiſlation, and the reform of the clergy. With regard to the firſt, " he has cauſed all the ordonnances of Charles the Seventh to be collected, in " order to put them in force; and as to the ſecond point, he conceived, that with- " out ſubjecting himſelf to cenſure for violating the deciſions of the church, " which he holds in the greateſt reſpect, he might, as head of the ſtate, take cog- " niſance of whatever related to diſcipline and manners.

" This is what the king has already performed; you are now to hear what he " expects from you; and this formed the fourth motive for aſſembling you. He " requires that you ſhould point out to him whatever abuſes may have eſcaped his " his knowledge, and that you ſhould not conceal from him any of the evils with " which the people are afflicted: do not fear that your complaints will be impor- " tunate, the king will pay due attention to all your remonſtrances. And you, " princes, who hear me, I entreat and conjure you, in the name of our country, " our common mother, to lay aſide all ſpirit of party, and to ſuffer the deputies " to enjoy a full and perfect freedom of debate.

" The fifth motive for the convention of this aſſembly, was the neceſſity of " forming a council for the king, who might ſecond his plans for the preſervation " of peace, for the re-eſtabliſhment of the police, for the adminiſtration of juſ- " tice, and for the encouragement of trade: this council ought to be compoſed " of men, whoſe experience of the paſt may enable them to provide for the fu- " ture; whoſe diſpoſitions and characters are calculated to ſecure to the king the " affection of his ſubjects, and the eſteem and confidence of his neighbours; of " men who have a thorough knowledge of the conſtitution of the kingdom, and " who are capable of ſetting in motion all the ſprings of the body-politic, without " embarraſſment or confuſion. If the king's wiſhes are gratified, juſtice will ſit " on the throne, and dictate laws to his people. Whoever ſhall commit any of- " fence againſt juſtice, will offend the king; and whoever may wiſh to prove his " affection for the king, muſt begin by paying a ſtrict attention to juſtice. In " order to remove all doubts as to his his true ſentiments, the king has command- " ed me to warn every perſon not to preſume to aſk him for any thing unjuſt; for " whoever ſhall make ſuch an attempt, will meet with the puniſhment due to his " temerity. Juſtice, prudence, reſolution, and temperance, will ſupport the throne, " and regulate all the actions of the monarch. Then may the people—reſcued " from ſhipwreck, and daily repairing their loſſes—exclaim, with tranſports of " joy, O thrice happy day! that has reſtored to us peace and plenty, and has given us " a prince whoſe conduct is influenced by wiſdom, and who merits the appellation of— " Father of his Country!

" In vain ſhould we aſpire to the poſſeſſion of theſe advantages, unleſs concord " and union were previouſly eſtabliſhed among the different members of the ſtate; " and this deſirable object it is chiefly your buſineſs to accompliſh. Recollect " what Cæſar ſaid of our anceſtors:—All the troops in the world would prove inſuffi- " cient to ſubdue the Gauls, were they united among themſelves. What cauſed the " deſtruction of the Roman republic?—the rivalſhip of two of her citizens. It " would be needleſs to remind you of the calamities produced in France, under " the reign of Charles the ſixth, by the hatred of two powerful families.

" I conclude, by conſigning to your care the intereſts of the king, the church, " and the people. You will obſerve the following order in your deliberations— " you will firſt diſcuſs all matters which relate to the general welfare of the ſtate; " you will next examine ſuch as concern only a ſingle province or town; and,

" laſtly, you will attend to the affairs of individuals. Take care not to confound " theſe objects. The king will grant you an audience whenever you ſhall apply " for one; and he will refuſe juſtice to no man, not to the meaneſt of his ſub- " jects*."

The aſſembly immediately adjourned till the next day, when they proceeded to the election of a preſident, and two ſecretaries; after which, they agreed to divide themſelves into ſix parts, or nations, in order to avoid that confuſion which a contrariety of intereſts might occaſion in the courſe of the debates between the deputies of the different provinces.—The firſt nation compriſed the iſle of France, Picardy, Champagne and Brie; the Nivernois, the Maçonnois, Auxerrois, and the Orleanois.

The ſecond conſiſted of the two Bugundies, and Charolois.

The third, of Normandy, Alençon, and Perche.

The fourth, of Aquitaine, Armagnac, the county of Foix, l'Agenois, the Perigord, Querci, and Rouergue.

The fifth, of Languedoc, Dauphiné, Provence, and Rouſſillon.

And the ſixth, called the Langue d'Oyl, included Berri, Poitou, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, the Limouſin, Auvergne, the Bourbonnois, Forés, Beaujolois, Angoumois, and Saintonge.

Each diviſion had a private apartment for the diſcuſſion of ſuch matters as they meant to lay before the king; after which it was agreed that the ſix diviſions ſhould meet to report the reſult of their reſpective labours, when the moſt important objects ſhould be ſelected, and formed into one cahier, or ſtring of reſolutions, which were to contain the demands of the whole nation.

It would be ſuperfluous to detail all the proceedings of this aſſembly, to notice the intrigues of the princes to corrupt the deputies, the petitions of individuals for redreſs of injuries ſuſtained during the preceding reign, or the various diſputes which occurred between the members themſelves. We ſhall only, therefore, ſelect ſuch parts as relate to the general hiſtory of the kingdom, or as tend to explain the maxims of government, and to illuſtrate the notions of liberty, which were then entertained by the French.

The debates on the formation of a regency, and the eſtabliſhment of a council, were long and animated. The nation of Normandy propoſed to leave the king's perſon to the care of thoſe who had hitherto diſcharged that important truſt with wiſdom and with zeal; to veſt the goverment of the kingdom in the hands of the council; to admit all the princes of the blood to a ſeat in the council, according to their rank, and to give them the power of chuſing eight or twelve of the old councillors, and to diſmiſs the reſt; that, to that number ſhould be added twelve, fifteen, or even four-and-twenty new councillors, to be ſelected from the ſtates-general, by the ſtates themſelves, which new members ſhould enjoy the ſame rank and prerogatives as the old ones. This propoſal, which tended to throw the whole power of the government into the hands of the people, acquired numerous partiſans. Many members exclaimed—That its propriety could not be queſtioned; that the ſupreme power was, during the king's minority, veſted in the nation, who had an undoudted right to impoſe its commands on individuals; and that, conſequently, the princes of the blood ſhould be compelled to ſubmit to this regulation. On the other hand it was maintained, with equal warmth, That, in an hereditary monarchy, ſuch as France, the nation had no right to the ſovereign authority, ſo long as there remained any lawful heirs: that, after the king's death, that authority paſſed into the hands of his ſon if he were in a condition to exerciſe it; and, in caſe of a minority, into the hands of the princes of the blood, who were his natural guardians; that they alſo had a right to form a council, and to regulate all the different departments of government; and that they were under no neceſſity of aſking the people's advice, except with regad to the diſtribution and collection of impoſts; that, if the princes, on the preſent occaſion, had deigned to conſult the nation, and chuſe her as the arbiter of their reſpective claims, it was a pure condeſcenſion on their part, which demanded a grateful return, and ſhould not, on any account be abuſed; that, by exciting their diſcontent on an article in which the happineſs of the people was in no wiſe concerned, they might perhaps be led to diſſolve the aſſembly, and that then every advantage, which the people expected to derive from the convention of the ſtates, would be irretrievably loſt; that prudence required the ſtates ſhould confine themſelves to ſuch objects as came immediately within their province, and leave to the princes the care of ſettling their own diſputes, as they might think proper.

The ſpeech of Philip Pot, lord of Roche, repreſentative of the nobles of Burgundy, is peculiarly worthy of notice. "If I were not well acquainted"—ſaid he —"with the ſentiments of the moſt enlightened part of the aſſembly, on the liberty and authority of the ſtates, I ſhould not now attempt to oppoſe the vain clamours of the multitude; but after the proofs which you have already given of your diſcernment and knowledge, I need not fear to advance what reading and reflection have taught me on this fundamental point of our public law. If I ſucceed in making myſelf underſtood, I dare flatter myſelf that thoſe who now blame us for the care we take in the formation of a council, will change their opinion and their language. Before I enter into an explanation of the reaſons on which I found the authority of the ſtates, let me be allowed to put a queſtion or two to our adverſaries:—Do they imagine that, on the death of a king, who leaves a ſon in his minority, the guardianſhip of the infant-monarch, and the general adminiſtration of the kingdom, belong of right to the firſt prince of the blood? No, doubtleſs—they will anſwer—for then the life of the monarch will be expoſed to evident danger; the law, too, has provided for this caſe, by conferring the adminiſtration on the firſt prince of the blood, and the guardianſhip on the next in ſucceſſion. Take care, I reply, that you do not, by this arrangement, equally expoſe the life of your ſovereign; for the two princes, between whom you ſeem to divide the authority, may unite and have the ſame intereſts. But of what law are you ſpeaking? Where does it exiſt? By whom was it made? In what book have you read it? I defy you to anſwer any one of theſe queſtions.—If ſuch a law did really exiſt, do you ſuppoſe the duke of Orleans would have conſented to ſubmit to arbitration a queſtion already decided, and to ſuffer the diſcuſſion of claims already ſettled? In vain do you cite the caſe of Charles the Wiſe; that caſe makes againſt you; for Charles did not ſucceed to the regency till two years after the throne had been vacated, and till that dignity had been conferred on him by the ſtates.—

"I now addreſs myſelf to thoſe who pretend, that, during a minority, the guardianſhip and adminiſtration devolve on all the princes of the blood indiſcriminately; and let me aſk them, if they mean to compriſe in the number, ſuch as are deſcended from our ſovereigns, on the mother's ſide, for, in that caſe, they will have a long liſt of guardians and adminiſtrators, among whom it will be difficult to eſtabliſh union and concord. But I will ſuppoſe that they confine themſelves merely to the male line: if thoſe princes have any diſpute among themſelves about the government, who is to decide between them? Is it not plain, that they will immediately have recourſe to arms, and involve the nation in all the horrors of civil war? Is it not evident, alſo, that, in this caſe, the ſupreme authority will often become the reward of a madman, and a diſturber of the public repoſe, who, in a well-regulated government, would incur the ſevereſt puniſhment? What then—will it be aſked—muſt the kingdom during a minority, remain in a ſtate of anarchy? No, certainly, for the authority then devolves on the ſtates-general, who will not, themſelves, take charge of the government, but who will entruſt it to ſuch perſons as they ſhall deem moſt capable of diſcharging its duties with zeal and ability. Now, hear what books, and converſation with men of wiſdom and experience, have taught me on this important matter.

"When men firſt began to form ſocieties, they choſe for their maſters ſuch of their equals as they believed to be poſſeſſed of the greateſt knowledge and integrity; in ſhort, ſuch as by their perſonal qualities were beſt calculated to procure the greateſt advantage to the infant ſociety.——Thoſe who, after their election to this important office, only thought of enriching themſelves at the expence of their ſubjects, were not conſidered as true paſtors, but as ravenous wolves; and thoſe, who, without waiting for an election, ſeiſed upon the ſovereign authority, were not regarded as kings but as tyrants. It is of the utmoſt conſequence to the people, to know the diſpoſition of the man who is deſtined to govern them, for on that alone depends the happineſs or miſery of the whole community. Now to apply theſe general principles:——If any diſpute ariſe with regard to the ſucceſſion to the throne, or to the regency, who is to decide it, unleſs that ſame people who firſt elected their kings, who conferred on them all the authority they enjoy, and in whom the ſovereign power ultimately reſides? For a ſtate or any government whatever is the res publica, and the res publica is the res populi; by the people I would be underſtood to mean the collective body or totality of the citizens, and in this totality the princes of the blood themſelves are neceſſarily included, as chiefs of the order of nobility: can you, then, who, are the repreſentatives of the people, and obliged by oath to defend their rights, ſtill entertain a doubt that it is your province to ſettle the adminiſtration and the form of the council? Who is to prevent you? Has not the chancellor declared, that the king and the princes expect you will do this? I am told, that immediately after the death of the late king, the government was ſettled, and a council choſen, and that thus our cares on this head became ſuperfluous. To this I reply, that as the ſtate could not remain without governors, it was neceſſary to appoint, without delay, ſome perſons who might watch over the public intereſt; but that ſuch appointments, as well as all other regulations which have been adopted ſince the king's death, are merely proviſional, and cannot ſubſiſt without your confirmation. Theſe aſſemblies of the ſtates, and the power which I aſcribe to them, are no novelties, as all who have read hiſtory muſt know. When, on the death of Philip the Fair, a diſpute aroſe between Philip of Valois and Edward, king of England, with regard to the ſucceſſion, the two competitors ſubmitted their claims, as they were bound to do, to the deciſion of the ſtates, who pronounced in favour of Philip. If, then, on that occaſion, the ſtates could lawfully diſpoſe of the crown itſelf, how can their right to appoint a regency be called in queſtion? During the reign of king John, when that courageous, but imprudent prince, was taken priſoner, and conveyed to London; the ſtates did not intruſt the adminiſtration to his ſon, although he had then completed his twentieth year; it was not till two years after, that the ſame ſtates, aſſembled a ſecond time, inveſted him with the dignity and authority of regent; and finally, when Charles the Sixth acceded to the throne, at the age of twelve only, the ſtates general again appointed a regency, and ſettled the government. This is a fact that cannot be diſputed. After ſuch poſitive authorities, will you ſtill doubt the validity of your rights? And ſince, by the form of your oath, you are bound to do and adviſe what, according to God and your conſciences, you ſhall deem moſt uſeful to the ſtate, can you neglect the fundamental point of all your proceedings? For if the promiſes which you mean to exact from the princes ſhould be broken, to whom are you to apply for redreſs? Omit the article of the council, and all your ſubſequent labours will be ſuperfluous:—In ſhort I have proved to you that you have an undoubted right to ſettle the adminiſtration, and to regulate the form of government; I have quoted a great number of examples to demonſtrate this truth; the king commands you to exerciſe your right, the princes conſent to it, and your country exhorts you by the mouth of her firſt magiſtrate. If reaſons thus ſtrong can make no impreſſion on your minds, any calamities which the ſtate may experience hereafter muſt be aſcribed ſolely to your baſeneſs. And you, who ſtill cheriſh the name and preſerve the reſolution of Frenchmen, do not give the nation cauſe for accuſing you of having betrayed her confidence, nor let poſterity have reaſon to reproach you with not having tranſmitted the precious charge of public liberty in the ſame ſtate in which you received it from your anceſtors."

This ſpeech was differently received by different parties; by ſome the orator was warmly commended for his patriotic zeal; while by others he was loudly cenſured for his audacity and factious diſpoſition: and many long debates and much altercation occurred before the queſtion of the council could be finally decided. At length, on the twelfth of February, the aſſembly came to the following reſolutions:

"The king having entered into his fourteenth year, and diſplayed a degree of wiſdom, prudence and diſcretion ſuperior to his age, ſhall himſelf publiſh all lettres-patent, regulations and ordonnances, after they have been diſcuſſed by the council.——The ſtates beſeech the king to preſide at the council, in perſon, as often as he can, in order to acquire an early knowledge of buſineſs, and to verſe himſelf in the arts of government.

"In the king's abſence, the duke of Orleans, as firſt prince of the blood, ſhall preſide at the council, where every meaſure ſhall be decided by a plurality of ſuffrages.

"After the duke of Orleans, and in his abſence, the duke of Bourbon, conſtable of France, ſhall preſide.

"The lord of Beaujeu, who hed already rendered ſuch important ſervices to the ſtate, ſhall have the third place, and ſhall preſide in the abſence of the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon."

It was farther reſolved, that twelve new counſellors ſhould be choſen by the king and the princes, from among the members of the ſtates, two from each of the ſix nations. The fear of offending the duke of Orleans prevented the ſtates from making any mention of Madame in theſe reſolutions; but ſhe had no reaſon to complain, for the reſolutions were ſo contrived as to leave her in poſſeſſion of all her authority. If ſhe ſhould find her meaſures thwarted in the council, by the preſence of the duke of Orleans, ſhe could eaſily remedy that inconvenience by ſending the king—of whoſe perſon ſhe had the ſole diſpoſal—to preſide. The conſtable, from his age and infirmities, would ſeldom be preſent, ſo that the lord of Beaujeu would moſtly be preſident of the council. The king went to the aſſembly, where the reſolutions were read to him; the deputies then bent one knee to the ground, and in that poſture waited his determination. After conferring for ſome minutes with his chancellor, he confirmed them all without any reſtriction.

The next object of importance which engaged the attention of the aſſembly was the ſtate of the revenue; and the deputies ſeemed unanimous in their opinion that a general abolition of impoſts ought to take place. This, they conceived, the king might be enabled to allow; firſt, by reuniting to the crown all kind of poſſeſſions, which, at any time, had been alienated from it, on whatever pretext: on this ſubject they maintained, that the domain, being the true patrimony of the crown, ought to be appropriated ſolely to the purpoſe of defraying the expences of the ſtate, and that a king could not, without manifeſt injuſtice, alienate any part of it: ſecondly, by ſuppreſſing all uſeleſs offices, and by reducing the wages of ſuch placemen as it ſhould be found neceſſary to retain: thirdly, by retrenching, or, at leaſt, diminiſhing penſions; and fourthly, by reducing the number of national troops. Having diſcuſſed this matter, they came to the following reſolution:

"That all taxes, and other arbitraty exactions, ought to be aboliſhed; and that, in future, agreeably to the national franchiſe of France, no tax or impoſt whatever ſhould be levied, within the kingdom, without the free conſent of the ſtates-general."

But this reſolution, as well as the article which related to the reduction of the national troops, experienced a violent oppoſition from the king and the princes of the blood; nor, indeed, could the aſſembly themſelves agree as to the moſt eſſential points, from the difficulty which they found in reducing their theory to practice. In order to obtain a juſt criterion of judgment, they had applied to the king for a full and regular account of the different branches of the revenue, and of the different articles of expenditure, that, by a compariſon of the receipts with the expences, they might be able to decide how far their projects of economy were feaſible and adviſeable. This ſtatement had accordingly been delivered to them by the officers of the revenue; but, on peruſing it, it appeared to be drawn up for the mere purpoſe of deceiving the deputies. The revenue of Normandy was ſtated to amount to no more than twenty-two thouſand livres, and the whole revenue of the crown was only eſtimated at ſeven hunhundred and fifty-five thouſand, in ſhort, the receipts were every where diminiſhed, and the expences magnified. The account was divided into ſix parts: 1. The expences of the king's wardrobe, of his table, and that of his gueſts. 2. The wages of the officers of his houſhold; of the hundred gentleman of his guard; of the two hundred archers à la grande paye, and of the two hundred à la petite; private pleaſures and embaſſies. 3. The pay of the troops, to the number of two thouſand five hundred lances, and of ſeven or eight thouſand infantry; the artillery, the fortifications, and the expences of the royal camp, or Camp of Peace, eſtabliſhed by Lewis the Eleventh. 4. The ſalaries of the judges of the parliaments of Paris, Bourdeaux, Toulouſe, Burgundy and Grenoble; the chamber of accounts, the chancery, the grand council, and the officers of the finance. And laſtly, the liſt of penſions, in which only the names of the penſioners were mentioned, who amounted to nine hundred.

This falſe account deranged all the combinations of the aſſembly, who, after much altercation and debate, were, at length, induced to give up their original plan, which they found to be impracticable in its full extent, and to make another propoſal to the king. They choſe John de Maſſelin for their ſpeaker, who, at a general aſſembly, at which the chancellor and all the princes of the blood were preſent, pronounced the following harangue:

" We have examined the accounts which were delivered to us by the officers of the revenue, but, at firſt ſight, we found them ſo full of ſuch groſs untruths, and ſuch palpable falſehoods, that we could ſcarcely believe our eyes: we muſt obſerve, that we did not expect to be treated with ſuch contempt; and ſince it had been reſolved te deceive us, a more ſkilful mode of accompliſhing the reſolution ought, at leaſt, to have been adopted. I ſhall not attempt to point out every falſehood; a whole day would be inſufficient for the purpoſe; I ſhall, therefore, confine myſelf to one or two articles. The revenue of Normandy, for which province I am member, is, in that account, only eſtimated at two-and-twenty thouſand livres, whereas there are people in this aſſembly who offer forty thouſand for it, and will give good ſecurity for the performance of their engagement. The revenue of the two Burgundies, which are known to amount to eighty thouſand livres, are only eſtimated at eighteen thouſand; and the ſame falſhoods are obſervable with regard to all the other provinces. The deputies for the various provinces are all preſent, and ready to atteſt the truth of my aſſertions. But if they have been actuated by a ſpirt of diminution in their calculation of the receipts, they have, in revenge, wonderfully ſwelled out the expences. The firſt article, which includes the expences of the king's wardrobe and table, amounts to an incredible ſum; God forbid we ſhould ſet ourſelves up for cenſors of our maſter, and pretend to throw any reſtraint on his inclinations!—no;—we ſha'l only preſume to requeſt that he will regulate his houſhold by the example of Charles the Seventh, of glorious memory. That monarch whoſe life had been a life of labour, and whoſe brows were ſhaded with laurels, kept, in his old age, a table much leſs expenſive than that of a modern prince in his infancy; for although, magnificence—as we have been told—be the appanage of royalty, and every man ought to live according to his rank, yet, it muſt be acknowledged, that every thing has its bounds, and that the maſter of the world might ruin himſelf by ſuperfluous pomp and unbridled luxury. The remarks me have made on the king's table and wardrobe, apply equally to his guard, which is three times more numerous than was that of Charles the Seventh. They apply alſo to the officers of his houſhold, and of the finances, whoſe number is not only doubled, ſince that period, but their wages likewiſe. Nor can one office, however lucrative, ſatisfy the perſon who obtains it; the ſame perſon frequently enjoys four or five, each of which would be ſufficient to conſtitute the happineſs of a worthier man, who, deſpairing to procure a place, applies for a penſion, and becomes a burden to the ſtate. In ſhort, the multiplication of officers of every kind, and the increaſe of their wages, are now carried to an intolerable exceſs; the deputies for Burgundy have furniſhed us with a ſtriking example of the prevalence of this evil. In the time of duke Philip the Good, the revenue of the duchy and county of Burgundy was collected by one treaſurer, who had a ſalary of ſix hundred livres; this treaſurer had a clerk, whoſe wages were two hundred livres, and no other expence whatever was incurred by the collection of the revenue. Now there is a treaſurer with a ſalary of two thouſand nine hundred livres; a receiver-general, with the ſame ſalary; a private receiver at twelve hundred livres; and a comptroller at ſix hundred; ſo that a conſiderable part of the revenue of the province is totally loſt to the ſtate.

"Now for the troops; in the liſt which has been preſented to us, the expences have been made out for the ſupport of two thouſand five hundred lances, and ſix or ſeven thouſand infantry, with the addition of a royal camp. On this ſubject the ſtates have ordered me to make the following repreſentations. If France had no mercenary troops, ſhe never could be conſidered in the light of a kingdom deſtitute of the means of defence, ſince ſhe poſſeſſes a brave and warlike nobility, obliged by their inſtitution, and by the nature of their poſſeſſions, to fly to the defence of their country; ſhe has ſeveral princes of the blood, men of wiſdom and experience, who are the natural chiefs of the nobility; and laſtly, ſhe can boaſt of a numerous and martial people, who make it their pleaſure, and think it their duty, to ſhed their blood for their king. For ſeveral centuries ſhe required no other defenders; and ſo far from finding herſelf expoſed to the inſults of her neighbours, ſhe gave the law to all the nations of Europe. Theſe armies of mercenariēs, whoſe utility is now ſo much dwelt upon, owe their firſt inſtitution to ſuſpicious tyrants, who thought they had no other means to defend themſelves from public vengeance, and who often received their puniſhment from the very men to whom they had entruſted the defence of their perſons. Let us, then, no longer be told—that they are the arms of the body politic, and that on them the ſafety of the ſtate depends!—It depends on the love which the ſubjects bear their ſovereign. A ſtate is happy and tranquil, when all orders of men unite in their wiſhes for the preſervation of their chief. How glorious it is for a king to live among his ſubjects, as a father in the midſt of his children, and only to be indebted for the ſincere homage which they are eager to render him, to his own virtues and their affection! But any attempt wholly to eradicate ſuch an inveterate evil would be vain. Since it appears evident that they are reſolved not to aboliſh the wretched cuſtom of keeping and paying a voracious inſtrument of murder, we require, at leaſt, that the example of Charles the Seventh, may, in this inſtance, be followed;—that is to ſay, that only twelve hundred lances may be kept in pay, and that the greateſt attention be paid in making them obſerve the ſtricteſt diſcipline.

"As to the royal camp, eſtabliſhed by Lewis the Eleventh, we conſider it as a ſuperfluous expence, which ought to be immediately aboliſhed. Our opinion is the ſame with regard to ſeveral garriſons mentioned in the paper that has been delivered to us: we cannot, for inſtance, conceive the neceſſity of keeping a garriſon of four hundred lances at Arras, ſince that town is defended by the garriſons of the neighbouring places; if, through exceſs of precaution, it were deemed neceſſary to ſtation ſome troops there, we are thoroughly perſuaded that fifty lances, and a company of infantry, would form a ſufficient garriſon. The ſame obſervation applies to Peronne, and ſeveral other places too numerous to mention. But we were particularly aſtoniſhed at finding a captain and a garriſon ſet down for places ſituated in the center of the kingdom. Who could have expected to find a ſalary of twelve hundred livres, inſcribed on the liſt for the captain of the Baſtile, and as much for the captain of the tower of Bourges; as if thoſe fortreſſes were expoſed to any danger, or as if there were even reaſon to apprehend that the Engliſh could approach ſufficiently near to them to deſcry, from ſome lofty mountain, the ſummit of the towers! I ſhall conclude this article by a fact, which tho' it be of little importance in itſelf, proves to what depradations the public treaſury is at this time expoſed. Twelve hundred livres are ſet down as the expenec of preparing this room, when every perſon preſent muſt know that it could not poſſibly exceed three. If, in an object thus trifling and expoſed to public ſight, they have not ſcrupled to be guilty of ſuch a groſs impoſition, what muſt be the impoſition on objects of greater magnitude, and with regard to which it is often impoſſible to procure any information? I know it has been ſaid, in order to juſtify the perſons who made out the accounts, that their only object was to amuſe and miſlead us; if that be their excuſe, let me aſk them, how they dare to inſult the repreſentatives of the nation? I ſhall take no notice of extraordinary expences, but proceed to the penſions. We have only received the names of the penſioners, without the amount of the reſpective penſions: but even were each penſion moderate, the liſt is ſo long, that they are ſufficient to drain the public treaſury. We are of opinion that none have claims of this kind on the ſtate, except ſuch as have rendered ſignal ſervice to their country; and that more than half of the names ſhould be ſtriken off the liſt; we had even ſome thoughts of entreating the king to ſuppreſs all penſions for a time.

"Such, illuſtrious princes, are the reflections which the ſtates have made on the accounts which have been preſented to them; you will doubtleſs enquire what ſubſidies they have voted, and what is the final reſult of their deliberations? I will ſatisfy you in a few words. Although the total abolition of taxes, and other arbitrary exactions, appeared to us to be the only means of relieving the diſtreſſes of the people; although we are ſtill perſuaded that ſuch an abolition is not only poſſible, but wou'd be even advantageous to the king; yet, diſcouraged by the numerous obſtacles which have been oppoſed to the accompliſhment of ſuch a laudable plan, conſidering how dangerous it would be to draw any concluſions from a falſe account, and deſpairing to triumph over the malice of thoſe who are intereſted in the perpetuation of abuſes, we have had recourſe to an expedient, which, although it be onerous to the people, removes all difficulties, and will prove to the king the ſincerity of that affection which his faithful ſubjects bear him—We offer then to pay to the crown, by way of gift or grant, the ſame ſum which the kingdom paid to Charles the Seventh, of glorious memory; but on condition, that this contribution ſhall be limited to two years, at the expiration of which, the ſtates ſhall be again aſſembled; and we require that the time and place for the future aſſembly ſhall be immediately fixed by an irrevocable declaration.—If all ſuperfluous expences be retrenched, we are thoroughly convinced that this ſum of twelve hundred thouſand livres, joined to the produce of the domain, the aids and Gabelles, will more than ſuffice for the diſcharge of all neceſſary expences, and that a very conſiderable portion of it may be ſet apart for unforeſeen contingencies. The reaſons on which we formed this opinion are theſe: the revenue of Charles the Seventh was greatly inferior to that of the preſent monarch, ſince he was not in poſſeſſion of Anjou, Maine, the two Burgundies, Artois, a great part of Picardy, Dauphiné, the county of Provence, nor Rouſſillon. Charles the Seventh had greater expences to defray than our king has, ſince he had ſons and daughters, and, moreover, paid penſions to Rene of Anjou, and the count of Maine; yet notwithſtanding theſe additional expences, he, with ſuch an inferior revenue, had the moſt brilliant court in Europe. He was a generous and munificent prince; he recovered, by force of arms, the two moſt important provinces in the kingdom, Normandy and Guienne; and, at his death, he left immenſe treaſures. We therefore conjure the king and the princes, not to aſk for any greater ſum than that which we now offer."

This determination of the ſtates occaſioned violent altercations between the princes of the blood and the members of the council; as the acceptance of the offer which had been made by the repreſentatives of the people muſt neceſſarily have occaſioned a conſiderable diminution of penſions, ſalaries, and places. The princes, and people in power, did not chooſe that theſe retrenchments ſhould fall upon them, nor upon the perſons who were attached to their party; and it ſeemed impoſſible to engage the ſtates to change their laſt reſolution. The chancellor, however, who was haraſſed by the murmurs and diſcontents of either party, reſolved once more, to try his influence with the ſtates; he accordingly repaired to the aſſembly, accompanied by the princes, and addreſſed them in the following words:

" You have made ſome uſeful remonſtrances to the king, who will pay them all the attention which faithful ſubjects deſerve, for you cannot doubt but that he deems it more glorious to be king of the Franks than to be king of the ſlaves; but, at the ſame time, it behoves you not to forget what was ſaid to an ancient people, —In aiming at the acquiſition of too much liberty, you run the riſk of falling into the oppoſite extreme: it is no proof of wiſdom, to throw yourſelf on the diſcretion of your enemies, nor can it be ſafe to ſleep in the midſt of ſerpents. I will ſuppoſe for a moment, that the kingdom has nothing to apprehend from foreigners; but then has it nothing to dread from the inordinate paſſions of ſome of its own members? Who will be able to check the turbulence of ambitious minds, if you take the troops from the king? Who will enſure you the execution of the laws? Who will defend the widow and the orphan from violence and oppreſſion? You have paid a juſt tribute of applauſe to Charles the Seventh, who firſt eſtabliſhed regular companies; with what propriety then can you cenſure the king for wiſhing to keep them? If it were ever your intention to do good to your country, this is certainly the time to ſhew it.

"You have entreated the king to be contented with the ſame ſums which Charles the Seventh levied on his ſubjects; but you have not paid attention to the difference of the times and of the circumſtances. Charles the Seventh was a prince who had learned wiſdom in the ſchool of adverſity; he was, moreover, vigilant, intrepid, and active: whereas your ſovereign is almoſt an infant. and finds himſelf expoſed to the ſnares of all who ſhall ſeek to profit by the weakneſs of his youth to ſhake off the yoke of dependence; he is, of courſe, in greater want of troops, from his inability to take upon himſelf all the cares of government, he ſtands in need of intelligent miniſters and a numerous council; he cannot, therefore, avoid granting penſions: beſides, ſince the change that has taken place in the value of money, the ſum you offer is not equivalent to that which Charles the Seventh exacted from his ſubjects. Weigh all theſe reaſons, and attend to my propoſal. You require that the king ſhould relieve the people; he will do more, for to relieve is only to lighten a burden, in a ſmall degree, and you cannot be ſaid to lighten a burden merely when you take off two thirds of it: the king, then, is willing to remit three deniers out of five, and this is a greater favour than you could preſume to hope for. Laſt year the taxes amounted to three millions four hundred thouſand livres. Onerous as that impoſt was, had not the king a right to continue it, ſince he found it eſtabliſhed? Certainly he had, but it is not his intention to exert that right. He means that the fifteen hundred thouſand livres, to which he is pleaſed to confine himſelf, ſhall be levied in equal proportions, on all the provinces which, in the time of Charles the Seventh, compoſed the monarchy; and he reſerves to himſelf the power of making a particular arrangement for ſuch as have been annexed to the crown ſince that period. You may now retire, not to deliberate, for you have heard the king's will, but to prepare yourſelves for expreſſing your gratitude in a becoming manner."

This ſpeech, far from exciting applauſe, was followed by a dead ſilence—in a few minutes ſome confuſed murmurs were heard, and then a general expreſſion of diſcontent burſt forth from every quarter. The members maintaned that the chancellor had attacked the liberty of the nation, and the ſacred rights of property, for, ſaid they, if the king can, of his own will, and without the concent of the ſtates, exact an additional contribution of three hundred thouſand livers, he may, by the ſame rule, double or triple the taxes, and then all our pretentios fall to the ground. The preſident, after confering with ſome of the members, who ſtood near him, aſked permiſſion for the ſtates to delibetate in private; the princes acccordingly withdrew, and the next day was appointed by the chancellor for receiving the final deciſion of the aſſembly.

The ſtates ſeemed ſtrongly diſpoſed to reſent the conduct of the chancellor, and to aſſert their own rights, by the immediate adoption of ſome violent meaſures, but the princes of the blood, by the alternate employment of promiſes and threats, at length induced them to yield, and to paſs the following reſolutions:

"In order to defray the expences of government, and to enſure peace to the kingdom, the members of the three eſtates grant the king, their ſovereign lord, by way of gift and grant, and not otherwiſe, the ſame ſum*—which can, at no future period be called a tax, but a gift and grant—that during the reign of Charles the Seventh, was leived on the kingdom, and this, for two years only and no longer, on condition, two, that the ſaid ſum ſhall be equally divided among all the provinces of which the monarchy is actually compoſed.

"Beſides this firſt annual ſum, the ſtates, who are anxious to promote the welfare, honour, and proſperity of the king and his kingdom, and who with to obey and to pleaſe him, grant him the net ſum of three hundred thouſand livers, as a free gift, on account of his joyous acceſſion to the throne, and in order to defray the expence of his coronation, and his public entry into paris.

" The ſtates beſeech and requeſt the king to convene and aſſemble the ſtates at the expiration of two years, and to immediately point out and declare the time and place at which ſuch aſſembly ſhall be holden: for it is their intention that, hereafter, no ſum of money whatever ſhall be levied on the people, without convening the ſtates, and obtaining their conſent, agreeably to the privileges and liberties of this kingdom.

" If the future aſſembly ſhall be of opinion, that the affairs of the kingdom admit of a diminution, or require an augmentation, the ſaid ſtates will ever be ready, like moſt humble and moſt obedient ſubjects, to make proviſion accordingly, chearfully, and courageouſly, without ſparing any thing, ſo that the king, our ſovereign lord, ſhall have reaſon to be contented with his good and loyal people, and to hold them in great and perpetual eſteem".

As ſoon as theſe reſolutions were adopted, intelligence of the ſame was ſent to the lord of Beaujeu, who promiſed that the king ſhould come to the aſſembly the next day; but the bad weather prevented the young monarch from attending, though the chancellor and the princes were punctual to their time. This diſappointment ſomewhat diſconcerted the ſpeaker, Maſſelin, who thus addreſſed them:

" We had encouraged the hope that the king would honour this aſſembly with his preſence; but, ſince he is here repreſented by the princes of the blood, I ſhall ſtill addreſs myſelf to him——Auguſt prince, under what happier auſpices could you, poſſibly, have begun your reign? Your firſt ſteps have been guided by wiſdom and juſtice. You aſſembled the ſtates of your kingdom, and ordered them to point out to you all the abuſes which had crept into the adminiſtration; we have obeyed thoſe orders. Not content with diſcovering the diſeaſe, we have, at the ſame time indicated the means of removing it: it remains with you to complete the cure, and your glory is intereſted in the event. The nation would be diſhonoured in the eyes of foreign powers, if, after having undertaken to reform every branch of the adminiſtration, our labours ſhould be productive of no ſolid advantage, no real good to our country. Continue, auguſt prince, to regulate your conduct by wholeſome advice, but beware of the arts of thoſe perfidious councillors by whom the princes of your blood are ſurrounded; they will tell you that a king is omnipotent; that he is never miſtaken; that his will is law;—theſe are monſters, objects of public execration; exterminate them without delay, or they will not only corrupt your heart, but will infect your court, and the whole body of the nation.

"After diſmiſſing ſuch evil councillors, a king who wiſhed to govern with equity, would immediately chooſe others whoſe integrity would juſtify the confidence he repoſed in them. He would honour the church, becauſe a contempt of religion occaſions a depravation of manners, and prepares the downfall of a ſtate; he would liſten with reſpect to the miniſters of the goſpel; he would impreſs on his mind an exact image of virtue, in order that his thoughts, words, and actions, might correſpond to it; he would teach his ſubjects, by his own example, to reſpect the laws; he would cheriſh the nobility, and conſider them as the arm of the ſtate, and the ſupport of the throne; in ſhort, he would live as a father in the midſt of his children, and would frequently aſk, with a tender emotion, How fares it with my people?

"If he found that his people were burthened with taxes, or that the ſum they paid, though moderate, was more than requiſite to ſupply the wants of the ſtate, he ought immediately to put a ſtop to the exaction; this is a duy and not a favour; unleſs words are groſsly abuſed, and the action of a ſtrong man who forbears to inſult a weak man whom he meets on his road, is alſo dignified with the appellation of a favour. The people in a monarchy poſſeſs rights, and have a real property, ſince they are free and not ſlaves, and ſince the monarchical government, according to the opinion of the ancient philoſophers, is the mildeſt of all governments, and that which is the moſt compatible with liberty. An abuſe, however ſanctioned by preſcription, can never be pleaded in bar of a natural right; and whoever affirms that a king who, on his acceſſion to the throne, finds his people overburdened with taxes, is not bound to relieve them, advances a falſe and injurious principle.

"It has given us the greateſt concern to find, that there are men baſe enough to accuſe us of a wiſh to deprive the king of his lawful prerogatives; ſuch an atrocious imputation can only reflect diſhonour on its author. Convinced that the welfare and advantage of the people, and the welfare and advantage of the king, were one and the ſame, we thought that, by ſeeking to relieve the people, we were ſerving the king, and fulfilling the duty of faithful ſubjects. In blaming the diſorders which prevailed in the old government, we only obeyed the king's commands, as he enjoined us, by the mouth of his chancellor, to expoſe to him, without diſguiſe, all the abuſes which diſfigured the ſtate. If we have expreſſed ourſelves with energy, and with a kind of aſperity, the ſubject required it, and we do not repent it.

" It has been objected to us, that while we have, on all occaſions, commended the officers of Charles the Seventh, we have obſerved an offenſive ſilence with regard to thoſe of Lewis the Eleventh; but we hope our conduct, in this reſpect, has not offended any one, for by praiſing Peter we do not ſatiriſe Paul. If among the officers of Lewis there be—as we doubt not there are—ſome men of integrity and honour, let them be rewarded and exalted; we willingly conſent to it. But as we know there alſo many of a contrary deſcription, we beg and requi e that all ſuch may be immediately diſmiſſed, and kept at a diſtance from the king's perſon.

" I now come to the principal object of this ſeſſion. My lord, the chancellor, having explained to us the wants of the ſtate, demanded that an annual impoſt of fifteen hundred thouſand livres ſhould be levied on the kingdom. We could wiſh, moſt high and potent princes, that the French people were in a ſituation to liſten only to the dictates of their generoſity, and of their love for their ſovereign; but you all know to what a ſtate of wretchedn ſs and humiliation they are reduced, and of what importance it is to afford them the means of extricating themſelves from their difficulties. Anxious, therefore, to pleaſe the king, without completing the miſery of the people, we have adopted the reſolutions which will now be read to you."

After ſettling the diſtribution of the taxes on the different provinces, and arranging ſome other matters of leſs importance, the ſtates were diſſolved on the fourteenth of March. It appears from their proceedings, that the French, at this period, entertained ſome juſt and rational ideas of civil liberty, and that though they had tamely acquieſced in the tyrannical meaſures of Lewis the Eleventh, they did not chuſe that his conduct ſhould be received as a precedent: indeed, they ſeem rather to have wanted an opportunity than a ſpirit for aſſerting and maintaining their rights, in oppoſition to the unconſtitutional encroachments of their ſovereigns; and had the ſtates-general but procured the privilege of aſſembling at fixed and ſtated periods, deſpotiſm could never have reached to that alarmi g heighth, to which it attained under the ſucceeding monarchs of the Capetian Race.

The princes of the blood, who had inſiſted, with ſuch warmth, on the convention of the ſtates, derived from it none of thoſe advantages which they had expected to obtain.—Madame triumphed; but far from inſulting her rivals in their diſgrace, ſhe ſpared no pains to conſole them for their diſappointment. To the duke of Orleans ſhe gave the command of a company of one hundred lances, with a conſiderable penſion; and the counts of Angoulême and Dunois had alſo each of them a company, with a penſion of ſixteen thouſand livres. It is probable that the princes, convinced that the majority of the nation were hoſtile to their pretenſions, would not have attempted to diſturb the peace of the kingdom, had not the troubles which prevailed in Brittany, and the dangeruos intrigues of a man who, from the moſt abject ſituation, had been raiſed to the higheſt rank, revived their ambition, and betrayed them, by degrees, into an open revolt. As the firſt ſparks of that general conflagration, which ſpread over France, England, Spain, and the Netherlands, were kindled in Brittany, it will be neceſſary to explain the ſituation of that court, at the preſent period, and to point out the motives which induced the deareſt friends and relations to take up arms againſt each other.

Francis the Second, who then reigned over the duchy of Brittany, had been twice married; by his firſt wife, Margaret of Brittany, he had no children; and by his ſecond, Margaret of Foix, only two daughters, Anne and Iſabella. His violent attachment to his imperious miſtreſs, Antoniette de Magnelais, widow to the lord of Villequier, who had acquired an unlimitted authority over him, had long prevented him from contracting a ſecond marriage, ſo that he was far advanced in life, when his two daughters were ſtill in their infancy, and there were little hopes of his living to ſee them married. This proſpect equally encouraged all who had any claims to the duchy to advance them; and ſuch as aſpired to the poſſeſſion of theſe rich heireſſes, to make their propoſals.

The diſpute which had ariſen, during the reign of Philip of Valois, between the rival houſes of Blois and Montfort, had never been completely ſettled. Philip had decided in favour of Charles of Blois; but the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, and the fortune of war, had ſecured the poſſeſſion of the duchy of Brittany to the count of Montfort. After the battle of Aurai, in which the former loſt his life, a convention was ſigned by the belligerent powers, by which the duchy of Brittany was ſecured to the houſe of Montfort, and the county of Ponthiévre, with ſeveral other conſiderable poſſeſſions, were ceded to the family of Blois. The latter, in conſequence of a conſpiracy againſt the duke of Brittany, were declared guilty of high treaſon, and deſpoiled of all their territories; but, through the mediation of Arthur of Brittany, conſtable of France, another convention took place between theſe rival houſes, by which duke Francis the Firſt engaged to reſtore to the Penthiévres the county whence they took their title, and all the other eſtates which they had formerly enjoyed; and he farther declared, in letters-patent, duly ſigned and ſealed, that, notwithſtanding the formal renunciation of their claims to the duchy of Brittany, it was his will, that in caſe he, his two brothers, his uncle Arthur, and his couſin Francis, ſhould die without male heirs, John and William de Ponthiévre, their niece Nicole, wife to the lord of Broſſes, or their children, ſhould ſucceed to the duchy, to the excluſion of the females of the branch of Montfort. But the Breton hiſtorians affirm—and the affirmation appears to be well founded—that theſe letters-patent were granted merely for the purpoſe of deception, in order to ſave the honour of the count of Ponthiévre, who was afraid that he ſhould be reproached by the court of France, with having too haſtily ſacrificed his pretenſions; and that when the duke granted them, he had exacted a counter-letter, by which the count declared, that, after he had ſhewn them to the king, and to his friends and relations, he would ſend them back to Francis, and never make any uſe of them. Be that as it may, they had fallen, by ſome means or other, into the hands of Tanneguy du Chatel, who was induced, by the love he bore his country, to keep them ſecret* ; his widow, however, leſs delicate, delivered them to Lewis the Eleventh, who, ſeeing the male line of the houſe of Montfort on the point of failure, ſince Frances the Second had no ſon, purchaſed of Nicole de Ponthiévre, and her huſband, John of Broſſes, the ſole remaining heirs of the houſe of Blois, all their rights to the duchy of Brittany. Though the validity of thoſe rights was expoſed to ſuch ſtrong doubts, Lewis intended to ſupport them by a formidable army ; but dying before the duke of Brittany, he tranſmitted them to his ſon.

Next to Charles the Eighth another claimant appeared on the liſt, whoſe pretenſions were trivial indeed : this was Francis, Baron d'Avaugour, a natural ſon of the preſent duke of Brittany by Antoniette de Magnelais ; he had been legitimiſed, and his father had conferred on him a profuſion of honours and riches. Promoted to the rank and dignity of firſt baron and lieutenant-general of Brittany, he now aſpired to the ſucceſſion, and imagined, that as the Bretons were attached to the blood of their ancient ſovereigns, and wanted a prince who was able to govern them, they would overlook the defect in his birth, and prefer him to a ſtranger.

The viſcount of Rohan advanced pretenſions that were ſomewhat though not much better founded : he was brother-in-law to the reigning duke, and had two ſons by his wife, Mary of Brittany, ſecond daughter to duke Francis the Firſt.—If Francis the Second had ſucceeded to the duchy in right of his wife, the ſons of the viſcount would have had a preferable claim to the children of the duke by Margaret of Foix ; but as there was a law in Brittany, by which females were excluded from the ſucceſſion, ſo long as there were any male heirs remaining, though farther removed from the direct line than the females, and as Francis had ſucceeded to the duchy, not as huſband to the princeſs, but as the neareſt male heir, the viſcount could advance no good reaſon for the excluſion of Anne and Iſabella : he, therefore, contented himſelf with claiming for his ſons all the treaſures and moveable effects of duke Francis the Firſt ; the dower and moveables of their aunt Margaret ; and laſtly, all the territorial acquiſitions made by the firſt Francis, and one half of thoſe which Francis the Second had, himſelf made during the period of his firſt marriage. Convinced that the duke, even had he the inclination, had not the ability to comply with theſe demands, he propoſed, in order to avoid all diſcuſſion, to unite the claims of the two families by a marriage between his two ſons and the two daughters of Francis. The propoſal was ſupported by the mareſchal de Rieux and the principal nobility of Brittany, but the duke rejected it with diſdain.

Francis, in order to connect his intereſts with thoſe of the Engliſh monarch, had propoſed an alliance between his eldeſt daughter, Anne, and the prince of Wales, but on condition that Brittany ſhould never be annexed to the crown of England. This alliance, however, had been prevented by the aſſaſſination of the prince and his brother.

* Garnier, tom. xix. p. 352.

Diſappointed in his hopes from that quarter, the duke now caſt his eyes on Maximilian, archduke of Auſtria, to whom he propoſed to marry his eldeſt daughter, and, at the ſame time, to give his youngeſt to Philip, the youthful ſovereign of the Netherlands, ſon to Maximilian and Mary of Burgundy. But the duchy being ſoon reduced to extremity, Maximilian, ſufficiently occupied in providing means for his own defence, and having but little proſpect of affording the duke ſpeedy and effectual aſſiſtance, Francis was induced to liſten to the propoſals of another lover. This was the lord of Albret, ſurnamed the Great, the moſt opulent ſubject in the kingdom, after the princes of the blood: he had claims on ſome places in Brittany, but more generous or more artful than his competitors, he appeared to forget his own intereſts in order to maintain thoſe of his ally. He demanded that the hand of the princeſs ſhould be the reward of that warrior who ſhould beſt ſignaliſe his courage and zeal in her defence, and who ſhould render the moſt important ſervices to the duchy. D'Albret, however, had but little to recommend him; he was advanced in years, and had ſeveral children either married or marriageable; his perſon was diſguſting, and his temper inſupportable.

Laſtly, the duke of Orleans appeared in the liſt of competitors, and for ſome time eclipſed all his rivals. His recommendations were ſtrong and powerful; he was firſt prince of the blood; preſumptive heir to the throne; and couſin-german to the duke of Brittany; he was ſupported by the houſe of Foix, whence the ducheſs of Brittany was herſelf deſcended; and as he, moreover, poſſeſſed, in an eminent degree, the art of pleaſing, he ſoon engaged the affections of his youthful miſtreſs.

Such were the principal claimants, whoſe efforts either to diſpoſſeſs or to marry the heireſs of Brittany, ſoon filled that court with factions and intrigues. Even an active, enlightened and reſolute prince would have found the repreſſion of ſo many tumultuous and diſcordant paſſions a taſk of extreme difficulty; and, unfortunately for Brittany, Francis was a weak and irreſolute prince, who had long ſuffered himſelf to be guided wholly by his miniſters. After Leſcun had engaged in the ſervice of France, he placed his confidence in Peter Landois, a man not leſs artful and intriguing than Leſcun, but more proud and corrupt; who, from the abject ſtate of a taylor, had been promoted to the dignity of treaſurer and prime miniſter. Convinced that the nobles would never forgive him for engroſſing the favour of their ſovereign, he did not attempt to conciliate their eſteem, but only ſought to render himſelf formidable by the indiſcriminate deſtruction of all who refuſed to acknowledge his authority. The laſt victim of the favourite's ambition, was Chauvin, chancellor of Brittany, a man of the ſtricteſt integrity, who had rendered the greateſt ſervices to the ſtate: Landois perſuaded the duke that he was a penſioner of the court of France, and was hired to betray the intereſts of his maſter: in conſequence of this falſhood, he ſurpriſed an order from Francis to impriſon the chancellor; and, after a long ſeries of perſecutions, that worthy magiſtrate periſhed by a moſt miſerable death.

The nobility enraged and alarmed at theſe iniquitous tranſactions, repaired in a body to the palace, in order to ſeize the object of their indignation, but he was ſo fortunate as to elude their ſearch, and to eſcape, for the preſent, the effects of their vengeance. Landois now conceived the deſign of forming a party which might enable him to triumph over his enemies. For this purpoſe he caſt his eyes on the duke of Orleans, and invited that prince to repair, without delay, to the court of his couſin the duke of Brittany, who, he ſaid, intended to beſtow on him the hand of his eldeſt daughter.* The duke of Orleans was already married to the ſecond daughter of Lewis the Eleventh, but his averſion to that deformed and ſterile princeſs was a matter of public notoriety. He haſtened to Brittany, contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with Landois, and obtained permiſſion to viſit the young princeſs, who, even at that early period of life, gave ſigns of thoſe great qualities which rendered her the admiration of the age.

Madame, to whom the conduct of the duke of Orleans gave juſt ſubject of complaint, profited by the circumſtance of the king's coronation, which was fixed for the thirtieth of May, to recall him to France; and the duke, though extremely mortified at being compelled to leave Brittany ſo ſoon, obeyed the citation, and was preſent at the ceremony. But his return to France occaſioned Madame almoſt as much uneaſineſs as his ſtay in Brittany would have done. The king became ſo enamoured of his company that he was never eaſy without him; and he was eaſily taught to conſider the ſalutary reſtraints impoſed on him by his ſiſter as deſtructive of his freedom, and derogatory to his rank. Impreſſed with theſe ideas, Charles conſented to elope; ſome councillors of ſtate, in the intereſt of the duke of Orleans, laid the plan of his evaſion, and three of his chamberlains undertook to put it in execution. But Madame, informed of the plot, entered the king's chamber in a rage, broke the chamberlains in his preſence, and immediately appointed others who were devoted to her intereſt. After this event ſhe conceived that ſhe was no longer in ſafety at the caſtle of Vincennes, on account of its vicinity to Paris, of which place the duke of Orleans was governor; ſhe therefore took the king to Montargis, where ſhe paſſed the remainder of the year, attentive to the motions of her enemies, and careful, by adopting the inſidious policy of her father, to foment the troubles in Brittany.

The duke of Brittany had, during theſe tranſactions, been prevailed on by his favourites to declare the nobility, who had ſhut themſelves up in the ſtrong town of Ancenis†, traitors to their ſovereign. This raſh and inconſiderate proceeding, had, as Landois expected, engaged the nobles in an open revolt; and having no other reſource, they did not ſcruple to purchaſe the protection of the king of France by the violation of their oaths, and the ſacrifice of their duty. They ſent the prince of Orange, Peter de Villeblanche, and John le Bouteiller, lord of Maupertuis, to Montargis, where they promiſed and ſwore, that, after the death of Francis the Second, they would acknowledge Charles for their lawful ſovereign, and would devote their lives and fortunes to the advancement of his authority, on the following conditions. 1. That after the annexation of Brittany to the crown of France, juſtice ſhould be adminiſtered in that province in the ſame manner as before, and by the magiſtrates of the country. 2. That the nobles, eccleſiaſtics and others, ſhould have their privileges and franchiſes confirmed. 3. That no tax ſhould be levied in the province, without the previous conſent of the ſtates. 4. That the gentry ſhould only be obliged to ſerve in ſuch caſes and in ſuch manner as ſhould be ſettled by the king. 5. That all employments, both civil and military, ſhould be conferred on the natives of Brittany. 6. That in caſe the ducheſs ſhould ſurvive her huſband, a proper ſettlement ſhould be aſſigned her, to be fixed by the ſtates. 7. That the duke's two daughters ſhould be married, with the advice of the ſtates, according to their rank. 8. That in caſe Charles or any of his ſucceſſors ſhould have ſeveral ſons, one of them ſhould be created duke of Brittany. On theſe conditions, which were granted without any reſtrictions, the king took the Breton nobles under his protection, and he immediately ſent an order to the duke, his vaſſal, to abſtain from all farther violence againſt them, and to repair the damages which they had already ſuſtained.

On exciting his maſter to drive the malecontents to extremities, Landois had explained to him the means by which he meant to reduce them to obedience. Beſides the ſuccours which he expected from the duke of Orleans, he aſſured him that he ſhould ſoon have all the forces of England at his command. The circumſtance on which he founded this aſſurance, were theſe:

After the fatal battle of Tewkeſbury, which fixed the crown of England on the brows of that ſanguinary tyrant, the fourth Edward, the earl of Pembroke, with his nephew, Henry Tudor, the young earl of Richmond, had embarked at Tynley for France; but contrary winds forced them to land in Brittany where they experienced a hoſpitable reception from Francis the Second. Edward, alarmed at Richmond's eſcape, who was conſidered, by many, as next heir to the throne, and on whom he knew, all the ſecret friends of the houſe of Lancaſter had caſt their eyes, ſent ambaſſadors to the duke of Brittany, to require that he would give him up: but that prince refuſed to commit ſo flagrant a breach of hoſpitality as to comply with this demand; though he aſſured Edward, that he would watch Richmond ſo cloſely that he ſhould never have an opportunity of diſturbing his government; in conſideration of which promiſe, the king of England paid a yearly penſion to the duke.

But three years after this attempt, Edward's fears of young Richmond being renewed with redoubled violence, he determined to make another effort for obtaining poſſeſſion of his perſon. With this view he again ſent ambaſſadors to the duke of Brittany, on pretence of renewing the truce, which was confirmed without difficulty; after which they proceeded to unfold the real object of their embaſſy. They told the duke, that the king their maſter was extremely deſirous of totally extinguiſhing the embers of thoſe factions which had raged with ſuch violence in England; that the earl of Richmond being the only ſurviving prince of the houſe of Lancaſter, it was his intention to marry him to one of his own daughters, that all future diſputes might be avoided by an union of the rival families; he, therefore, hoped the duke of Brittany would entruſt the earl to his care, that he might diſtinguiſh him by marks of his bounty, and convince the world of his earneſt anxiety to ſecure, on a ſolid baſis, the peace and tranquillity of his kingdom. The duke, truſting to the ſincerity of Edward's profeſſions, ordered the young earl, with his uncle Pembroke, to be delivered to them, and they immediately departed with their victims to the port of Saint Malo, whence they prepared to embark for England. But John de Quelenec, admiral of Brittany being appriſed of this circumſtance, entered the duke's apartment with ſorrow expreſſed on his countenance; which the duke obſerving, he enquired the cauſe of it. "The paleneſs you obſerve in my face," replied the admiral, "is the forerunner of death, which, I could have wiſhed, had put a period to my days, before I had witneſſed an action that muſt diſhonour my maſter. My lord, you have acquired the reputation of a man of honour, how then could you be ſo inattentive to the preſervation of that character, and how, after you had pledged your faith, could you conſent to deliver up a prince, who had aſked your protection, to puniſhment and death?"—"Mr. Admiral," interrupted the duke, "you are miſtaken, there is nothing to fear for the earl of Richmond, whom Edward only beſought me to ſend to him, that he might make him his ſon-in-law."—"Be aſſured," replied Quelenec, "that if he quit your dominions, he is a dead man." The eyes of Francis were now opened, and he immediately diſpatched his favourite, Peter Landois, to Saint Malo, to bring back the refugees. He arrived as they were on the point of embarking; and, having made known the purport of his miſſion to Richmond and Pembroke, he amuſed the ambaſſadors while they affected their eſcape to a ſanctuary, from whence he would not ſuffer them to be taken. The ambaſſadors complained loudly of this artifice, and Landois made ſome frivolous apoligies, which they would by no means admit. He then frankly told them, that the duke his maſter, having duly reflected on the ſubject, had become ſenſible that he could not deliver up his gueſts without a flagrant violation of the laws of hoſpitality; but he renewed, in the duke's name, thoſe aſſurances which had been before made to Edward, that the two earls ſhould be ſo ſtrictly guarded they would be effectually prevented from interrupting the tranquillity of England.

It was by means of this prince, who was already indebted to him for the preſervation of his life, that Landois hoped to effect a revolution in England; he juſtly imagined, that ſhould he ſucceed in his attempts to place him on the throne, he ſhould receive from him ſuch aſſiſtance as would be requiſite to make him triumph over his enemies; and that by the ſubſequent promotion of a marriage between Richmond and the heireſs of Brittany, he ſhould be enabled, after the duke's death, to preſerve his rank and ſtation. In order to ſecure the ſucceſs of this plan, Landois, after the acceſſion of the third Richard, ſent ambaſſadors to England, under pretence of renewing the truce which ſubſiſted between the two crowns. Theſe ambaſſadors could not have arrived at a more fortunate period, as the duke of Buckingham diſcontented with Richard, had juſt formed the deſign of depoſing that uſurper, and had entered into a correſpondence, with the view to haſten the execution of his plan, with all the malcontents in different parts of England.

The Breton ambaſſadors returned with this favourable report; and they were ſoon followed by two confidential friends of Richmond, who brought him a ſum of money from his mother, and preſſed him to haſten to England, where his friends were waiting to receive him. Landois, to whom the earl communicated his diſpatches, furniſhed him with a fleet, and a body of five thouſand men, with which he ſailed from Saint Malo, in October, 1483; but before he could reach the Engliſh coaſt, the duke of Buckingham had been defeated and executed; not thinking it prudent, therefore, to land, he returned to Brittany. He was there joined by numbers of the Engliſh nobility, who exacted from him an oath, that, ſo ſoon as he ſhould have effected the depoſition of Richard, he would unite the oppoſite pretenſions of the houſes of York and Lancaſter, by marrying the princeſs Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of king Edward. They then ſwore fealty and allegiance to him, as their lawful ſovereign, and Richmond immediately formed a little court of his own at Rennes; Landois ſeemed to encourage theſe proceedings, and renewed his promiſes of aſſiſtance, though, at the ſame time, he had entered into a correſpondence with their enemies.

Richard the Third, convinced that he ſhould never be at eaſe, ſo long as Richmond ſhould be at liberty, ſent an ambaſſador to Brittany, who addreſſed himſelf to Landois, and made him ſuch offers as were well calculated to ſeduce a venal and perfidious mind. He engaged to reſtore to Francis the earldom of Richmond, which had formerly been poſſeſſed by his anceſtors; to give Landois all the eſtates and other property of the Engliſh refugees in Brittany, and to ſupply him with a body of troops for the purpoſe of reducing his enemies. Landois, conſidering that the plan for dethroning Richard would be attended with conſiderable difficulty and expence, and was ſubject, moreover, to a thouſand interruptions; and that, even ſhould it ſucceed, he could not expect to derive from it greater advantages than thoſe which were now offered to him, at a time, too, when he was in the greateſt want of them, accepted, without heſitation the propoſals of Richard, and promiſed to deliver up to him, without delay, the earl of Richmond, and all his partiſans. The negociations, however, had not been conducted with ſuch ſecrecy, but that the biſhop of Ely, who was then on the continent, was adviſed of it. That prelate immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to Richmond, warning him of his danger, and urging him to eſcape to France. But this appeared to be a matter of difficulty, as a very early day was fixed for the execution of Landois's plan, and there could be little doubt but that he had taken every precaution to prevent his evaſion. After much reflection, however, Richmond ſettled the plan of his eſcape:—he made the earl of Pembroke and ſome other noblemen take the road to Nantes, where the duke of Brittany reſided under pretext of imparting to Francis ſome affairs of importance; but he adviſed them by no means to enter that town, and to make the beſt of their way to the frontiers of France. He then announced his intention of viſiting, in two days time, a country houſe which he had at a ſhort diſtance from Rennes; and on this pretence he entered a foreſt, which lay on the road, with only one attendant, and travelled day and night, by private ways, towards the frontiers of Anjou. Landois ordered him to be purſued, and the meſſengers he ſent after him, only miſſed him by one hour. Three hundred Engliſhmen, who remained at Rennes, gave themſelves up for loſt; but the duke, who was a ſtranger to the intrigues of his miniſter, gave them permiſſion to follow their maſter, and defrayed their expences on the road. The fugitives experienced a favourable reception from Madame, and were even encouraged to hope for aſſiſtance.

Though diſappointed in his hopes of procuring aſſiſtance from England, Landois did not renounce his ſchemes of vengeance. The troops which he had at his diſpoſal were more than ſufficient to deſtroy his enemies, had thoſe enemies been left to themſelves; but as they had been taken under the protection of the king of France, he could not attack them without expoſing his country to an immediate invaſion. He, therefore, reſolved to wait till the duke of Orleans and Maximilian ſhould act in concert, and draw all the forces of France to another quarter.

Madame, in the mean time, aware of his deſigns, was ſtudious to throw ſuch obſtacles in the way of Maximilian, as ſhould deter him from engaging in a war with France; ſhe followed the plans of her father in rewarding ſuch of the Flemiſh nobility as reſiſted the authority of that prince, and in encouraging the turbulent inhabitants of Ghent to revolt. She farther ſought to raiſe up a perſonal enemy to Maximilian, in René, duke of Lorraine, celebrated for the victories he had obtained over Charles the Bold. This prince had appeared before the ſtates at Tours, where he claimed the reſtitution of the Barrois, Provence, and the inheritance of the houſe of Anjou, from which he was deſcended by his mother's ſide. Madame, afraid that he might be tempted to eſpouſe the intereſts of the princes, had not rejected any of his demands. She had already reſtored to him the duchy of Bar; and had made a formal ceſſion of all the claims which Lewis the Eleventh had prefered to the duchy of Lorraine: with regard to Provence, commiſſioners were appointed on both ſides, to diſcuſs the reſpective rights of either party; and till their deciſion, which was to be delivered at the expiration of four years, ſhould be known, the king had conſented to pay the duke, by way of indemity, a penſion of thirty-ſix thouſand livres. This generous proceeding had attached the duke of Lorraine to Madame, and ſhe now wiſhed to oppoſe him to Maximilian by making him marry Philippa of Gueldres, niece to her huſband, the lord of Beaujeu, and daughter to Adolphus, who had been deprived of his dominions by the duke of Burgundy. This young princeſs had but one brother, who had juſt entered the ſervice of Maximilian; and, in caſe of his death, ſhe had an indiſputable right to the duchy of Gueldres, and the county of Zutphen; if, on the contrary, that prince ſhould with the aſſiſtance of the duke of Lorraine, recover the inheritence of his anceſtors, he would become a powerful ally, and might give his ſiſter a conſiderable dower. To enable the duke of Lorraine to aſſert the rights of the family with which he was about to connect himſelf, Madame procured him the alliance of William de la Mark, chief of the Liegeois, and the implacable enemy of Maximilian.

Maximilian, notwithſtanding his eagerneſs to revenge the inſults he had ſuſtained from the French, was ſo ſurrounded by enemies on all ſides, that he would certainly have remained tranquil, had not the duke of Brittany, or rather his favourite, Landois, urged him to a renewal of hoſtilities, by a promiſe to give him the heireſs of Brittany in marriage. Reſolved to hazard every thing in order to merit ſuch a flattering diſtinction, Maximilian ſummoned the Flemings to acknowlege him for the guardian of his ſon—whom they had taken from his father—and for the governor of his dominions; and he warned them that he ſhould conſider their refuſal as a declaration of war. The Flemings anſwered this citation by an appeal to the parliament of Paris, or to the court of French peers. Madame, meanwhile, who had only wiſhed to intimidate Maximilian, and was extremely anxious to avoid an open rupture, ſent Anthony and Baldwin, baſtards of Burgundy, into Flanders, in order to promote an accommodation between Maximilian and his ſubjects. With this view, they aſſembled thirteen knights of the Golden Fleece at Terremonde, where deputies from all the towns in Flanders were invited to attend. William Rym, chief of the deputation from the inhabitants of Ghent, a man of a turbulent and ſeditious ſpirit, after declaiming with great virulence again Maximilian, drew his ſword, and threatened with inſtant deſtruction any man who ſhould dare to ſpeak in favour of the prince. The aſſembly was accordingly diſſolved without coming to any deciſion, and Maximilian prepared for war. He firſt took Terremonde by ſurpriſe, and then reduced Oudenard, Granmont, and Ninove; while the militia of Ghent, under the command of the count of Romons, carried deſſolation into the environs of Bruxelles and Hal. Maximilian marched into that country with a view to bring them to action, but they retired on his approach; and the winter being far advanced, the operations on both ſides were ſuſpended.

A. D. 1485.] The duke of Orleans, in the mean time, had adopted every plan he could deviſe for ſtrengthening his party: ſince the court had retired with ſuch precipitation from the caſtle of Vincennes, he had remained at Paris, where he exerted his utmoſt endeavours to render himſelf popular. As ſoon as he thought his credit ſufficiently eſtabliſhed with the multitude, he repaired to the parliament, accompanied by the count of Dunois, and by his chancellor, Denis Mertier, who obſerved to the court*—"That the duke of Orleans, as firſt prince of the blood, and the ſecond perſon in the kingdom, ought to be entruſted with the ſovereign power during the king's minority: that, anxious to procure relief for the people, and to correct the abuſes which prevailed in the adminiſtration, he had, in conjunction with the dukes of Bourbon and Brittany, inſiſted on the convocation of the ſtates-general: that after many contradictions and refuſals, he had at length ſucceeded in convening them; that having received information of attempts to intimidate the members by threats, he had declared himſelf their protector, and had procured for them all the liberty which was neceſſary for the purpoſe of their meeting: that they had made a great number of ſalutary regulations with regard to the general police of the kingdom, and had alſo determined that the king, having entered his fourteenth year, ſhould govern in his own name, but according to the advice of his council, of which the duke of Orleans had been declared preſident: that all theſe uſeful regulations had been treated with contempt: that Madame de Beaujeu had taken poſſeſſion of the revenue, and exhauſted the royal treaſury by a boundleſs prodigality: that the ſtates having granted, beſides the produce of the taxes, which they had reſtricted to twelve hundred thouſand livres, a ſupply of three hundred thouſand for one year only, that ſum had been already extended to another year, in violation of the moſt ſolemn engagements; that even this additional burthen had not prevented the government from contracting a debt of two or three hundred thouſand livres, by which means it would become neceſſary to double the taxes the following year, and thus reduce the people to a ſtate of deſpair the moſt wretched: that all this money was employed for no other purpoſe than to confirm the authority of Madame de Beaujeu, and to render her more deſpotic than ever: that ſhe had already preſumed to exact from the guards that oath which ought only to be taken to the king: that ſhe had, of her own authority, deprived three chamberlains of their places, and conferred them on others; that ſhe kept the king in ſuch a ſtate captivity, that no prince or nobleman was permitted to ſee him; that ſhe had even threatened the duke of Orleans, and had attempted to get him aſſaſſinated by du Lait; that though that prince deſpiſed all threats and attempts which only affected himſelf, yet he could not but feel the greateſt concern, at ſeeing his ſovereign kept in the ſtate of confinement and ſervitude, in which he was meant to be retained till he ſhould have accompliſhed his twentieth year; that he had already written to his majeſty, to entreat him to take refuge in Paris, where he would be at liberty, and where he might chuſe a council compoſed of men of virtue and knowledge; that in order to prove that his advice, in that reſpect, was not influenced by intereſted motives, the duke offered not to appear in the king's preſence, unleſs he ſhould be ſent for; and, in caſe Madame de Beaujeu would conſent to live at the diſtance of ten leagues from court, he himſelf would retire to the diſtance of forty leagues; that being reſolved to devote his life and fortune to the purpoſe of reſcuing the king from captivity, he had come to conſult the parliament, who conſtituted the ſovereign juſtice of the kingdom, whether it would not be adviſeable to convene the ſtates-general a ſecond time, or what other meaſures it would be prudent to adopt for the good of the kingdom."

The firſt preſident of the parliament, very properly, replied—"That the good of the kingdom chiefly conſiſted in the enjoyment of public tranquillity; that ſuch tranquillity could never be maintained ſo long as the principal members of the ſtate refuſed to ſet an example of concord——Prince"—purſued the worthy magiſtrate, addreſſing himſelf to the duke of Orleans—" you are more intereſted than any one, in preventing the prevalence of diſſentions in the royal family of France, and you ought not, therefore, on reports, often falſe, and always equivocal, to venture on meaſures which may be productive of the moſt fatal conſequences.*" The duke's chancellor attempted to reply, but the magiſtrates perſiſted in their reſolution of not becoming inſtruments of ſedition; and all that the duke could prevail on them to do, was to ſend his remonſtrances to the king, without obſervation or comment.

The duke of Orleans next attempted to ſecure the univerſity in his favour, which at that time contained five-and-twenty thouſand ſtudents, moſt of them able to bear arms, who formed, as it were, a private republic in the heart of the capital. But that learned body followed the example of the parliament, and would only conſent to forward the duke's propoſals to the king.

Madame, informed of the manœuvres of this prince, ſent a party of ſoldiers, in diſguiſe, to ſecure his perſon†, but the duke, appriſed of the danger, fled with precipitation to Verneuil, a place belonging to the duke of Alençon, who was one of his partiſans. Madame then haſtened to Paris with the king, who entered that capital on the fifth of February, 1485. Her firſt care, after her arrival, was to expreſs her gratitude to the parliament for their firmneſs and loyalty: ſhe then deprived the duke of Orleans of all his poſts, and conferred the government of Paris, and the Iſle of France, on the old count of Dammartin. The government of Dauphiné, which, at the requeſt of the duke of Orleans, ſhe had given to the count of Dunois, was now aſſigned to Philip of Savoy, count of Breſſe, brother-in-law to the lord of Beaujeu. She broke the three regular companies commanded by thoſe princes, and by the count of Angoulême, their couſin, and ſuppreſſed their penſions; and, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, ſhe conducted the king to Evreux, and made the army advance to Verneuil. Such was the celerity of her motions, that the duke of Orleans was deprived of every reſource, and compelled to make his ſubmiſſion to the king: after which he was reſtored to his ſeat in the council, but neither to his place nor penſion. Whatever reſentment he might experience on this occaſion, he concealed it for the preſent, and accompanied the king on his tour to Normandy.

But while the court remained in that province, the duke of Orleans contrived to form a freſh confederacy againſt Madame‡; in which he engaged the conſtable, Lewis, George, and Buſſi de Amboiſe, Philip de Commines, and ſome other councillors of ſtate, who were diſpleaſed at not being ſuffered to enjoy, in the preſent reign, the ſame credit and influence which they had poſſeſſed in the preceding one. The authority which the conſtable poſſeſſed in the kingdom gave great ſtrength to the confederacy; and the duke of Orleans, confident of ſucceſs, retired to Blois, whence he wrote to the counts of Angoulême and Dunois, and the viſcount of Narbonne—who was then diſputing the county of Foix and the principality of Bearn, with his niece, Catherine, queen of Navarre—to levy troops, and to form a junction either with him, or with the forces under the command of the conſtable. The duke of Brittany, alſo, promiſed to aſſiſt him with all his forces, as ſoon as he ſhould have reduced his rebellious ſubjects: but the prudence of Madame, and the death of his unprincipled favourite, Landois, who was ſeized and hanged by the Breton nobles, prevented him from fulfilling his engagements.

The confederated princes wiſhed to obtain poſſeſſion of ſome ſtrong town which might ſerve as a place of rendezvous for their troops, which were levying in different parts of the kingdom*. They accordingly pitched upon the city of Orleans, which commanded a bridge upon the Loire; but they were too ſlow in their motions, and that fault decided the fate of the campaign. Madame, apprifed of their intentions, ſent the lord of Bouchage, to exhort the citizens of Orleans to remain faithful to the king, and not to tarniſh the glory they had acquired under Charles the Seventh, by an act of rebellion; and that nobleman ſucceeded ſo well in his embaſſy, that when the duke of Orleans preſented himſelf, two days after, before the town, the gates were ſhut againſt him, and the citizens were unanimous in refuſing him admiſſion. The duke's army conſiſted of two thouſand ſix hundred cavalry, and about eight thouſand infantry, with which he ravaged the country round Orleans, and then proceeded to take poſſeſſion of Beaujenci. Madame, meanwhile, in order to encreaſe the mortification of her rival at the failure of his attempt upon Orleans, repaired to that city, where ſhe attended the celebration of the nuptials of the duke of Lorraine, with Philippa of Gueldres, niece to her huſband, the lord of Beaujeu. She then placed Lewis de la Tremouille—who afterward acquired, by his conduct, the honourable appellation of Chevalier ſans reproache—at the head of her troops; and that nobleman ſent two heralds to Beaujenci to order the forces under the duke of Orleans to lay down their arms; but the heralds were diſmiſſed with contempt, and preparations for reſiſtance were made. But no ſooner had la Tremouille inveſted the place, than the count of Dunois, ſenſible that it was unprovided with proviſions and ammunition ſufficient for ſuſtaining a ſiege, perſuaded the duke of Orleans to make propoſals for an accommodation. The council was divided in opinion as to the propriety of accepting theſe propoſals; Madame, and all thoſe who had eſpouſed her quarrel, inſiſted on the wiſdom of profiting by this opportunity to enſure tranquillity to the ſtate: they maintained, that as ſoon as the duke of Orleans ſhould have extricated himſelf from the danger which now threatened him, he would promote a renewal of hoſtilities, and would take care ſo frame his ſchemes in future as to enſure his ſucceſs; it would, therefore, they aſſerted, be more prudent to ſecure his perſon, as well as that of the count of Dunois, who was the moſt dangerous man in the kingdom, and ſend them to be tried by the parliament. This advice, however, was over-ruled by thoſe who were fearful of incurring the hatred of the preſumptive heir to the throne; and it was at length agreed to accept the duke's propoſals for a peace, on condition that he would admit a royal garriſon into all the fortreſſes in his appanage, and that the count of Dunois ſhould be baniſhed to the town of Aſt, beyond the Alps. The duke, at firſt, rejected theſe conditions with diſdain, but by the voluntary ſubmiſſion of the count of Dunois to the ſentence impoſed on him, and by the ſtrenuous perſuaſions of that nobleman, he was at length prevailed on to accept them. As the conſtable had only taken up arms in favour of the duke of Orleans, he was ſoon perſuaded to diſband his forces, and to become a party in the treaty of accommodation.

At the ſame time, the miniſters of France and Brittany, who had aſſembled at Bourges, concluded a treaty, by which the duke of Brittany engaged to pay the ſame kind of allegiance to the king, as his predeceſſors had been accuſtomed to pay to the French monarchs; to renounce all alliances, as well within the kingdom as out of it, that could tend to interrupt the tranquillity of the ſtate; to break off all commerce with the king's enemies, and neither to furniſh them with men, arms, or ammunition. There was the greateſt reaſon to believe that the duke would fulfil theſe engagements, as, ſince the death of Landois, he had regulated his conduct by the advice of his barons, all of whom were under obligations to Madame; and, in order farther to ſecure the attachment of the Breton nobles, ſhe diſtributed honours and rewards among them with a liberal hand. She was, at this time, extremely anxious to live at peace with the duke of Brittany, as, although ſhe had ſucceeded in diſſolving the confederacy of the princes, her arms had been leſs ſucceſsful in the Netherlands.

After the reduction of Tenremonde, Oudenarde, Ninove, and Granmont, by Maximilian, the Flemings, alarmed at the rapidity of his progreſs, had ſent to demand ſuccours of France, and to require that the king would openly declare in their favour*. In conſequence of this application, Charles addreſſed a manifeſto to his father-in-law, Maximilian, accuſing him of having violated his duty as a vaſſal to the crown, in attacking the towns belonging to young Philip, who was a peer of France; and enjoining him to make reparation for ſuch damages, as well as for the loſſes which the Flemings—whom the king, as lord paramount of the county of Flanders was bound to protect and defend—had ſuſtained from his arms. As it was not ſuppoſed this manifeſto would have much effect, the mareſchal Deſquerdes received orders to march to the aſſiſtance of the inhabitants of Ghent, with an army of ſix hundred lances. The mareſchal firſt attempted to get poſſeſſion of Tournai, but failing in the attempt he repaired to Ghent, where the citizens, whom he had been ſent to protect, ſoon became jealous of his power, and forced him to leave the town. After the expulſion of the French, who retired into Artois, the inhabitants of Ghent concluded an accomodation with Maximilian, on the following conditions:—1. The citizens agreed to acknowledge Maximilian for the guardian of his ſon, and the adminiſtrator of the county of Flanders, and to take an oath of allegiance to him in that capacity. 2. They conſented to receive that prince into the city with the ſame number of troops as generally accompanied him in his viſits to the other towns in Flanders. 3. They engaged to recal all ſuch as had been baniſhed from the town on account of their attachment to Maximilian, and to reſtore them to their eſtates. And, laſtly, they agreed to pay ſeven hundred thouſand florins, for the expences of the war. But a riot which occurred in Ghent, through the imprudence of a German ſoldier, after Maximilian had entered that city, afforded him a ſpecious pretext for completing the humiliation of this turbulent and ſeditious people. He ordered their fortifications to be demoliſhed, deſtroyed a part of the walls, took from them all their artillery, deprived them of their privileges, and eſtabliſhed a magiſtracy of his own election.

After he had reſtored tranquillity to Flanders, the attention of Maximilian was called to another quarter. The marriage of the duke of Lorraine with the princeſs of Guilders, had already excited his ſuſpicions; and he ſoon learnt that the duke had had an interview, at Meziere, with his great enemy, William de la Mark; that, at the inſtigation of, and in concert with, Madame de Beaujeu, they had formed a plan for making an incurſion into Brabant; and, in order to facilitate that enterpriſe, la Mark had ceded to the duke ſeveral fortreſſes in the territory of Liege. Maximilian, however, found means to avert the danger which threatened him, by ſending one of his officers to ſecure the perſon of la Mark, who was conducted to Maeſtricht, where he paid, by his death, the forfeit of his numerous crimes.

A. D. 1486.] Madame de Beaujeu, though poſſeſſed of many good qualities, appears, in ſome reſpects, to have followed that inſidious and diſhoneſt ſyſtem of policy, which had been adopted by her father. Notwithſtanding her late treaty with the duke of Brittany, ſhe ſpared no pains to diſturb the government of that prince. The lord of Broſſes, being dead, ſhe had the precaution to exact from his widow, Nicole de Penthiévre, a freſh confirmation of the ceſſion which ſhe and her huſband had made to Lewis the Eleventh, and his ſucceſſors, of all their claims to the duchy of Brittany. The duke, informed of theſe proceedings, ſent ambaſſadors to the king to expreſs his aſtoniſhment at the conduct of the French council, in thinking of making uſe of a title ſo falſe and illuſive as the famous letter granted to John de Penthiévre, and to offer in his name either to give an authentic copy of the counter letter written by that nobleman, or to ſhew the original to any commiſſioners whom his majeſty might chuſe to appoint for the purpoſe of inſpecting it. Madame, however, affected to treat this counter-letter as a forgery, and deſired it might be ſent for examination to the council of France; a requeſt with which the duke was not ſo weak as to comply. Finding it impoſſible to obtain any ſatisfaction from the French council, and learning that Madame was uſing her utmoſt exertions to acquire partiſans in Brittany, the duke aſſem-bled the ſtates of the duchy, and made them ſwear, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that, after his death, they would acknowledge his two daughters, reſpectively, and according to the order of their birth, for his ſole and lawful heirs; that they would pay them obedience as ſuch; and that they would oppoſe, to the utmoſt of their power, any attempts that might be made to deſpoil them of their ſovereignty, and of their juſt rights.

After he had taken this precaution, the duke ſent an ambaſſador to Maximilian, who had lately been raiſed to the rank of king of the Romans, urging him to invade France, and promiſing to ſupply him with a body of troops, with proviſions, and with arms. A treaty was concluded between theſe princes at Bruges, by which they engaged not to lay down their arms, till they had obliged the king to diſmiſs all thoſe members of his council who gave him evil advice, and to obſerve all the regulations propoſed by the ſtates at Tours. The better to ſecure the obedience of the Flemings, he made his ſon, though an infant, ſwear to obſerve this treaty, under the title of the duke of Auſtria and Burgundy; and with the money he had exacted from the inhabitants of Ghent, he was enabled to raiſe a powerful army of Germans and Swiſs.

Madame, appriſed of theſe preparations, thought it neceſſary to encreaſe the number of her troops. Since the ſuppreſſion, by Lewis the Eleventh, of the free archers, which had been embodied by his father, and the diſmiſſion of ſix thouſand Swiſs at the commencement of the preſent reign, France had no other infantry than the militia of the different towns, who were ill-diſciplined, and who were barely ſufficient to defend the places to which they belonged*. The regular troops of calvary diſperſed on the frontiers, and in thoſe fortreſſes which lay neareſt to the enemy, could with difficulty aſſemble, and form a compact body of forces. Madame, therefore, after conſulting the ſeneſchals and bailiffs of the different provinces in the kingdom, on the beſt means of re-eſtabliſhing a body of infantry, which had become requiſite for the defence of the ſtate, decreed, by the advice of the council, that every fifty-five hearths ſhould ſupply one man completely armed, and pay him ſixty ſous a month. This was, to all intents, a new tax, but the neceſſity of the eaſtabliſhment was ſo evident as to prevent all murmurs. Beſides this national malitia, Madame deemed it prudent to recall the ſix thouſand Swiſs whom ſhe had before diſmiſſed.

Maximilian, before he proceeded to an open declaration of war, gave orders to the governors of his towns to make ſome attempts on the French territories; Montigni, governor of Hainaut, accordingly took the town of Mortagne by ſurpriſe; while Salazar eſcaladed the walls of Terouenne, during the night, and thus, without the ſmalleſt effuſion of blood, made himſelf maſter of one of the ſtrongeſt places in Artois; a place, too, rendered more important by the circumſtance of of the mareſchal Deſquerdes having eſtabliſhed his magazines there. After this ſucceſs, Maximilian no longer delayed the publication of a manifeſto, in which, excuſing the king on account of his youth, he inveighed againſt the conduct of Madame de Beaujeu and her huſband, whoſe ambition and avarice had, he ſaid diſguſted the princes and chief nobility in the kingdom, and induced the neighbouring powers to take up arms againſt France. He complained of their intrigues with the Flemings; of the ſupplies, both of men and money, which they had ſent to la Mark; and of the hoſtilities which they had cauſed to be committed in Flanders, by the mareſchal Deſquerdes; he obſerved, that the only mode of averting the calamities with which the monarchy was threatened, was to diſmiſs from the king's preſence all thoſe who took advantage of his weakneſs, and to convene a ſecond aſſembly of the ſtates-general, to which he and the emperor, his father, would ſend ambaſſadors, to reſtore concord among the princes of the blood, and to enſure, by new treaties, the tranquility of France; and he concluded, by exhorting the parliament and city of Paris to concur with him in ſo laudable an undertaking. This manifeſto was treated with contempt by the council, and the herald who delivered it was adviſed to diſſuade his maſter from engaging in an unjuſt war. Maximilian did not, indeed, follow their advice, but finding himſelf too weak to undertake any expedition of importance, he was ſoon obliged to diſband his troops, while the attention of the French court was once more directed to the affairs of Brittany.

The death of Landois had failed to reſtore tranquillity to that duchy; the ſame pretenſions, the ſame intrigues, either for deſpoiling or for marrying the heireſs of Brittany, ſtill ſubſiſted, and the danger to which the duchy had been lately expoſed by the duke's illneſs, awakened the public attention*. In a ſhort time a freſh league was formed againſt Madame, into which not only the duke of Orleans and the count of Angoulême entered, but the whole houſe of Foix; the lord of Albret; his ſon; the king of Navarre; the prince of Orange; Leſcun, who had all the forces of Guienne at his diſpoſal; the old count of Nevers, of the houſe of Burgundy; the lords of Pons and d'Orval; and the duke of Lorraine himſelf. This laſt prince had been diſguſted with the king, who, before the commiſſioners, appointed for ſetttling their reſpective claims to Provence could come to a deciſion, had, by his letters-patent irrevocably united that country to the crown; he had, alſo, taken from the duke his company of a hundred lances, and the penſion of thirty-ſix thouſand livres, which had been granted him till ſuch time as the difference with regard to Provence could be ſettled.

Dunois, though in exile, was the ſoul of this intrigue, and he ſecretly congratulated himſelf on the ſucceſs of his efforts. When he found that Maximilian had been able, without any aſſiſtance, to withſtand during two years, the whole force of the kingdom; that the duke of Savoy claimed the marquiſate of Saluces; that the duke of Brittany was inſeparably united to the duke of Orleans, and was influenced by the advice of the enemies of Madame; that the houſe of Foix, the lord of Albret, the king and queen of Navarre, had engaged to promote an inſurrection in Gaſcony; while Leſcun was to arm the inhabitants of Guienne; that ſeveral noblemen of diſtinction in the provinces, and even ſome of the ſtate counſellors, had ſecretly acceded to this league, he had no doubt, but that, in the enſuing ſpring, Madame muſt infallibly fall beneath the united exertions of her numerous enemies. Inſpirited by this hope, he left the place of his exile without the king's permiſſion, and, returning to France, eſtabliſhed his reſidence in the the town of Partenai, the fortifications of which he haſtened to repair.

This was the firſt ſymptom that appeared of the conſpiracy. Madame had no doubt, but that a prince ſo renowned for his prudence had duly concerted his projects before he threw off the maſk; in order, therefore, to diſcover his reſources, and to learn what ſhe had to fear, ſhe ſent deputies to deſire he would account for his conduct, and to reproach him with his preſumption in daring to diſobey the king's poſitive orders: theſe deputies told him, that his rendezvous on the frontiers of Brittany had rendered him an object of ſuſpicion to the court; and they propoſed to him, as the laſt proof of his majeſty's condecenſion, to retire to his county of Longueville in Normandy. Dunois refuſed to enter into any explanation, and the only anſwer he would give the deputies was—"I am at home".

An attempt, equally unſucceſsful, was made to allure the duke of Orleans to court; and ambaſſadors were ſent to remonſtrate with the duke of Brittany; but that prince retorted, by reproaching Madame with her intrigues to diſturb his government, and to deſpoil his daughters of their lawful inheritance.

A. D. 1487.] Madame, meanwhile, intercepted a courier, charged with diſpatches, from ſuch of the king's officers and counſellors of ſtate as had joined the princes, in which ſhe found a complete plan of the conſpiracy. In conſequence of this diſcovery ſhe immediately iſſued orders for apprehending Geoffrey de Pompadour, biſhop of Perigueux, and almoner to the king; George d'Amboiſe, biſhop of Montauban; his brother, Buſſi d'Amboiſe, and Philip de Commines, the celebrated hiſtorian. She had alſo taken meaſures for ſecuring Lewis d'Amboiſe, biſhop of Albi; but that prelate effected his eſcape to Avignon, whence he afterward obtained permiſſion to return to France.

Madame now perceived the extent of her danger, and concluded that her ruin might be the conſequence of giving her enemies time to collect their forces and ſettle their plans. She, therefore, wrote to the citizens of Bourdeaux, and the inhabitants of all the other towns in Guienne, exhorting them to preſiſt in their allegiance to their lawful ſovereign, and warning them to be on their guard againſt the intrigues of the governors and garriſons of the different fortreſſes; and, ſo early as the eleventh of February, ſhe paſſed the Loire, and took the king into Poitou. Dunois expected that it was the intention of the royaliſts to beſiege him in Partenai, but he ſoon learnt that the king had paſſed through Poitiers, and was directing his march towards Guienne. Charles, accordingly, entered that province, which was defended by Odet d'Aidie, ſeneſchal of Carcaſſonne, brother and lieutenant to the lord of Leſcun, who advanced with a ſmall body of troops to the town of Saintes, in order to oppoſe the paſſage of the royaliſts over the river Charente, and to give time to the lord of Albret and the count of Angoulême to join him with the forces under their command. But being foiled in the attempt—from his neglect to ſ cure a tower which commanded the bridge—he evacuated Saintes and repaired to Pons. He was ſoon, however obliged to quit that place, and, being cloſely purſued by the king's army, he, at length, ſhut himſelf up in the ſmall town of Blaye, where his troops revolted, and, in conjunction with the inhabitants, compelled him to capitulate. Reduced to the neceſſity of imploring the king's clemency, he only demanded to be continued in his office, and to have his ſalaries and penſions ſecured to him; on which condition he promiſed to ſurrender to the royaliſts all the fortreſſes and caſtles in his brother's poſſeſſion. The offer was accepted, and in a few days, the king became maſter of the caſtle of Trompette, of Fronſac, Reole, Saint-Sever, Dax, and the citadel of Bayonne. He gave the government of Guienne to the lord of Beaujeu, who being unable to reſide, appointed the lord of Candale his lieutenant. The admiralty of Guienne was united to that of France, and the county of Comminges annexed to the crown.

The rapid progreſs of the royal arms ſtruck a panic into the confederates, many of whom haſtened to procure, by timely ſubmiſſion, a pardon for their offences; the lord of Albret, and the king and queen of Navarre, made terms with the king; the count of Angoulême, too, forſook the confederates, and Madame, being anxious to ſecure his future attachment, promoted his marriage with Louiſa of Savoy, daughter to the count of Breſſe, and niece—by her mothers ſide—to the lord of Beaujeu, and the conſtable de Bourbon; from this marriage ſprang Francis the Firſt. The count of Dunois, on the approach of the royal army, evacuated Partenai, and fled, with precipitation, into Brittany, whither the king prepared to follow him.

The aſcendancy which the duke of Orleans had acquired at the court of Brittany, gave great offence to the Breton nobles*; and the mareſchal de Rieux, the count of Laval, the viſcount of Rohan, and upwards of fifty other gentlemen, retired in diſcontent to Chateaubrient, where they formed an aſſociation, which was ſoon after joined by the baron d'Avaugour, the duke of Brittany's natural ſon. The conduct of this ſeditious band, being properly reſented by their ſovereign, they ſacrificed the intereſt of their country to the gratification of their private reſentment, and entered into a treaty with the king of France; by which it was agreed—1. That the king ſhould ſend an army into Brittany, not exceeding four hundred lances, and four thouſand infantry; and that he ſhould prefer no claim to the duchy during the duke's life—2. That theſe troops ſhould be placed under the command of the mareſchal de Rieux, or of ſome one of the confederated barons, and that they ſhould not lay ſiege to any town, where the duke ſhould have eſtabliſhed his reſidence.—3. That as ſoon as the duke of Orleans, the count of Dunois, the prince of Orange, and the lord of Leſcun, againſt whom the war ſhould be directed, ſhould have evacuated Brittany the king ſhould withdraw his troops, without requiring any recompence. Charles accepted theſe terms without heſitation, and without the ſmalleſt intention of adhering to them; this was a part of his father's infamous policy, which his ſiſter had been careful to inſtil into his youthful mind. Madame had reſolved to execute her favourite project of reducing Brittany to ſubjection; and the ſtate of Europe was ſuch as appeared to favour her ſchemes.

* Hiſtoire de Bretagne, par Lobineau.

Maximilian, indeed was engaged in cloſe alliance with the duke of Brittany, and was in hopes of marrying his daughter; but his indigence, and the ſeditious diſpoſition of the Flemings, prevented him from affording that aſſiſtance which was expected from him. The attention of Ferdinand and Iſabella was wholly engroſſed by the conqueſt of Grenada; and had they even been unoccupied, it was well known that the reſignation of Rouſſillon and Cerdagne, to which they had claims, would have effectually ſecured their neutrality. England, alone, was both enabled by her power, and invited by her intereſt, to ſupport the independence of the Bretons. Of this Madame was aware, and to avert the ſtorm which ſhe expected from that quarter, ſhe ſent ambaſſadors to England, to congratulate Henry on his ſucceſs in reducing his rebellious ſubjects, and, at the ſame time, to make the greateſt profeſſions of amity, eſteem and confidence.

The ambaſſadors ſought to perſuade the Engliſh monarch that in the conteſt between the court of France and the duke of Brittany, the latter was the aggreſſor, in having offered protection to the duke of Orleans, who had been guilty of treaſonable practices: and that the war, which, on the part of France, they affirmed was merely defenſive, would ceaſe the moment that protection ſhould be withdrawn. They farther obſerved, that their maſter was ſenſible of the obligations which Henry owed to the duke of Brittany for protecting him in the hour of diſtreſs; but reminded him, at the ſame time, that at a more critical period Francis and his miniſters had forſaken him, and reduced him to ſeek for refuge in the court of France, where he had not only experienced the moſt hoſpitable reception, but received the aſſiſtance which had laid the foundation of his ſubſequent ſucceſſes. For theſe reaſons they hoped, that if the ſituation of Henry's affairs precluded the poſſibility of returning the obligation to France on the preſent occaſion, he would, at leaſt, obſerve a perfect neutrality. In order to ſtrengthen this plauſive diſcourſe, they imparted to Henry, as in confidence, the intention of their ſovereign, ſo ſoon as he ſhould have ſettled the diſputes in Brittany, to enforce by arms his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples: a project which, they knew, could give no umbrage to the court of England. Henry, however, was not to be deceived by theſe artful evaſions; but as he immagined that France could not ſucceed in her attempts, he was induced to liſten to the dictates of his avarice, which rendered him averſe from all foreign enterpriſes and diſtant expeditions, however politic, and however neceſſary to the future ſafety of his dominions. He, therefore determined to try the expedient of negociation, and gave a general anſwer to the ambaſſadors, expreſſive of his concern at a rupture between two princes, to each of whom he was under ſuch eſſential obligations, and of his reſolution to act as a mediator between them.

The French, me nwhile, had entered Brittany; and, beſides the ſtipulated number of troops which had been promiſed to the barons, the king ſent two other detachments into the d chy, under the command of Gilbert de Bourbon, count of Montpenſier, la Tremouille, and Saint-Andre*. Hoſtilities were firſt began by the army commanded by the Breton nobles, who took Rhedon, and laid ſiege to Ploermel, which ſoon capitulated. The duke of Brittany, notwithſtanding his age and infirmities, had placed himſelf at the head of ſix hundred lances, and ſixteen thouſand infantry, with which he advanced to raiſe the ſiege; but finding the place had ſurrendered, he purſued his rebellious barons, in order to bring them to action. But his principal officers, infected by the general contagion of revolt, found means to inſtil a ſpirit of diſſention into the ſoldiers, ſuch numbers of whom diſbanded, that the duke was compelled to fly before the rebels, and ſhut himſelf up in Vannes, which was immediately inveſted. The town being incapable of defence, the dukes of Brittany and Orleans, with the count of Dunois and Leſcun, muſt inevitably have fallen into the king's hands, but for the activity of the prince of Orange, who no ſooner heard of their ſituation, than he left Nantes, and, ſailing down the Loire, ſtopped at Croiſic and Guerrande, where he collected all the veſſels he could find, and entered the port of Vannes in ſafety. The duke of Brittany and the French princes immediately embarked, and made the beſt of their way to Nantes, while the garriſon of Vannes ſurrendered that town to the French.

Nantes, the moſt conſiderable town in the duchy, and the beſt fortified, was now beſieged by the French army; and Dunois, who was with the duke of Brittany, entertained ſuch apprehenſions for its ſafety, that he reſolved to go to England in perſon, to ſolicit aſſiſtance from the Engliſh monarch; he accordingly left the town in diſguiſe, and repaired to Saint Malo, but the prevalence of contrary winds prevented his embarkation. This circumſtance, however, which Dunois was induced to conſider as a misfortune, proved the means of ſaving the duchy, for it haſtened the arrival of a fleet, containing a reinforcemnt of fifteen hundred veteran troops, which Maximilian had ſent to the aſſiſtance of his ally. Dunois having, at the ſame time, received information that the peaſants of Lower Brittany, appriſed of the danger to which their ſovereign was expoſed had aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, and only wanted a leader to head them, he immediately offered himſelf to this formidable band, and having ſelected ten thouſand of the moſt able and beſt-armed, he joined the Germans, and returned in triumph to Nantes.

While the king was engaged in the ſiege of this city, Urſwic, almoner to Henry the Seventh, arrived as ambaſſador from that prince. Having made known to Madame the purport of his journey, that able princeſs accepted with alacrity Henry's offer of mediation, under the idea that the duke of Orleans, from a conſciouſneſs that his ruin muſt form the baſis of an accomodation, would exert his utmoſt influence with the duke of Brittany to make him reject the propoſal of the Engliſh monarch. The event juſtified her prudence. When the ambaſſador made the ſame offer to the duke of Brittany, who was then confined to his bed by ſickneſs, he was anſwered by the duke of Orleans, in the name of Francis, that, in ſuch a perilous conjuncture, he expected from Henry the moſt effectual aſſiſtance, rather than a fruitleſs offer of mediation, which could not tend, in the ſmalleſt degree, to impede the progreſs of the French arms: that if Henry's gratitude were not ſufficient to impel him to the adoption of ſuch a meaſure, his prudence, at leaſt, ſhould ſuggeſt to him how very important it was to England to prevent the annexation of the duchy of Brittany to the crown of France. This, however, did not induce Henry to depart from that line of conduct which he had previouſly determined to purſue; and, indeed, when he found that the peaſants of Lower Brittany had riſen in favour of their prince, and that the reinforcement introduced into Nantes by the count of Dunois, compelled the French to raiſe the ſiege of that city, he was fortified in his opinion that the court of France would experience ſuch inſurmountable obſtacles to the accompliſhment of their object, as would finally oblige them to abandon their deſign.

From Nantes the French army haſtened to Cliſſon, a town belonging to the baron d'Avaugour, who, enraged at the introduction of a French garriſon into a place where he commanded in perſon, abandoned the confederates, and returned to his father's court. Vitry ſurrendered to the French; and the ſmall town of Dol, in conſequence of a refuſal to open her gates, was taken by aſſault, and reſigned to pillage. Saint-Aubin du Cormier made a vigorous reſiſtance, under the command of its brave governor, William de Roſnyvinen, who had ſerved with diſtinction in the French army, under Charles the Seventh, his ſon Lewis; and the deſertion of the garriſon had left this gallant veteran with only forty or fifty men, with which trifling force, he ſucceſsfully oppoſed, for ſeveral days, the utmoſt exertions of an army of fourteen thouſand combitants. He had expreſſed his determination rather to bury himſelf beneath the ruins of the town, than to ſurrender it to the enemy; but the earneſt entreaties of his friends, and his generous concern for the few brave men who had remained attached to his fortunes, at length induced him to break the raſh reſolution, and to propoſe terms of capitulation, which were immediately accepted. The honours paid him by the French, who admired his courage, rendered him an object of ſuſpicion to the court of Brittany, who ſeized his eſtates, plundered his houſe, and deprived him of his places. A ſubject leſs faithful might have been led to revolt, by ſuch an act of injuſtice; but in the mind of Roſnyvinen, honour always roſe ſuperior to reſentment. He immediately repaired to Nantes, where he procured an audience of his ſovereign, to whom he repreſented, with manly firmneſs, that four of his nephews, the only ſupport of his houſe, had loſt their lives in the ſervice of their prince; that his brother, who had married the rich heireſs of Vaucouleurs, had alſo periſhed in the field of battle; that, for his own part, ever ſince he had been able to mount his horſe, he had never failed in his duty to his country; that he had been preſent at every battle which had been fought in Brittany, and although, when his country was at peace, he had entered into the ſervice of France, and had acquired ſome reputation in the wars of Charles the Seventh, and Lewis the Eleventh, he had, whenever war was declared between the kings of France and the dukes of Brittany, without heſitation reſigned his places, and rejected the moſt tempting offers, in order to fly to the aſſiſtance of his country; that he had not only ſerved her with his ſword, but had been ſo fortunate as to aſſiſt his maſters with his purſe in times of neceſſity; that the duke muſt recollect that when Guerche was taken by the French, he had lent him two thouſand crowns; and that he had alſo lent two thouſand more to the count of Dunois, to enable him to ſubſiſt the troops which he was conducting to the relief of Nantes; and he, laſtly, explained his conduct at Saint-Aubin du Cormier, and juſtified himſelf ſo completely, that the duke, deteſting the perfidy of his enemies, and condemning his own weakneſs, in having liſtened to their ſuggeſtions, immediately ordered his property to be reſtored, and, being unable, at that time, to indemnify him fully for the loſſes he had ſuſtained, appointed him to be one of his maîtres d'hôtel.

Various towns and fortreſſes were now taken and retaken by the two armies; while Maximilian ſent a freſh reinforcement to his ally. The duke was ſo well pleaſed at this new proof of his friendſhip, that he immediately wrote to the king of the Romans, telling him that if he could, within a certain time, repair in perſon to Brittany, with an army ſufficiently ſtrong to expel the French from the duchy, his daughter ſhould marry him without delay, and he would make the ſtates take an oath of allegiance to him. But Maximilian was unfortunately in a ſituation which rendered it impoſſible for him to profit by this propoſal.

The mareſchal Deſquerdes, who commanded the French forces in the Netherlands, had taken the towns of Saint-Omer and Terouennè, the former by ſurpriſe, the latter by the perfidy of one of the inhabitrnts*. He had alſo, by an act of treachery, dignified, by the cruel policy of war, with the appellation of ſtratagem, ſeduced a body of Germans into an ambuſcade, in which moſt of them periſhed by the ſword. Weakened, by theſe repeated loſſes, it was with the utmoſt difficulty that Maximilian had been able to ſend a ſmall reinforcement to the duke of Brittany; and ſo far from being able to join him with a powerful army, he ſtood in need of aſſiſtance himſelf.

* Heuter. rer. Belgic.—Haraeus, Annal. Brabant.—Jaligny.

Charles, by this time, found himſelf in poſſeſſion of the towns of Ancenis, Cliſſon, Châteaubient, Guerche, Vitré, Dol, Saint-Aubin, Ploermel, Vannes, and Aurai*, and, as the ſeaſon was far advanced, he diſtributed his troops in the different places he had reduced, and returned to France.

The duke of Orleans, and the other confederates, now plainly perceived, that, unleſs they could ſucceed in promoting unanimity among the Breton nobles, and in procuring more powerful aſſiſtance than they had hitherto been able to obtain, their ruin was inevitable. In order, therefore, to remove thoſe prejudices, which the people of Brittany, who imputed to them all the misfortunes of their country, had been led to encourage, they gave it out, that as they had only come to Britany on the invitation of the duke, their ally, and in the view to defend him, they were ready to leave the duchy, if the king would engage to let him live in peace, and to reſtore all the places which he had unjuſtly taken from him: and to prove their ſincerity, they demanded a ſafe conduct of Charles for the lord of Leſcun, whom they appointed to ſettle the conditions of their return. This nobleman accordingly repaired to Pont à l'Arche, in Normandy (where the court then reſided) accompanied by Dubois, an officer in the houſhold of the mareſchal de Rieux, who had been prevailed on by Leſcun to forſake the aſſociated barons of Brittany, in caſe the king ſhould refuſe to comply with the demands of the princes.

As Leſcun was aware of the improbabily of concluding, in the preſent ſtate of affairs, the accommodation he was ſent to negociate, he only dwelt, in his ſpeech to the French council, on thoſe circumſtances which he knew would moſt offend Madame: he expatiated on the abuſes which prevailed in the government, on the infraction of the articles accorded by the ſtates of Tours, and on the unjuſt perſecution of the duke of Orleans. No anſwer was made to his propoſals; he had been heard with indignation, and was diſmiſſed with contempt. Dubois next ſpoke, in the name of the mareſchal de Rieux; he accuſed the king of having broken the two firſt articles of the treaty of Chateaubrient, as well by ſending into Brittany a greater number of troops than had been agreed on, as by forming the ſiege of Nantes, where the duke reſided: he expreſſed his hop s, however, that his majeſty would fulfil the third article, by immediately evacuating the duchy, and by reſtoring the places he had taken from the duke, ſince the princes of the blood, againſt whom alone the war had been directed, offered to leave Brittany on condition only that they ſhould be ſuffered to live at peace. Madame, at firſt, attempted to ſeparate the cauſe of the mareſchal from that of the princes, and ſhe continued, for ſome time, to elude the demand of his envoy; but Dubois, aware of the artifice, inſiſted, with bacoming firmneſs, on a direct and poſitive anſwer; When Madame, reſolved to ſacrifice juſtice to policy, told him that the king would ſuffer no man to interfere in his affairs, and that he had advanced too far to retreat.

* Belleforet, Annales de France.

As ſoon as the mareſchal de Rieux was appriſed of this anſwer, he diſmiſſed all the French who were then at Ancenis, where he reſided, and exacted a freſh oath of allegiance to the duke of Brittany, from the remainder of the garriſon, and the inhabitants of the town; and repaired to Chateaubrient, which belonged to his ſon-in-law, the lord of Montafilant. Having gained acceſs to that town, with a ſmall body of troops, he entered the caſtle, where ſeveral of the confederated barons were at ſupper, and thus addreſſed the company:—"Gentlemen, you all know what were the conditions of the treaty we ſigned in this very place, with the French: they have all been violated. I have complained of this infidelity; my remonſtrances have given offence, and the French no longer make a ſecret of their intention to ſubdue Brittany, and to treat it as a conquered country. It is now time to ſhew who we are. This place is already in the power of the duke, our maſter; but as I gained admiſſion as a friend, I do not mean to offer violence to any man's inclinations; ſuch as chuſe to return to their duty, may remain here and rely on my friendſhip; while thoſe who had rather perſiſt in their alliance with France, are at liberty to leave the town with their arms and baggage."—The lord of Montafilant, and many of his friends, immediately choſe the former, and renewed their oaths of allegiance to the duke of Brittany, while ſome few of the barons profited by the permiſſion to depart.

A. D. 1488.] During theſe tranſactions, Maximilian was reduced to the moſt wretched ſituation; Deſquerdes, having ſucceſsfully exerted the deteſtable policy of exciting an inſurrection in an enemy's country, the inhapitants of Ghent, ever ripe for ſedition, had ſhaken off the authority of their lawful ſovereign, re-eſtabiſhed the democratical form of government, and placed themſelves under the protection of France. The king of the Romans, on the firſt news of his event, haſtened to Bruges, where the citizens, tainted with the ſame ſpirit of revolt, flew to arms, and compelled the prince, who was but ſlightly attended, to ſhut himſelf up in his palace. The brave Salazar, who had accompanied him, propoſed to force a paſſage through the ſeditious rabble, but Maximilian declined an attempt which he regarded as deſperate; Salazar, however, reſolved to try it himſelf: accordingly, having clad himſelf in cemplete armour, and fixed on twelve determined men to accompany him, he ſeized an opportunity while the citizens were opening one of the gates of the town, to attack them ſword in hand, and killing all who dared to reſiſt, he cut his way throw the mob, and effected his eſcape. After his departure, Maximilian was treated with the greateſt indignity; he was confined a cloſe priſoner in his palace, many of his officers were maſſacred, and his own life was almoſt hourly in danger. The inhabitants of Ghent were no ſooner informed of his ſituation, than they ſent to deſire he might be delivered into their hands; this, however, the citizens of Bruges thought proper to refuſe, though they conſented ſo deliver up ten of his attendants, who were conveyed to Ghent were they were put to the torture. Ten of the the citizens of Ghent, who had alſo diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their loyalty, were invited to dine with the principal magiſtrates, who, after regaling them in the moſt ſplendid manner, and loading them with ca-reſſes. introducted an executioner and ſeveral prieſts. The unhappy gueſts were immediately put to death, and their bodies having been conveyed to a church of a neighbouring convent, the inhuman magiſtrates ſent for their wives, telling them they were at liberty to viſit their huſbands, and to diſpoſe of them as they pleaſed. To ſuch refinement of cruelty did theſe popular demagogues proceed; and, indeed, we have generally found, that were the people have uſurped an authorrity, which, though in particular caſes they may be entitled to confer, it was certainly never intended they ſhould exerciſe, they have employed it for the moſt abominable purpoſes.

While theſe events were paſſing in the Netherlands, the king returned to Paris, where he held a bed of juſtice, at which the confederated princes were formerly tried, though it was not deemed adviſeable to paſs ſentence on them. Theſe violent proceedings, at length, opened the eyes of the Engliſh monarch, to avert the effects of whoſe reſentment, lord Bernard d'Aubigny, a Scotch nobleman, was ſent to London; and this ambaſſador had orders to perſuade Henry to perſiſt in his offers of meditation to the duke of Brittany. Henry, on his part, diſpatched another embaſſy to Paris, conſiſting of Urſwic, the abbot of Abingdon, and ſir Richard Tonſtal, who were charged with new propoſals for an accommodation, all of which were rejected by Madame. No ſuccours, meanwhile, were provided for the diſtreſſed Bretons. Lord Woodville, uncle to the queen of England, having aſked permiſſion to raiſe privately a body of volunteers, and tranſport them into Brittany, met with a refuſal, which, however, proved inſufficient to deter him from his purpoſe. Being governor of the Iſle of Wight, he went thither, and raiſed four hundred men, whom he immeidately conducted to the aſſiſtance of the Bretons; but this enterprize proved fatal to its projector, and afforded ſmall relief to the unhappy duke.

The French, meanwhile, had opened the campaign by the ſiege of Châteaubrient, the garriſon whereof, after an obſtinate defence, was obliged to capitulate. The town of Ancenis, belonging to the mareſchal de Rieux, was next reduced and pillaged; the ditches were filled up, and all the fortifications demoliſhed*. At length, however, the duke of Brittany aſſembled an army (commanded by the duke of Orleans, the prince of Orange, the mareſchal de Rieux and the lord of Albret) ſufficiently formidable to reſiſt the progreſs of the French, had not the generals been more anxious to lay ſnares for each other, than to fruſtrate the deſigns of the enemy. The object of this army was to relieve the town of Fougeres, which was then beſieged by the French; but finding it had ſurrendered, they directed their march towards Saint Aubin du Cormier, with the view to carry that place by aſſault before the garriſon could be reinforced. La Tremouille, who commanded the French, having gueſſed their deſign, directed his march to the ſame quarter, and the two armies met, unexpectdly, at the village of Orange. It is generally allowed that had the Bretons attacked the French without delay, they might have obtained an eaſy victory; but the diſſentions which prevailed amongſt their leaders made them loſe the opportunity; and both ſides proceeded, with great deliberation, to form their plan of attack. The duke of Orleans was entitled, from his rank, to have the chief command, but a report having been propogated that he maintained a correſpondence with the enemy, he alighted from his horſe, and placed himſelf in the ranks, and his example was followed by the prince of Orange, and ſome other French officers. The command of the van devolved on the mareſchal de Rieux; the lord of Albret led the center, and the rear was entruſted to the lord of Montaſilant. One of the wings was covered by a thick wood, and the other by the baggage. The French army was drawn up in two diviſions, the firſt of which was commanded by Adrian de l'Hopital, and the ſecond by La Tremouille; a body of cavalry was placed in ambuſh, under the conduct of Galiot, who had orders to profit by any confuſion which might occur during the action. The firſt attack of the Bretons was firm and impetuous; the French, unable to withſtand it, gave way and retreated to ſome diſtance; but the Bretons, in purſuing them, incautiouſly opened their ranks, and thus afforded an opportunity to the cavalry, in which the French were greatly ſuperior, to attack them to advantage. This opportunity was eagerly ſeized and ſucceſsfully improved: the horſe ruſhed forward, overthrew the firſt ranks, and cut their way to the center of the army; at that critical moment, while the Bretons were in confuſion, Galiot attacked them in flank; the rout then became general; twelve or thirteen hundred of the Bretons periſhed in the field; near ſix thouſand were taken priſoners, and the reſt fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Among the ſlain was the young lord of Leon, ſon to the viſcount of Rohan; and among the priſoners were the duke of Orleans, the prince of Orange, and Moſen Gralla, captain of the Spaniſh guards. Lord Woodville, and all the Engliſh, were maſſacred in cool blood, together with a body of Bretons, who had been accoutred in the garb of Engliſhmen, in order to ſtrike a greater terror into the French, to whom the martial proweſs of that nation was always formidable.

After the battle, the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange were conducted to Saint Aubin, where Tremouille invited them, and all the officers who had been taken with them, to ſup with him. After ſupper, he whiſpered ſomething to one of his attendants, who, in a ſhort time, introduced two friars into the room. The princes, alarmed at the ſight, immediately roſe from table, and remained motionleſs; but Tremouille deſired them not to be alarmed, for that their lives were ſafe till the king ſhould have decreed otherwiſe. "But," —ſaid he—"as for you, captains, who have been taken in the act of fighting "againſt your king and country, prepare yourſelves for death, for you muſt die "inſtantly." The princes in vain interfered in behalf of their partiſans; the inhuman general remained inexorable, and his ſanguinary orders were immediately executed. The duke of Orleans himſelf, after being transferred from one priſon to another for ſome time, was, at length, confined in the tower of Bourges, where he was treated with the utmoſt ſeverity, being ſhut up, every night in an iron cage. The prince of Orange was confined in a priſon at Angers.

By the defeat of Saint Aubin the military force of Brittany was totally broken, and the greateſt conſternation ſpread throughout the duchy. La Tremouille haſtened to Rennes, and ſummoned the citizens to ſurrender, threatening them with the effects of his vengeance, ſhould they preſume to reſiſt; but they treated his threats with contempt, and expreſſed their reſolution to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity. He was induced, therefore, to alter his plan, and to direct his courſe to Dinant, which he ſpeedily reduced; he then proceeded to Saint Malo, a place of great ſtrength, but the cowardice of the garriſon rendered it an eaſy conqueſt.

The duke of Brittany, finding himſelf unable to cope with the ſuperior power of France, was, at length, reduced to the neceſſity of ſuing for peace*. The propriety of noticing his application was ſubmitted to the diſcuſſion of the French ceuncil; when Madame, and her partiſans, maintained that, after ſo much labour and expence, it would be madneſs to ſtop, when in ſight of the goal; that the ſmalleſt delay might change the face of affairs, and render that conqueſt a matter of doubt, which now appeared to be certain: that care ſhould be taken not to give the Bretons time to recover from their conſternation, and to claim the protection of foreign powers: and that, in all expeditions, the beſt mode of enſuring ſucceſs was to make the moſt of a favourable opportunity, which once loſt might never be recovered. Theſe reaſons, more ſpecious than ſolid, were admitted as deciſive by the majority of the conncil, from a ſervile deference to thoſe who urged them; when William de Rochefort, chancellor of France, thus addreſſed the council:—"All thoſe who have ſpoken before me, have endeavoured to prove that the conqueſt of Brittany would be eaſily accompliſhed; but yet no one has taken the trouble to examine whether it would be juſt to attempt it, yet that ſurely is the firſt object of conſideration! Nations of old, who had not received the light of the goſpel, thought the plea of convenience ſufficent to authoriſe the ſeizure of any neighbouring country: but a Chriſtian prince has other rules of conduct. He owes an example of juſtice to the reſt of the world, and he conſiders a war, that is not founded in equity, as oppreſſion. The king, I know, advances certain claims upon the duchy of Brittany, but theſe claims are ſtill involved in the obſcurity of the cabinet; they have not been ſubmitted to the cenſure of the laws. Let, then, commiſſioners—men of knowledge and integrity—be ſpeedily appointed; let the reſpective titles be ſubmitted to their inſpection, and let a perfect freedom of diſcuſſion be accorded them: if, after a ſtrict examination, thoſe of the king ſhall be deemed unjuſt, or even doubtful, there will be no room for heſitation: the conqueſt of Brittany—were it even more eaſy of accompliſhment than it is repreſented—muſt be renounced. This example of moderation will do the king more honour than the moſt ſplendid conqueſt. If, on the contrary, they ſhould be declared valid, it will then be proper to enforce them; the Bretons will open their eyes, and will no longer dare to reſiſt a prince, who has juſtice on his ſide." This honeſt advice was, after much diſcuſſion, adopted by the council; and, on the twenty-firſt of Auguſt, 1488, the king concluded a treaty of peace, at Sablé, with the miniſters of the duke of Brittany, on the following conditions:

"1. The duke ſhall diſmiſs from his dominions all the foreigners whom he has drawn thither, and he ſhall ſwear upon the goſpel, and upon the true croſs, that neither he, nor his ſucceſſors will ever invite any foreigners into Brittany, to aſſiſt him with their advice or with their ſword, in making war upon the king, his ſovereign. 2. He ſhall not marry the princeſſes, his daughters, without the knowledge and conſent of the king, who, on his part, declares that he will treat them favourably, and as his near relations. 3. The two preceding articles ſhall be ſworn to by all the nobles, eccleſiaſtics, barons and inhabitants of the principal towns in the duchy; who ſhall engage to pay the king, in caſe of any breach of this treaty, the ſum of two hundred thouſand crowns of gold; for which ſum the principal towns in the duchy ſhall be mortgaged, and particularly the town of Nantes. 4. The king ſhall keep, until the full accompliſhment of theſe conditions, the towns of Saint Malo, Dinaut, Fougeres, Vitre and Saint Aubin, and ſhall put what garriſons he may think proper in thoſe towns; but he engages immediately to withdraw the garriſons from all the other towns now in his poſſeſſion, and to renounce all farther conqueſts. 5. The king ſhall reſtore to the duke's daughters, or their heirs, the towns of Saint Malo and Fougeres, in caſe the commiſſioners appointed to examine the claims of either party, ſhall determine that his pretenſions are invalid, without requiring any indemnity for the expences of the war; but if the princeſſes ſhould marry againſt his will, or even without his conſent, he ſhall then keep, as his own property, all the towns he poſſeſſes in Brittany."

Such were the principal articles of the treaty of Sablé, which Francis ſwore to obſerve, and, a few days after, having received a fall from his horſe, he expired at Coiron, on the ninth of September*. By his laſt will, he appointed the mareſchal de Rieux his executor, and guardian of the two princeſſes, the care of whoſe perſons he entruſted to Frances de Dinan, counteſs of Laval; he ordered the county of Penthiévre to be reſtored to the children of the lord of Albret, and an indemnity to be made to that nobleman himſelf for the expences he had incurred during the war. He empowered the mareſchal de Rieux, to whom he entruſted the ſupreme power during the minority of his daughters, to conſult, in all matters of difficulty, with the lord of Albret, the count of Dunois, and Leſcun count of Comminges. He was ſilent as to the marriage of the two princeſſes, that he might not violate the treaty he had juſt concluded with the king; but from the manner in which he had ſettled the adminiſtration, it appeared impoſſible for the princeſs Anne to eſcape the lord of Albret, whoſe intereſt was eſpouſed by all who had authority over her. Her averſion for this nobleman was, indeed, well known, but this was conſidered as a matter of ſuch little conſequence by the parti s concerned, that the lord of Albret had already taken the neceſſary ſteps for procuring a diſpenſation from the pope.

Anne's firſt care was to appriſe the king of her father's death, and to requeſt that an event ſo unfortunate for Brittany might operate no change in the condition of the treaty of Sablé. But the French court had reſolved to adopt a ſyſtem of perſecution hoſtile to every principle of honour, generoſity, or good faith; a ſyſtem conceived and enforced in the true ſpirit of Lewis the Eleventh. Agreeably to this ſyſtem the young monarch replied, that he was willing to fulfil his engagements, on the following conditions.—1. That, being the lord paramount, and the neareſt relation of the two princeſſes, he ſhould be declared their guardian, and ſhould have the management of their property during their minority. 2. That, for the final ſettlement of the difference between them and him, relative to the duchy of Brittany, they ſhould communicate their titles to the commiſſioners, who ſhould aſſemble before the month of January, in order to examine their validity; and that, until their deciſions ſhould be known, neither Anne nor her ſiſter ſhould aſſume the title of ducheſs. 3. That conformably to the firſt article of the treaty of Sablé all foreigners ſhould be immediately expelled from Brittany.

Anne, without entering into any diſcuſſion on theſe demands, replied, that ſhe ſhould religiouſly adhere to the laſt treaty; and that as one of the articles ſtipulated that the three eſtates of the duchy ſhould ſwear to obſerve it, ſhe had juſt convened them for that purpoſe. She then complained of the conduct of the French generals, who, in violation of the treaty, had continued to ravage the country, and had recently made themſelves maſters of Moncontour. The king promiſed to repair all damages, withdrew the garriſon of Moncontour, and delivered up the town to the Breton officers. But while he thus affected to pay a rigid obſervance to his word, on matters of little importance, in order to inſpire the princeſs with a dangerous confidence, he connived at proceedings which were more calculated to alarm her.

The viſcount of Rohan, at the head of a conſiderable detachment of the French army, addreſſed a long manifeſto to the principal towns of Lower Brittany, in which, after deploring the calamities of his country, he conjured all his fellow citizens to unite in her defence. He aſſerted, that the king of France having taken up arms for the purpoſe of preventing the duchy, which was a fief of the crown, from falling into the hands of a foreigner, was ready to lay them down as ſoon as the Bretons ſhould have choſen, as a huſband for their ſovereign, a prince on whoſe fidelity they could rely: that he had already obtained the king's conſent for his ſon to become her huſband, and that the juſtice of his pretenſions had been acknowledged at the court of Brittany, by the mareſchal de Rieux, and the counteſs of Laval, whom the duke had entruſted with the ſovereign authority: he ſummoned the municipal officers to contribute to the reſtoration of public tranquillity, by joining him in the purſuit of his plan, and by opening to him the gates of their towns.

Theſe inſidious profeſſions of patriotiſm, calculated to conceal the moſt intereſted deſigns, were treated with the contempt they deſerved; but the viſcount finding his rhetoric fruitleſs, had recourſe to arms, and reduced many of the towns in Lower Brittany. Anne, meanwhile, perceiving that the king, regardleſs of his oaths and promiſes, was only ſtudying how to deſpoil her of her inheritance, prudently determined to retain the foreign axiliaries which had been ſent to the aſſiſtance of her father, and even employed the moſt earneſt ſolicitations with her allies to induce them to furniſh her with freſh ſuccours.

Maximilian had, by the aſſiſtance of his father, releaſed himſelf from the hands of his rebellious ſubjects, who, neverthelefs, ſtill continued to make war on him; he was in Holland when he received the ambaſſadors from the young ducheſs of Brittany, who informed him of the deplorable ſituation of their miſtreſs, and demanded a freſh ſupply of troops. Maximilian ſent her all the forces he could ſpare, and informed the ambaſſadors, that having received a promiſe of effectual aſſiſtance from the princes of the empire, he fully intended to penetrate ſo far into France, that Charles would be compelled to evacuate Brittany, in order to protect his capital.

A. D. 1489.] Unfortunately the ſituation of the ducheſs was ſuch as not to permit her to wait the effects of theſe promiſes. The viſcount of Rohan, after reducing Breſt and Concarneau, had extended his invaſions to the gates of Rhedon, whither Anne had retired; but as that place was, in a manner, defenceleſs, ſhe formed a deſign of repairing to Nantes, which was one of the ſtrongeſt towns in the duchy, and where ſhe expected to find the jewels of the crown, which, in the preſent ſcarcity of money, would have been highly acceptable to her*. She accordingly ſent for the mareſchal de Rieux and the lord of Albret to eſcort her, but inſtead of obeying her orders, they haſtened to Nantes themſelves, placed a ſtrong garriſon in the city, and perſuaded the citizens, that Dunois and Montauban, who accompanied the ducheſs, and who enjoyed a great ſhare of her confidence, only wiſhed to gain admiſſion into the town, in order to watch for an opportunity of delivering it to the French. After they had taken theſe precautions, they ſent word to their ſovereign that ſhe might come to Nantes, but with a retinue only of twelve perſons. Being informed that ſhe diſregarded their threats, and was advancing towards the town, where they feared her preſence would excite an inſurrection of the citizens, they went to meet her at the head of a ſtrong detachment, with the view to ſeize her perſon. As ſoon as Anne ſaw them approaching, ſhe ordered her attendants to put themſelves in a poſture of defence, then placing herſelf behind the count of Dunois (on the ſame horſe) ſhe offered them battle. This unexpected diſplay of reſolution diſconcerted the rebels; and Rieux, aſhamed of attacking a young princeſs, at once his ward and his ſovereign, immediately returned to Nantes. The next day, however, he reproached himſelf for having ſuffered ſo fair an opportunity to eſcape, and placing himſelf at the head of a ſtronger detachment, he again went forth to ſeize the princeſs.—Anne received him as before, but the count of Dunois, judging the party unequal, advanced before the ranks, and deſired to ſpeak with the mareſchal. He promiſed to conduct the ducheſs to Nantes, and delivered John de Louan, a captain in the guards of the duke of Orleans, as a hoſtage for the performance of his promiſe. The life of this brave man depended on the punctuality with which Dunois ſhould fulfil his engagement, but his fidelity roſe ſuperior to the fear of death. Having gained information of the meaſures which had been concerted for ſecuring the ducheſs, and compelling her to beſtow her hand on the lord of Albret, he wrote to Dunois, whom he generouſly releaſed from his promiſe, requeſting he would leave him to his fate, and only think of conſulting the ſafety of the ducheſs. Dunois availed himſelf, though with reluctance, of this permiſſion, and conducted the princeſs to Vannes, whence ſhe afterwards returned to Rhedon.

The king of England, urged by the clamours of his ſubjects, at length found himſelf obliged, much againſt his inclination, to adopt ſome more vigorous meaſures than he had hitherto purſued, for the relief of the Bretons. Rieux and Leſcun, who were well aware of the importance of aſſociating Henry in their deſigns, had cauſed it to be repreſented to him, by ſecret emiſſaries, that Dunois and Montauban, who had, they ſaid, obtained an entire aſcendency over the mind of the young ducheſs, were paid by the French miniſtry; that, in order to effect her ruin with the greater certainty, they had led her to ſuſpect the fidelity of her moſt faithful ſubjects, and had inſpired her with diſguſt for the lord of Albret, who had ſacrificed every thing to her intereſt: who had, moreover, well-founded claims to one third of Brittany; who had been accepted by the duke for his ſon-in-law: they repreſented that the marriage they propoſed would be equally advantageous to England as to Brittany, ſince the lord of Albret, the moſt powerful nobleman in Gaſcony, father to to the king of Navarre, allied to the king of Spain, might, when duke of Brittany, afford effectual aſſiſtance to the Engliſh in the recovery of Guienne: that he was, in all reſpects, the moſt ſuitable ally for them, being ſufficiently powerful to render them important ſervices, and yet too weak to ſeparate his intereſt from theirs; whereas Maximilian, ſole heir to the vaſt dominions of the houſe of Auſtria, veſted with the imperial power, father-in-law to the king of France, and maſter of all the ports of Holland and Flanders, might, on the moſt trivial pretext, break with them, and attempt to deprive them of Calais. Theſe reaſons, it may be preſumed, had but little effect with Henry. In the treaty which he concluded with the ducheſs, he had three objects in view: the firſt was to ſell his troops as dearly as he could; the ſecond, to exact large ſecurities for the ſums he might expend; and third, ſo to bind down his new ally, that he might become the arbiter of her fate, and obtain ſuch power over her as to make her give her hand to the lord of Albret.

The following were the principal articles of the treaty. 1. "The king of England undertakes to ſend ſix thouſand regular troops to the aſſiſtance of the ducheſs of Brittany, or even more, ſo that the number ſhall not exceed ten thouſand, which troops ſhall be obliged to ſerve in Brittany from the ſixth of January to the firſt of November. 2. The ducheſs engages to reimburſe the king of England, according to eſtimation of commiſſioners choſen by the two powers, all the expences he ſhall incur for the embarkation, tranſport, and ſupport of theſe troops, and to remit to England the ſum ſtipulated for ſuch reimburſement. 3. In order to enſure the validity of her engagement, the ducheſs will ſurrender to the Engliſh troops, two of the five followings towns, at the option of the king of England, viz. Concarneau, Hennebonne, Aurai, Vonnes, and Guerrande; which two towns, with all their dependencies, ſhall remain in the power of the king of England, till ſuch time as all his expences have been defrayed. Should the ducheſs ſucced in retaking any of the places which are now in poſſeſſion of the French, the king of England ſhall be at liberty to take them in exchange for thoſe which he had before choſen, on condition, however, that the Engliſh ſhall not hold at the ſame time Breſt and Concarneau. 4. The ducheſs, and four of the principal nobility, one of whom ſhall be the mareſchal de Rieux, ſhall ſwear, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that ſhe will not enter into any treaty, nor form any engagement, with regard to her marrige with any ſovereign prince, or nobleman without the knowledge and conſent of the king of England; and that ſhe will even inform him of the object of all other negociations which ſhe may open with foreign powers".

Hard as theſe conditions indiſputably were, the ducheſs ſubſcribed them without any reſtriction; but ſhe found that moſt of them had been dictated by her guardian, and that her new protector was likely to become her principal perſecutor. She, therefore, was in no haſte to deliver up the two places ſhe had agreed to ſurrender to the Engliſh, who landed, to the number of ſix thouſand men, under the conduct of lord Willoughby of Broke. When they diſembarked, they were received by ſome officers who had been ſent by Anne to compliment them on their arrival, and to concert with them the plan of operations for the enſuing campaign; but neither quarters nor proviſions had been provided for them, and they were reduced to the neceſſity of encamping on the ſhore. Diſguſted with this reception, they diſmiſſed the officers with contempt, and refuſed to hold any commerce with them. Anne haſtened to ſend a new embaſſy to Henry to excuſe the bad treatment which his troops had experienced; ſhe repreſented to him, that ſhe had no longer any authority over her ſubjects: that Rieux, under the name of her guardian, had become her tyrant, and ſet an example to the Bretons of diſobedience and revolt, that he already boaſted of having ſecured in his intereſt the principal leaders of the Engliſh forces, and that it would be impoſſible for his victim to eſcape him: and that ſhe well knew, from the beſt authority, that that dangerous man ſuborned the Engliſh, by making them believe that if the lord of Albret were duke of Brittany, he might afford them effectual aſſiſtance in the recovery of Guienne: but, ſhe obſerved, Henry was too prudent to adopt ſuch viſionary plans, and to found any hopes on an adventurer, baniſhed and diſinherited, who did not then poſſeſs a ſingle inch of land in the kingdom: and, laſtly, ſhe remarked that the lord of Albret had rendered himſelf ſo odious by his unjuſt perſecution, that, rather than marry him, ſhe would bury herſelf for ever in a cloiſter. Henry, in his reply, endeavoured to calm her mind, by exhorting her not to give credit to every report ſhe ſhould hear, and by treating her ſuſpicions of the fidelity of her principal officers as the effects of a groundleſs terror; but he was totally ſilent with regard to the lord of Albret; he even ſent ſecret orders to his generals not to treat with Anne's officers, but to induce her, if poſſible, to repair to their camp, herſelf, or, ſhould they fail in that attempt, to lead their troops to Rennes, under pretence of ſhewing them to her, and to endeavour, at all events, to ſecure her perſon.* Anne would have been unable to reſiſt the efforts of ſo many enemies who had conſpired againſt her liberty, but for the arrival, at this critical conjuncture, of a conſiderable reinforcement of Spaniſh troops, under the conduct of don Diego Perez de Sarmiento, and don Pedro Carilla d'Albernos. Theſe ſhe ordered immediately to march to Rennes, and joining them to the Germans ſhe had received from Maximilian, the French attached to the duke of Orleans and the count of Dunois, and ſuch of the Bretons as the mareſchal de Rieux had not been able to ſeduce from their duty, ſhe found herſelf in a ſituation to oppoſe an inſurmountable barrier to the violent projects of her perſecutors. Ferdinand, not content with having ſent this body of troops to the aſſiſtance of the ducheſs, promiſed that he would, in the courſe of the ſummer, make a diverſion on the ſide of the Pyreenes, which ſhould compel the French to divide their forces.

The king, meanwhile, remained at Paris, pretending to be no wiſe concerned in the hoſtile attempts of the viſcount de Rohan, and waiting, for the regulation of his future conduct, the iſſue of thoſe intrigues by which Brittany was, at this time, convulſed†. When the French council found that the faction of the lord of Albret had acquired a ſuperiority over the oppoſite party, that Henry the Seventh had joined it, and that Rieux and Albret, beſides the national troops under their command, had at their diſpoſal the ſix thouſand Engliſh, they thought that by attacking the princes they would drive her into the ſnares which had been laid for her by the enemies of France; that the beſt way would be to remain on the defenſive, to give time to the two factions to weaken each other, and then to make uſe of the weakeſt, to facilitate their triumph over the ſtrongeſt.

For this purpoſe, Madame was careful to concilitate the favour of the Roman pontiff, to whom d'Albret had applied for a diſpenſation, by releaſing two prelates—the biſhops of Pui and Montauban—who had been thrown into priſon, for maintaining a correſpondence with the duke of Orleans. Some other per-ſons, who had ſuffered on the ſame account, were alſo releaſed; but Philip de Commines was treated with greater ſeverity. After having been confined eight months in an iron cage, he was delivered over to the parliament, who pronounced a ſentence of baniſhment upon him—the place of his exile to be fixed on by the king—and confiſcated one-fourth of his property; but Charles remitted his fine, and afterward took him into favour.

As the capture of the duke of Orleans was openly aſcribed to the jealouſy and manœuvres of the lord of Albret, the duke's partiſans had become the moſt implacable enemies of that nobleman. The count of Dunois, in whom the ducheſs repoſed an entire confidence, exerted the ſtrong talents which he had received from nature, to counteract all the intrigues of Leſcun and Rieux, and ſecretly rendered France all the ſervice he could, without betraying the intreſts of Anne. Madame, to whom this conduct had fully reconciled him, determined to give him an aſſociate, actuated by the ſame views, and ſhe, accordingly, fixed her eyes on the prince of Orange, who was releaſed from priſon, and ſent, on ſome frivolous pretext, into Brittany.

The king had now three armies on foot; one in Brittany, a ſecond in Flanders, and a third—under the command of the count of Angouiéme and the mareſchal de Gie—deſtined to cover Gaſcony and Languedoc, which were threatened with an invaſion from Ferdinand*; and as the ordinary revenue of the ſtate was inſufficient to defray the additional expences incurred thereby, the king determined to exact a tenth of the revenues of the clergy. This reſolution was accordingly communicated to the parliament of Paris, who were ordered to ſupport the commiſſioners appointed to collect the impoſt. That court, however, obſerved, that as they had been inſtituted for the adminiſtration of juſtice, it behoved them to inform his majeſty that no ſuch impoſt could be legally levied till the clergy had been aſſembled, and conſulted thereon.

The king, diſpleaſed at their interference, ſent them a ſecond meſſage, forbidding them to admit any appeals with regard to the impoſt, and to grant any delay to ſuch as ſhould refuſe to pay. With this prohibition, however, the parliament poſitively refuſed to comply, and they ſanctioned their refuſal by the laws of the realm and the principles of the conſtitution. Charles, deſpairing to make the magiſtrates deviate from their duty, had recourſe to the pope, who accordingly, in his own name, exacted a tenth from the clergy of France, on pretence of an expedition againſt the Infidels; two thirds of this impoſt were to be paid to the king, and the remaining third the ſovereign pontiff reſerved for himſelf. But the ſtrenuous oppoſition of the parliament, ſeconded by the univerſity of Paris, rendered the tax extremely unproductive.

Nothing of importance occured in Brittany during the preſent campaign; the mareſchal de Rieux made an attempt to ſeize the chancellor de Montauban, but he was defeated by the count of Dunois, and the prince of Orange; while the Engliſh, ſeeing the duchy thus rent by contending factions, became diſguſted with the expedition, and haſtened to return. They had already, of their own authority, concluded a truce with the commander of the French gariſon at Dinant, and had even opened conferences for a peace. Anne ſent them what money ſhe could collect, and did not fail to complain to Henry, whome ſhe ſtiled her good father, of the conduct of his officers, who, ſhe ſaid, publicly conſpired the ruin of Brittany, and had ſold themſelves to the mareſchal de Rieux. Henry anſwered the complaints of his good daughter by other complaints of her neglect to fulfil the conditions of the treaty, and to provide neceſſaries for his troops, and of her unjuſt ſuſpicions of his offices, who, he ſaid, were men of the firſt families in England. He inſinuated that ſome kind of reparation was due to them for this inſult, and he required that ſhe ſhould either pay them a viſit in their camp, or ſuffer them to go to Rennes, and review their troops in her preſence*. Anne immediately replied, that the Engliſh officers, whoſe fidelity he boaſted of, did not even take the trouble of concealing their commerce, as well with the rebels as with the French; that on the contrary they had repelled with contempt, and had almoſt inſulted the officers whom ſhe had ſent to them: that the ſtate of affairs did not permit her either to repair to the Engliſh camp, or to ſuffer the troops to abſent themſelves, even for a day, from Lower Brittany, which was expoſed to the depradations of the French:—"Should they dare"—added the young heroine—"to come to me, without having "previouſly obtained my permiſſion, I will receive them in ſuch a manner that they will "have little inclination to repeat their viſit."

In the Netherlands, the arms of Maximilian proved every where ſucceſsful, and the mareſchal Deſquerdes was foiled in ever attempt. The diet of the empire, too, had been ſummoned to meet at Frankfort, and, from the preſent diſpoſition of the German princes, there could be little doubt but that their united efforts would be exerted to humble the pride, and to thwart the treacherous projects, of France. To avert this ſtorm, Madame ſent ambaſſadors into Germany, and though they were treated with the utmoſt contempt by Maximilian himſelf, the terms they propoſed appeared ſo moderate, that the princes of the empire compelled him to accept them. A treaty was accordingly ſigned at Frankfort, by which it was agreed that Maximilian and Charles ſhould have an interveiw at Tournay, for the re-eſtabliſhment of that harmony and confidence, which ought ever to ſubſiſt between a father and ſon-in-law; that Maximilian ſhould have the guardianſhip of his ſon Philip, that his authority ſhould be acknowledged by the Flemings, and, in caſe they ſhould make any difficulty on that head, the king of France engaged to compel them to obey him; that, as neither the king of the Romans, nor his ſon Philip, had received the revenues of the county of Flanders, the inhabitants of Ghent, Ypres, and Bruges, ſhould pay them an adequate ſum, by way of indemnity. Charles engaged to reſtore without delay, to the ducheſs of Brittany, all the places he had reduced ſince the death of his father, provided ſhe would diſmiſs the Engliſh troops, and promiſe never to recal them. The towns of Saint-Malo, Dinaut, Fougeres, and Saint-Aubin, were to be ſequeſtered in the hands of the lord of Beaujeu (now duke of Bourbon) and the prince of Orange, who ſhould ſwear to deliver them up to whichever of the two parties they ſhould be adjudged, by commiſſioners appointed for the purpoſe. But while France by this treaty, which ſhe never intended to obſerve, endeavoured to deceive Maximilian, ſhe was herſelf deceived by that prince, on an object of greater importance.

Anne, ſurrounded by traitors, was apprehenſive that, in ſpite of all her precautions, ſhe ſhould at length fall into the power of the lord of Albret; and, therefore, in order to liberate herſelf from perſecution to which ſhe was daily expoſed, ſhe informed the king of the Romans, that ſhe had choſen him for her huſband, and placed her fate entirely in his hands. Maximilian accordingly ſent the count of Naſſau, Wolfang Polhaim, and his ſecretary, Gondebald, to celebrate the marriage by proxy. The oſtenſible object of their embaſſy was to enforce an obſervance of the treaty of Frankfort; and as the French miniſtry were unacquainted with their ſecret commiſſion, Charles not only received them with diſtinction, but ſent two of his heralds to conduct them to Rennes. In that city the ceremony was performed with ſuch ſecrecy, that none of the ducheſs's attendants were appriſed of it, and the preciſe date of the tranſaction has not yet been diſcovered.

A. D. 1490.] As ſoon as the news of the peace between France and Maximilian was received in Brittany, it occaſioned the moſt violent commotions. The partiſans of the lord of Albret, though ignorant of the terms of the treaty, did not doubt but as it had been dictated by Maximilian, and approved by the court of France, that it tended to ruin their hopes, and perhaps to promote their deſtruction. They remonſtrated with Henry on the inſult which he had ſuſtained from the contracting powers, as well as from the ducheſs herſelf, in ſtipulating, without deigning to conſult him, the expulſion of the Engliſh from Brittany; and they exerted themſelves ſo ſucceſsfully in exciting the reſentment of the Engliſh officers, that they intercepted and cut to pieces a body of Germans, whom the ducheſs had ſent to Guerrande.

Anne, meanwhile, had convened the ſtates-general of the duchy at the town of Rhedon, to make them accept the treaty of Frankfort; and ſhe even ſent ſafe-conducts to the principal leaders of the rebels, that they might repair thither in ſafety. They accordingly came, but completely armed, and with the intention of murdering the chancellor, and diſſolving the aſſembly. Unable to perpetrate the crime, or to impede the acceptance of the treaty, they reſolved, at leaſt, to oppoſe its execution. The Engliſh, at the inſtigation of the mareſchal de Rieux, committed the moſt deſtructive ravages in Brittany, while the mareſchal himſelf made excurſions into Poitou and Touraine. The king——whoſe conduct to Anne was founded on a baſe dereliction of every principle of honour——was ſecretly pleaſed at being ſupplied with a pretext for refuſing to evacuate Brittany; and he ſent a formal embaſſy to the ducheſs, to demand reparation for the hoſtilities which had—in contempt of the late treaty—been committed in the French territories; and to ſummon her to fulfil, without farther delay, the fundamental article of that treaty, by expelling the Engliſh from Brittany. The ducheſs was now in a moſt diſtreſſed ſituation, oppreſſed by her rebellious ſubjects, and harraſſed by an unprincipled neighbour; while her huſband, Maximilian, was at the fartheſt extremity of Europe, engaged in a fruitleſs attempt to recover the kingdom of Hungary. In this dilemna, ſhe reſolved, if poſſible, to regain the friendſhip of the Engliſh monarch; and, to intereſt him the more in her behalf, ſhe renewed her promiſe never to marry without his conſent. In this, Indeed ſhe deceived him; but the deceit was innocent and juſtifiable. The kind reception, however, which her ambaſſadors experienced from Henry, inſpired her with a greater degree of confidence; and induced her to entruſt him with the ſecret of her marriage; at leaſt, on this ſuppoſition alone can the change which took place in the conduct of that monarch be accounted for. Henry diſplayed the utmoſt zeal in ſerving the king of the Romans, and evinced the moſt earneſt deſire to ſecure his friendſhip. After promoting a reconciliation betwen the ducheſs and the marſhal de Rieux, he ſent an embaſſy to Maximilian, who was then in Auſtria, to inform him that France was guilty of continual violations of the treaty of Frankfort, and to exhort him to retnrn with expedition to the Netherlands, in order to concert with him the means of ſaving Brittany. Maximilian, who was detained in another quarter by a mad ſcheme of conqueſt, which he was unable to execute, contented himſelf with ſending ambaſſadors to England, who ſigned a treaty offenſive and defenſive againſt France. Henry, at the ſame time, concluded a ſimilar treaty with the king of Caſtile and Arragon, by which the contracting parties agreed to declare war againſt France, and not to lay down their arms till Charles had reſtored to Ferdinand the counties of Rouſſillon and Cerdagne, and to Henry the provinces of Guienne and Normandy. Henry, did not fail to publiſh theſe treaties, as well to intimidate, the French council, as to obtain ſubſidies from the Engliſh parliament.

It was about this time that the French miniſtry received intelligence of the marriage of the ducheſs of Brittany with Maximilian, from their emiſſaries, the count of Dunois and the prince of Orange. Madame apprehenſive that ſhe was on the point of loſing a province, to ſecure which her utmoſt efforts had been exerted, aſſembled the council, who formally pronounced the marriage to be null and void; and had the vanity and arrogance to ſuppoſe that their deciſion would be final. After this prepoſterous ceremony, they proceeded to deviſe means for preventing the ducheſs from conſummating a marriage ſhe had contracted from inclination; they were acquainted with the firmneſs of her mind, and they knew that, from her earlieſt infancy, ſhe could ill brook controul. By having recourſe to violence they would only alienate the affection of the Bretons, and diſguſt the princeſs, who would, in that caſe, fly to England, and arm all the princes of Europe in her behalf. It was, therefore, determined to ſecure the ſuffrages of the principal nobles of Brittany, and to bring the young ducheſs, partly by perſuaſion and partly by force, to renounce her firſt engagement, and to accept another huſband of equal rank, who, his pretenſions being favoured by the Bretons themſelves, might reſtore peace and tranquillity to her diſtracted country. The only perſon poſſeſſed of all theſe advantages was Charles the Eighth, who had been contracted to Margaret, daughter to Maximilian; and that princeſs, though too young for the conſummation of her marriage, had been ſent to Paris to be educated, and now enjoyed the title of Queen of France. In a conteſt between intereſt and honour, princes are ſeldom at a loſs how to decide: Charles determined to ſacrifice his integrity to the gratification of his ambitious ſchemes: but, as ſuch a ſtep could not fail to give umbrage to every court in Europe, it was neceſſary to obſerve the moſt profound ſecrecy, that no diſcovery might be made till too late for prevention. The French miniſtry accordingly diſplayed their uſual policy in the management of this delicate enterpriſe, marked by the moſt diſguſting features of treachery, and calculated to violate every principle of good faith, decency and decorum.

The ducheſs, during the formation of this abominable plan, had ſent frequent embaſſies to Charles, to requeſt he would conform to the treaty of Frankfort; and that monarch having arranged his plan of proceedings, promiſed to give her ample ſatisfaction. After leaving ſtrong garriſons in the few towns which he had reſerved by the treaty, he cauſed all the others to be evacuated and ordered his troops to retire into Normandy, while he himſelf went to viſit Dauphine. Before his departure, he fixed the time for opening the coferences between his miniſters and thoſe of Maximilian, at the city of Tournay, which were to precede his interview with that prince. He reproached the ducheſs with her neglect in not having appointed commiſſioners to attend theſe conferences; and he ſent her ſafe-conducts for two hundred and forty perſons, a much greater number than ſhe intended to ſend, but the king wiſhed thoſe in whom ſhe placed the greateſt confidence to be abſent from Brittany, at the time which he had fixed for the accompliſhment of his project.

A. D. 1491.] The ſtrong town of Nantes was ſtill in poſſeſſion of the lord of Albret, who, finding his ſituation deſperate, reſolved to employ it as the means of ingratiating himſelf with the king of France, and of procuring the reſtitution of his territories which that monarch had confiſcated. Accordingly, having made his terms with the French miniſtry, he ſurrendered Nantes to the duke of Bourbon; and Charles, ſoon after, repaired thither in perſon, and exacted an oath of allegiance from the inhabitants.

The loſs of this important place ſpread a general conſternation throughout the province, and the count of Dunois and the prince of Orange, who had received their ſecret inſtructions from the court of France, profited by this event to ſound the diſpoſition of the mareſchal de Rieux and the counteſs of Laval, with regard to Anne's marriage with the king, and they were eaſily induced to favour the ſcheme.

Dunois demanded, as the reward of his ſervices, the releaſe of the duke of Orleans, but Madame, who knew that prince to be her enemy, rejected the propoſal with diſdain. The count engaged Jane of France, the duke's unhappy wife, to exert her influence with her brother and ſiſter, to procure her huſbands liberty. Jane forgot every ſubject of complant which ſhe had received from that inconſtant prince, who had always treated her with contempt. Her prayer being rejected by her ſiſter, ſhe dreſſed herſelf in deep mourning, and, with diſhevelled hair, threw herſelf at the feet of her brother, and pleaded with ſo much eloquence, the cauſe of her huſband, that Charles preſſed her in his arms, and exclaimed—" Be comforted, my ſiſter, you ſhall obtain what you ſo ardently wiſh for, and heaven ſend you may never have occaſion to repent it !"

Notwithſtanding this promiſe, the duke's releaſe ſtill ſuffered great difficulties. The king could not prevail on himſelf to mortify his governeſs and his ſiſter. But two young noblemen of his houſhold, Miolans and Coſſé, encouraged him to ſhake off this humiliating reſtraint, and to convince the French that they had a king. He accordingly pretended to go out on a hunting-party, and having ſlept at Montrichard, he advanced as far as the bridge of Barangon, whence he diſpatched d'Abigni to the priſon where the duke of Orleans was confined, with orders to conduct that prince to him. The interview was truly affecting; the king, in his earlieſt years, had evinced a ſtrong predilection for the duke of Orleans, who, notwithſtanding the improper conduct into which his ambition and bad advice had betrayed him, had never ceaſed to eſteem the king. Pleaſed at being indebted for his liberty ſolely to the friendſhip of his ſovereign, he no ſooner approached him than he alighted from his horſe, and threw himſelf at his feet, while his feelings were too powerful for utterance. Charles repeatedly preſſed him to his boſom, intreated him to forget what was paſt, and being unwilling to leave his company, ordered a bed to be prepared for him in his own apartment.

When Madame was informed of this event, ſhe conceived her authority was at an end; ſhe even ſuſpected that her brother had been prejudiced againſt her, and that the loſs of her influence would not be the only effect of his reſentment. She haſtened to write him a ſubmiſſive letter, in which ſhe reminded him of the care ſhe had taken of his infancy, entreated him not to liſten to the ſuggeſtions of her enemies, and aſking permiſſion to give a full account of her adminiſtration. Charles endeavoured to quiet his ſiſter's apprehenſions, by aſſuring her of the continuance of his friendſhip, and of his unwillingneſs to attend to any reports to her prejudice, which, however, he did not believe any one would be bold enough to hazard. As the king had inſiſted that the duke or Orleans ſhould be reconciled to the duke of Bourbon, an interview took place between them, at which they not only promiſed to forget the paſt, but ſwore mutually to protect and defend each other in future, and to unite their forces for the ſupport of the royal authority, and for the welfare of the people: they aſſociated in this league the count of Dunois, the mareſchal de Baudricourt, the biſhops of Albi and Montauban, and the lords of Miolans, Liſle, Bouchage and Gonnaut. The duke of Orleans reaped the fruits of this reconciliation; the government of Normandy was conferred on him, and he received orders to repair to that province, to adopt ſuch meaſures as prudence ſhould ſuggeſt to him for defending it from a threatened invaſion of the Engliſh.

The king of the Romans, on his return from Hungary, received an embaſſy from the ducheſs of Brittany, who appriſed him of the loſs of Nantes, and of the danger to which ſhe was expoſed at Rennes. Maximilian, haſtened to his father, who, convening a diet of the empire at Nuremberg, obtained from the princes a ſupply of twelve thouſand men; but the avaricious emperor poſitively refuſed to advance him ſufficient money for the ſupport of theſe troops; and as the inſidious machinations of the French king had excited a freſh inſurrection in Flanders, he was deprived of all hopes of obtaining a ſupply from his Flemiſh ſubjects.

While the court of France were ſtudious to provide employment for Maximilian in his own dominions, they laid freſh ſnares for the ducheſs of Brittany, who was now ſurrounded by traitors. Her council was entirely compoſed of men * in the intereſt of France; even her chancellor, Montauban, had withdrawn his oppoſition to the ſchemes of Charles. On the firſt mention of her marriage with the king, ſhe broke out into ſuch violent reproaches, ſhe exhibited ſuch ſtrong ſymptoms of deſpair, that it was not deemed prudent to preſs it. She had imbibed a ſtrong prepoſſeſſion againſt the French nation, particularly againſt Charles, the author of all the calamities which had befallen her family: ſhe was convinced, too, that her inheritance, rather than her perſon, was the object of his purſuits, and this idea encreaſed her hatred and diſguſt. Beſides ſhe had fixed her affections on Maximilian and ſhe could not, ſhe thought, give her hand to another, without incurring the greateſt guilt, and violating the moſt ſacred engagements. The prince of Orange, who, as her couſin-german, had been entruſted with the negociation, informed the king, that it would be neceſſary to ſupport his remonſtrances by the opperation of terror, and particularly to take effectual meaſures for preventing the ducheſs from repairing to England, whither ſhe was reſolved to fly ſooner than give her hand to his majeſty. Charles, whom a juſt ſenſe of honour and delicacy ſhould have induced to give up all thoughts of a woman to whom he was odious, haſtened to profit by this advice; the army under the viſcount of Rohan ſeized upon Lower Brittany; while La Tremouille, with another, inveſted Rennes, then the reſidence of the ducheſs; and the king, with a third, entered Brittany on the ſide of Anjou. The conſternation was now general: there was not a garriſon in the duchy capable of withſtanding ſuch ſuperior forces; no orders had been iſſued for levying troops, and there was no general to lead them, if any had been levied. The prince of Orange, Dunois, Rieux, and the other members of the council, were ſhut up with the ducheſs, and availing themſelves of the diſtreſſed ſituation to which their treacherous machinations had reduced her, they told her that there was no time to be loſt, and that the only alternative left her, was to become queen of France, or a diſinherited princeſs, and they deſired ſhe would immediately take her choice.

The unfortunate ducheſs, aſſailed on all ſides, and finding no one ſufficiently honeſt to ſupport her in the virtuous reſolution ſhe had adopted, was at length compelled to open the gates of the city, and conſent to eſpouſe the man ſhe hated. She was accordingly taken to the caſtle of Langeais in Touraine, where the marriage was celebrated on the ſixteenth of December, 1491; from thence ſhe was conducted to Saint Denis, where the ceremony of her coronation was performed. She then made her entry into Paris, amidſt the acclamations of the people.

By the marriage contract, Anne, daughter and ſole heireſs to the duke of Brittany, ſince the death of her ſiſter, which occured the preceding year, ceded and transferred to the king, in caſe ſhe died before him, and left no children, all her rights to the duchy of Brittany, the county of Nantes, and all her other eſtates and lordſhips whatſoever; and Charles, king of France, on the other part, in caſe he died firſt and left no children, ceded and transferred to the princeſs all his rights and pretenſions to the ſaid duchy, county and lordſhip, on condition that ſhe ſhould marry no other than the king of France, his ſucceſſor, if that monarch ſhould conſent to eſpouſe her; and in caſe he were already married, that ſhe ſhould give her hand to the next heir to the crown, who ſhould be bound to do homage for the duchy, and not alienate nor transfer any part of her territories, except to the king.

A. D. 1492.] Maximilian had loſt a conſiderable territory which he thought he had acquired; and an accompliſhed princeſs whom he had eſpouſed. He was inſulted in the perſon of his daughter Margaret, who was ſent back to him, after ſhe had been treated, during ſome years, as queen of France. Theſe conſiderations threw him into a moſt violent rage, and he endeavoured, by the moſt bitter invectives, to promote a general confederacy of the European powers, for an invaſion of France. He repreſented the king as a raviſher, a monſter of perfidy, who had wantonly violated the rights of nations, and the moſt ſacred oaths. He maintained that the marriage which that monarch had contracted with a princeſs already married, was contrary to all laws, and that the offspring of ſuch a connection muſt be conſidered as baſtards, and incapable of ſucceding to the throne. How far he was authoriſed to make the laſt aſſertion, the Roman canoniſts, who, in ſuch caſes, generally allowed themſelves a latitude of interpretation forbidden to the hiſtorian, were alone competent to decide; but all the other accuſations were certainly well-founded.

Charles, who had been unfortunately trained in a ſchool for perfidy and falſehood, now ſent ambaſſadors to the archduke Philip, ſovereign of the Low Countries, who declared that the king their maſter, juſtly offended with the king of the Romans and the emperor Frederic, for having accuſed him of taking away the princeſs Margaret in a violent manner, thought his honour was intereſted in removing the ſubject of this reproach: for which reaſon he had choſen another wife, and was ready to ſend back Margaret in an honourable manner to the Netherlands, after having given her an education ſuitable to her rank: that his majeſty being aware that this new arrangement would render a modification of ſome of the articles of the treaty of Arras neceſſary, would conſent to ſubmit that matter to commiſſioners appointed by either party, provided that the king of the Romans and the archduke would previouſly renounce their alliance with England and Spain, on which condition he made them an offer of his friendſhip.

To this curious declaration, the chancellor Corondelet replied, in the name of Maximilian and his ſon, that the king of France, in this tranſaction, had neither conſulted what he owed to himſelf, nor what he owed to the princeſs Margaret, to the archduke, to the king of the Romans, and to the emperor. That the houſe of Auſtria would reſent his conduct at a proper time: that, with regard to the treaty of Arras, it would have become thoſe who had dictated the terms of that treaty, to have been more punctual in fulfilling them: that the king of the Romans and the archduke beſt knew what alliances they ought to preſerve, and what to renounce, and that they had not been accuſtomed to take the advice of the king of France on that head: that, after what had paſſed, they cared as little for his friendſhip as his hatred.

This proper and ſpirited reply—which has been ſtigmatiſed by the French hiſtorians as offenſive and miſplaced—was followed by the immediate diſmiſſion of the ambaſſadors; and the count of Naſſau was, ſoon after, ſent to Paris, in the name of the archdnke, to demand his ſiſter, and the two provinces which had been given as her dower. Charles replied that he would think of it at his leiſure, though common juſtice ſhould have dictated an inſtant compliance with ſuch a demand. The Flemings, and particularly the citizens of Ghent, feeling the greateſt indignation at the affront offered to their princeſs, and enraged with France for breaking a match which they regarded as their own work, maſſacred Coppenole, one of the demagogues in the intereſt of the French, and ſeveral of his partiſans, and then ſubmitted to a reconciliation with Maximilian, on terms much more ſevere than thoſe which they had rejected the year before.

The attention of Charles was now called to the conduct of Henry the Seventh, who, as well as Maximilian, had juſt grounds for ſelf-reproach, in the late important tranſaction: for, though it was not poſſible he ſhould have foreſeen that the affair would have terminated as it did, his negligence in leaving his moſt uſeful ally ſo long expoſed to the attacks of a ſuperior power, muſt appear the reſult of timid caution and narrow politics. But he was farther actuated by avarice—and he ſought the gratification of this ruling paſſion. On the pretence of a French war, he iſſued a commiſſion, for levying on his people that odious ſpecies of taxation, called a Benevolence; and the produce of this tax not proving ſufficient for his purpoſe, he ſummoned a parliament, in the hope of enriching himſelf ſtill farther by the prejudices and paſſions of the members, and, having expatiated on theſe perſuaſive topics, he concluded by demanding a ſupply adequate to the magnitude of the enterpriſe.

The parliament fell into the ſnare prepared for them by the king, and granted him two fifteenths; and an act was paſſed, empowering them to ſell their eſtates, without paying the uſual fines for alienations. The Engliſh nobility were now ſeized with a violent thirſt for military glory: they hoped to behold their triumphant banners diſplayed on the walls of Paris; and to place the crown of France on the head of their ſovereign. Many of them mortgaged their eſtates for large ſums, or ſold off manors, that they might appear in the field with greater ſplendour.

The news of theſe preparations was ſoon received in France; and as the regular companies were inſufficient to protect the coaſts from inſult, the king convoked the ban and arriere ban. In the midſt of theſe alarms, the queen gave birth to a dauphin, who was baptized by the name of Charles Orlando; this event was celebrated with great rejoicings by the Bretons, and afforded the king an opportunity for aſſembling the ſtates of that province, from whom he exacted a conſiderable contribution; in return for which, he confirmed and extended the privileges of the principal towns in Brittany; and, three years after, in 1495, he exempted the Bretons from the juriſdiction of the parliament of Paris, and eſtabliſhed a ſovereign court within the duchy, conſiſting of two preſidents, and eighteen inferior judges, ten of whom were laymen, and the reſt eccleſiaſtics.

Notwithſtanding the threats of Henry, the council deemed it expedient to ſend a freſh embaſſy to the court of England. The ambaſſadors were received by the Engliſh miniſtry, with the utmoſt complacency, and if the treaty was not abſolutely concluded, it was, at leaſt, far advanced, ſince, on their return, and before Henry had completed his preparations, the king gave full powers to the mareſchal Deſquerdes and the preſident La Vacquerie, to treat, in his name, with the Engliſh plenipotentiaries*. All the towns, in the vicinity of Calais, were ſtrongly fortified, and the young adventurer, Perkin Warbec, ſo celebrated in the Engliſh hiſtory, was allured to the court of France. Charles ſent ambaſſadors to Ferdinand, king of Arragon, promiſing to reſtore to that monarch the counties of Rouſſillon and Cerdagne, on condition that he ſhould forego his alliance with Henry and Maximilian. Ferdinand accepted the propoſal, and appointed commiſſioners to regulate the terms of the treaty.

The Engliſh monarch embarked with an army of twenty-five thouſand foot, and ſixteen hundred horſe, and landed at Calais, on the ſixth of October, 1492. Some imagining, from the late period at which the campaign commenced, that peace would ſoon be concluded, Henry ſaid—"He had come over to make an "entire conqueſt of France, which was not the work of one ſummer. It was, "therefore, of no conſequence at what ſeaſon he began the invaſion, eſpecially "as he had Calais ready for winter quarters." He inſtantly marched into the enemy's country, and laid ſiege to Boulogne. But, notwithſtanding this appearance of hoſtility, it ſoon appeared that he was ſerious in the ſecret advances which he had made towards a peace above three months before. In order to reconcile the minds of his ſubjects to this unexpected event, it was contrived that ambaſſadors ſhould arrive in the Engliſh camp from the Low Countries, with intelligence that Maximilian was wholly unable to fulfil his engagements, and that no aſſiſtance muſt be expected from him. Theſe were ſoon followed by meſſengers from Spain, who brought advice that a peace was concluded between that kingdom and France, in which Charles had ceded the counties of Rouſſillon and Cerdagne to Ferdinand: but Henry privately prevailed on the marquis of Dorſet, and twenty-three other perſons of diſtinction, to preſent him a petition for agreeing to a treaty with France. The pretence was founded on the late ſeaſon of the year, the difficulty of ſupplying the army at Calais during the winter, the obſtacles which daily occured to the ſiege of Boulogne, and the deſertion of thoſe allies, whoſe aſſiſtance had been relied on.

Theſe preparatory ſteps being previouſly taken, the Engliſh monarch appointed the biſhop of Exeter, and lord Daubeney, governor of Calais, to confer at Eſtaple's with the French plenipotentiaries. Charles agreed to pay Henry ſeven hundred and forty-five thouſand crowns—nearly four hundred thouſand pounds ſterling of our preſent money—partly as a reimburſement of the expences he had incurred in behalf of the ducheſs of Brittany, and partly as arrears of the penſion due to Edward the fourth; and he farther ſtipulated a yearly penſion to Henry, and his heirs, of twenty-five thouſand crowns.

A. D. 1493.] Maximilian had the option of being comprehended in the treaty, but, diſdaining to be in any reſpect beholden to an ally of whom he had juſt grounds for complaint, he rejected the propoſal with ſovereign contempt. About this time, the citizens of Arras, diſguſted with the conduct of the French, took an opportunity of delivering that town to the Auſtrians. The mareſchal Deſquerdes, who was a moſt deteſtable politician, adviſed the king to puniſh his rebellious vaſſal by annexing the counties of Artois and Flanders to the crown; thus he wiſhed to deprive the archduke of his lawful inheritance, for having defended his father againſt his rebellious ſubjects, and for having reſiſted an inſult offered to his ſiſter. Charles rejected the treacherous advice of Deſquerdes, and even concluded a treaty with Maximilian and his ſon, by which he agreed to reſtore Artois and Franche-Comté; reſerving only the three towns of Heſdin, Aire and Bethune, which were to be ſequeſtered in the hands of Deſquerdes, till the archduke ſhould come of age, and Tournay, Mortagne, and Saint Amand, which had formerly belonged to France.

This peace was concluded very opportunely for Maximilian; whoſe father, the emperor Frederick, having died at Lintz, in the ſeventy-third year of his age, the Turks profited by the occaſion to make incurſions into Croatia and Auſtria.

In the treaty Charles concluded with Ferdinand, he had exacted a promiſe, in return for the ceſſion of Rouſſillon and Cerdagne, that the king of Arragon ſhould oppoſe no obſtacle to his projected attempts upon Italy; that he ſhould not marry his children, either to thoſe of the king of the Romans, or to the children of Henry; and that he ſhould form no kind of connexion, by marriage, with either of thoſe princes. But Ferdinand was no ſooner in poſſeſſion of Rouſſillon, than he married one of his daughters, the Infanta Catharine, to Arthur, prince of Wales; and, on the death of that prince, contracted her to his brother Henry; another of his daughters he married to the archduke Philip, only ſon to Maximilian; and his ſon eſpouſed the princeſs Margaret, whom Charles had ſent back to her father*.

It will be neceſſary to take a ſhort review of the motives and origin of a war which forms an epoch in the hiſtory of France, and occupies the greater part of three ſucceſſive reigns.

Charles was born with a delicate conſtitution and a feeble frame; his father had ſtrictly forbidden his application to any ſerious ſtudy; and had contented himſelf with reciting to him the atchievements of thoſe monarchs who had acquired the greateſt glory in the government of France, and with attempting to make the ſeeds of emulation ſhoot forth in his infant mind. As he advanced in years, he became eager for inſtruction, and having peruſed with avidity the Commentaries of Cæſar, and the life of Charlemagne, he became enamoured of thoſe warriors, and choſe them for his heroes. Led away by a martial ardour, and ſeduced by a blind preſumption, he thought, that in order to equal his models, he had only to form an enterpriſe, in boldneſs and extent ſurpaſſing their own. With this view, he reſolved on forming the ſiege of Conſtantinople, and on completing the conqueſt of the eaſtern empire. Having adopted this reſolution, the next object of conſideration was to find the means of tranſporting an army to the gates of that capital: France, at this period, had but a ſmall number of trading veſſels, which, in time of war, were equipped for hoſtile purpoſes: to have recourſe, as in the times of the former cruſades, to the Venetians or other Italian ſtates, was deemed dangerous, as the king's perſon, and the ſafety of the ſtate, muſt, in that caſe, have been truſted to the diſcretion of foreigners; beſides, it was neceſſary to ſecure a place of retreat in caſe of misfortune. The poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples would, from its ſituation and flouriſhing towns, have procured him all the advantages he could deſire; he therefore reſolved, previous to his grand expedition, to enforce his claims to that part of Italy.

The kingdom of Naples, as well as Sicily, which was annexed to it, had been enjoyed, for the beſt part of two centuries, by the princes of the two royal houſes of Anjou. Alphonſo, king of Arragon, whoſe anceſtors had taken Sicily from the Anjevin princes, availing himſelf of the troubles which prevailed in France, deſpoiled them alſo of the kingdom of Naples, where he eſtabliſhed his reſidence. This prince, at his death, left the kingdom of Arragon, and the iſland of Sicily, which he had inherited from his anceſtors, to his brother don Juan, father to Ferdinand of Arragon; but, with the conſent of the pope, who was conſidered as lord paramount of Naples, he bequeathed his conqueſt to a natural ſon, named Ferdinand, who reſiſted all the efforts made to diſpoſſeſs him of that kingdom by René of Anjou, titular king of Naples and Sicily, and his ſon John, commonly called the duke of Calabria. The failure of theſe princes to recover the dominions of their anceſtors, had proceeded from the diſinclination of Lewis the Eleventh to promote the elevation of any part of his family, which had led him to fruſtrate all their plans. King René, having ſurvived his ſon and grandſon, left all his claims to the kingdom of Naples, and the county of Provence, to his nephew, the count of Maine, in preference to René, duke of Lorraine, ſon to Yoland, his eldeſt daughter. The count, dying ſoon after without heirs, bequeathed all his rights and pretenſions to Lewis the Eleventh; and after him, to the dauphin Charles, and all his ſucceſſors on the throne of France. To this ſecond will no oppoſition could be formed, but the validity of the firſt was ſtrongly conteſted by the duke of Lorraine, who maintained that Provence and the kingdom of Naples, not being ſubject to the Salic law, and having been frequently governed by females, belonged of right to his mother; and that his grandfather had no power to annihilate the rights of nature, by a deed which had been extorted from him at an age when his faculties were impaired. The king of France produced a family compact, and the wills of the two princes of the houſe of Anjou, who had appointed their male heirs to ſucceed them, to the prejudice of females, who were more nearly related to them.

* It is ſaid that this princeſs, on her voyage to Spain, whither ſhe was going to celebrate her marriage, had nearly periſhed in a ſtorm; and expecting the veſſel to ſink every moment, ſhe took out a pencil, and wrote the following epitaph on herſelf—

The duke of Lorraine was unable to cope with the king, who reſolved to enforce his pretenſions on the firſt favourable opportunity, which ſpeedily occurred. The Neapolitans, diſguſted with the oppreſſive and tyrannical conduct of Ferdinand the Firſt, and his ſon Alphonſo, had reſolved to depoſe the former, and diſinherit the latter; the nobility had taken up arms to effect this purpoſe, but, through the mediation of the king of Spain, and pope Innocent the Eighth, a treaty was concluded, and tranquillity reſtored. But, in violation of this treaty, which they had ratified by the moſt ſolemn oaths, Ferdinand and his ſon invited the nobility (under pretence of attending the celebration of a marriage) to the palace, where they were ſeized and maſſacred. Three only eſcaped, viz. the prince of Salerno, and two of his nephews, ſons to the prince of Biſignano. Theſe left the kingdom in diſguiſe, and haſtening to Venice, conſulted the ſenate, as to what monarch they ſhould apply for aſſiſtance. Three princes had claims to the kingdom of Naples; Ferdinand, the Catholic; the duke of Lorraine, and Charles the Eighth. The ſenate excluded the firſt, becauſe, being already maſter of Sicily, he would, by the conqueſt of Naples, become a too formidable neighbour to the other Italian ſtates. The duke of Lorraine, they obſerved, had outlived his reputation, and it would be abſurd to loſe time in attempting to raiſe the dead. To the king of France neither of theſe objections could be oppoſed, and the Neapolitan refugees accordingly reſolved to apply to Charles.

The ſolicitations of the prince of Salerno and his nephews were ſtrongly ſeconded by ambaſſadors from Ludovico Sforza, ſurnamed the Moor, who governed Milan in the name of his nephew, John Galleazzo, the lawful ſovereign of that duchy; and from pope Alexander the Sixth, a man of infamous character, who was raiſed to the papacy, notwithſtanding he had five natural children, whom he publicly acknowledged, by Vanoſſa, a lady of Rome. The object of theſe princes was to check the overgrown power of the Neopolitan monarch, and of Pietro de Medicis, duke of Florence, who had evinced a diſpoſition to oppoſe the deſigns of the uſurper (who meant to dethrone his unſuſpecting kinſman, and ſeat himſelf on the ducal throne) and of the ſovereign pontiff.

The ambaſſadors were admitted to an audience, where, by an artful harangue, they influenced the military ardour of Charles, though the arguments made a very different impreſſion on the members of his council. Admiral de Graville repreſented, that a war, in ſuch a diſtant country, where no communication could be preſerved with France, would be attended with immenſe expence, without much probability of a happy iſſue: that the enemies whom they propoſed to attack, were by no means ſo contemptible as the ambaſſadors had repreſented them; that every body did juſtice to the penetration, knowledge, and prudence of Ferdinand, who was ſuppoſed to have amaſſed immenſe treaſures during a reign of thirty-five years; that his ſon Alphonſo enjoyed the reputation of the braveſt warrior and the beſt general in Italy; that theſe princes were allied to the king of Spain, who would never tamely acquieſce in the depoſition of his neareſt relations, nor ſuffer the French to eſtabliſh themſelves in the vicinity of Sicily; that profeſſions of the Italians were not to be truſted; nor was it to be ſuppoſed that they would behold the crown of Naples on the head of a French king; that Lewis the Eleventh, whoſe political knowledge no one would diſpute, had conſtantly rejected the invitations of the popes to carry his arms into Italy; and that, before any engagement were contracted, it would be neceſſary to ſend ſome prudent perſons into Italy, to ſound the diſpoſitions of the different courts.

Graville's opinion was adopted by the whole council; even the king himſelf apeared to concur in it, and he accordingly appointed Peron de Baſchi, and ſome other perſons diſtinguiſhed for their merit, his ambaſſadors to the Italian courts; but he was ſecretly determined not to wait their return before he ſettled his plan of operations. Led away by the warmth of his imagination, Charles privately ſigned a treaty, by which he engaged to conduct an army into Italy, ſufficiently powerful to enſure the conqueſt of Naples. Ludovico, on his ſide, promiſed to give his troops a free paſſage through the duchy of Milan; to reinforce them with a body of five hundred men at arms; to lend the king two hundred thouſand ducats to defray the expence of the war; and to give him permiſſion to equip, in the port of Genoa, as many veſſels as he ſhould want for the expedition.

A. D. 1494.] On the firſt report of the hoſtile deſigns of Charles, the king of Naples ſent an embaſſy to France, offering to pay homage, and an annual tribute of fifty thouſand crowns. Theſe conditions, ſo anvantageous to France, were rejected by the king, ambitious of the fame of a conqueror; Ferdinand, doubtful of the fidelity of his ſubjects, oppreſſed by years, and ſenſible of the calamities which impended over his country, was ſeized with an apoplexy, which terminated his exiſtence, and his crown devolved on his ſon, Alphonſo the Second.—That prince immediately prepared to detach the ſovereign pontiff from the intereſt of the French; and, by procuring ſplendid eſtabliſhments for his ſons, he not only ſucceeded in that attempt, but engaged Alexander to join him in an application to the ſultan Bajazet, requeſting his aſſiſtance in oppoſing the projected invaſion of Charles.

Charles had ſent the lord d'Urfé to Genoa, to make the neceſſary preparations for the equipment of a fleet. The troops were already in motion, though Charles had not yet made known his deſigns to the nation. The reſiſtance he had experienced from the council had made him dread a ſtill greater oppoſition from the parliaments, and principal towns. He was perſuaded by thoſe who favoured his paſſions, to take the nation, as it were, by ſurpriſe, that the advice of the more prudent part of his council might not have time to operate. He accordingly appointed a day for holding a grand tournament at Lyons, to which all the nobility of the kingdom repaired, and, in the midſt of their feſtivity, he propoſed to them an immediate expedition to Italy, the glory and dangers whereof he expreſſed his reſolution to ſhare. Moſt of the nobles eagerly embraced a plan, which, in their cooler moments, they would have rected; and, that their ardour might not be ſuffered to cool, he gave orders for the troops to advance without delay.

But Charles's inattention to buſineſs and want of foreſight were never more ſtrongly diſplayed than on this occaſion, for when the army began their march, it appeared that no money had been provided for their ſubſiſtance*. The king was obliged to borrow, of a banker at Genoa, one hundred thouſand ducats, at the enormous intereſt of fourteen thouſand ducats for four months; and a banker at Milan advanced fifty thouſand more. Theſe ſums proving inſufficient, even for the equipment of the fleet, recourſe was had to extraordinary meaſures; and by anticipations of the revenue, and other expedients, he raiſed ſufficient to begin his enterpriſe.

The duke of Orleans was appointed to command the fleet; and the duke of Bourbon was created lieutenant-general of the kingdom, during the abſence of Charles. The count of Angouleme was made governor of Guienne; Normandy and Picardy were entruſted to the care of admiral Graville: Burgundy to the mareſchal de Baudricourt; Champagne to the lord d'Orval, and Brittany to the baron d'Avagour, and the viſcount de Rohan.*

After taking every neceſſary precaution for the ſafety of the kingdom, the king left Lyons, and repaired to Grenoble, where he appointed commiſſioners for providing the troops with proviſions; and appointed the officers who were to command under him. The death of the mareſchal Deſquerdes, which occured at this period, proved a great loſs to Charles; for though he had many other experienced commanders, ſuch as the count de Montpenſier; la Trémouille; d'Aubigni; and mareſchals de Gié and de Rieux, yet had he none to whoſe advice he paid ſuch implicit reſpect.

Charles continued his march through Dauphiné to Savoy, where he experienced a magnificent reception from the ducheſs-dowager, who, being informed that he was in want of money, and having none to advance him, lent him her jewels, which ſhe requeſted he would pledge for twelve thouſand ducats. When he came to Caſal, the marchioneſs of Montferrat was equally generous, and lent him her jewels alſo, towards defraying the neceſſary expences of the enterpriſe.

The king arrived at Aſt, in Piedmont, the place appointed for the general rendezvous of his army, on the ninth of September: he was here ſeized with the ſmall pox, from which he recovered, after the moſt imminent danger of his life. The joy occaſioned by the return of his health, was farther encreaſed by the news that the duke of Orleans had obtained a victory over the fleet of Naples, commanded by don Frederic, brother to Alphonſo: the duke himſelf was the bearer of this intelligence.

Charles left Aſt on the ſixth of October, and purſued his victorious career towards Naples. Previous to his departure from Piedmont, he had an interview with Ludovico Sforza, who left him, in a few days, to take poſſeſſion of Milan, which he ſeized, on the death of John Galleazzo, his nephew, though that prince had left an infant ſon. The pope, appriſed of the approach of the French, ſent a nuncio to the king, to forbid him under pain of excommunication, to ſet foot on the territories of the church; but Charles replied, that he had made a vow to viſit the tomb of Saint-Peter, and was reſolved to fulfil it.

The army prepared to paſs the Appenines. It conſiſted of the king's houſhold troops, compoſed of one hundred gentlemen, and four hundred archers; ſixteen hundred lances, each lance having ſix horſes; twelve thouſand infantry, half Swiſs, half Gaſcons, and a numerous body of volunteers:—the train of artillery conſiſted of one hundred and forty pieces†.

Charles's cavalry was entirely compoſed of thoſe companies of Gendarmes, embodied by Charles the Seventh, and continued by Lewis the Eleventh; and his infantry, as we have before obſerved, conſiſted partly of Swiſs, hired of the Cantons, and partly of Gaſcons, who were armed and diſciplined after the Swiſs model.

* Chronique d'Aquitaine.—Fontanieu, ree. des pieces. † Guicciardini, tom. i. lib. i. p. 84.

The arms and diſcipline of the Swiſs were different from thoſe of other European nations. During their long and violent ſtruggles in defence of their liberties againſt the houſe of Auſtria, whoſe armies, like thoſe of other conſiderable princes, conſiſted chiefly of heavy-armed cavalry, the Swiſs found that their poverty, and the ſmall number of gentlemen reſiding in their country, at that time barren and ill-cultivated, put it out of their power to bring into the field any body of horſe capable of facing the enemy. Neceſſity compelled them to place all their confidence in infantry; and, in order to render it capable of withſtanding the ſhock of cavalry, they gave the ſoldiers breaſt-plates and helmets as defenſive armour; together with long ſpears, halberts, and heavy ſwords, as weapons of offence. They formed them into large battalions, ranged in deep and cloſe array, ſo that they could preſent, on every ſide, a formidable front to the enemy*.

After the army had paſſed the Appenines, Montpenſier, who commanded the vanguard, inveſted Fivizano, the firſt fortreſs in the Florentine dominions; the place being carried by aſſault, the whole garriſon and moſt of the inhabitants, were put to the ſword; the Italians, who had been wholly unuſed to ſuch treatment, were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation by this cruel mode of waging war. The French next approached the ſmall town of Serezana, and the ſtrong fortreſs of Serezanello, which, from their ſituation, on the ſummit of lofty rocks, and in the centre of a dry and barren country, might long have reſiſted their utmoſt efforts; but the arrival of Pietro de Medicis in their camp, ſoon removed this difficulty.

Alarmed at the rapid progreſs of the French arms, Pietro was induced to ſign a treaty with Charles, by which he engaged immediately to deliver up to the French the fortreſs of Serezanello, with the towns of Serezana, Pietra-Santa, Piſa, and Leghorn; and to make the Florentines advance him, by way of loan, the ſum of two hundred thouſand ducats. The king, on his part, promiſed to reſtore the towns, as ſoon as he ſhould have completed the reduction of Naples. The Florentines were ſo incenſed with Pietro, for having ſigned ſuch a diſhonourable treaty, that they declared him a traitor to the ſtate, and compelled him to take refuge in Venice. Charles paſſed through Piſa, whoſe inhabitants deſired to be taken under his immediate protection, and to be conſidered, thenceforth, as ſubjects of France, and continued his route to Florence; into which city, after ſome heſitation on the part of the inhabitants, he obtained admiſſion, and renewed, with the Florentines themſelves, the very treaty which had induced them to expel Pietro de Medicis. From Florence Charles marched to Sienna, where he was received with joy by the inhabitants, who had levelled their walls, and pulled down their gates, to facilitate the entrance of his troops. The pope received the intelligence of his ſucceſs with terror; he haſtily retired into the caſtle of Saint Angelo, and commanded the gates to be thrown open to the victor, who took poſſeſſion of the city without ſtriking a blow, and diſpoſed of his troops in the different quarters of it. But Charles reſiſted the importunities of thoſe cardinals, who adviſed him to depoſe the profligate and turbulent Alexander, and fill the apoſtolic chair with a more holy ſucceſſor. The king rejected their counſels, and concluded a treaty with the Roman pontiff, who ſolemnly granted him the inveſture of Naples, and delivered to him the towns of Viterbo, Terracina, Spoleto and Civita-Vecchia, with his ſon, Ceſar Borgia, cardinal of Valenza, as a pledge of the ſincerity of his intentions.

A. D. 1495.] Alphonſo the Second, king of Naples, at this critical conjuncture, abdicated the throne, and reſigned his ſceptre to his ſon Ferdinand the Second, and retired to the town of Mazara, at the fartheſt extremity of Sicily, where he paſſed the remainder of his days in a convent: Alphonſo had received intelligence that a powerful confederacy was forming at Venice, for the expulſion of the French from Italy, and that Ludovico Sforza was the principal promoter of it; and he was afraid, that the perſonal hatred which ſubſiſted between him and Ludovico might prevent that nobleman from bringing matters to a concluſion, till ſuch time as he could be certain he had nothing to apprehend from him.

Charles was at Rome when he received the news of this ſtrange revolution; aware how eſſential it was to the ſucceſs of his enterpriſe, not to allow young Ferdinand time to ingratiate himſelf with the Neapolitan nobility, he began his march on the twenty-eighth of January, after he had remained near a month at Rome, he arrived the next day at Veletri.

From Veletri, the army proceeded to inveſt the ſmall town of Monte Fortino, which was taken by aſſault, and abandoned to the rage of the ſoldiers. Monte di San Giovani was next reduced, and experienced a ſimilar fate; and this ſeverity, to which the Italians were wholly unaccuſtomed, ſpread ſuch a general conſternation, that not another town durſt refuſe to open its gates.

Ferdinand, having aſſembled an army of fifty ſquadrons, and ſix thouſand infantry, took poſſeſſion of the ſtrong poſt of San-Germano, reſolved to diſpute with the French the entrance into his dominions. He could not have choſen a more proper place for making a ſtand; he was protected on one ſide by a ſteep and rugged mountain, on the other by impaſſible marſhes; and his front was defended by the river Garigliano. Ferdinand had alſo rendered the approach to it more difficult by cutting down a great quantity of trees, and by erecting batteries which commanded the road. The attempt to force this paſs would have been extremely dangerous, but the terror which preceded the French had unmanned the enemy. They no ſooner perceived Lewis d'Armagnac, count of Guiſe, ſon to the unfortunate duke of Nemours, advance towards them with three hundred lances, and two thouſand infantry, than, forgetting the ſtrength of their poſt, they fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Ferdinand, in vain, attempted to rally his troops, he was compelled to yield to the torrent, and to ſhut himſelf up, with his cowardly followers, in the town of Capua. Here he hoped to reſiſt the attacks of the enemy, till the arrival of foreign ſuccours; but fortune continued her perſecution, and ſoon deprived him of this laſt reſource: the news of an inſurection at Naples, compelled him to fly to that capital, promiſing, however, to return to Capua the next day; but after his departure, Gianiacopo da Triulzi, to whom he had entruſted the command of the town during his abſence, ſurrendered it to the king. The town of Averſa, ſituated mid-way between Capua and Naples, alſo ſent a deputation to Charles. The capital itſelf was in commotion.

Having diſcovered, by certain ſymptoms, the intention of the garriſon, which conſiſted of five hundred Germans, to ſeize his perſon, and deliver him to the French, he gave up to them all the furniture and effects which the caſtle contained; and while they were employed in dividing the ſpoil, he eſcaped by a private door, and embarked for the Iſle of Iſchia, about thirty miles from Naples. On his arrival at that place, the governor refuſed to admit him into the citadel, unleſs he came unattended; a propoſal which the unhappy monarch thought it adviſeable to accept; but as ſoon as he entered the citadel, he ſeized the governor, and threw him to the ground, to the great aſtoniſhment of the garriſon, who, awed by this act of reſolution, ſubmitted to their lawful ſovereign.

Charles, meanwhile, advanced to Averſa, where he received a deputation from the citizens of Naples, who ſent him the keys of the town: and, on the twenty-firſt of February, he made his triumphant entry into that capital, amidſt the acclamations of the inhabitants. Thus, in the depth of winter, without money, and without magazines, did Charles march through Italy, and complete the reduction of that fertile country. From Lyons to Naples, not a town reſiſted his arms for more than one day, and the troops did not ſleep in tents a ſingle night. The whole expedition rather reſembled the peaceable progreſs of a monarch through his own dominions, than the hoſtile march of a conqueror.

But Charles wanted prudence to ſecure this conqueſt; his miniſters and favourites were ſuffered to act as they pleaſed: and their rapaciouſneſs and oppreſſions ſoon diſguſted the Neapolitans; even ſuch of the native nobility as had been forward in aſſiſting the progreſs of the French arms, were treated with neglect, and many others were deſpoiled of their eſtates and reduced to poverty. Theſe injuries, ſharpened by repeated inſults, the ſubject of which was the impotent effeminacy of the Italian troops, produced a prompt revolution in the ſentiments of the Neapolitans, who now conceived a violent hatred to the French, while their averſion for the houſe of Arragon was converted into pity and remorſe.—Charles, however, who, wholly abſorbed in pleaſure, was ignorant of this change, and, by a conſiderable diminution of the uſual impoſts, had even been led to believe he had ſecured the affections of his new ſubjects, appointed the twelfth of May for his coronation: and that ceremony was accordingly performed, with the utmoſt magnificence.

Dazzled with ſo extraordinary a blaze of glory, Charles already meditated the attack of Conſtantinople, and the ſubverſion of the Ottoman Empire; but while he inconſiderately waſted his time at Naples, in feſtivals and triumphs, on account of his paſt ſucceſſes, or was fondly dreaming of future conqueſts in the Eaſt, a powerful combination was formed againſt him. The firſt news he received of this confederacy, came from Philip de Commines, whom he had ſent as ambaſſador to the republic of Venice, to require their aſſiſtance in his projected expedition againſt the Turks. Commines ſoon had occaſion to perceive that the rapid progreſs of the French arms was highly diſpleaſing to the Venetians, and that they began to repent the encouragement they had given to Charles; for which reaſon he had adviſed his maſter to accept an offer made him by Ferdinand, to hold the kingdom of Naples as a fief of the crown of France, and to pay tribute for the ſame. But the king, intoxicated with ſucceſs, rejected the advice of his ambaſſador. The more fortune ſeemed to favour an enterpriſe which prudence diſavowed, the more did Commines tremble for the conſequences. Appriſed of the deſigns of the confederates—the Venetians, the kings of Arragon and Naples, the emperor Maximilian, and the duke of Milan—and finding all his remonſtrances loſt upon Charles, he wrote to the duke of Orleans to fortify the town of Aſt, where he had been detained by a violent fever; to the duke of Bourbon, lieutenant-general of the kingdom, to ſend, with all poſſible expedition, a ſtrong reinforcement of troops to Aſt, which was on the point of being beſieged; and to the marchioneſs of Montferrat, deſiring her to ſupply the duke of Orleans with all her Gendarmes, to enable him to defend himſelf until the arrival of the expected ſuccours from France.

Ferdinand of Arragon engaged to ſend an army into the kingdom of Naples, commanded by one of his moſt experienced generals, and to make ſuch a powerful diverſion on the ſide of the Pyrenees, that the duke of Bourbon ſhould not be able to ſend a reinforcement of troops into Italy. The emperor agreed to ſupply the confederates with a body of the beſt troops in Germany, and to enter Champagne with another army, provided they would furniſh him with money for the expedition. The duke of Milan undertook to reduce the town of Aſt, and to ſecure the paſſage of the Alps; and, laſtly, the Venetians engaged to equip a fleet, and to pay, in conjunction with the pope and the duke of Milan, an army of forty thouſand men, which ſhould wait for the French at the foot of the Appenines. "The league," ſays Commines, "was concluded late at night, and the next morning the ſenate ſent for me at an earlier hour than uſual."

Although Commines was prepared for this news, yet ſtill he was ſo thunderſtricken when he heard it, that, for a moment, he loſt the power of utterance; but when he had recovered his ſurpriſe, he replied, with apparent tranquillity, That he knew before what they had juſt told him, and many more particulars which they had not thought proper to notice; that he had not only appriſed the king of theſe circumſtances, but the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon alſo, in order that they might have time to provide for the ſafety of the town of Aſt, which they had already done. The Venetians, who pique themſelves on the ſecrecy of their delberations, were extremely mortified at hearing this; and in order to excite miſtruſt among the confederates, Commines added, That he had not even had the merit of being the firſt to inform the king of this league, ſince Charles had already received certain advice of it both from Rome and Milan. The doge was now diſconcerted in his turn, and wiſhing to engage the ambaſſador in a converſation, he began by repreſenting to him that a league, the only object whereof was to ſecure the dominions of the powers who had joined it, could not poſſibly injure the king, unleſs he had a deſign to attempt the conqueſt of Italy; he then aſked him, whether he had no new propoſal to make; but Commines replied, that it was too late to negociate, when war was already declared.

Commines was ſo ſtricken with what he had heard, and was ſo buried in reflection, that, turning to the ſecretary, whom the ſenate had appointed to conduct him to his reſidence, he ſaid to him—"Pray, friend, repeat what the prince ſaid to me, for I have forgotten every word of it: I don't know what has become of my memory and my reaſon!"

Charles, though leſs alarmed than his ambaſſador, at length became ſenſible of his danger. In this critical ſituation there was not a moment to loſe. If he gave time to the confederates to bring a ſtrong body of diſciplined veterans into Switzerland and Germany, and intrench them in the defiles of the Appenines, all was loſt, and the laurels he had already reaped would only tend to augment the humiliation of his defeat. The only mode of eſcaping was to cut his way through the Italian ſtates, while they had none but their own national troops to defend them. This, indeed, appeared no eaſy matter, for as he could not prevail on himſelf to evacuate Naples, and loſe all the fruits of his labours, he was obliged to leave a part of his army behind him, under the command of Gilbert de Bourbon, count of Montpenſier, whom he appointed his lieutenant-general in the kingdom of Naples. The character of this nobleman is given by Philip de Commines in a very few words:—He was brave, but poſſeſſed of little prudence; he never roſe till noon!"

The king left Naples on the twentieth of May, 1495, with an army conſiſting of nine hundred lances, two thouſand five hundred Swiſs, and fifteen hundred houſhold troops, amounting, in the whole, to nine thouſand four hundred men*. The firſt enemy, through whoſe dominions he had to paſs, was the pope, who, conſcious that he deſerved no mercy from the French, withdrew from Rome, and wrote to Charles, informing him, that having taken care that the army ſhould want for nothing in its paſſage through the eccleſiaſtical territories, he had retired to Orvietto, whence he would not fail to viſit the king, as ſoon as he ſhould be appriſed of his arrival at Viterbo. Charles paſſed through Rome, but refuſed to alight at the Vatican, where apartments had been prepared for his reception. When he came to Viterbo, the pope fled to Perucia; but the king, notwithſtanding the juſt grounds for complaint which he had againſt the treacherous pontiff, reſtored to him the towns of Civita-Vecchia, Terracina, Spoleto, and Viterbo, reſerving only Oſtia, which he afterwards reſigned to the cardinal di San Pietro, in Vincola.

* Commines.—Guicciardini.—Giovio.

All the places in the pope's dominions opened their gates to the French, except the ſmall town of Toſcanella, which refuſed them admiſſion. It was, in conſequence, taken by aſſault, and abandoned to pillage: among the priſoners, who had eſcaped the ſword, was a young girl of extraordinary beauty, who was reſerved for the king. Notwithſtanding the horror and deſpair which were ſtrongly depicted on her countenance, and notwithſtanding the tears which ſtreamed from her eyes, Charles ſeized her in his arms, and was proceeding to commit violence on her perſon, when, as ſhe ſtruggled to get looſe from him, ſhe perceived the picture of the Virgin hanging in the room:—"In the name of her," exclaimed the virtuous maid, "who, by her purity deſerved the honour of becoming mother to the Son of God, O king, ſpare my honour!"—Charles, caſting his eyes on the picture, reſtrained his deſires; and being informed that the maid was betrothed to a young man of a decent family, who, with her father and mother, had alſo eſcaped the fury of the troops, and were then priſoners in the town, he releaſed them all, and gave the fair captive a marriage-portion of five hundred crowns of gold.

On the arrival of Charles at Sienna, he was met by Commines, of whom he enquired, with a ſmile, whether the proud republicans whom he had juſt left, meant to ſend any body to meet him? "Sire," replied Commines, "they aſſured me, when I took leave of them, that it was their intention to ſend forty thouſand men to meet your majeſty." The young courtiers, who held the Italians in contempt, and were perſuaded that France was the only country for ſoldiers, were highly diverted with the ambaſſador's ſerious looks, and the king himſelf partook of their amuſement. In vain did Commines expatiate on the number and quality of the enemy's troops, and the ſkill of their leaders; in vain did he conjure Charles not to wait the arrival of the Germans, whom the emperor had promiſed to ſend into Italy; nothing he could ſay had any effect on the king, or could induce him to haſten his march.

Already were the combined forces of the pope, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, on their march to the foot of the Appenines, where they intended to wait for the French. Beſides this army, which conſiſted of between thirty and forty thouſand men, Ludovico had raiſed a ſecond, compoſed of ſeven hundred lances, and three thouſand foot, which he deſtined for the ſiege of Aſt, which he now ſummoned to ſurrender. But before he was in a condition to act, the duke of Orleans had received a reinforcement from France; and thus finding himſelf at the head of a little army of three hundred lances, and two thouſand Swiſs, beſides a body of provincial troops from Dauphiné, he forgot the purpoſe for which theſe forces had been entruſted to his conduct: two Milaneſe gentlemen, having offered to procure him admiſſion into the town of Novara, where they had formed a conſpiracy, he accepted their propoſal, and made himſelf maſter of the place without the loſs of a man.

Charles was at Sienna, when he received intelligence of the firſt exploits of the duke of Orleans; he immediately left that city and proceeded to Poggibonzi, a place belonging to the Florentines, where he received ambaſſadors from that republic, who urged him to fulfil his engagements, by reſtoring the towns which had been delivered to him on his march to Naples. The king promiſed to comply with their requeſt on his arrival at Piſa, whither he was followed by the ambaſſadors; but the Piſans, ſhocked at the idea, of again ſubmitting to a power, from whom they had experienced nothing but tyranny and oppreſſion, found means to intereſt the Swiſs in their behalf; and the whole army riſing, inſiſted that the inhabitants ſhould be ſuffered to remain under the protection of the French.

Charles, deeming it prudent to ſuffer the zeal of his ſoldiers, in defence of the Piſans, to evaporate, feigned a compliance with their requeſt, and ſecretly promiſed the Florentines to give them full ſatisfaction on his arrival at the town of Aſt. Though highly diſpleaſed at this freſh delay, they, nevertheleſs, permitted two of their generals, Franciſco Seceo, and Camillo Vitelli, with three hundred lances, and two thouſand infantry, to accompany the king, and to ſerve with the French army, as long as they ſhould remain in Italy.

But this reinforcement was trifling, when compared with the magnitude of the danger, though ſo far were the king, and the young warriors of France, from conſidering that danger, in a proper light, that the cardinal San Pietro di Vincola, having promiſed, if they would give him a detachment of the French army, to excite an inſurrection in Genoa, obtained, againſt the advice of the more prudent part of the council, all the troops he required—viz. one hundred and twenty French lances, ſome companies of Italians, and five hundred croſs-bowmen, under the command of Philip of Savoy, count of Breſſe: John de Polignac, count of Beaumont; and Hugh d'Amboiſe. This little army advanced to the ſuburbs of Genoa, where they waited the arrival of the French fleet, commanded by Miolens, which, ſince the defection of Ludovico Sforza, was reduced to ſeven galleys, and four veſſels of inferior ſize. Theſe were overtaken by the Genoeſe fleet, reinforced by the pope's gallies, near Repallo, and, after a ſhort conteſt, were all captured. The troops, after this misfortune, found it neceſſary to retire, by private roads, to the town of Aſt, where they waited the iſſue of the king's expedition.

Charles, after ſtaying ſix days at Piſa, paſſed through Lucca, Pietra-Santa, and Serezana, and proceeded to Pontremoli, the firſt place in the duchy of Milan. The inhabitants, having diſmiſſed the garriſon, opened their gates to the French, on condition that their lives and property ſhould be ſafe. In violation of this agreement, the Swiſs, forty of whoſe comrades had been killed the year before, in a fray with the inhabitants, drew their ſwords, and, without communicating their intentions to the French, maſſacred the defenceleſs citizens, pillaged their houſes, and ſet fire to the town.

A mode was pointed out to them of expiating their fault. The army being now arrived at the foot of the Appenines, the council were employed in deliberating on the beſt means of tranſporting the heavy artillery over thoſe ſteep and rugged mountains, and by roads that appeared impaſſable. As no means could be deviſed which appeared feaſible, it was propoſed to leave the guns behind, after rendering them unfit for uſe; though, at the ſame time, they were aware, that by ſo doing they would deprive the army of its principal ſtrength, and perhaps of its only reſource. In this emergency the Swiſs offered, on condition that the king ſhould grant them a pardon for their late offences, to drag the artillery themſelves over ſuch places as were inacceſſible to horſes. Charles not only conſented to pardon them, but promiſed never to forget ſo ſignal a ſervice. Accordingly, the martial band prepared for the laborious taſk, which La Trémouille was appointed to ſuperintend. He was careful to place, at certain diſtances, refreſhments for the men, and to ſtation relays of horſes and mules wherever thoſe animals could be employed: companies of pioneers preceded the Swiſs to break off the rugged points of the rocks, and to fill up the ravines; other companies of carpenters, ſmiths, aud wheelrights, accompanied the carriages, to repair, without loſs of time, any damage they might ſuſtain on the road. La Trémouille was preſent every where, animating the workmen by his words and geſtures. Convinced, too, that example is more perſuaſive than exhortation, he carried two cannon-balls himſelf. After ſuſtaining incredible fatigue, the army at length reached the ſummit of the mountain. But the greateſt difficulty yet remained to be ſurmounted; it now became neceſſary to ſupport, with cables from behind, thoſe enormous maſſes which they had ſo much trouble to drag up, in order to prevent them from cruſhing the men who were before them. The fatigue of this laborious operation was greatly encreaſed by the extreme heat of the ſun, which darting its rays from a cloudleſs ſky, proved almoſt inſupportable. When La Trémouille went to ſalute the king after the buſineſs was completed, ſome time paſſed before Charles could recollect him, his face was ſo much burned.

Meanwhile, the confederate army, under the conduct of Franceſco de Gonzago, marquis of Mantua, had aſſembled in the plain beneath, to the number of five-and-thirty thouſand men. Had their only object been to cut off the king's retreat to his own dominions, they would certainly have entrenched themſelves in the narrow paſſes of the Appenines, whence it would have been impoſſible to diſlodge them: but their ſuperiority over the French army, which conſiſted of between ſeven and eight thouſand men, haraſſed by a long and toilſome march, and deſtitute of proviſions and of money, led the confederates to conceive more lofty deſigns:—they propoſed to take the king priſoner, ſo completely to ſurround the French, that not a man might eſcape, and to ſtrike ſuch a terror into the nation, that they ſhould loſe all deſire of re-viſiting Italy. Their firſt deſign had been to fix their camp at Fornuovo, a village ſituate at the foot of the Appenines; but conſidering that the place would be too confined for an army ſo numerous, compoſed almoſt wholly of cavalry, to act in; afraid too, that if the king ſhould perceive them from the ſummit of the mountain, he might be tempted to return to Piſa, and ſome other towns in Tuſcany, where he had left garriſons; they abandoned this poſt, and pitched their camp near the abbey of Ghiaruola, three miles from Fornuovo, in a ſpecious plain, interſected by the river Taro, which, ruſhing down the mountains, empties itſelf into the Po. The poſition of their camp was ſuch, that the French could not purſue their march without being expoſed to the fire of their atillery, nor attack it without croſſing the Taro, the banks of which being ſteep, and full of willows, would have thrown their ſquadrons into diſorder. The plain was ſo ſpacious, that the whole army could, with eaſe, be drawn up in order of battle; they had laid in a ſufficient ſtock of proviſions to ſupply them for ſeveral months; and, in ſhort, all their meaſures appeared to be ſo well planned, that had the courage of the Italian troops proved equal to the ſkill and prudence of the generals, death or captivity muſt have been the inevitable fate of the French.

The mareſchal de Gie, who commanded the van of the French, had croſſed the Appenines ſeveral days before the reſt of the army, in order to ſecure the defiles. On his arrival at the village of Fornuovo, he perceived the enemy's camp, which covered a vaſt extent of ground; and after he had diſpatched a party to reconnoitre it, he ſent a herald to the general to demand a free paſſage for his troops, who only wiſhed to return in a peacable manner to France, and who would pay for all the proviſions they wanted. The arival of this herald threw the whole camp of the confederates into confuſion; they had hitherto perſuaded themſelves, that the report of their preparations, and the ſuperiority of their forces, would deter the king from attempting to croſs the Appenines. While he remained at Piſa, they believed that he would diſtribute the greater part of his troops in the different towns in Tuſcany, and would embark with the reſt at Leghorn, in order to return to France by ſea, in which caſe there was a fleet ſtationed to intercept him; when they received intelligence that he was marching towards the Appenines, they imagined that as ſoon as he reached the foot of the mountain, he would abandon his artillery and baggage, and endeavour to reach Montferrat by private roads, rather as a fugitive than a king; but when they found that a part of the army had already eſtabliſhed their quarters at Fornuovo, the conſternation became general: the reſiſtleſs impetuoſity of the French troops, the ſteady firmneſs of the Swiſs battalions, the dreadful fire of the artillery, all tended to ſtrike a panic into the Italians; but nothing tended to diſcourage them more than the reſolution of a ſmall body of determined men, who came to meet them from the fartheſt extremity of Italy, and who ſeemed to take a pleaſure in braving dangers and death. Even the leaders themſelves were not exempt from the terror which pervaded the troops: when they came to deliberate on the anſwer to be given to the hearld, the two Provvéditori, whom the ſenate of Venice had appointed to aſſiſt the marquis of Mantua with their advice, were of opinion, that ſince the French only aſked permiſſion to retire, in a peaceable manner, to their own country, they ought to be allowed a free paſſage.

After much diſcuſſion, it was at length agreed to inform the Venetian ſenate of the demand of the French, and to wait for their orders; but as it could not be expected they would arrive in time, the herald was diſmiſſed without an anſwer, and ſome companies of ſtradiotti were ſent to ſcour the country, and to drive in the enemy's out-poſts. Theſe ſtradiotti were a kind of light-horſe, compoſed entirely of Greeks, levied by the Venetians in the Peloponneſus, in Italy, and Epirus, and by them ſucceſsfully employed in their wars with the Turks; Commines tells us, they were very hardy, and that both men and horſes were accuſtomed to ſleep in the open air throughout the year. They had a barbarous mode of waging war, by cutting off the heads of their enemies; which they faſtened to the pommel of their ſaddle, and carried to the Venetian Provvéditori, who gave them a ducat for every head.

The mareſchal de Gié was fully aware of the danger of his ſituation; and after having, in vain, urged the king to haſten his march, he evacuated the village, and retired nearer to the mountains. It was determined, that the army ſhould march the next morning; that, on their arrival at the plain where the enemy were encamped, they ſhould fire a few pieces of cannon, and if the confederates did not leave their lines to attack them, they ſhould purſue their road.

Accordingly, on the ſixth of July, (1495) the king, clad in complete armour, drew up his troops in order of battle*. The van was compoſed of the flower of the army, and conſiſted of three hundred French lances, one hundred Italian lances, three thouſand Swiſs or Gaſcons, and three hundred archers of the king's guard. The centre was entruſted to the conduct of the lord of Trèmouille; and there the king fought in perſon, accompanied by his nine preux—viz. Mathew, baſtard of Bourbon; Lewis of Luxembourg, count of Ligni; Lewis d'Armagnac, count of Guiſe; Hallewin, lord of Piennes; Bonneval; d'Archiac; Galliot de Genouillac; Fraxinelles; and Baraſe: the rear was commanded by the viſcount of Narbonne, of the houſe of Foix. The centre and the rear being too weak to ſupport ſeparately, any formidable attack, marched ſo near each other as to be ready to afford reciprocal aſſiſtance. As no regular troops could be ſpared to guard the baggage, this care was entruſted to the workmen and followers of the army, who armed thmeſelves with axes and long ſwords, and compoſed a body of about two thouſand men. When the troops began to march, the king ſent for Commines, and ordered him to renew the negociation: "Sire," ſaid Commines; "I will do it moſt willingly, but I never ſaw too ſuch large companies ſo near to "each other, who parted without coming to blows." A herald was accordingly ſent to the Provvéditori, and Commines repaired, not without great danger, to the place appointed for the conference. The confederates were already drawn up within their lines, in order of battle, and had diſpatched ſome companies of ſtradiotti, to haraſs the French army. While the Provvéditori were conſidering what anſwer they ſhould give Commines, the French fired upon the ſtradiotti, who had advanced too near their ranks; upon which the French herald was immediately dimiſſed, accompanied by another from the Marquis of Mantua, who informed the king that a conference would be opened, provided he would ceaſe to fire.—This was a ſtratagem adopted by the confederates merely for the purpoſe of reconnoitring the French, that they might know where to direct their principal attack; and might likewiſe diſcover where the king himſelf was ſtationed, and what diſtinctive marks he bore, by which he might be known in the heat of the action. The French, not ſuſpecting this treachery, admitted the herald into the ranks, and did not diſcover their error till they obſerved that he examined the king's perſon with peculiar attention. To avert the ill effects of this imprudence, the nine preux put on armour exactly ſimilar to that which the king wore. As ſoon as the enemy had obtained all the information they deſired, they left their camp, and advanced with confidence towards the French; their troops were ſo diſpoſed, that if they ſucceeded in breaking the firſt ranks, it would be impoſſible for a man to eſcape them. The marquis of Mantua, commander in chief, who was aſſiſted by his uncle, Rodolfo Gonzaga, detached a company of ſtradiotti, ſupported by a body of croſs-bowmen, and a company of men at arms, to attack the baggage, and take poſſeſſion of the village of Fornuovo. The marquis himſelf, with ſix hundred men at arms, and their archers, five thouſand infantry, and fifteen hundred ſtradiotti, croſſed the Taro behind the army, with the view to attack the rear, and then fall upon the centre. He left a conſiderable body of troops on the oppoſite banks of the river, under the command of Antonio da Montefeltro, natural ſon to the duke d'Urbino, who had orders to croſs the ſtream, and take the enemy in flank, as ſoon he ſhould receive a courier from Rodolfo Gonzaga. At the ſame time, the count of Gaiazzo, general of the Milaneſe forces, croſſed the Taro in front of the French army, with four thouſand men at arms, and two thouſand infantry, leaving, on the oppoſite ſide, Annibale di Bentivoglis, with two hundred men at arms, who were to join him as ſoon as they ſhould ſee him engaged with the van of the French, commanded by the mareſchal de Gié. Two companies of men at arms, and one thouſand foot, were left to guard the camp, under the conduct of the Venetian Provvéditori.

The marquis of Mantua diſplayed great courage in his attack on the rear of the French; which was no ſooner engaged than the baſtard of Bourbon galloped to the centre, and called to the king to advance. Charles accordingly haſtened to his aſſiſtance with the centre-diviſion: the firſt ſhock was dreadful: in an inſtant the ground was covered with broken lances, and knights unhorſed. Charles fought in the foremoſt ranks with ſuch little precaution, that the enemy ſeized his horſe's bridle, and the baſtard of Bourbon was made priſoner at his ſide. In the heat of the action, the French perceived that body of ſtradiotti which had been ſent to pillage the baggage, and ſeize the village of Fornuovo, returning to camp with their booty; and fifteen hundred of their comrades, whom the Marquis of Mantua had taken with him to attack the enemy with their ſabres, as ſoon as their ranks ſhould be broken by the men at arms, allured by the proſpect of plunder, haſtened to join them. Another accident, equally fortunate for the French, alſo occured; Rodolfo Gonzaga, who was to have ſent orders to Montealtro to advance with his corps-de-reſerve, was thrown from his horſe, and cruſhed to death. The Italian men at arms who accompanied the marquis, after they had broken their lances, and defended themſelves for a ſhort time with their ſabres, finding themſelves unſupported, fled with precipitation, and were purſued by the French, who put all they could overtake to the ſword. The king ought either to have reſtrained the ardour of his troops, or elſe to have followed them; but neglecting to adopt either of theſe precautions, he was left on the field of battle, accompanied only by his valet-de-chambre, where he remained about a quarter of an hour at a conſiderable diſtance from the van of his army. While his troops were intent on purſuing the fugitives, he had nearly been taken by a company of Italian men at arms, who, having been routed at the beginning of the action, had retreated to the banks of the river, whence, ſeeing the field clear, they now ventured to return. Charles defended himſelf, for a long time, with extreme valour, but he muſt inevitably have fallen into the power of the enemy, but for the timely return of a part of his troops.

While the rear was engaged, the count di Gaiazzo attacked the van, but leſs from the hope of defeating it than with the view to prevent it from affording any aſſiſtance to the centre, againſt which the principal attack was to be directed. His men at arms, uuable to withſtand the impetuous courage of the French, and alarmed at the loſs of Giovanni Piccinino and Galeazzo da Coreggio, two of their moſt celebrated captains, took to flight; and if the mareſchal de Gié had purſued them, the victory would have been complete; but perceiving a corps-de-reſerve on the oppoſite ſide of the river, and ignorant as yet of what had paſſed in the centre and rear, he prudently checked the zeal of his troops, and remained where he was.

The action did not laſt more than an hour. The confederates loſt three thouſand five hundred men, among whom were many perſons of diſtinction, while the loſs of the French did not amount to two hundred, and the baſtard of Bourbon, and Julian de Bourgneuf, captain of the king's guards, were the only officers miſſing.

Charles, afraid that the enemy might be tempted to avail themſelves of the ſcarcity of proviſions which prevailed in his camp, to prevent his departure, thought it prudent to decamp in the night. The confederates were not appriſed of his departure till the next day at noon; and when they attempted to purſue him, they found the river Taro ſo ſwelled with the rain which had fallen the two preceding days, that it was not poſſible to ford it in any part. Fortune, however, furniſhed them with a fine opportunity of revenge, if they had had but courage to ſeize it: the king, after croſſing the river Trebia, left, on the oppoſite ſide, two hundred lances, a part of the Swiſs, and all his artillery; as the river was ſhallow, it was not ſuppoſed there could be any danger in thus dividing the army for the greater convenience of lodging. But the ſame accident which had ſwollen the waters of the Taro, occaſioned a flood at the Trebia; and, had the enemy appeared, one part of the army muſt have ſeen the other part maſſacred without the ability to aſſiſt them. They fortunately eſcaped for the fright, and after a toilſome march of five days, entered the Tortoneſe, when the enemy left them, and went to join the army which was employed in the ſiege of Novara.

The army croſſed Montferrat, and, after ſuſtaining incredible fatigue, reached in ſafety the town of Aſt, where they found the body of troops which had been ſent againſt Genoa, and ſome freſh reinforcements from France, under the command of the prince of Orange.

Of ſeven thouſand men, whom he had taken with him to Novara, two thouſand had periſhed with hunger, and the reſt were reduced to the laſt extremity.—It was neceſſary, therefore, to wait for a reinforcement, before any attempt could be made with the leaſt proſpect of ſucceſs. Charles accordingly ſent the bailiff of Dijon to the Swiſs, while he advanced with his troops to Trino, as well for the greater convenience of ſending convoys to Novara, as for the purpoſe of viſiting a beautiful young woman, named Anna Solara, at whoſe father's houſe he had lodged on his road to Naples; and whoſe affections he had then found means to engage.

During his ſtay at Trino, an officer arrived from the pope, commanding him, under pain of excommunication, to leave Italy in ten days; and to withdraw, within a given term, which he ſpecified, all the troops which he had left in the kingdom of Naples, or elſe to repair to Rome in perſon, in order to give an account of his conduct. "I am much ſurpriſed," replied the king, "that the holy father, not having condeſcended to wait for me at Rome, when I went thither for the purpoſe of devoutly kiſſing his feet, ſhould now expreſs ſuch impatience to ſee me there! You will tell him, that I think of opening myſelf a paſſage to him once more, and that I moſt urgently intreat him to have the complaiſance to wait for me this time, that I may not perform the journey for nothing." The officer, who had been extremely averſe from taking charge of ſuch a commiſſion, was very happy to find that the king made it a ſubject for laughter. The pope's deſire, however, to witneſs the evacuation of the kingdom of Naples by the French troops, was ſoon accompliſhed. Ferdinand the Second, emerging from his retreat, aſſiſted by the Spaniſh troops, under Gonſalvo Ernandez, ſurnamed The Great Captain, returned again in triumph to his capital. The French, indeed, under the conduct of the conſtable d'Aubigny, gained an uſeleſs victory, and maintained their reputation for national valour; the count of Montpenſier, ſurrendered Naples after an obſtinate defence; and Capua, Averſa, and Otranto, returned to their allegiance.

Charles received this intelligence at Trino, and though to relieve the duke of Orleans, was the firſt object to be accompliſhed, ſtill he did not neglect to take ſome ſteps for the recovery of Naples: unable at this period, to ſpare any troops for that purpoſe, he concluded a treaty with the republic of Florence, which, had it been duly obſerved, might have been productive of the greateſt advantage. The Florentine miniſters had perſiſted in following the king, notwithſtanding the mortifications to which they were continually expoſed; Charles, however, now determined to give them full ſatisfaction, and a treaty was concluded.

The king, on his part, diſpatched the moſt poſitive orders to the governors, whom he had left in the different towns in Tuſcany, to reſtore thoſe towns, without delay, to the commiſſioners appointed by the republic to take poſſeſſion of them. Theſe firſt orders never reached the place of their deſtination: the fiorentine ambaſſador to whom they were entruſted, thought he might croſs the duchy of Milan in ſafety, as the republic were not at war with Ludovico; but that uſurper, in violation of the law of nations, ſtopped him, ſeized his papers, and informed the inhabitants of Piſa of the danger to which they were about to be expoſed, unleſs they would conſent to receive aſſiſtance from him. The Florentines were reduced to the neceſſity of applying for freſh orders, which were ſent, but badly executed. The count of Ligni ſecretly adviſed the governors to find ſome pretext for evading them, promiſing to juſtify their conduct to the king. Saillant was the only officer who refuſed to be concerned in this infamous manœuvre; he reſtored the port and citadel of Leghorn, where he commanded, to the Florentine commiſſioners. Charles, appriſed of theſe infamous proceedings, ordered, as a mark of his diſpleaſure, the count of Ligni's bed to be removed from his chamber, and he paſſed a ſentence of baniſhment upon Entragues. His reſentment, however, ſoon ſubſided; unable to ſupport the abſence of his favourite, he recalled him in a ſhort time, and the firſt uſe which Ligni made of the influence he had recovered over his maſter, was to procure a pardon for Etragues, and all his accomplices. The unhappy Florentines, who were deſpoiled of their towns, and the thouſands of brave men who had been left in the kingdom of Naples, were the only people who ſuffered for the king's weakneſs.

From Trino the army advanced to Vercelli, a town which had long been annexed to the duchy of Milan; Philip Maria Viſconte had ceded it to the duke of Savoy, in order to detach him from a powerful league which had been formed againſt him; but he had expreſsly ſtipulated that it ſhould obſerve a ſtrict neutrality in all the wars which ſhould be undertaken againſt the duchy of Milan. As ſoon as he was in poſſeſſion of the town, he eſtabliſhed poſts within a mile of Novara. He had not been long there, before a few companies of Swiſs arrived with intelligence, that a large army of their countrymen might be expected in a ſhort time. The king, hitherto victorious, and commanding his army in perſon, deemed it derogatory to his dignity to ſue for an accommodation; while the confederates, who acted in the name of the pope and of the emperor, and who, moreover, were afraid, by betraying their inquietude, of rendering the French more difficult in their terms, wiſhed not to treat till famine and deſpair had delivered the firſt prince of the blood into their hands. Chance, however, reſolved the difficulty. After the death of the marchioneſs of Montferrat, ſome diſputes aroſe relative to the guardianſhip of her ſon, who was then a minor; and the ſtates of the country, dreading the conſequences of this diviſion, obliged the competitors to chuſe the king for their umpire. Charles being unable to take the commiſſion upon himſelf, ſent Commines to provide for the ſafety of the young prince, and to promote the eſtabliſhment of concord.

This able miniſter, finding at the court of Montferrat a gentleman in the ſervice of the Marquis of Mantua, entered into converſation with him, and expreſſed his aſtoniſhment at the infatuation of his maſter, in not perceiving that by contributing to the elevation of the Venetians, he was promoting his own ruin. As he found from the gentleman's anſwer, that the marquis himſelf was aware of this circumſtance, and that notwithſtanding his title of generaliſſimo, he would willingly accede to any propoſal for an accommodation; Commines took upon himſelf to write to the Venetian Provvéditori, offering to renew the conferences which had been opened on the banks of the Taro. His propoſal was accepted, and a place appointed for the meeting of the plenipotentiaries; but the perſon employed, by theſe artful politicians, who were ſincerely deſirous of peace, to make the firſt overtures, was the moſt improper man for the purpoſe they could poſſibly have choſen: this was the count Albertino Boſchetto, a ſubject and intimate friend of the duke of Ferrara, who, having been deſpoiled of a part of his dominions, by the Venetians, was anxious to promote their humiliation, as the only means of repairing the loſſes he had ſuſtained.

Albertino, after he had delivered his commiſſion at a public audience, had a private interview with the king, in which he exhorted him not to grant any of the articles he had been ſent to demand; declaring, that the confederates trembled in their camp, and that, on the firſt motion of the French army to attack them, they would fly with precipitation. Commines, la Trémouille, and the prince of Orange, oppoſed it with ſuch warmth, that the king determined to ſend ſafe-conducts for the plenipotentiaries, who, on the part of the confederates, were the marquis of Mantua, Bernardo Contarini, and Franceſco Bernardino Viſconte: and, on the part of the French, the prince of Orange, mareſchal de Gié, the lord of Piennes, and Philip de Commines. The fear that the Swiſs might arrive, and induce the king to change his mind, engaged the plenipotentiaries to accelerate their proceedings. In the very firſt conference, a truce for ten days was agreed on, and permiſſion given to the duke of Orleans to leave Novara, but wholly unaccompanied, and on condition that if no treaty ſhould be concluded, he ſhould return in the ſame manner*. As the duke was to paſs through the camp of the confederates, the marquis of Mantua offered himſelf as a hoſtage for his ſafety, and accordingly repaired to the French camp. The principal nobility conſiſted in perſuading the garriſon of Novara to conſent to this arrangement; reduced to the moſt wretched ſituation, and expoſed to all the horrors of famine, they were afraid, that after the departure of the firſt prince of the blood, they ſhould be totally neglected and forgotten. In vain did the duke promiſe, either to effect their relief in the courſe of three days, or return to ſhare in their fate; they would not conſent to his departure, until mareſchal de Gié ſent his nephew, the marquis of Rochefort, as a hoſtage for his return. Three days after, it was agreed that the French ſhould march out of the place with their arms and baggage; that the defence of the town ſhould be left to the citizens; and that only thirty French troops ſhould remain in the citadel, which they were to hold in the name of the duke of Orleans. The wretched remains of the garriſon of Novara, exhauſted with ſickneſs, famine, and fatigue, accordingly retired from the ſcene of their miſery, and joined their countrymen.

During theſe tranſactions the Swiſs arrived, under the conduct of the bailiff of Dijon, but, inſtead of eight or ten thouſand men which the king expected, he was much ſurpriſed at finding, that he had now under his command, including the Swiſs whom he had brought with him from Naples, and thoſe which he had juſt received from Novara, no leſs than two-and-twenty thouſand troops of that nation. Their attachment to the French, and more than that, the hopes of enriching themſelves with the ſpoils of Lombardy, had made them flock to the army in crouds. The king, and the chief nobility of France, were now left at the diſcretion of theſe mercenary troops; the only precaution that could be adopted was to ſtation them at different poſts, at a diſtance from each other, and the exertion of great prudence was requiſite to prevent them from perceiving the motive of ſuch precaution.

The duke of Orleans was the only perſon who exulted in the cauſe of this alarm; and his exultation proceeded from the conviction that the ducal crown of Milan could not eſcape him, if his attempts for defeating the negociations for peace ſhould be crowned with ſucceſs. Charles, in conſideration of the danger to which the duke of Orleans was expoſed, had had the generoſity to forget the juſt grounds for complaint which the duke had afforded him; but he had no inclination to expoſe his life, and the ſafety of his army, in purſuit of a conqueſt of which that prince would reap all the advantages, and which might, perhaps, only ſerve to render him more untractable. The duke, perceiving that he could not ſucceed by this means, had recourſe to the Swiſs, whom he exhorted to inſiſt on coming to action, aſſuring them that the king would not dare to reject their demand. This ſeditious meaſure came to the knowledge of the prince of Orange, who, foreſeeing the fatal conſequences to which it might lead, thought it his duty to inform the king of it. A council was accordingly aſſembled, where diſputes ran ſo high, that the leaders of the different parties had nearly proceeded to blows. The duke of Orleans, enraged at the prince of Orange, forgot himſelf ſo far as publicly to give him the lie. Charles, however, interpoſed his authority, and put a ſtop to the quarrel. The negociations were carried on with great eagerneſs on both ſides. So long as the evacuation of Novara had been the only object of diſcuſſion, the duke of Milan had entruſted every thing to his miniſters; but as ſoon as the concluſion of a treaty of peace became the ſubject for debate, he attended the conferences in perſon, accompanied by his ducheſs, in whom he placed great confidence, and whoſe advice he followed on moſt occaſions.

With regard to the town of Novara, no difficulty occurred; the French agreed to give it up, but they demanded, in return, the abſolute ſovereignty of the city of Genoa, which had formerly belonged to France, and the government whereof

Lewis the Eleventh had ceded to the dukes of Milan, on condition of paying homage to the crown of France. It was maintained that Ludovico, by waging war againſt his lord paramount, had forfeited his fief; but that prince, who was endeavouring to extend his domains, and who had juſt ſent a body of auxiliaries to Piſa, in order to obtain poſſeſſion of that town under pretence of defending it, peremptorily refuſed to give up his claims to Genoa. He endeavoured to excuſe his late conduct, by the neceſſity to which he was reduced of ſecuring himſelf againſt the threats and intrigues of the duke of Orleans. Finding the French extremely impatient to return to their own country, this treacherous prince at length conſented to make all the promiſes required of him; and ſo far impoſed on the credulity of the plenipotentiaries, as to induce them to accept ſuch ſlender ſecurity.

The treaty was ſigned by the king and the duke of Milan, on the tenth of October, the very day on which the conditions were ſettled by the plenipotentiaries. The reaſon of this haſte ſoon appeared; for the Swiſs, enraged at being diſappointed in their hopes of plunder, and ſecretly inſtigated by the partiſans of the duke of Orleans, aſſembled in a tumultuous manner; when ſome of the moſt violent among them propoſed to ſeize the king, and all the principal nobility, carry them to Switzerland, and keep them there till they ſhould conſent to procure their liberty by the payment of ſuch ranſoms as the Swiſs might think proper to exact. Others, rejecting this perfidious advice, propoſed only to inſiſt on receiving three months' pay, in conformity to a treaty by which Lewis the Eleventh had engaged to allow them ſo much whenever he ſhould require them to march out of the limits of their own country. They began by ſeizing the bailiff of Dijon and Lornai, and by entering, in great numbers, the town of Vercelli. The king, appriſed of their conduct, fled with precipitation to Trino; but as he could not with the ſame facility take off his artillery and baggage, he was reduced to the neceſſity of compounding with the Swiſs, and of giving them ſecurity for the payment of the ſum they demanded. Harmony was then re-eſtabliſhed, and all the treaties that ſubſiſted between the two powers were renewed; after which the king took the road to France.

A. D. 1496.] Ferdinand of Arragon, profiting by the abſence of the French troops, had aſſembled all his forces in the province of Rouſſillon. He firſt attempted to ſurpriſe the caſtle of Son, which commands an entrance into the kingdom of Navarre; and had he ſucceeded in this attempt, it is highly probable he would have immediately taken that kingdom from Catharine of Foix, and her huſband, John d'Albret. Being compelled to deſiſt from his enterpriſe, he made an incurſion into Languedoc, and laid waſte the environs of Carcaſſonne and Narbonne. The duke of Bourbon ſent to its defence all the regular troops which he had at his diſpoſal, under the command of Guichard d'Albon, lord of Sainte-André, and la Roche-Aimon, his lieutenants, with orders to remain on the defenſive, and to ſtrengthen the fortifications of Narbonne, which he was fearful the Spaniards would attempt to ſecure. Alain d'Albret, father to the king of Navarre, was ordered to convoke the ban and arriere-ban of Gaſcony, and to cover that frontier: things were in this ſituation when the king returned from Italy.—Saint-André having then received a conſiderable reinforcement which made his army amount to eighteen thauſand men, advanced into Rouſſillon, took by aſſult, and reduced to aſhes, the town of Salces (which Ferdinand had converted into an arſenal) almoſt in ſight of the Spaniſh army, which, though more numerous than the French, did not dare to venture on action. Ferdinand, aſtoniſhed at the rapid progreſs of the French arms, and afraid of loſing the province of Rouſſillon, feigned an extreme anxiety for the concluſion of a peace, and ſent to demand a truce, that the plenipotentiaries might aſſemble for the purpoſe of bringing the treaty to a ſpeedy termination. Charles, who daily received bad accounts of his troops in Italy, willingly acceeded to the propoſition.

Since his return to France, the only forces he had been able to ſend to the relief of Naples were eight hundred lanſquenets, which had been leived in the dominions of the duke of Gueldres. The veſſels appointed to convey them to the place of deſtination had formed a junction with a French fleet that lay in the harbour of Leghorn; but before the arrived at Nables, they received inteligence that the caſtles had ſurrendered to Ferdinand. The fleet then proceeded to Gaietta, were three thouſand men diſembarked, with plenty of ammunition, and joined the count of Montpenſier, who now wanted nothing but money. This, however, he was unable to procure, and Fereinand having received conſiderable reinforcements from the Venetians, followed him from place to place, and at length compelled him to capitulate at Aella, on condition that he ſupplied him with veſſels to tranſport his troops to France. A neglect, however, on the part of the govenors of the different towns, to comply with the orders of Montpenſier, who had conſented to a total evacuation of the kingdom of Naples, furniſhed Ferdinand with a pretext for refuſing to fulfil, on his part, the conditions of the cipitulation; the troops were, therefore, ſent to the ſmall iſland of Procioa, were moſt of them died of a contagious diſorder.

While theſe things were paſſing in the kingdom of Naples, Stephen de Veſc, who had, ſome time before, been diſpatched to France by Montpenſier, exhorted the king to ſend, without delay, a ſtrong renforcement of troops to the aſſiſtance of that nobleman. Charles was anxious to comply with his requeſt; the council evinced a ſimilar diſpoſition; and even thoſe who had been moſt ſtrenuous in their oppoſition to the former expedition, were of opinion that a new armament ſhould be immediately equiped. But though France did not want ſoldiers, ſhe had neither ſhips nor money. To obviate this laſt inconvenience, the king ſuſpended the payment of all penſions, and even the ſalaries of his officers, till after his return from Italy: he had then recourſe to the uſal expedients for raiſing money, by encreaſing the taxes, by opening loans, and by anticipations on the revenue; and laſtly he demanded from the principal towns the neceſſary contributions for the equipment of a fleet.

The city of Paris had been rated at a hundred thauſand crowns. The municipal officers deſired, that if the tax took place, it ſhould be equally levied on every claſs of citizens; and they entreated the parliament to ſend a certain number of deputies to the municipal aſſembly at the town-houſe. The court replied, that they ſhould not ſend any body, and only promiſed to aſſiſt the municipal officers with their advice, in caſe they came to conſult them; and the magiſtrates availed themſelves of this refuſal of the parliament to offer the king only fifty thouſand livres. Charles, who, in his preſent ſituation, could not conſent to ſo material a diminution, ſent Philip of Luxembourg, cardinal of Mons; the lord of Albret; admiral de Graville; and William of Poictiers, lord of Clérieux, to the parliament. Theſe miniſters declared to the court it was the king's pleaſure, that the members of the parliament ſhould, for this time only, contribute with the reſt of the citizens; but the parliament perſiſted in their oppoſition, and many other towns in the kingdom followed their example.

The duke of Orleans, who was to have commanded the main body of the army, being diſcontented with the laſt treaty with the duke of Milan, and knowing that France was ſtill negociating with the uſurper, exerted all his influence and credit to put a ſtop to the expedition. Thus, though he expreſſed his readineſs to obey the king's orders, he gave riſe to numerous difficulties, and betrayed a ſtrong repugnance to undertake the commiſſion with which he was charged.

The king himſelf, at the very moment when every body expected him to begin his march to Italy, ſuddenly took the road to Tours, in order to viſit, before his departure, the tombs of Saint-Martin and Saint-Denis. It was ſuſpected, however, that love rather than devotion was the object of this pilgrimage; and a report was propagated, that during his reſidence at Lyons, where he had paſſed a year on his return from Italy, having become deſperately enamoured of a maid of quality, attached to the queen, he would not quit the kingdom without bidding her adieu. Be that as it may, Charles, after paſſing ſome days at the caſtle of Pleſſis-les-Tours, repaired to Saint-Denis, and the Pariſians, expecting a viſit from him, prepared to receive him with the greateſt magnificence; but diſpleaſed with their late refuſal to ſupply him with money, he refuſed to honour the town with his preſence. He even intended to carry his vengeance ſtill farther: as he imputed to the parliament the reſiſtance he had experienced from the municipal officers, he formed a plan for inſtituting a new parliament at Poictiers, and to extend its juriſdiction over the provinces of Poitou, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, La Marche, Aunis, and Angoumois. The Poictevins, appriſed of his intentions, were extremely earneſt in their ſolicitations to the king to put them in execution; but Robert Briſſonet, the chancellor, who, through the credit of his brother, had ſucceeded the celebrated William de Rochfort, eluded their demand, and at length induced the king to give up the deſign.

The report of the preparations making by the French excited a general fermentation in Italy. The Venetians and the duke of Milan, who had joined in deceiving the king, began to harbour ſuſpicions of each other; but the expected arrival of the French induced them to ſuſpend their mutual jealouſy, and an union, cemented by fear, rather tended to confirm than diminiſh their mutual hatred. Ludovico, whoſe territories was deſtined to become the theatre of war, repreſented to the Venetians that the preſence of the emperor would be abſolutely neceſſary, to ſave them from the fury of the French; and he offered to defray one half of his expences. The Venetians conſidered Maximilian as a dangerous protector, on account of the pretenſions of the empire, and of the houſe of Auſtria, to part of their dominions.——They appointed ambaſſadors to accompany Ludovico's to the Imperial court, and promiſed the emperor ſixty thouſand ducats, for levying an army, and for ſupporting it during three months. Maximilian, after receiving a part of this money, evinced no diſpoſition to fulfil his engagements, and, in a ſhort time, demanded an addition of thirty thouſand ducats to the ſtipulated ſum. The Venetians, who had been led againſt their will, to contract the firſt engagement, openly rejected this new demand. Ludovico, however, undertook to pay the additional ſum himſelf, in the hope of facilitating, by that means, the acquiſition of the ſovereignty of Piſa.

The emperor, at length, made his appearance, but with an army that neither correſponded to his engagements, nor to his dignity. Perſuaded that he had only to iſſue his orders to enſure inſtant obedience from all the Italian ſtates, he ſummoned the duke of Savoy and the marquis of Montferrat to attend him, but though thoſe princes held fiefs of the empire, they, nevertheleſs, refuſed to obey the citation: the duke of Ferrara, himſelf, though father-in-law to Ludovico, refuſed to hold any commerce with the emperor, under pretext that being appointed a kind of umpire between the French and the Milaneſe, he ought not to take any ſtep that might render him an object of ſuſpicion to either party. Laſtly, the Venetians, far from affording that aſſiſtance which he had expected to receive from them, endeavoured to fruſtrate all his undertakings: compelled to renounce the flattering hopes which he had built on a ſandy foundation, Maximilian began to perceive that he was expoſing himſelf to the ridicule and deriſion of the neighouring powers. Ludovico propoſed to him, as the laſt reſource, to offer himſelf as an umpire between the Piſans and Florentines; he repreſented to him that the Venetians, having no claim to the city of Piſa, could not poſſibly refuſe to ſurrender that place into his hands; and, that the Florentines, too weak to reſiſt, of themſelves, the forces of the empire, and thoſe of the confederates, would be compelled to ſubmit to his arbitration. Ludovico flattered himſelf, that if Piſa were once delivered to the emperor, he ſhould find it an eaſy matter, either by money or intrigues, to obtain poſſeſſion of it himſelf. The Venetians, aware of his deſigns, accepted the proffered mediation of Maximilian, but, at the ſame time, took care to preſerve a ſuperiority, in point of forces, in Piſa; and they hoped that, if the emperor ſhould ſucceed in procuring, as he had promiſed, for the Piſans, the reſtitution of Leghorn, both that place, and Piſa itſelf, would, after his departure, fall into their hands, and render their power as much reſpected on thoſe coaſts, as it already was on their own gulph.——They ſtrengthened the fortifications of Leghorn, and applied to the French for aſſiſtance. The event proved the wiſdom of their precautions: the emperor, repairing to Genoa, there embarked a part of his army, on board a fleet that was deſtined to attack Leghorn by ſea, while he himſelf, with the remainder of his troops, made an aſſault on the town by land. But the arrival of a little ſquadron of the French ſhips, under the command of Hugh d'Amboiſe, baron d'Aubijoux, enabled the Florentines to repel his attacks. The emperor was compelled to raiſe the ſiege, and, filled with indignation againſt the Venetians, to whom he aſcribed the failure of his enterpriſe, he retired, with precipitation, into Germany, leaving a part of his troops with the duke of Milan.

Since the capitulation of Atella, and the death of Montpenſier, the French had been unable to reſiſt the ſucceſsful exertions of Ferdinand. The governors of the few places in the kingdom of Naples, which ſtill remained in poſſeſſion of the French, being deprived of all communication with each other, and ſurrounded on every ſide by a ſuperior force, only ſought, by reſiſtance, to retard their defeat for a few days, and to deſerve the ſterile honour of being the laſt to ſurrender*. But before Ferdinand could behold the complete reduction of his dominions, he himſelf, expired, crowned with glory. The deſire of cementing his alliance with the court of Spain, had led him to contract a marriage with his aunt, Jane of Arragon, daughter to his grandfather, Ferdinand, by a ſiſter of Ferdinand the Catholic. He was ſucceeded in his dominions by his uncle, Frederic, who, in a tide of uninterrupted ſucceſs, ſwept away the few remaining garriſons of France which had eſcaped the arms of Ferdinand.

A. D. 1497.] So long as any of his ſubjects remained in the kingdom of Naples, Charles, by nature magnanimous, had thought his honour intereſted in their defence; even after that conqueſt had eſcaped him, he formed a project for recovering it, by making himſelf maſter of ſuch places as might enable him to eſtabliſh a communication between Naples and France. Having diſmiſſed a great part of the army he had aſſembled the preceeding year, he ſent the remainder into Lombardy, under the command of Triulzi. His choice of a general, who was highly reſpected in the Milaneſe, and the excellence of his troops, made Ludovico tremble for his ſafety; and it is probable that this little army would have ſufficed to puniſh him for his paſt treachery, had Triulzi been at liberty to direct its operations as he pleaſed; but Charles, knowing that all the conqueſts he might make in the Milaneſe would prove advantageous to the duke of Orleans, whom he had juſt diſgraced, had rendered him, in a manner, ſubſervient to the cardinal San Pietro di Vincola, and Batiſtino Fregoſo, who promiſed to introduce the French into the city of Genoa; the poſſeſſion of which, the king conſidered as an object of greater importance. Triulzi, therefore, was compelled to divide his army into three bodies: the firſt, reduced the town of Novi, by which means the communication was ſtopped between Genoa and Milan: the ſecond diviſion, took poſſeſſion of Ventimiglia; while Triulzi reduced the important fortreſs of Boſco, and kept all the forces of the duchy of Milan in awe: each of the three diviſions, acting ſeparately, was too weak to attempt any enterpriſe of importance.

During theſe tranſactions in Italy, Charles continued to negociate with the Spaniſh monarch, in order to detach him from the confederacy of the Italian ſtates. Ferdinand the Catholic now employed againſt France the ſame inſidious policy which Lewis the Eleventh had exerted againſt Don Juan of Arragon. Without making any direct oppoſition to the king's projects, he kept him in ſuſpence, and ſought to amuſe him till ſuch times as all his Italian conqueſts ſhould be taken from him. In a conference which Ferdinand had with William of Poitiers, lord of Clérieux, he propoſed a means of effecting a pacification between the two crowns; by joining their arms to reduce the kingdom of Naples, and then to divide the conqueſt betwen them; Ferdinand ſaid, that he would be contented with Calabria for his ſhare. This propoſal appeared too advantageous to be ſincere; and as the French court were of opinion, that the king of Spain had impoſed on the credulity of De Clérieux, they ſent Du Bouchage to diſcover his real intentions. Ferdinand, when preſſed for an explanation, by this new ambaſſador, did not deny that he had mentioned the ſubject, but, on reflection, he had found that the plan he propoſed would be attended with ſo many obſtacles, that it would not be prudent to attempt its execution.

Now that Charles had ſecured himſelf from the dread of interruption from the neighbouring powers, he again turned his thoughts to Italy. The ambition of the Venetians, and the rapid encreaſe of their power, had inſpired all the ſtates in their vicinity with alarm. The Florentines, deſpairing to regain poſſeſſion of Piſa, without the aſſiſtance of the French, were urgent in their ſolicitations to Charles to repaſs the Alps; and promiſed to equip an army of eight hundred men at arms, and five thouſand infantry, which they deſired the conſtable, d'Aubigny, might be ſent to command*. The marquis of Mantua, who had commanded the Venetian forces, and rendered them ſuch eſſential ſervice in the conqueſt of Naples, diſguſted with their ingratitude, and trembling for the ſafety of his own territories, offered to ſupply the king with three hundred men at arms: the duke of Ferrara promiſed him five hundred men at arms, and two thouſand infantry; and ſeveral other petty princes engaged to join the confederacy. The pope himſelf—though little reliance could be placed on his word—affirmed that he only waited for the king's arrival to declare in his favour. Thus, in Italy alone, a force might have been levied, at a trifling expence, to counterbalance that of the league; and if the French had appeared in Italy at this period, nothing could have impeded their progreſs. The king, flattered by theſe appearances, felt his firſt ardour revive; he openly confeſſed the faults he had committed in his laſt expedition; and he employed himſelf in the formation of new plans, but the depoſition of Ludovico ſhould have formed the baſis of all his projects, and he was unwilling to render ſuch an eſſential ſervice to the duke of Orleans: beſides, it was impoſſible to ſucceed without money, and the debts he had already contracted rendered it difficult to procure any. Cardinal Briſſonet, general of the finances, purpoſely enhanced theſe difficulties, in order to deter him from the enterpriſe. Charles, in this emergency, applied to the Florentines for a loan of one hundred and fifty thouſand ducats, and experienced a refuſal. This imprudent ſtep deſtroyed his credit in Italy; the duke of Ferrara, notwithſtanding his attachment to the French, was fearful of truſting to them for protection, and therefore delivered the citadel of Genoa to the duke of Milan; while the king, paſſing at once from the extreme of enthuſiaſm to perfect indifference, laid aſide all thoughts of Italy for the preſent, and applied himſelf entirely to the regulation of the internal government of the kingdom.

Charles the Seventh had, by an ordonnance, appointed cuſtomary laws in every province in France to be collected and arranged: Lewis the Eleventh renewed the injunction; bur this ſalutary undertaking not having been executed by either of theſe monarchs, Charles the Eighth now determined to complete it; for which purpoſe, he iſſued orders to the different bailiwicks, to chuſe a certain number of perſons, moſt diſtinguiſhed for their knowledge and abilities in the three orders of the ſtate, who were to extract, from memorials ſupplied by the mayors and aldermen of the different towns, the cuſtoms and privileges which prevailed in each diſtrict; he appointed commiſſioners to ſuperintend this work, and when it was far advanced, he addreſſed letters-patent to Thibaut Baillet, preſident of the parliament of Paris, and ſome other magiſtrates, enjoining them to enforce the publication in every bailliwick and ſénéchauſſée, of the laws appointed to prevail there; in caſe of diſpute, appeal was to be made to ſuch commiſſion, unleſs the object of diſpute was of ſuch importance as to render it difficult to be decided, in which caſe the parties were to be referred to the parliament. Charles the Eighth, however, had not time to finiſh this work, which, though continued by his ſucceſſors, was not entirely completed till the reign of Charles the Ninth.

The ſtates of Tours had entreated the king to enſure a fixed and permanent form to the great council, at which the chancellor had hitherto been accuſtomed to preſide, aſſiſted only by a few maſters of requeſts, bailiffs, ſeneſchals, and other officers of the crown, who happened to be at court. It often happened that there were not counſellors ſufficient to proceed to buſineſs; at other times the ſame cauſe was tried before different judges, and thoſe who heard only the latter part of it were called upon to decide, without being competent to the taſk.—Notwithſtanding the remonſtrances and ſolicitations of the ſtates, this abuſe was ſuffered to ſubſiſt till the preſent period, when Charles attempted a remedy by the creation of ſeventeen counſellors, who, together with the chancellor and maſters of requeſts, compoſed the great council, and decided in all cauſes that were brought before that tribunal. Theſe counſellors had ſtated ſalaries aſſigned them, and were only obliged to reſide at court ſix months in the year.

A. D. 1498.] A total revolution appears to have taken place in the manners and diſpoſition of Charles; who, quitting thoſe ſcenes of diſſipation which he had long been accuſtomed to frequent, and foregoing his taſte for illicit enjoyments, now applied himſelf, excluſively, to the cares of government. He reſolved, in imitation of ſome of his anceſtors, to adminiſter juſtice to his ſubjects in perſon; and having received, from the chamber of accompts, the neceſſary informations with regard to the forms obſerved, on theſe occaſions, by his ſubjects, he granted audiences to every perſon requiring it, liſtened to all complaints, and gave immediate anſwers to all petitions that were preſented to him. By this means he diſcovered a variety of abuſes, and acts of oppreſſion, committed by his officers in the provinces; and the puniſhments he inflicted on the culprits tended greatly to the relief of the people.

The next object which attracted the attention of the king, was the extreme ignorance of the clergy, and the inattention of the biſhops to the duties of their office; more intent on obtaining a plurality of benefices than improving the morals of their flocks, or enforcing a propriety of conduct in the inferior eccleſiaſtics entruſted to their care, they ſeldom reſided in their dioceſes: hence the lower clergy had become indolent, and were infected with thoſe vices which indolence too often engenders, thereby rendering their profeſſion contemptible, and expoſing religion itſelf to the deriſion of the vulgar.—Anxious to reform this abuſe, the king conſulted the Pariſian doctors on the extent of his power, with regard to the alterations in eccleſiaſtical diſcipline; but he did not live to execute either this ſalutary project, or the ſcheme he had formed for reducing the taxes—after the payment of his debts—to the ſum of twelve hundred thouſand livres, ſtipulated by the ſtates of Tours; which he meant to appreciate ſolely to the defence of the kingdom, reſerving only for his own uſe the revenues of the domain, and the produce of the Gabelles. The taxes, at this time, amounted to two millions, five hundred thouſand livres*.

In the midſt of theſe occupations, the moſt glorious that can engage the attention of a monarch, an accident occurred which terminated the exiſtence of this youthful prince. During his ſtay in Italy, Charles had contracted a taſte for architecture; and, on his return, he gave orders for the conſtruction at Amboiſe, the place of his birth, of a more magnificent edifice than any which had yet been ſeen in France. He meant to adorn this palace with a variety of coſtly furniture, ſtatues and pictures, which he had brought from Italy; and that the building might correſpond with the richneſs of the embelliſhments, he had had the precaution to attach to his ſervice the moſt ſkilful architects, and the moſt celebrated painters he could meet with on his expedition. From a gallery in this caſtle, he was engaged in obſerving a game of tennis that was played in the ditch below; deſirous that the queen might partake of the amuſement, he went to her chamber, and conducted her to the gallery; but, in paſſing through a door, he ſtruck his head with violence againſt the top, which was very low. He felt, however, no immediate bad conſeqnence from the accident; but, after remaining ſome time in the gallery, as he was returning with the queen, he ſuddenly fell, ſenſeleſs, to the ground: the attendants, alarmed at his danger, laid him on a wretched couch which ſtood in a corner of the gallery; thrice he recovered his voice, and as quickly loſt it again; his expreſſions were ſolely thoſe of devotion; and, notwithſtanding every effort of medicine, he expired at eleven o'clock the ſame night, on the ſeventeenth of April, 1498, in the fifteenth year of his reign, and the twenty-eighth of his age.

The amiable qualities of Charles had acquired him the ſurname of The Affable and The Courteous; and his loſs was deeply regretted by all ranks of people. His talents were not above mediocrity, and all his endowments were rather calculated to conciliate affection than to excite admiration. Of a raſh and enterpriſing ſpirit, his ability in the execution greatly exceeded his wiſdom in the formation of plans. His facility of diſpoſition frequently rendered him a dupe to his miniſters and favourites, whoſe dangerous influence was farther extended by his averſion from buſineſs: but towards the concluſion of his reign he remedied theſe defects, and deſerved and obtained the grateful eſteem of his ſubjects.

His funeral obſequies were performed with uncommon magnificence: two of his domeſtics are ſaid to have died of grief for the loſs of their beloved maſter; and Anne of Brittany, his widow, abandoned herſelf to all the diſtraction of ſorrow. During three days ſhe never undreſſed, but ſecluded herſelf in her chamber, overwhelmed with deſpair, deaf to the friendly importunities of her attendants, and pertinaciouſly refuſing to accept the nouriſhment that was repeatedly proffered to her.

At the commencement of this reign, the roads and bridges were ſo bad in many parts of France, though contributions were levied on the paſſengers for keeping them in repair, that the ſtates of Tours complained that many men and beaſts of burden, had loſt their lives in attempting to paſs them; and that ſeveral villages were totally deſerted from the difficulty of approaching them.

Each deputy of the ſtates of Tours received a ſtated ſalary for his ſervices, equal to four livers one ſol of the preſent money, per diem.

The venereal diſeaſe was introduced into France, during the reign of Charles, by the troops who had accompanied that monarch on his expedition to Naples. It is ſaid that the French ſoldiers had contracted that dreadful diſorder from the Neapolitans, and that on their return to France, they diffuſed it throughout Italy: certain it is, that it was called by the French, The Neapolitan diſeaſe, and by the Italians, The French diſeaſe.* The Neapolitans are ſuppoſed to have received it from Spain, where it had been imported by ſome of the ſailors who had attended Chriſtopher Columbus, in his expedition to the New World.

LEWIS THE TWELFTH.

A. D. 1498.] IN Charles the Eighth, ended the direct line of Valois; and the ſceptre paſſed to Lewis, duke of Orleans, his couſin, in the third or fourth degree, and grandſon to that duke of Orleans who was aſſaſſinated at the inſtigation of John, duke of Burgundy. The new monarch was in his thirty-ſixth year, and had, conſequently, attained to a maturity of vigour both in body and mind; he had, moreover, received ſome ſalutary leſſons in the ſevere ſchool of adverſity; and his misfortunes, with the reflections they occaſioned, had produced a wholeſome change in his diſpoſition, by tempering the fire of youth, by teaching him to reſtrain the ſallies of paſſion, and to ſubmit the ſuggeſtions of enthuſiaſm to the dictates of reaſon.

Lewis the Twelfth was anointed at Rheims, on the twenty-ſeventh of May; on the firſt of July the ceremony of his coronation was performed at Saint-Denis; and on the following day he made his public entry into Paris. Immediately after his acceſſion to the throne, he rewarded the zeal and fidelity of George d'Amboiſe, archbiſhop of Rouen, who had alike ſhared with him the ſmiles and the frowns of fortune, by raiſing him to the dignity of prime miniſter; and never did a favourite better deſerve the confidence of his ſovereign.

This prince had been compelled at an early age, and much againſt his will, to marry Jane, the youngeſt daughter of Lewis the Eleventh, a princeſs of an amiable diſpoſition, but deformed in her perſon: on the oath of the king of France that he had never conſummated the marriage, pope Alexander the Sixth was prevailed on to pronounce it null and invalid; Jane ſubmitted with decent reſignation to a ſentence which deprived her of a crown, and only expreſſed her wiſh to be enabled to reward her domeſtics, and to relieve the poor. The king accordingly aſſigned her the revenues of the province of Berry for her ſupport, and retiring to a nunnery which ſhe founded at Bourges, the capital of that province, ſhe there took the veil, and cloſed a life of humble virtue.

A. D. 1499.] On the deceaſe of Charles the Eighth, Anne of Brittany, retired into her own hereditary dominions, and maintained the rights of an independent ſovereign. The articles of her marriage with the late king precluded her from diſpoſing of her hand, in caſe of his death without male iſſue, to the prejudice of the ſtate; but a ſtipulation, in which ſtate policy was oppoſed to natural rights, was deemed equivocal, and prudence warned Lewis to ſecure the important acquiſition of Brittany, by meaſures the moſt effectual.

She refuſed, however, to accede to the propoſals of Lewis, till that monarch had conſented, that in caſe ſhe ſhould die without children, her duchy ſhould revert to the heirs of her houſe; and that her marriage ſhould be celebrated at the city of Nantz. The ceremony was accordingly performed in that city, on the eighteenth of January, 1499, whence the king conducted her to Paris.

The king now determined to enforce the claims of his houſe on the duchy of Milan; but, that his kingdom might not be expoſed to inſult in the abſence of his troops, he confirmed the treaties with all the neighbouring powers. Thoſe which had been concluded with the republics of Venice and Florence were renewed; the pope was ſecured in the intereſt of France; the peace with England was confirmed; Ferdinand and Iſabella withdrew their troops from Italy, the archduke Philip did homage to the king at Arras: but, his father, Maximilian, was more difficult to treat with. The king had no ſooner aſcended the throne, than the emperor, at the inſtigation of Ludovico Sforza, made an incurſion into Burgundy; but being repulſed by the count of Foix, he conſented to a truce for a few months.

The king, meanwhile, repaired to Lyons, in the month of July, whence he ſent his army into Italy, under the command of Lewis of Luxembourg, count of Ligni, who had under him Triulzi and d'Aubigny: the Venetians, at the ſame time, made their troops advance to the banks of the Adda, and took poſſeſſion of all the territory which the king had ceded to them between the rivers Adda and Serio.

The French entered the Milaneſe, and reduced and ſacked, after a vigorous reſiſtance, the towns of Aleſſandria and Novara; Mortara and Pavia capitulated; Valenza was betrayed into the hands of the French, by the treachery of the governor, Donata-Raffamino*. The inhabitants of Milan exhibited ſymptoms of revolt, and Ludovico, uncertain in whom he ſhould confide, and incapable of reſiſting the ſtorm, retired with his treaſures to Inſpruck, after providing the caſtle of Milan with every requiſite for a long and obſtinate defence, and entruſting the care of it to Bernardino da Corte, a man on whoſe fidelity he placed the firmeſt reliance. But he was deceived in his choice, and the governor, after a ſiege of twelve days, was induced, by a bribe, to ſurrender the fortreſs to the French; who, in leſs than a month, became maſters of the duchy.

Lewis, who had remained at Lyons, was no ſooner informed of the ſucceſs of his troops, than he haſtened acroſs the Alps, entered the capital of his new dominions, clad in the ducal robes; and, during the three months that he remained there, by the advice of cardinal d'Amboiſe, he employed himſelf in recalling thoſe that had been baniſhed by Sforzo, in remitting a fourth of the impoſts, in eſtabliſhing a court of juſtice, and in aſſidious endeavours to ingratiate himſelf with the inhabitants of Milan.

The government of Genoa, which had voluntarily ſubmitted to his power, was conferred by Lewis, on the lord of Raveſtain; the Milaneſe were ſubjected to the authority of Triulzi, to whom, as well as to Ligni and d'Aubigny, conſiderable eſtates were aſſigned. But this alienation of the ducal domain diſpleaſed the people, while Triulzi, by his ſeverity and pride, diſguſted the nobles; a miſunderſtanding, alſo, prevailed between the generals and Ligni, and d'Aubigny refuſed obedience to the governor of the duchy.

A. D. 1500.] Ludovico, informed of the diſpoſition of the people, who now began to pity the prince they had ſo lately deteſted, ventured to quit his retreat in Germany, and to re-enter the Milaneſe. The gates of the different cities were opened on the approach of Sforza, with the ſame facility as they had been unbarred to his enemies. The town of Commo expelled the French, and obliged Ligni to leave the place. Milan revolted, and Triulzi, after placing a ſtrong garriſon in the caſtle, was compelled to retire. Tortona, Vigevene, and ſeveral other places, ſubmitted to the conqueror. The king, who had returned to France, to be preſent at the delivery of the queen, who had juſt given birth to a princeſs, received with grief the account of this revolution.

Ludovico, meanwhile, having obtained poſſeſſion of Milan, left his brother, the cardinal Aſcanio, to conduct the ſiege of the citadel, and proceeded himſelf to inveſt Novara. That town ſoon ſurrendered, but the famous Bayard, who was then a very young man, threw himſelf into the citadel, and refuſed to be included in the capitulation: Ludovico, by perſiſting in his determination to reduce Bayard, gave time to the French army to form a junction with the troops in Italy. Cardinal d'Amboiſe prudently forbore to cenſure the conduct of Triulzi, and promoted a reconciliation between that nobleman and the French generals; after which, la Trémouille marched to Novara, where he ſucceded in his attempt to ſeduce the Swiſs from the ſervice of Ludovico. The want of pay furniſhed theſe mercenary troops with a pretext for refuſing to fight; and the Germans, alarmed at their defection, fled with precipitation, ſo that the duke, betrayed on all ſides, was reduced to the neceſſity of applying to the Swiſs for permiſſion to diſguiſe himſelf as a private ſoldier, that he might eſcape in their ranks. The permiſſion was granted, but either through treachery or accident, Ludovico was diſcovered, and conducted to the king, who then reſided at Lyons. The temper of Lewis, naturally mild and humane, was ſteeled againſt Sforza by his repeated treachery and enormous crimes. He ſentenced him to a rigorous confinement in the caſtle of Loches, where he remained till releaſed by death from a captivity of ten years, during which, according to Mezerai, he experienced the moſt ſevere and cruel treatment.

Cardinal Aſcanio, informed of his brother's misfortune, left Milan, with an eſcort of ſix hundred horſe, in order to ſeek a refuge in Germany; but he was betrayed, by the treachery of Currado Lando*, into the hands of the Venetians, who were induced, partly by perſuaſion, and partly by threats, to deliver him to the king. He was conveyed to France, and confined in the tower of Bourges, whence, at the ſolicitation of Maximilian, he was very ſoon releaſed.

The inhabitants of Milan being deprived, by the retreat of the cardinal Aſcanio, of all means of defence, and dreading the reſentment of the king, haſtened to carry the keys of their city to the cardinal d'Amboiſe, who entered the capital of the duchy on the ſeventeenth of April, 1500. He reproached the citizens with their late ſeditious conduct, put ſome of the leaders of the inſurrection to death, exacted from the city a contribution of two hundred thouſand crowns, and then pronounced a general amneſty in the king's name.

The cardinal d'Amboiſe, after he had ſettled the affairs of the duchy, and ſupplied the Florentines with a body of troops for the recovery of Piſa returned to France, in order to concert with the king the plan of operations for the projected conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples.

A. D. 1501.] Frederic, king of Naples, informed of the preparations of the French, applied for aſſiſtance to the Venetians, who renewed the propoſal which had been made to Charles the Eighth, for rendering the kingdom of Naples a fief of the crown of France, and for the ceſſion of the principality of Tarento to the French; but this propoſal, though acceded to by Frederic, was rejected with diſdain by Lewis. Frederic then applied to Maximilian, who promiſed all he deſired, and a treaty was accordingly ſigned between them; but the cardinal d'Amboiſe ſoon broke the alliance, and made the emperor conſent to a prolongation of the truce with France.

Frederic next addreſſed himſelf to Ferdinand of Arragon, who engaged to afford him protection, but, by a ſignal inſtance of perfidy, that monarh treated at the ſame time with Lewis, and agreed to divide the kingdom he had promiſed to protect. The French army, in the mean time, under the command of Nemours and d'Aubigny, had already entered the Florentine territories; and Frederick, having ſtrengthened the fortifications of his frontier towns, haſtened to their defence.—At this period the Spaniards threw off the maſk; the ambaſſadors of France and Spain procured from the pope the inveſtiture of their reſpective portions of the kingdom of Naples; the capital, and the northern parts of the kingdom, were aſſigned to Lewis, while the provinces of Apulia and Calabria were allotted to Ferdinand. It excited univerſal aſtoniſhment to ſee Lewis aſſociate the king of Spain with him in this conqueſt; it was impoſſible that the diviſion they had agreed upon could long ſubſiſt, and it was generally foreſeen that theſe princes muſt finally be compelled to yield to the other. The union between them was the work of the cardinal, who was greatly blamed for it; the treaty, ill-planned and worſe executed, proved highly prejudicial to the French.

Frederic, diſcouraged by this unexpected event, and ſurrounded by enemies on all ſides, quitted the frontiers, and returned to Naples, in the determination to confine his efforts to the defence of that capital, of Capua and Averſa. Gonſal-vy ſent to demand the two queens-dowager of Naples to convey them to Spain; Proſpero Colonna adviſed Frederick to reject the demand, to ſeize the gallies which had been ſent to receive them, to collect his forces, and immediately march againſt the enemy. "If we conquer one of them," ſaid he, the other will ſoon be deſtroyed; if we be conquered, a monarch cannot die more glorioufly than in defending his kingdom;" but his advice was not followed, and the two princeſſes were delivered to the Spaniards. The French meanwhile, continued their progreſs. Capua was taken by aſſult, and the inhabitants were expoſed to the fury of an enraged and licentious ſoldiery; many females of quality, it is ſaid, preferring death to diſhonour, threw themelves into the river; while others, who fell into the hands of the conquerors, were carried to Rome, and there expoſed to ſale. Cæſar Borgia, duke of Valentinois, (ſon to the ſovereign pontiff) who accompanied the French army, entered a tower whither a conſiderable number of theſe unhappy victims had retired for ſecurity and after examing them all with the eye of a ſenſauliſt, ſelected forty of the moſt beautiful for his own uſe*. Though Frederick was at Naples himſelf, the citizens ſent a deputation to the French, and ſurrendered the capital. The king retired into the caſtle, but, deſtitute of all means of defence, and dreading to fall into the hands of the Spaniards, he demanded a ſafe conduct into France, and threw himſelf on the well-known lenity of Lewis, from whoſe liberality he obtained an aſylum in the duchy of Anjou, with an annual penſion of thirty thouſand crowns.

A. D. 1502.] Lewis and Ferdinand had acted with perfect cordiality in the reduction of Naples; but ſcarce had they completed that conqueſt before they turned their victorious arms againſt each other. The treaty of diviſion was couched in ſuch ambiguous terms, that both nations laid claim to a tract of country called Il Capatinato, which was ſeparated from Apulia by the river Lofanto: the French affirmed that it belonged to the province of Abruzzi; while the Spaniards maintained that it formed a part of Apulia. In conſequence of this difference, hoſtilities commenced between the two armies; the French ſeized on Tripalda; and Gonſalvo and d'Aubigny meeting, a conference enſued, in which a truce was agreed on that was ſoon broken.

The progreſs of the French was ſo rapid that the Spaniards were ſoon expelled from almoſt every place in Apulia, Calabria and Il Capatinato, and Gonſalvo was reduced to retire to the city of Barletta; but as d'Aubigny neglected to puſh the ſiege with ſufficient vigour, the Venetians had time to ſupply him with ammunition and proviſion. The duke of Valentinois, who had conceived a diſguſt againſt Lewis, for having oppoſed his attempts to reduce the republic of Florence, ſent a body of troops to the aſſiſtance of the Spaniards; and the duke of Nemours having been imprudently led to a diviſion of his forces, the affairs of Lewis in the kingdom of Naples ſoon took a different turn.

The ſuccours ſupplied by the duke of Valentinois enabled the Spaniards to ſurpriſe the ſmall town of Callimera, but the booty they made there was taken from them by d'Aubigny. Meanwhile the blockade of Barletta was continued. At the ſame time he entered into a negociation with Maximilian, whom he urged to break the truce which he had recently concluded with France, and preſſed Ferdinand to ſupply him with adequate ſuccours. The archduke of Auſtria, and his wife, were at the court of Spain, where Iſabella lay dangerouſly ill; her daughter, Joanna, wife to Philip, who was heireſs of the kingdom of Caſtile, having thought it neceſſary to exact an oath of allegiance from her future ſubjects, during the life, and with the approbation of her mother. Ferdinand, in whom the proſpect of ſoon loſing the crown of Caſtile created a diſlike to the preſumptive heir, hurried the archduke out of his dominions, and ſent him to France, to negociate a peace with Lewis.

A. D. 1503.] Philip, flattered by this mark of confidence, demanded a ſafe-conduct to repair to Lyons, where he was received with great cordiality by Lewis. Neither the king nor the archduke were aware that Ferdinand was deceiving them; and that his only object in propoſing a treaty was to gain time. They therefore proceeded to buſineſs, and the cardinal d'Amboiſe, and the biſhop of Albi, were appointed to confer with the Spaniſh plenipotentiaries, whom Ferdinand had ſent to accompany and aſſiſt his ſon-in-law. After much delay, the treaty was ſigned, and the contract of marriage of the princeſs Claude, the king's daughter, with Charles, ſon to the archduke, was received; and the two monarchs agreed to cede to Charles their reſpective claims on the kingdom of Naples, inſtead of the duchy of Milan, which had been promiſed before. The queen of France, who was extremely anxious to promote the union of her daughter with the duke of Luxembourg, expreſſed the greateſt ſatisfaction at the treaty; but before the rejoicings, on account of the peace, were finiſhed, the king received intelligence that a Spaniſh fleet had ſailed for Naples, and that the Germans had embarked for Barletta. Lewis reproached the archduke with his perfidy, but that prince took ſuch pains to juſtify his conduct that the king was fully convinced of his innocence, and renewed his ſafe-conduct, by which Philip profited to return to his own dominions.

The chevalier Préjan, who had ſailed from the port of Genoa, with four veſſels, fell in with the Spaniſh fleet, which compelled him to take refuge in the harbour of Otranto, where he burned his ſhips, and then haſtened to join the duke of Nemours. That prince finding his forces not ſufficient to enable him to keep the field, had ſent orders to d'Aubigny to join him; but d'Aubigny himſelf was in ſtill greater embarraſſment, being ſurrounded on all ſides by a ſuperior force; and he was at length compelled to engage the Spaniards on unequal terms near Seminara in Calabria, where the French were completely routed, and d'Aubigny with difficulty eſcaped the general maſſacre: he retired to Antigola, where he was inveſted by the enemy, and being deſtitute of proviſions, was in a few days obliged to ſurrender. The duke of Nemours took every precaution to prevent Gonſalvo, who was ſtill ſhut up in Barletta, from receiving information of the victory of Seminara; and the Spaniſh general, compelled at length to evacuate a town where he had ſuffered the extremes of peſtilence and famine, marched towards Cirignuola, and having choſen an advantageous poſt, fortified his camp, and fought, by ſurrounding it with deep ditches, to ſecure it from inſult. He was purſued by the duke of Nemours, who was perſuaded by his officers, much againſt his inclination, to attack the Spaniſh camp late in the evening of the twenty-eighth of April, 1503. The French, though at firſt ſucceſsful, ſuſtained a total defeat, and the duke of Nemours fell in the action. D'Alegre, who had been chiefly inſtrumental in perſuading the duke to engage, and the prince of Salerno, diſplayed their valour in a moſt ſignal manner, and made aſtoniſhing efforts to rally their troops; but neither their example nor exhortations could prevail; all the artillery, proviſion and baggage fell into the hands of the enemy: d'Alegre, with the ſcattered remains of the army, retired to Gaeta.

In leſs than a fortnight after the battle of Cirignuola, Gonſalvo reduced the cities of Naples, Capua and Averſa, ſo that, in the whole kingdom, the French only retained a few places of little importance.

During theſe tranſactions pope Alexander the Sixth died by that poiſon which he had deſtined for another: his ſon, the duke of Valentinois, had partaken of the fatal doſe, but the ſtrength of his conſtitution ſubdued its malignant influence, and that prince, anxious to ſecure the protection of France, promiſed to promote the election of the cardinal d'Amboiſe to the papacy.

The archduke Philip, enraged at the perfidy of his father-in-law, and jealous of his own reputation, had returned to France, and again put himſelf in the power of Lewis. At the ſame time he diſpatched meſſengers to Ferdinand, to remonſtrate on the indelible infamy which muſt forever ſtain his character, if he countenanced the treachery of Gonſalvo. But the king of Arragon, with his uſual duplicity, at one moment diſowned his ambaſſadors, at another his general; while he ſecretly ſent orders to puſh the war in Naples to the abſolute expulſion of the French.

Lewis, whoſe magnanimous mind was ſuperior to the dark artifices of his profligate rival, commanded the miniſters of the king of Arragon to quit his dominions. Though he had ſeverely ſuffered from the treachery of Ferdinand, he ſcorned to avail himſelf of any other arms than what became him as a monarch. While he diſmiſſed the archduke with every mark of reſpect to purſue his route to Flanders, he addreſſed him at parting in theſe memorable words: "If your father-in-law has been guilty of perfidy, I will not reſemble him; and I am infinitely happier in the loſs of a kingdom, which I know how to re-conquer, than to have ſtained my honour, which I could never retrieve."

War was now declared againſt Spain, and the preperations of Lewis were proportioned to the injuries he had ſuſtained from the conduct of his unprincipled enemy; three armies were aſſembled to invade on every ſide, the dominions of the king of Arragon. The firſt, commanded by la Trĕmouille, was deſtined to the recovery of the kingdom of Naples; the ſecond, under the lord of Albret, and the mareſchal de Gié, was directed to penetrate into the province of Fontara-

bia. The third was entruſted to the mareſchal de Rieux, and was to invade the county of Rouſſillon; at the ſame time a conſiderable fleet was fitted out to inſult the coaſts of Catalonia and Valentia, and to intercept any communication at ſea between Spain and Naples.

When the French troops arrived in the kingdom of Naples, the ſeaſon was far advanced, and the roads were ſo bad, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty the artillety could be tranſported from one place to another. Gonſalvo had expelled the French garriſon from the town of San Germano, which commanded the entrance into the kingdom, and ſtrengthening the fortifications, had advanced, with his army, to the banks of the Garigliano. In order to paſs the river, the marquis of Mantua cauſed a bridge of boats to be prepared, and a fort to be conſtructed for its defence; as the workmen, employed in theſe operations, were only attended by a ſlight eſcort, the Spaniards reſolved to profit by the neglect, and a detachment of a hundred men at arms was ordered to ford the river, while another party was ſent to ſecure the bridge. The chevalier Bayard, ever eager to fly where glory was to be acquired, haſtened to the aſſiſtance of Cocles, who commanded the eſcort appointed to guard the workmen; by uncommon exertions of intrepid valour, he checked the progreſs of two hundred Spaniſh horſe that were preparing to paſs the bridge, and maintained the unequal conteſt till the arrival of ſuccours enabled him to put the enemy to flight, and to purſue them with conſiderable ſlaughter: the fugitives, however, being reinforced by a ſtrong detachment from the Spaniſh camp, Bayard was compelled to retreat, and his horſe, overcome with fatigue, fell with him into a ditch, where he was ſecured by the Spaniards. The French, meanwhile, by whom this circumſtance was unperceived, had paſſed the bridge: Guiffray, a man at arms in Bayard's own company, was the firſt who miſſed his captain; alarmed at the loſs, this brave and generous ſoldier harangued his comrades, and exhorted them to return to the charge; the acclamation of "France! France! turn Spaniards, you ſhall not thus take off the flower of chivalry!" reſounded through the ranks; the attack was inſtantly renewed with redoubled vigour; Bayard, mounting the firſt horſe he could find, ruſhed into the midſt of the enemy, and, with his brave companions, regained the bridge. But theſe heroic atchievements, though productive of glory to thoſe who performed them, were attended with little advantage to the army.

Through the infamous conduct of the treaſurers and commiſſaries of the army, the troops were neither ſupplied with money nor proviſions; the marquis of Saluzzo reported this circumſtance to the king, who having been careful to provide againſt every inconvenience of the kind, determined to puniſh the criminal neglect of his officers with exemplary rigour, and he accordingly ſentenced John Heroef, the intendant of his finances, to loſe his head. Meanwhile the marquis had been obliged to divide his troops into different bodies to facilitate the means of ſubſiſtence, and this diviſion occaſioned, in the ſequel, the deſtruction of his whole army.

The prodigious efforts of France, during this campaign, proved every where unſucceſsful. The army deſtined for the attack of Fontarabia was divided by the diſſentions of its generals; the lord of Albret, either from a principle of revenge on account of the rivality which had formerly ſubſiſted between him and Lewis, or from his total ignorance of the art of war, led his troops, in oppoſition to the advice of the mareſchal de Gié, who commanded under him, into a ſterile part of the province of Biſcaye, where a want of proviſions ſoon led them to diſband: thoſe who were under the immediate command of Albret retired in ſafety, while the reſt periſhed, almoſt to a man, on their return to Guienne. The mareſchal de Rieux formed the ſiege of Salſes, but after the French had battered the town during forty days, they were compelled to raiſe the ſiege, on the approach of Ferdinand himſelf, with an army of thirty thouſand men. The fleet alſo, after alarming the coaſts of Valentia and Catalonia, was overtaken by a ſtorm, and reduced to the neceſſity of returning to the port of Marſeilles.

In Italy, Gonſalvo had made a fruitleſs attempt to burn the bridge over the river Garigliano; being repulſed with loſs he retired to his camp, and the inclemency of the weather kept both armies in a ſtate of inactivity for near two months.

A. D. 1504.] On the firſt day of the year 1504, Gaeta was inveſted by the Spaniards; and though the garriſon were provided with every neceſſary for a long defence, ſuch was the terror with which the recent ſucceſſes of the enemy had impreſſed the minds of the French, that in a council of war, it was determined to capitulate, and d'Alegre was appointed to make the propoſal to Gonſalvo. That general chearfully accepted the terms, and a treaty was immediately ſigned, of which the ſurrender of Gaeta, and the evacuation of the kingdom of Naples, conſtituted the principal articles: the French only obtained the liberty of retiring to France, either by land or ſea, and the releaſe of the priſoners; but Gonſalvo violated the conditions of the treaty, and ſhamefully detained in captivity all thoſe who were natives of Naples.

The chevalier Bayard, and Lewis d'Ars, received with indignation the meſſenger ſent by Gonſalvo to inform them of the treaty of Gaeta; they refuſed to ſign it, proteſting that they would rather loſe their lives in Italy, than ſuffer the Italians to believe that all Frenchmen were cowards.

The anxiety which Lewis had experienced from the ill-ſucceſs of his arms, and from the diſtreſs under which his ſubjects laboured from the united attacks of peſtilence and famine, brought on a fever, which raged with ſuch violence as to baffle the ſkill of his phyſicians, and to threaten his diſſolution. Anne, daily apprehenſive of the death of her royal conſort, determined to provide for her own ſecurity, embarked her moſt precious effects, and meditated a retreat into her native dominions of Brittany. The veſſels which ſhe had laden were ſtopped by the forward and imprudent zeal of the mareſchal de Gié; an offence, which Anne could never forgive in a man who had been born her ſubject. She refuſed to liſten to the mareſchal's excuſes, and, on her huſband's recovery ſhe obtained an order for his trial by the parliament of Toulouſe. Every circumſtance of his life was inveſtigated, in order to find matter for an accuſation; and it having been proved that he had once received pay for fifteen dead men, ſuppoſed to be on duty in his caſtle of Fronſac, he was deprived of his places and penſions, prohibited from exerciſing the functions of a mareſchal for five years, and forbidden to approach within ten leagues of the court.

On the king's recovery, the negociations for peace were renewed; a treaty was concluded, by cardinal d'Amboiſe, with the emperor, who, in conſideration of being allowed to aſſert his claims to certain towns belonging to the republic of Venice, and on condition of receiving twelve hundred thouſand florins, to be paid by inſtalments, a pair of golden-ſpurs, every Chriſtmas-day, and a body of five hundred lances, whenever he ſhould chuſe to go to Rome, conſented to beſtow the inveſture of the duchy of Milan on Lewis and his male deſcendants, or, in default of males, on his daughters. This treaty had been preceded by another with the archduke Philip, which occaſioned great uneaſineſs to Ferdinand, who was afraid of his ſon-in-law, and therefore endeavoured to create freſh diſturbances. He ſent ambaſſadors to France with propoſals that he never wiſhed to be accepted; offering to place the crown of Naples on the head of the prince of Tarento, ſon to Frederic, the depoſed monarch, on condition that he ſhould marry his niece. Frederic accepted the propoſal, but Lewis being informed of the circumſtance, ordered the Spaniſh ambaſſador to quit his dominions.

Frederic died ſoon after, as did alſo Iſabella of Caſtile, wife to Ferdinand of Arragon. The archduke Philip, in right of his wife Joanna, on the death of Iſabella, claimed the inheritance of her dominions, and changed the ſyſtem of European politics.

A. D. 1505.] Hitherto Lewis had conſidered the archduke as a vaſſal, and as a vaſſal whom he loved and eſteemed; but his late acquiſition rendered him a formidable neighbour. The county of Flanders, the hereditary dominions of the houſe of Auſtria, the empire of the kingdom of Caſtile, were now likely to center in one prince, whoſe ſon, too, was to augment theſe extenſive poſſeſſions, by his marriage with the princeſs Claude, with the duchies of Brittany and Milan. This vaſt combination of power might, in the ſequel, prove deſtructive to France, and meaſures, therefore, were immediately though ſecretly, taken to counteract its effects. The ambaſſadors ſent by the king of Arragon to notify the death of his wife to the French court, experienced a gracious reception; and as Ferdinand was ſtill young, Lewis engaged him to marry his niece Germana, daughter to the count of Foix; the king gave up his part of the kingdom of Naples, as a marriage-portion for the young princeſs, on condition that, if Ferdinand ſhould die before her, and without children, the whole of that kingdom ſhould revert to France; if, on the contrary, Ferdinand ſhould ſurvive his wife, and have no child, he was to keep poſſeſſion of Naples.

A. D. 1506.] The queen was extremely anxious that the projected aliance between her daughter Claude, and Charles of Luxemburgh, ſhould take place, but the nation entertained very different ſentiments, they beſought his majeſty to beſtow the hand of his daughter on Francis, duke of Valois, a prince of the blood, and preſumptive heir to the crown.

Lewis, aſtoniſhed at this propoſal, or, at leaſt, feigning to be ſo—for it is uncertain whether or not the plan originated with himſelf—promiſed to give his anſwer in a few days. After conferring with the princes of the blood, and finding that the ſentiments of the council coincided with thoſe of the ſtates, he chearfully aſſented to the propoſed alliance. The queen however oppoſed it to the utmoſt of her power. But however great the aſcendency which ſhe had acquired over the mind of Lewis, ſhe could not, in this inſtance, prevail on him to change the reſolution he had taken to ſatisfy the ſtates. The king exacted from the ſtates a promiſe, confirmed by an oath, that, in caſe he ſhould die without male heirs, they would enforce the conſummation of the marriage, and acknowledge the duke of Valois for their lawful ſovereign.

Lewis ſent an ambaſſador to Valadolid to inform the king of Caſtile of this event, and of the reaſons which had induced him to violate the marriage-treaties which had been concluded between their children. Philip received the intelligence without betraying any ſymptoms of reſentment, and expreſſed an earneſt wiſh that this circumſtance might not be ſuffered to interrupt the harmony which ſubſiſted between the two crowns. Maximilian, however, ſhewed his diſcontent, by immediately calling on the king to fulfil, the terms of the laſt treaty, by ſupplying him with five hundred lances to eſcort him to Rome. His demand was complied with, but Lewis took care to prevent his journey, by exciting the apprehenſions of the pope and the Venetians, who refuſed him a paſſage through their dominions, unleſs he choſe to come with no other attendants than his uſual retinue. Meanwhile, a diſpute having occurred between the king of Caſtile and the duke of Gueldres, the latter applied for aſſiſtance to Lewis, his kinſman and ally, who immediately ſent him four hundred lances, under the command of Robert de la Marche. Philip, complained, and not without reaſon, of this proceeding, as an infraction of the treaty; he proteſted it was his wiſh to live at peace with the king, but threatened, at the ſame time, to defend himſelf with vigour if he preceived any intention of attacking him. Henry, king of England, as an ally both of Philip and of Lewis, employed his mediation on this occaſion, and ſent an ambaſſador to France, who repreſented to the king, that as the duke of Gueldres had been the aggreſſor, to afford him aſſiſtance was to violate the treaties which ſubſiſted between him and the king of Caſtile; that if he continued to ſend troops into the duchy of Gueldres, and ſhould be led to invade the county of Flanders, the king of England would be obliged to aſſiſt his ally the king of Caſtile; but if, on the contrary, Lewis would recall his forces, Henry would perſuade Philip to accommodate matters with the duke of Guelders. Lewis conſented to the propropoſal; but the death of the king of Caſtile, which occurred on the twenty-fifth of September, 1506, changed the face of affairs. This prince, who loſt his life by drinking cold water when he was hot, left two ſons, Charles and Ferdinand; and, by his will, he appointed Lewis to be guardian to Charles, who was the eldeſt.

A. D. 1507.] The attention of Lewis was now called to the affairs of Italy, where he was ſo impolitic as to enforce the pretentions of the pope to the ſovereignty of Bologna. He had ſoon, however, occaſion to repent this condeſcenſion, for Julius the Sixth, who ſince his acceſſion to the papal throne had diſplayed a diſpoſition better ſuited to the camp than the conclave, forgetful of the protection he had received, exerted his genius in exciting the enemies of France, and nouriſhing the diſcontents of the Genoeſe. Theſe at laſt broke out into open revolt, expelled the French, and declared Paul Nuova, a ſilk-dyer, their doge. They were privately encouraged by Julius and the emperor Maximilian, and were openly reinforced by the troops of Piſa.

Lewis, ſenſible how much his reputation depended on immediately cruſhing the inſurgents, aſſembled an army of twenty thouſand men, and marched towards Genoa, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the queen, who exerted all her influence to prevent him from engaging in an expedition, the conſequences whereof ſhe dreaded. Lewis, however, forced the paſſes which the rebels had occupied, and, in perſon, ſtormed their entrenchments. The Genoeſe, diſconcerted by his rapid approach, endeavoured to diſarm his reſentment by ſubmiſſion.

A. D. 1508.] The formidable preparations made by the king for the conqueſt of Genoa, had ſpread an alarm over a great part of Europe; his intention, it was generally believed, was to ſubdue Italy, to recover the kingdom of Naples, to aſſemble a council, depoſe the pope, and procure the election of the cardinal d'Amboiſe to the chair of Saint Peter; in conſequence of this ſuppoſed deſign, Julius endeavoured to form a confederacy againſt Lewis. Maximilian was the firſt to promote this plan; he aſſembled a diet at Conſtance, where he expatiated, with great energy, on the boundleſs ambition of the king of France, which urged him to the violation of all treaties; he repreſented to the princes of the empire, that it was their intereſt to oppoſe the conqueſt of Italy by Lewis, which would deprive the empire of its rights to that country; and his eloquence prevailed ſo far as to extort from the princes a promiſe to ſupply their quota of troops, for oppoſing this imaginary expedition. By the time Maximilian had aſſembled his army and entered Italy, the king of France had completed the reduction of Genoa, and diſmiſſed his troops.

The Germans, finding no enemy to encounter, refuſed to proceed; and the apprehenſions of Julius with regard to the French being diſpelled, he now began to read the deſigns of the emperor, and accordingly engaged the Venetians and the Swiſs to refuſe his troops a paſſage through their territories. The emperor advanced as far as Trent, with five or ſix thouſand men, who were defeated by the Venetian general, Alviano. The Venetians, however, notwithſtanding this victory, applied for aſſiſtance to the king, who ſent them a body of troops, under the command of Triulzi; that general again defeated the Germans, who perſuaded the Venetians to ſign a truce for a year, without conſulting the king, and without including the duke of Gueldres, as they had promiſed. It was by ſuch miſtaken policy that the Venetians afforded ſubjects for complaint to all the different powers, and engaged them to enter into that famous league, which was formed the following year, and which had their deſtruction for its object.

The king was the more irritated at the excluſion of the duke of Gueldres from the treaty, as the territories of that prince were in a ſtate of revolt, and the rebels were aſſiſted by the Imperialiſts; while the forces which Lewis had ſent to the relief of the duchy, under the orders of the count of Rethel, were too inconſiderable to reduce the rebels to obedience, and were, moreover, deſtitute of money.

Maximilian was glad to bring his affairs in Italy to a concluſion, in order to attend to the ſtate of his grandſon's dominions in Flanders; he made every effort to procure from the Flemings the appointment of guardian to Charles, but, averſe from his power, they refuſed to admit his pretenſions, and, in compliance with the will of their late ſovereign, placed themſelves under the protection of Lewis, whom they deſired to chuſe a governor for their youthful prince*. Lewis accordingly appointed Philip de Croy, lord of Chievres, to that important office. Maximilian, determined to have ſome influence on the affairs of Flanders, perſuaded his daughter Margaret—now a widow—to repair thither, in the hope that the Flemings would entruſt her with the adminiſtration: nor was he diſappointed in his hopes; that event took place, and de Chievres only retained the title of governor to Charles. It does not appear that Lewis made any oppoſition to this change, with which indeed, he had every reaſon to be ſatisfied; for Magaret, a princeſs of uncommon merit, was ſtudious to enſure the continuance of peace in the dominions of her nephew, and to promote a reconciliation between the emperor and the king of France; ſhe at length concluded, with the cardinal d'Amboiſe, in the names of Maximilian and Lewis, the famous league of Cambray, formed againſt the Venetians.

To humble the republic of Venice, and to divide its territories, was the avowed object of all the princes who united in this confederacy. The civil conſtitution of Venice, eſtabliſhed on a firm baſis, had ſuffered no conſiderable alteration for ſeveral centuries; during which the ſenate conducted its affairs by maxims of policy, no leſs prudent than vigorous, and adhered to theſe with an uniform ſpirit of conſiſtency, which gave that commonwealth great advantage over other ſtates, whoſe views and meaſures changed as often as the form of their government, or the perſon who adminiſtered it. By theſe uninterrupted exertions of wiſdom and valour, the Venetians enlarged the dominions of their commonwealth, until it became the moſt conſiderable power in Italy; while their extenſive commerce, the uſeful and curious manufactures which they carried on, together with their monopoly of the precious commodities of the Eaſt, rendered Venice the moſt opulent ſtate in Europe.

* This opinion has been adopted by all the French hiſtorians, from Varillas to Garnier; but the Spaniſh, German, and Flemiſh writers, concur in contradicting their aſſertions; and maintain that Lewis had loſt the confidence of Philip, by conſenting to the marriage of Germaine de Foix with Ferdinand.

The emperor, the king of France, the king of Arragon, and the pope, were principals in the league of Cambray, to which almoſt all the princes of Italy acceded; the leaſt conſiderable of them hoping for ſome ſhare in the ſpoils of a ſtate, which they already deemed to be devoted to deſtruction. The Venetians might have diverted this ſtorm, or have broken its force; but with a preſumptuous raſhneſs, to which there is nothing ſimilar in the courſe of their hiſtory, they waited its approach*.

A. D. 1509.] They raiſed an army of ſix thouſand lances, four thouſand light horſe, and three-and-thirty-thouſand foot; theſe troops, who were chiefly mercenaries, were put under the command of the count of Petigliano and Alviano.—Andrew Gritti and George Cornaro, noble Venetians, and men of eſtabliſhed reputation, were appointed Provvéditori† to the army. When they had thus provided for their defence, they exerted all the arts of policy to promote a diſſolution of the confederacy, but in vain; their offers were rejected by the different powers, and their deſtruction ſeemed inevitable—even the elements appeared to conſpire againſt them—A veſſel, ſent with money for the troops in garriſon, at Ravenna, was loſt in a ſtorm; the caſtle of Breno, in which the archives of the republic, and other papers of the higheſt import, were depoſited, was deſtroyed by lightning; the arſenal of Venice took fire, and, with all it contained, was reduced to aſhes. But the greateſt misfortune which the republic experienced at this period, was the diviſion that took place between their generals. Pitigliano inſiſted on the propriety of abandoning the towns on the Adda, and of encamping in the country that lies between the rivers Olio and Serio. Alviano, on the contrary, propoſed to paſs the Adda, and, by invading the Milaneſe, make that duchy the ſeat of war. Both theſe projects, however, were rejected by the ſenate, who ordered their generals to prevent the French from paſſing the Adda, and to avoid a general action, unleſs they could engage with an apparent certainty of ſucceſs. Theſe orders, however, it was found impoſſible to execute.

The French army was divided into different bodies, which invaded the territories of the republic in five different parts. The garriſon of Leco extended their depredations to the gates of Bergamo; thoſe of Lodi and Piazenza invaded the Cremoneſe on either ſide; the marquis of Mantua reduced the town of Caſale Maggioné, while Chaumont paſſed the Adda, and inveſted Trévi. The garriſon of Trévi made a vigorous ſally, but they were ſucceſsfully repulſed by the French, who purſued them ſo cloſely, that they entered the town with them. Moroſin, the governor, was taken priſoner, together with the garriſon, conſiſting of four hundred light horſe, and twelve hundred infantry. Chaumont, after he had exacted an oath of allegiance from the inhabitants, and appointed Fontrailles to command in the place, repaſſed the Adda, and haſtened to join the king, who had, by this time, reached Milan. The Venetians ordered their generals to profit by the abſence of Chaumont, to recover the town of Trévi. Petigliano and Alviano did not approve of this plan, and propoſed another, which, in the opinion of moſt men, was much more advantageous; but the ſenate, unuſed to contradiction, enforced their orders, and Trévi was accordingly beſieged at the beginning of May, 1509.

Fontrailles, who had only fifty men at arms, and one thouſand Gaſcons, under his command, plainly perceived that it would be impoſſible for him long to reſiſt the attacks of the Venetian army. He immediately appriſed the king of his ſituation, obſerving that the walls of the town were in ſuch a bad ſtate, that the enemy's artillery muſt ſpeedily deſtroy them; aſſuring him, however, that he would not fail to hold out to the laſt extremity. The council, who had been aſſembled on the reception of this news, were divided in their ſentiments: Triulzi maintained that it was too late to think of marching to the relief of Fontrailles; that all the Venetian forces being united on the banks of the Adda, would prevent the troops from paſſing that river, and that the attempt would only occaſion a great loſs of time, that might be uſefully devoted to other purpoſes: but Chabarone de la Paliſſe was of a different opinion, and inſiſted on the neceſſity of ſetting out immediately for Trévi; this advice coinciding with the ſentiments of Lewis, the army was put in motion without farther delay: it conſiſted of ſix thouſand Swiſs, twelve thouſand French and Italian infantry, and two thouſand Gendarmes. Lewis reached the banks of the Adda on the ninth of May*, at the very moment that Fontrailles, after defending the town of Trévi as long as poſſible, ſurrendered it to the enemy. Lewis, though appriſed of this diſaſter, purſued his deſign, and marched along the banks of the river till he came oppoſite to Caſciano, where he paſſed the Adda, with his whole army, without receiving the ſmalleſt moleſtation from the Venetians, who were employed in plundering the town of Trévi, and refuſed to obey the commands of their officers, and, according to others, from the diviſion which prevailed between the generals†.

Lewis finding it impoſſible to force the Venetian camp, moved towards Rivolta, which lay to the left of the enemy, to try whether the deſire of ſaving that place would not induce them to come forth, and riſk an action. Rivolta, however, was taken by aſſault in ſight of the Venetian army; and the king having paſſed a night in the town, marched the next morning, with his whole army, with the view to ſecure either Valia or Pandino, by which means he would be enabled to cut off the communication with Cremona or Creama, whence the Venetians drew their proviſions. There were two roads to theſe places; that which the king took was the longeſt, and lay along the ſide of the Adda; the other was much ſhorter, and ran in a ſtraight line, and this induced the Venetians to quit their poſt, in the hope of arriving at Vaila before the French. They formed their army in two diviſions, the ſtrongeſt of which was entruſted to Alviano, and the other to Pitigliano. The latter marched firſt, and had nearly reached Vaila, when the former was overtaken, and attacked by the van of the French army, under Chaumont and Triulzi. Alviano immediately ſent a meſſenger to Pitigliano, to appriſe him of the circumſtance, and poſted his infantry in ſome neighbouring vineyards, where he converted the vine-props into paliſades; he erected ſome batteries with great expedition, and drew up his cavalry in a plain behind the ground occupied by the infantry. Chaumont was repulſed with loſs in his firſt attack; the Swiſs, whoſe heavy-armed infantry could not make their way through the rows of long pikes that were ſtuck in the ground, met with no better ſucceſs; and the van was in danger of ſuſtaining a defeat, when the king came to their aſſiſtance with the reſt of the army. Some of his officers, it is ſaid, endeavoured to deter him from purſuing his march, by obſerving that the Venetians were already in poſſeſſion of Vaila; but Lewis replied, "We ſhall "then have the additional trouble of diſlodging them," and preſſed onward. He rallied the Swiſs, made the Gaſcons advance, and ſupported them with the troops from Trévi, who were anxious to revenge the affront they had recently ſuſtained. Animated by the preſence of their ſovereign, and the exhortations and example of the gallant veteran La Trèmouille, the troops deſpiſed all danger, and ruſhing forward with irreſiſtible impetuoſity, bore down all before them. Lewis expoſed his perſon in the thickeſt of the fight, and vied with his men in exertions of perſonal valour. The Venetians, after an obſtinate conteſt, yielded up the palm of victory, and left eight thouſand of their beſt troops on the field of battle.

From the height of preſumption the Venetians now ſunk to the depth of deſpair; they no longer ſought to reſiſt the confederates, but endeavoured to ſoothe by ſubmiſſion where they could not repel by arms; all the places claimed by the Spaniards and the emperor were ſurrendered without heſitation or delay.

The king having ſecured his conqueſts, and concluded a new treaty, offenſive and defenſive, with the pope, returned to France, leaving the chief command of his forces to Chaumont. The cardinal d'Amboiſe had adviſed Lewis to remain longer in Italy, from the dread that the number of nobility who muſt neceſſarily accompany him would greatly diminiſh the army, and encourage the Venetians to profit by his abſence. This proved to be the caſe; their courage revived, and they made ſome ſpirited attempts to recover their loſt territories. Padua again fell into their hands; and although the emperor, with an immenſe army, entered Italy, for the purpoſe of retaking it, they baffled all his efforts, and compelled him to retire with diſgrace. They alſo made an attempt on Verona, but the timely arrival of Chabannes and Bayard, who had been detached by Chaumont, with a body of French troops, ſaved the town, and obliged the Venetians to retreat to Vicenza, which they evacuated on the approach of the French.

A. D. 1510.] During the winter the king made the moſt formidable preparations for opening the enſuing campaign with vigour and effect; but he could not perſuade his allies to make equal exertions. As he was preparing to paſs into

Italy he had the misfortune to loſe his friend and favourite the cardinal d'Amboiſe, who expired on the twenty-fifth of February, 1510, univerſally regretted by the nation. The virtue and diſintereſted ſpirit of this ſtateſman, have been juſtly celebrated by contemporary hiſtorians. His memory is ſtill holden in veneration at Rouen, to the cathedral of which city he gave the famons bell which bears his name*.

Julius, notwithſtanding his late treaty with the king, had lent a favourable ear to the overtures made him by the Venetians, and had promiſed to take off the cenſures which he had pronounced againſt them.

This was the firſt ſtep towards the execution of that plan which the enterpriſing ſpirit of Julius formed for the expulſion of every foreign potentate from Italy. He now exerted his ſkill and addreſs in perſuading the Swiſs to renounce their alliance with France, and even to declare war againſt that power. On the expiration of the treaty between France and the Swiſs, the latter aſſembled at Baden, and made a demand of twenty thouſand livres, in addition to their former penſion, from the perſuaſion that the French could not do without them. The matter, however, was ſubmitted to the council, who being of the ſame opinion with the king, the demand of the Swiſs was rejected with contempt, their alliance renounced, and ſome obſervations were made on their conduct, which offended them highly, and led them to ſeek for revenge. Lewis accepted the offer of the Griſons, who agreed to ſerve him at a more moderate price; and the Swiſs immediately formed an alliance with the pope.

Julius, encouraged by this acceſſion of ſtrength, now ventured to declare war againſt the duke of Ferrara, whom the king had taken under his immediate protection: Chaumont was ſent to his aſſiſtance, and both he and the duke were excommunicated by the vindictive pontiff. The papal army was commanded by the duke di Urbino, nephew to the pope, and cardinal of Pavia. The duke reduced ſeveral places of little importance, made a fruitleſs attempt on Lunigiana, and retired in diſorder on the news that the French had joined the duke of Ferrara; Julius, however, ſoon repaired this diſgrace by the reduction of Modena. The duke, intimidated by the loſs of that city, retired to his capital, which he reſolved to defend to the laſt extremity. His ally, the king of France, to whom he applied for aſſiſtance, was now engaged in repelling an attack of the Swiſs, who, in the month of September, had made an irruption into the duchy of Milan. They had already taken Como, and Lewis was fearful that they would ſoon penetrate farther into the Milaneſe; but he was releaſed from his apprehenſions at a time when he had leaſt reaſon to expect it. The Swiſs ſoldiers having applied to their officers to advance them ſome pay, experienced a refuſal, which enraged them ſo much that they immediately mutinied, and returned to Bellinzone.

* This bell, known by the name of George d'Amboiſe, was founded in 1501. It meaſures thirty feet in circumference, and ten in diameter: the clapper weighs ſeven hundred and ten pounds; and the bell itſelf, forty thouſand.

The king, who had with difficulty prevailed on himſelf to bear arms againſt the ſucceſſor of St. Peter, and who inceſſantly tormented by the complaints and ſcruples of the queen, convoked, at Tours, in the month of September, 1510, an aſſembly of the Gallican church, to which he explained the motives of his conduct; and deſired to know whether he could in conſcience wage war againſt the pope. The aſſembly replied, that his motives were juſt, and thoſe of his adverſary unjuſt, and that it was his duty not only to act on the defenſive, but to carry the war into the enemy's country. After this deciſion, the king forbade his ſubjects to hold any commerce with the court of Rome.

A. D. 1511.] Ferdinand of Arragon had, at laſt, thrown off the maſk, in conſequence of having received from the pope the inveſtiture of the kingdom of Naples, on condition that he ſhould every year preſent a white palfrey to the ſovereign pontiff, and ſupply him with a body of three hundred lances whenever he ſhould be engaged in a war. Ferdinand, not content with entering into a league with Julius againſt France, endeavoured to make the emperor follow his example; but failing in this point, he offered himſelf a meditator between the pope and the confederates. Some fruitleſs negociations were the conſequence of this offer, which only ſerved to ſhew the averſion of the pontiff from all pacific meaſures. After attempting, in vain, to corrupt the ambaſſadors of Lewis and Maximilian, and to promote diſſentions in Genoa and Florence, he intrigued with the court of England which was now ruled by Henry the Eighth, to whom Margaret of Auſtria—apriſed of the pope's machinations—wrote on the occaſion to deter him from engaging in ſchemes that were hoſtile to the intereſts of his kingdom. Julius created eight new cardinals, in order to appoſe a part of the Holy College who had declared for France, and retiring to Milan, had juſt ſummoned, with the approbation of the emperor and the king, a general council to meet at Piſa, on the firſt of September.

Chaumont dying after the reduction of Mirandola, the command of the French forces devolved on the mareſchal Triulzi, who opened the campaign by the ſiege of Concordia, which he took, and then marched againſt Bologna. On the approach of the French the pope retired to Ravenna, and the inhabitants of Bologna, attached to their old maſters, the Bentivoglios, compelled the garriſon to lay down their arms, and received the French into the city; Lewis, actuated by the ſame ridiculous ſcruples as his wife, had given the moſt poſitive orders not to puſh matters to extremities. This ill-timed moderation revived the arrogance and vindictive ſpirit of the Roman pontiff, who now repaired to Rome, where he had the mortification to find himſelf cited to attend the council of Piſa, under the ſimple denomination of cardinal San Pietro di Vincola. Julius was tried and depoſed by his council, but no one was appointed to ſucceed him in the papal throne; in revenge, that pontiff laid the whole kingdom of France, and the city of Lyons in particular, under an interdict.

Gaſton de Foix, nephew to the king, who had lately been created duke of Nemours, was now appointed governor of the Milaneſe; and Chabannes, lord of la Paliſſe, was, at the ſame time, ſent into Italy, with a conſiderable reinforcement of troops, and with orders to be guided in his operations by the commands of Maximilian. The emperor, whoſe army was not yet prepared to take the field, ordered la Paliſſe to diſlodge the Venetians from a ſtrong poſt which they occupied not far from Vicenza; having performed this taſk, and taken the Venetian general priſoner, he reduced Suana, at the beginning of Auguſt; then purſuing his march to Padua, he undertook to turn the ſtream which ſupplied that city with water, but as he was preparing to put this plan in execution, he received orders from the emperor to enter the province of Friuli, where, in a ſhort time, he diſpoſſed the Venetians of almoſt every town and fortreſs in that country, and theſe republicans once more retired to their capital, having loſt all their places on the continent, except Padua and Trevigi.

On the twentieth of October, 1511, according to Mezerai, Julius concluded a league with the Venetians, and the king of Arragon, againſt France. Some efforts were made to induce Henry the Eighth and Maximilian to join the confederacy; but thoſe monarchs rejected, for the preſent, the ſolicitations of the pope, though they already evinced a diſpoſition hoſtile to Lewis.

A. D. 1512.] The army of the Holy League entered Romagna in the month of November, and after reducing all the places belonging to the duke of Ferrara, beyond the Po, laid ſiege to Baſtia. The governor ſignaliſed his courage in defence of the town, but he was unfortunately killed in the breach with a great part of his garriſon; and the Spaniards, in revenge for the loſs they had ſuſtained in the attack, put the reſt to the ſword, together with numbers of the inhabitants. The duke of Ferrara did not give them time to repair the fortification, but attacking the Spaniards on every ſide, he obtained a complete victory, and recovered Baſtia the ſame day on which it was taken. This check, however, did not prevent the Spaniards from laying ſiege to Bologna, to the aſſiſtance of which Gaſton had already detached two thouſand Germans and two hundred Gendarmes, under the command of Odet de Foix, lord of Lautrec, a young warrior of twenty; Yves d'Alegre, and ſome other experienced captains; but this ſuccour was inſufficient for the defence of the city, which muſt inevitably have fallen into the hands of the enemy, if a difference of opinion among the Spaniſh generals had not occaſioned a conſiderable loſs of time. Peter Navarre, the ſecond in command, promiſed to take the town by ſpringing a mine; and while he was making the neceſſary preparations, the beſieged received a freſh reinforcement, and adopted a reſolution to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity; the failure of the mine only tended to encreaſe the courage of the garriſon. Gaſton profited by theſe delays, and collecting his troops, marched to Bologna, and entered the city, under cover of a prodigious fall of ſnow, unperceived by the aſſailants, who inſtantly retired from before the place.

The Venetians, meanwhile, had obtained poſſeſſion of Breſcia, through the treachery of count Lewis Avogaro, who reſided in that city. Gaſton no ſooner received the news of this event than he determined to recover the place; he accordingly left a garriſon in Bologna, ſent ſuccours to Ferrara, and, after marching forty leagues in the depth of winter, arrived in the night of the fourteenth of February, before the town of Breſcia. Bayard and Teligni, who had preceded the army, attacked and defeated a body of Venetians, and made a great number of priſoners; an abbey, near one of the gates of the city, was inveſted by d'Alegre, who forced an entrance, and put the troops ſtationed to defend it to the ſword.

The day after his arrival, Gaſton, and his army, entered the citadel, which ſtill held out for the French. A council of war being called, a general aſſault was determined on; Gonet, governor of the citadel, marched at the head of the Gaſcons; and Bayard followed on foot, with his men at arms. The conteſt was long and bloody; but the ſuperior courage and diſcipline of the French at length prevailed, and the Venetians were every where routed; d'Alegre being ſtationed at the gate of Saint John, the only gate that was open, to intercept them in their flight, a dreadful carnage enſued; Mezerai* ſays they loſt eight thouſand men; other writers have encreaſed this number to twelve thouſand, but Guicciardini†, who lived at the time, reduces their loſs to eight hundred; according to his account, indeed, all the Venetian forces then in Breſcia did not amount to twelve thouſand men.

At this period, Gaſton received orders from the king to hazard a deciſive action, ſince the ſituation of his affairs rendered it abſolutely neceſſary to bring the war to a ſpeedy concluſion. The emperor's conduct gave reaſon to apprehend that he would ſoon be induced to yield to the ſolicitations of the ſovereign pontiff; the king of England evinced a ſimilar diſpoſition.

In conſequence of theſe orders, Gaſton entered Romagna with an army compoſed of eighteen thouſand foot, beſides a numerous cavalry, but as Ferdinand had expreſsly ordered his generals to avoid an action. He took, in ſight of the Spaniſh army, the towns of Caſtel di Solarolo, Cotignolo and Grannarolo; and, at length, laid ſiege to Ravenna. The Spaniards had pledged themſelves to Mark Anthony Colonna, who commanded the town, to march to his relief in caſe the French ſhould attack him; they accordingly advanced to within two miles of Ravenna, where they fixed their camp; Gaſton, having in vain endeavoured to allure them into the plain, at length came to a reſolution of attacking their camp, he ſtationed himſelf in no particular place, that he might be at liberty to repair wherever his preſence might be required. The enemy, meanwhile, had ſtrongly fortified their camp, and appeared determined not to leave it, though the French artillery made conſiderable havock among their troops. But Fabrico Colonna, enraged at ſeeing his cavalry deſtroyed without fighting, diſobeyed the orders of the viceroy, and advanced towards the French; the Spaniards being obliged to follow them, the action became general. Colonna, who had pierced the ranks of the French, was attacked in his turn, and with ſuch reſiſtleſs impetuoſity, that he was compelled to leave the field, and the viceroy, Cordonna, ſoon became the companion of his flight. Navarre, who commanded the infantry, ſtill kept his ground: twelve hundred of his men defeated a detachment of Gaſcons, and endeavoured to throw themſelves into Ravenna; but being attacked by a body of cavalry, under the baſtard du Fay, they were compelled to give up this attempt, and join their leader, who defended himſelf, with extraordinary courage and preſence of mind, againſt the attacks of the whole French army: at length the Germans, animated by the ſpirit of revenge for the loſs of their leader, ruſhed on the enemy with incredible fury; one of them a man of uncommon ſtrength, cut his way through their ranks, and opened, at the expence of his life, a road for his comrades: the opportunity was eagerly ſeized, and ſucceſsfully improved: Navarre being wounded in ſeveral places, was taken priſoner, and his troops, preſſed on all ſides, were ſoon diſperſed with great ſlaughter.

In this celebrated battle, Gaſton diſplayed the qualities of a conſummate and experienced leader: hitherto he had eſcaped unhurt, but perceiving a body of Spaniards, who were retiring in good order, he imprudently ruſhed forward to attack them, accompanied only by about twenty gentlemen. The conſequence was ſuch as might have been expected; his couſin, Lautrec, was wounded at his ſide; Gaſton's horſe was killed under him, and he himſelf, after having fought with the moſt heroic courage, fell, pierced with fourteen wounds. In vain did Lautrec exclaim—"'Tis Gaſton, 'tis the brother of your queen, do not kill him."—The Spaniards, deaf to his cries, and bent on revenge, vented their cowardly rage on the unarmed and defenceleſs hero.

Never was any commander more deeply regretted; and never was any one more deſerving of regret. His body was carried to his tent by his gentlemen, amidſt the lamentations of the army, whoſe grief for the loſs of their leader greatly exceeded their joy for the victory they had gained. The French called on la Paliſſe to put himſelf at their head, and conjured him to lead them, without delay to the attack of Ravenna. That city was taken by aſſault, Calonna ſurrendered the citadel, and Vitelli, having withdrawn the garriſon from Citta de Caſtello, that town opened its gates to the French.

Meanwhile, the cardinals, alarmed at the rapid progreſs of the French, and ſhocked, we muſt hope, at the vaſt effuſion of blood occaſioned by theſe deſtructive wars, on their knees conjured the pope to give peace to Europe: but the profligate pontiff delighted in blood, and cared not how many of his fellow-creatures were ſacrificed to the gratification of his own boundleſs ambition. He feigned, however, a compliance with their wiſhes, and once more impoſed on the candour and conſideration of Lewis, by talking of a peace which he had reſolved not to conclude. The cardinal de Medicis, though a priſoner, confirmed him in this reſolution: having found means to ingratiate himſelf with the cardinals of the council of Piſa, he obtained permiſſion to ſend a meſſenger to Rome, under pretext of arranging ſome domeſtic concerns, but in fact, to inform the pontiff of the ſituation to which the French were reduced. It was ſuch, that their army appeared rather to have ſuffered a defeat, than to have obtained a victory; it was conſiderably diminiſhed by ſickneſs and deſertion; and Maximilian, in conſequence of a truce which he had concluded with the Venetians, ſent orders to the Germans to quit the French camp without delay.

Thus la Paliſſe was left alone to oppoſe the Swiſs, who had ruſhed, like a torrent, into the Milaneſe. In vain did he write to the General of Normandy (that was the title which the king's commiſſary bore) to levy freſh recruits; his letter, in which he expatiated on the dreadful ſituation to which he was reduced, fell into the hands of the Swiſs, whoſe courage it ſerved to inflame. They immediately joined the Venetians, the Griſons having granted them a free paſſage through their territories, under a pretence of being compelled thereto by ancient treaties.

The revolution ſoon became general: Milan, Lodi, and ſeveral other towns, preſerved themſelves from pillage by the payment of conſiderable ſums, which were given to the Swiſs. Bologna implored the clemency of Julius, who was, with difficulty, prevailed on to pardon the inhabitants; it is even pretended, that but for his death, which fortunately occurred ſoon after, that beautiful city would have been conſigned to deſtruction. Florence again ſubmitted to the authority of the Medici. The French had evacuated the duchy of Milan, excepting ſome few places, which ſoon ſurrendered. Genoa once more revolted, revived the ancient form of government, and raiſed James Fregoſo to the dignity of doge. Maximilian Sforza was acknowledged as duke of Milan, and the Swiſs ſtill continued to ravage that beautiful country. The cardinal de Medicis eſcaped from the French, and repaired to Rome; while the cardinals of the council of Piſa, who had retired to Lyons, were condemned by the council of Lateran, opened by the pope on the ſixteenth of November, when the interdict which had been impoſed on the kingdom of France was renewed: Julius even wiſhed to transfer the title of Moſt Chriſtian King from Lewis to Henry the Eighth, that is, from one of the moſt virtuous to one of the moſt vicious monarchs that ever exiſted.

Lewis, meanwhile, after ſeeing all his Italian conqueſts wreſted from him, found his kingdom threatened by an invaſion of the Engliſh. Henry the Eighth had ſent a herald to Paris, to exhort the king not to wage impious war againſt the ſovereign pontiff; and when he returned without ſucceſs, another was ſent to demand the ancient patrimonial provinces of the Engliſh crown, Anjou, Maine, Guienne, and Normandy: this meſſage was underſtood to be a declaration of war, and Lewis accordingly prepared for the conſequences. Henry was adviſed, by Ferdinand the Catholic, not to invade France by the way of Calais, where he himſelf ſhould not have it in his power to aſſiſt him, but exhorted him rather to ſend forces to Fontarabia, whence he could eaſily make a conqueſt of Guienne, a province in which it was imagined, the Engliſh had ſtill ſome adherents. Ferdinand promiſed to aſſiſt this conqueſt by the junction of a Spaniſh army.

But the ſecret purpoſe of Ferdinand, in this affectation of concern for the intereſts of the Engliſh monarch, was to ſecure for himſelf the kingdom of Navarre, the conqueſt whereof he had long meditated; and as John d'Albret, the ſovereign, was connected by friendſhip and alliance with Lewis, the opportunity ſeemed favourable to the king of Arragon, while the Engliſh forces were conjoined with his own, and while all adherents to the council of Piſa lay under the ſentence of excommunication, to put himſelf in poſſeſſion of theſe dominions.—No ſooner, therefore, was Dorſet landed in Guipuſcoa, than the Spaniſh monarch declared his readineſs to join him with his forces, to make, with united arms, an invaſion of France, and to form the ſiege of Bayonne, which opened the way into Guienne*: but he remarked to the Engliſh general how dangerous it might prove to leave behind them the kingdom of Navarre, which, being in cloſe alliance with France, could eaſily give admittance to the enemy, and cut off all communication between Spain and the combined armies.

Dorſet began to ſuſpect the inſidious deſigns of Ferdinand, and having no orders to invade the kingdom of Navarre, he refuſed to take any part in the enterpriſe, and therefore remained in his quarters at Fontarabia. But ſo ſubtle was the contrivance of Ferdinand, that, even while the Engliſh army lay in that ſituation, it was almoſt equally ſerviceable to his purpoſe, as if it had acted in conjunction with his own. It kept the French army in awe, and prevented it from advancing to ſuccour the kingdom of Navarre; ſo that Alva, having full leiſure to conduct the ſiege, made himſelf maſter of Pampeluna, and obliged John to ſeek for ſhelter in France, whither his conſort, queen Catherine, had retired before him. That ſpirited princeſs, mortified at the loſs of her crown, could not refrain from exclaiming to her huſband—"Had I been John, and you Catherine, we ſhould never have loſt our kingdom."

Dorſet, by this time, convinced of Ferdinand's perfidy, inſiſted on being ſupplied with veſſels to return to England.

The Engliſh acquired little honour from this ill-conducted enterpriſe, and an action at ſea, which occurred ſoon after, produced nothing more deciſive. An Engliſh fleet of forty-five ſail, under the command of Sir Thomas Knevet, was ſent to inſult the coaſts of Brittany; after they had committed ſome depredations, they were met and attacked by a French fleet of thirty-nine ſail, under the conduct of Primauget. Primauget's ſhip took fire, and that officer, finding his deſtruction inevitable, bore down upon the veſſel of the Engliſh admiral, and, grappling with her, reſolved to make her ſhare his fate. Both fleets ſtood ſome time in ſuſpence, as ſpectators of this dreadful engagement; and all men ſaw with horror the flames which conſumed both veſſels, and heard the cries of fury and deſpair, which came from the miſerable combitants. At laſt the French ſhip blew up, and, at the ſame time, deſtroyed the Engliſh†. The reſt of the French fleet made their eſcape into different harbours.

Lewis, meanwhile, enxious to enforce the reſtoration of John d'Albret, ſent an army into Navarre, under the command of the duke of Valois. John accompanied the duke, and, at his approach, many of the towns valuntarily roſe in his favour, while ſome others were reduced by arms. But when the French formed the ſiege of Pampeluna, they were oppoſed by the whole force of Spain; and being deſtitute of proviſion, and moreover unable to cope with ſuch a powerful army, they raiſed the ſiege and returned to France: their retreat was followed by a total ſubjection of Navarre to the power of Spain.

Ferdinand, anxious to ſecure his new conqueſt, and intereſted in preventing a farther extention of the Papal or Venetian power in Italy, conſented to a truce with France for one year.

A. D. 1513.] Lewis was, by this time, fully convinced of the conſequence of detaching the Swiſs from their alliance with the pope; la Trémouille, therefore, for whom they had always evinced a marked predilection, was ſent to Switzerland, in the capacity of ambaſſador extraordinary; but they refuſed to hold a commerce with him. Triulzi, who held a conſiderable rank among this mercenary people, alſo exerted his influence in favour of France; but he met with no better ſucceſs, and la Trémouille was obliged to return without fulfilling the object of his embaſſy. The emperor propoſed to ſign a treaty with Lewis, on condition that the princeſs Remée, the king's youngeſt daughter, ſhould marry one of his grandſons, and immediately be ſent to the Imperial court; but the tender years and delicate conſtitution of that princeſs exciting apprehenſions for her life, in caſe ſhe married too ſoon, the queen oppoſed her departure, and Maximilian immediately put a ſtop to all farther negociation.

The Venetians ſtill continued to ſolicit the friendſhip of a prince, who having proved his ability to deſtroy, might, they conceived, be able to reſtore them to their priſtine ſplendour, or, at leaſt, to preſerve them from the dangerous encroachments of their powerful neighbours. The matter was debated in council, and more inconveniences than advantages were deemed likely to ſpring from the projected alliance; but the influence of Triulzi, who was extremely anxious to promote it, prevailed; and Andrew Gritti, then a priſoner to Lewis, being releaſed, received ample powers from the republic of Venice, and appeared as their ambaſſador at the court of France. Julius did not live to be informed of this treaty, which was concluded but a few days before his death: he died as he had lived, a ſtranger to the principles of chriſtianity; inſtead of expreſſing his remorſe for the numerous ſins of his life, his laſt moments were only embittered by regret at not having lived to fulfil his projects of ambition, and to complete his ſchemes of vengeance. What Guicciardini has ſaid of the cardinal San Severino, may, with greater juſtice, be applied to Julius—"He was more diſpoſed to martial atchievements, and to feats of arms, than to acts of devotion and pious meditations." As a man, he was treacherous, faithleſs, and vindictive; as a miniſter of religion his conduct was ſtill more deteſtable; and his memory muſt ever be holden in abhorrence by all who are not inclined to think that ſplendid talents afford an adequate compenſation for the abſence of every virtue.

The cardinal de Medicis, who had been taken priſoner at the battle of Ravenna, was appointed to ſucceed him in the papal throne. The new pontiff, who aſſumed the appellation of Leo the Tenth, proſecuted with diligence and ability the plans of his predeceſſor.

The king of England had obtained a ſupply from the parliament for the proſecution of the war with France, and the moſt formidable preparations were now making for that purpoſe. The dread of an invaſion deterred Lewis from paſſing into Italy as he had intended, and la Trémouille was appointed commander of the troops deſtined for that expedition, who were to be joined by the Venetians. On the appointed day, the army of the republic took the field under the conduct of Alviano, who had been releaſed by the French. La Trémouille, on his arrival in Italy, recovered, in one-and-twenty days, the whole duchy of Milan, except the towns of Como and Novara. Sforza had retired to Novara, where he was inveſted by the French; but on the news that ten thouſand Swiſs, followed by a ſecond army of five thouſand, were advancing to the relief of the place; which it was found impoſſible to take by aſſault; the breach being not yet practicable, la Trémouille determined to ſuſpend the operations of the ſiege, and march to attack the Swiſs before their two armies ſhould have effected a junction. Triulzi received orders to proceed, without ſtopping, as far as Trecario; but under pretence that his troops were fatigued, he pitched his camp on the road in a marſhy place, where the different corps of the army were ſo divided that it was impoſſible for them, in caſe of attack, to afford timely aſſiſtance to each other. La Trémouille, on his arrival with the rear of the army, immediately reproached Triulzi with the fault he had committed, which he would fain have repaired by continuing his march, but it was too late, and he was compelled to paſs the night on the ſpot. The next morning (June the ſixth) before day-break he was attacked by the Swiſs, whoſe forces were ſuperior to his own, as a part of his troops were ſtill in Savoy: la Trémouille drew up his army in order of battle, while his artillery made conſiderable havock among the enemy; but, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, the French and Lanſquenets were routed, and ſeven thouſand of them left dead on the field. La Trémouille, who was wounded in the action, effected his retreat with the remainder of his troops to Vercelli, whence he proceeded to Suſa. The French loſt on this occaſion ſeven-and-twenty pieces of cannon.

Lewis was wholly unable to afford his allies that effectual relief which their diſtreſſed ſituation required; his dominions were threatened with attacks on every ſide, and his troops barely ſufficient to defend his kingdom againſt the numerous enemies with which it was ſurrounded. Picardy and Burgundy were expoſed to imminent danger, but the miſconduct of the Engliſh ſaved the one, and the prudence of la Trémouille preſerved the other.

Five-and-twenty thouſand Swiſs made an irruption into Franche-Comté, where they were joined by a body of Imperialiſts, and after laying waſte the country, they laid ſiege to Dijon. That place was not in a ſtate of defence; yet la Trémouille, who was governor of Burgundy, threw himſelf into it, with the reſolution to hold out to the laſt extremity; and when the town ſhould be no longer tenable, to repair to ſome other, ſo as to prevent the enemy from penetrating to the capital. The magiſtrates and people of Dijon were in the greateſt conſternation; the Gendarmes had entered the city, and were diſtributed in different parts, with orders to encourage the citizens; the infantry were poſted on the ramparts, the cannon pointed, and the gates blocked up except two—that which led to Paris, left open for the convenience of receiving ſuccours, and facilitating a retreat, in caſe of neceſſity; and that which faced the enemy's camp. The governor ſent an officer to the king to demand ſuccours, while Mouſſii had orders—which he could not execute—to open a negociation with the Swiſs. The people, in alarm, followed the magiſtrates to the palace, whither la Trémouille had ſummoned them to attend: he there reproached them with their want of ſpirit: "If we cannot "conquer"—ſaid he—"we can at leaſt hold out till the arrival of ſuccours, "which are not far off. Obſerve our preparations; look on that formidable "train of artillery; the very ſight of it has already ſtricken the Swiſs with terror; "what, then, will be the caſe, when it ſhall begin to play upon them?" But the eloquence of la Trémouille was inſufficient to revive the drooping ſpirits of the inhabitants. La Trémouille, immediately took his reſolution, and repaired to the enemy's camp, where, without betraying any ſymptoms of fear, or aſſuming a miſplaced confidence, he offered them peace. "On two conditions"—replied the Swiſs—"we will accept it;—Money for ourſelves, and Burgundy for the "emperor." This propoſal was rejected with diſdain by la Trémouille, who harangued the Swiſs with ſo much energy, that thoſe who had at firſt been moſt violent againſt him, now liſtened to him with patience; meanwhile his ſecret partiſans exerted their influence; and the Swiſs, by degrees, began to relax: he ſeized, with judicious eagerneſs, the favourable moment, and inſtantaneouſly concluded a treaty, by which he engaged to pay them ſix hundred thouſaud crowns, part of which was immediately advanced; and for the payment of the remainder he gave them his nephew and ſome other perſons as hoſtages: he aſſured the Swiſs that the king ſhould be reconciled to them, ſhould renouce the council of Piſa, and cede to them ſeveral places in the Milaneſe. The inhabitants of Dijon were tranſported with joy at the news of this treaty: they chearfully contributed to ſupply a part of the promiſed ſum.

While the Swiſs were in Burgundy, Henry, king of England, had landed at Calais, with an army of fifty thouſand men: he was ſoon after joined by Maximilian, with ſome German and Flemiſh ſoldiers, who were uſeful in giving an example of diſcipline to Henry's new-levied forces.

Before the arrival of Henry and Maximilian in the Engliſh camp, the earl of Shrewſbury and lord Herbert, who had landed firſt with the vanguard of the army, had formed the ſiege of Terouane, a town ſituated on the frontiers of Picardy. Teligny and Crequi, who commanded in the town, made a ſtout reſiſtance, but at the expiration of a month, finding themſelves without proviſions, they appriſed the king of their ſituation, who ſent orders to de Pinnes, governor of the province, to throw relief into the place. Fontrailles appeared at the head of eight hundred horſemen, each of whom carried a ſack of gunpowder and two quarters of bacon behind him. With this ſmall force he made an unexpected irruption into the Engliſh camp, and, ſurmounting all reſiſtance, advanced to the foſſée of the town, where each horſeman threw down his burden. They immediately returned on a gallop, and were ſo fortunate as again to break through the Engliſh, and to ſuffer little or no loſs in this dangerous attempt.

The governors were obliged, ſoon after, to ſurrender, and Henry found his acquiſition of ſo little moment, though gained at the expence of ſome blood, and much valuable time, that he immediately demoliſhed the fortifications, in direct violation of the terms of capitulation.*

Maximilian, deſirous of freeing his grandſon from a troubleſome neighbour, adviſed the king of England to lay ſiege to Tournay; and Henry, not conſidering that ſuch an acquſition would nowiſe advance his conqueſts in France, was ſo imprudent as to follow this intereſted council. The city of Tournay, by its ancient charters, being exempted from the burden of a garriſon, the burghers, againſt the remonſtrance of their ſovereign, ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on maintaining this dangerous privilege; and they engaged, by themſelves, to make a vigorous defence againſt the enemy. They found themſelves, however, inadequate to the taſk, and, after a few days ſiege, the place was ſurrendered to the Engliſh†. The biſhop of Tournay was lately dead, and as a new biſhop was already elected by the chapter, but not inſtalled in his office, the king of England beſtowed the adminiſtration of the ſee on his favourite, the celebrated cardinal Wolſey. Hearing of the retreat of the Swiſs from Burgundy, and obſerving the ſeaſon to be far advanced, Henry thought proper to return to England; and he carried the greater part of his army with him.

Lewis was thus unexpectedly delivered from a danger as formidable as any that had ever threatened the French monarchy; he was however, tired of the war; and the queen inceſſantly repeating to him that he could never expect to ſee it brought to a concluſion ſo long as he continued at variance with the ſovereign pontiff, Lewis, at length, yielded to her importunate ſolicitations, and ſuffered her to make overtures to Leo, which were favourably received by that pontiff, who did not wiſh to promote the ruin of France, but only to prevent her from obtaining the duchy of Milan. An accommodation was accordingly effected between Lewis and the pope, the former having previouſly renounced the council of Piſa, and acknowledged that of Lateran, in conſequence whereof the king and kingdom were abſolved from all the cenſures which had been pronounced againſt them.

A. D. 1514.] The queen did not live to reap the fruits of this accomodation, which ſhe regarded as her own work; ſhe expired at Blois, on the ninth of February, 1514, regretted by the nation, and deeply lamented by the king, by whom ſhe was tenderly beloved. The averſion of Anne for the counteſs of Angouléme, had made her conceive a diſlike to the young duke of Valois, the conſummation of whoſe marriage with her daughter Claude had, on that account, been hitherto prevented; but ſoon after her death, on the fourteenth of May, 1514, the nuptials were celebrated at Saint Germain-en-Laye.

* Mezerai, tom. vii. p. 214. † Mezerai, ubi ſupra.

The Swiſs, enraged with the king for his refuſal to ratify the treaty they had concluded with la Trémouille, now meditated a freſh invaſion of Burgundy, and were buſily employed in raiſing troops for that purpoſe; but the pope, fearful that Lewis might be unable to ſuſtain a ſecond campaign againſt ſuch a powerful confederacy, undertook to appeaſe the Swiſs, and an accommodation might have been effected, had Lewis poſſeſſed leſs candour and ſincerity; but it was a peculiar misfortune attending this prince, that his virtues generally proved prejudicial to his intereſts. The pope required, as a previous condition, the abſolute renunciation of the duchy of Milan; but Lewis aſſured him it was impoſſible to comply with his demand, ſince that duchy had been united to the domain of the crown.

Lewis, who ſtill grieved for the loſs of Anne, his late queen, had no inclination to marry again; but the account he received of the charms of Mary, joined to his deſire of promoting the happineſs of his people, by the reſtoration of peace, were motives too ſtrong to be reſiſted, and he accordingly gave Longueville full powers for negociating the treaty. The articles were eaſily adjuſted between the monarchs. Lewis agreed that Tournay ſhould remain in the hands of the Engliſh; that Henry ſhould receive payment of ſix hundred thouſand crowns,* as well for arrears of the penſion promiſed by the treaties of Pĕquigny and Eſtampes, as to reimburſe him for the expences of the war; and that the princeſs Mary ſhould bring four hundred thouſand crowns as her portion, and enjoy as large a jointure as any queen of France, even the laſt, who was heireſs of Brittany. The two princes alſo agreed on ſuccours with which they ſhould mutually ſupply each other, in caſe either of them were attacked by an enemy.† In conſequence of this treaty, Mary was ſent over to France with a ſplendid retinue, and Lewis met her at Abbeville, where the nuptials were celebrated on the tenth of October, 1514.

A. D. 1515.] This marriage diffuſed an univerſal joy throughout the kingdom, and the court became a ſcene of feſtivity and pleaſure. Lewis was enchanted with the beauty, grace, and numerous accompliſhments of his youthful conſort, for whoſe gratification he totally changed his manner of living; but, unfortunately, his exceſs of affection proved prejudicial to his health; by ſtimulating a diſpoſition naturally amorous, it led him to indulge too freely in thoſe enjoyments which are ill-ſuited to the autumn of life. He had been frequently heard to repeat, that —"Love is the king of young, but the tyrant of old men;" and he was condemed to experience the truth of that maxim. His conſtitution, already ſhaken, received an additional ſhock, from a fit of the gout and a ſlow fever; yet ſtill he continued his preparations for an invaſion of Italy; the troops had already advanced to the frontiers, and only waited the return of ſpring to paſs the mountains. The Venetians, having rejected the ſolicitations of the pope, to conclude a treaty with the emperor, had conſiderably augmented their forces, and were reſolved to ſecond the operations of Lewis. On the other hand, the Swiſs had undertaken to guard the Alps, and threatened to exterminate the French. But the execution of theſe projects were, for a time, ſuſpended, by the death of the beſt of kings, who, in addition to his other diſorders, was ſeized with a dyſentery, at the palace of the Tournelles, in Paris, which brought him to the grave, on the firſt of January, 1515, in the ſeventeenth year of his reign, and the fifty-fourth of his age.

* Mezerai, tom. vii. p. 218. † Du Tillet.

The ſuperior integrity of Lewis, in an age when moſt of the European princes were actuated by a ſpirit of perfidy, and made intereſt the grand object of their purſuits, and the ſole rule of their conduct, merits the higheſt commendations which the pen of the hiſtorian can beſtow. A profeſſed enemy to falſhood and equivocation, he puniſhed with ſeverity every deviation from truth. Frank, open, candid, affable, and gay, he conciliated the affections of all who knew him, while his attention to the welfare and felicitity of his ſubjects, procured him the honourable appellation of The Father of his People. As a politician, indeed, his abilities may be called in queſtion; though the failure of his ſchemes may, in general, be aſcribed to the excellence of his principles; and the monarch who becomes a dupe to his virtues cannot fail to ſecure the eſteem of poſterity, while the prince who is indebted for his ſucceſs to his vices, muſt be holden in perpetual abhorrence.

Lewis the Twelfth had, by his conſort, Anne of Brittany, widow to Charles the Eighth, two ſons, who died in their infancy, and two daughters, Claude married to Francis the Firſt, and Renée, who eſpouſed the duke of Ferrara.

Francis had been greatly ſtricken with the charms of the Engliſh princeſs Mary, wife to Lewis; and, even during his predeceſſor's life-time, had paid her ſuch aſſiduous court, as made ſome of his friends apprehend that he had a deſign upon her perſon. Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, was, at that time, at the court of France, the moſt comely perſonage of his time, and the moſt expert in all the faſhionable exerciſes of the age. He was the Engliſh monarch's principal favourite, and Henry had even once intended to give him his ſiſter in marriage, and had encouraged a paſſion between the youthful pair. The queen now aſked Suffolk whether he had the courage, without farther reflection, to eſpouſe her? and ſhe told him that her brother would more eaſily be induced to forgive him for not aſking his conſent, than for acting contrary to his orders. Suffolk had too much ſpirit to decline ſuch an inviting offer; and their nuptials were ſecretly celebrated at Paris. Francis interpoſed his good offices in appeaſing him; and his interpoſition being ſeconded by the Engliſh miniſter Wolſey, Suffolk and his conſort obtained permiſſion to return to England.

FRANCIS THE FIRST.

A. D. 1515.] WITH Lewis the Twelfth expired the elder branch of the houſe of Orleans, and the ſceptre of France was transferred to that of Angouleme. Francis the firſt ſucceeded his great-uncle Lewis, without oppoſition or difficulty: the order of ſucceſſion was firmly eſtabliſhed; and this was the third time, ſince the acceſſion of the monarchs of the Capetian race, that the crown, in default of heirs male, had paſſed to a collateral branch. The coronation of Francis was performed at Rheims, on the twenty-fifth of January, amidſt the acclamations of a people, whoſe affections his external endowments and popular manners were well calculated to acquire. But the adulation he received had a fatal effect on his conduct, by inflating his pride, and flattering his ambition. The firſt act of authority he performed, proved the ſtrength of his filial affection—the county of Angouleme was, in favour of his mother, converted into a duchy; the patent of the creation is dated the fourth of February, 1515.

After regulating the internal adminiſtration of his kingdom, Francis turned his attention to foreign affairs. His firſt care was to renew the treaty of peace which his predeceſſor had concluded with Henry the Eighth. He received homage from the count of Naſſau, in the name of his maſter, the archduke Charles, from the counties of Flanders, Artois, and Charolois; and he concluded a treaty with that prince, the terms of which it is needleſs to ſpecify, as the treaty itſelf was annulled by another which was ſigned between Charles and Francis, the following year.

During theſe tranſactions an attempt was made to procure a renewal and prolongation of the truce with Spain, but this Ferdinand refuſed, unleſs Italy and the Milaneſe were included in the treaty; and Francis having rejected with diſdain a propoſal which tended to thwart his favourite project, the king of Arragon entered into a league with the emperor Sforza and the Swiſs, for the defence of the Milaneſe: The Swiſs engaged to make an irruption into Burgundy, and to ſpread terror and devaſtation throughout that fertile province. The pope, at firſt, heſitated to join this formidable confederacy, but was at length, in the month of July, induced to accede to it. The Venetians, whoſe ſafety in a great meaſure depended on the protection of France, renewed with Francis the treaty they had ſigned with his predeceſſor. The king, meanwhile, continued to make the moſt formidable preparations, amuſed the pope by negociations, which Leo thought neceſſary for the concealment of his deſigns, ſecured the Genoeſe in his intereſt, and engaged Octavian Fregoſa to quit the title of doge for that of governor for the king.—Every thing being ready for his expedition, the king left Lyons on the fifteenth of Auguſt, after he had appointed his mother, Louiſa of Savoy, regent of the kingdom during his abſence.

In order to ſupply the neceſſary funds for his Italian expedition, Francis had recourſe to meaſures the moſt arbitrary and impolitic. It was on this occaſion that the offices of the crown were firſt expoſed to ſale, at the inſtigation of the chancellor Duprat* ; a dangerous innovaſion, which was ſtrongly oppoſed by the parliament, who refuſed to regiſter it without the uſual clauſe, in all caſes where their own judgment was compelled to yield to the plenitude of the regal power, that it was entered in the regiſters, by the expreſs command of the king†.

The army deſtined for this enterpriſe was formidable from its numbers, and ſplendid from the rank of its officers and commanders. Beſides a great number of nobility, the king was attended by ſeven princes of the blood-royal. The Swiſs, after laying waſte the duchy of Savoy, had ſecured all the paſſages of the Alps, to force which it would have been neceſſary to ſuſtain an action at every defile, in which twenty men might impede the progreſs of an whole army. Triulzi received imformation, from a peaſant who inhabited the mountains, of a ſecret path, which was left unguarded, becauſe believed to be impracticable; and having previouſly explored it, it was reſolved to purſue it. It was neceſſary to blow up ſeveral points of rocks which intercepted the paſſage of the troops; and Peter Navarre, who had entered the French ſervice, becauſe the king of Spain had refuſed to pay his ranſom when taken priſoner at the battle of Ravenna, rendered eſſential ſervice to Francis on this occaſion: both the army and the artillery reached the oppoſite ſide of the Alps in ſafety, and unperceived by the Swiſs, whoſe attention was called to another quarter, by ſome troops of horſe, ſtationed purpoſely to amuſe them, on mount Cenis. The French deſcended the Alps into the marquiſate of Saluzzo, and Bayard ſurpriſed Proſper Colonna, the general of the papal forces, who, ignorant of the approach of the French, was negligently encamped, with a thouſand cavalry, at Villa-Franca, near the ſource of the Po‡. But two men of the whole detachment eſcaped: the reſt were all killed or taken.

This ſucceſsful beginning inſpired the French troops with additional courage; while the allies remained in a ſtate of ſuſpence, and diviſions and miſtruſt began

† When the practice of verifying and regiſtering the royal edicts in the parliament of Paris became common, the parliament contended that this was neceſſary in order to give them legal authority. It was eſtabliſhed as a fundamental maxim in French juriſprudence, that no law could be publiſhed in any other manner; that, without this formality, no edict or ordonnance could have any effect; that the people were not bound to obey it, and ought not to conſider it as an edict or ordonnance, until it was verified in the ſupreme court, after free deliberation. to prevail among them. The Swiſs were the only enemies who were actuated by hoſtile zeal and violent reſentment; enraged at their failure in preventing the French from paſſing the Alps, they had retired into the duchy of Milan, with the reſolution to defend it to the laſt extremity. The king, meanwhile, had joined his army in the plains of Quieras; and the town of Novara immediately ſurrendered to his arms. The Swiſs continued to retreat before him, as if anxious to avoid a battle; owing to a diſpute with the cardinal of Sion, who had arreſted one of their chiefs, named Albert. The cardinal was obliged to releaſe Albert, who took the road to Berne with a part of his companions, while the reſt of their troops lent a favourable ear to a propoſal made by the duke of Savoy, in the king's name, to advance them ſeven hundred thouſand crowns, and to give Maximilian Sforza an eſtabliſhment in France. The treaty appeared to be on the point of concluſion, when the arrival of ten thouſand of their countrymen, and the powerful exhortations of the cardinal of Sion, made the Swiſs change their mind; they marched forwards to attack the lines of the French, who were encamped at Marignano, about a league from Milan.

Hiſtory ſcarce affords any example of a battle diſputed with greater obſtinacy than that of Marignano. It began about four in the afternoon of the thirteenth of September, and laſted more than three hours after the night cloſed; when laſſitude and darkneſs ſeparated the combatants, without abating their animoſity.—The king, who paſſed the night completely armed, on the carriage of a cannon, was ſurpriſed to find himſelf at dawn of day, within a few paces of the enemy, who renewed the charge with renovated vigour. The black bands, ſo called from the colour of their ſtandards, commanded by the duke of Guiſe, in the abſence of his uncle, the duke of Gueldres, who had given way the day before, now retrived their honour, by the moſt ſpirited and ſucceſsful exertions. The Swiſs, repulſed on every ſide, and perceiving Alviano approaching with a choſen body of Venetian cavalry, returned to Milan, without being purſued by the French. Diſcouraged at the loſs they had ſuſtained, and unable to procure any money from Sforza, who had none to give them, they left him fifteen hundred of their men to defend the caſtle of Milan, and haſtened back to their own country. Francis remained maſter of the field, which was ſtrewed with the bodies of ten thouſand Swiſs, and from three to four thouſand of the French, among whom were many of the nobility.

The king would not ſuffer the Swiſs to be moleſted in their retreat; but Alviano, who did not arrive till the end of the action, anxious to ſhare in the glory of the day, attacked the rear of the Swiſs; the attempt proved unſucceſsful, and was attended with the loſs of many officers of note. Triulzi, who had been preſent at ſeventeen pitched battles, ſaid, that "that of Marignano was a combat of giants, and all the reſt but mere children's play!"—The king rewarded the valour of the chevalier Bayard by receiving the honour of knighthood from his hands.

The terror which the battle of Marignano inſpired, together with the departure of the Swiſs, left Maximilian Sforza almoſt deſtitute of aſſiſtance. Yet he ſought to prolong the moments of his ſovereignty by retiring into the caſtle of Milan, while Francis took poſſeſſion of the city; but that fortreſs was incapable of withſtanding the ardour of the French, directed by the duke of Bourbon. It was ſurrendered to that general, together with the city of Cremona; but Sforza obtained, at leaſt, honourable terms from the victor; and a ſafe retreat, with a penſion of thirty thouſand ducats, was aſſigned him in France. Deſtitute of ambition, and of talents, he gladly retired from a ſituation to which he was unequal, and, at laſt, expired at Paris, after lingering fifteen years through a life of contempt.

When the king made his entry into Milan, he exacted an oath of allegiance from the inhabitants, and eſtabliſhed a parliament, in imitation of his predeceſſor, after which, he paſſed a week in viſiting the different towns of the duchy.

Leo the Tenth, verſed in all the refinements of Italian policy, abandoned with their fortunes, the cauſe his allies. He courted an interview with Francis; and that monarch ſuffered himſelf to be conducted, by the cardinals de Fieſco, and de Medicis, to the city of Bologna. The treaty was ſoon concluded; Leo agreed to withdraw his troops from the cities of Parma and Piacenza; in return for which conceſſion, Francis conſented to abandon the duke di Urbino, an uncertain ally, and the declared enemy of the houſe of Medicis, in whoſe favour he was deſpoiled of his duchy: Had the king gone no farther, his policy would not have been prejudicial to the nation, but he was ſo weak as to accede to the pope's propoſal for the total abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction—an abolition deſtructive of the privileges of the Gallican church—for which he ſubſtituted the Concordat, whereby Leo ceded to Francis the right of appointing biſhops and abbots, throughout the French dominions; and the king, in return, granted the pope the Annates, or firſt fruits of thoſe eccleſiaſtical benefices*. The parliament long refuſed to regiſter the Concordat, continued to regulate their deciſions according to the Pragmatic Sanction, and confirmed the oppoſition of the univerſity. The clergy, too, called loudly for the convocation of a national council; but the authority of the king prevailed, and the parliament were, at length, obliged, much againſt their will, to give the diſgraceful compact a place on their regiſters, where it was inſerted, on the twenty-ſecond of March, 1518, with the uſual clauſe of diſapprobation.

While the king thus ſuffered himſelf to be duped by the artful adulation of the pope, his miniſters concluded a more honourable and more advantageous treaty with the Swiſs; by which they conſented to acknowlege Francis for duke of Milan, count of Aſt, and lord of Genoa; engaged to aſſiſt that monarch, and to defend his dominions, and to reſtore all the places they held in the Milaneſe, except Bellinzone. The king, on his part, engaged to pay them ſix hundred thouſand crowns, and the annual penſion which they received before their rupture with Lewis the Twelfth: but five cantons having refuſed to ſubſcribe theſe conditions, the others ſtipulated that they ſhould never be obliged to bear arms againſt their countrymen.

* Mezerai, tom. vii. p. 249.

A. D. 1516.] The victory of Marignano had inſpired with terror the mind of Ferdinand of Arragon; the accommodation with the pope, and the treaty with the Swiſs, which he had, in vain, exerted his utmoſt efforts to prevent, had encreaſed his alarm; he trembled for the throne of Naples, and, anxious to avert the danger with which he conceived himſelf to be threatened, he endeavoured to revive the animoſity of the neighbouring powers, and once more to excite a formidable confederacy againſt France; but death put a ſtop to his plans. He died on the twenty-third day of January, 1516. By his will he left the archduke Charles ſole heir of all his dominions, and allotted to Ferdinand, brother to Charles, a ſcanty penſion of fifty thouſand ducats; the regency of Caſtile was committed to cardinal Ximenes, and the archbiſhop of Saragoſſa was appointed regent of Arragon.

Meanwhile the French, who now only acted as auxiliaries to the Venetians in Italy, formed the ſiege of Breſcia, under the command of mareſchal Lautrec, whoſe brother Triulzi, had been appointed general of the Venetian forces on the death of Alviano. The garriſon agreed to ſurrender if not relieved within twenty days; but the German general, Roquendolf, haſtened to their aſſiſtance, with a body of ſix thouſand men, and was cloſe followed by the whole Imperial army, led by Maximilian himſelf. On the emperor's arrival Lautrec raiſed the ſiege, and retired with precipitation to Milan, where the alarm was ſo great that Maximilian might eaſily have made himſelf maſter of the city; but, inſtead of marching directly to Milan, he amuſed himſelf by laying waſte the country between the Po and the Adda, and thereby gave time to the conſtable to put himſelf in ſtate of defence. In the city of Milan there were thirteen thouſand Swiſs, in the pay of France, but as they refuſed to fight againſt their countrymen, who were in the Imperial army, the conſtable diſmiſſed them. Maximilian, who inveſted Milan, was ſoon reduced to the ſame dilemma; his Swiſs troops demanded their pay, and the emperor having diſſipated the money that was deſtined for that purpoſe, they mutinied, and returned to their own country. The Germans, too, diſperſed, and the whole army evacuated Italy.

During theſe tranſactions Charles, anxious to take poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh dominions, and deſirous to ſecure, during his abſence, the Netherlands from invaſion, evinced a ſtrong diſpoſition to maintain peace with France: the Flemings, too, who had long poſſeſſed an extenſive commerce, which, during the league of Cambray, had grown to a great height upon the ruins of the Venetian trade, dreaded a rupture with that power; and Chievres, the Flemiſh miniſter, ſagacious to diſcern the true intereſts of his country, warmly adopted the ſame ſentiments. Francis, ſolicituous to ſecure his late conqueſts in Italy by a treaty, liſtened with joy to the firſt overtures of accommodation. Chievres himſelf conducted the negociation, in the name of Charles, while Boiſi appeared as plenipotentionary for Francis. They concluded, on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, 1516*, a treaty of confederacy and mutual defence between the two monarchs. This alliance not only united Charles and Francis, but obliged Maximilian, who was unable alone to cope with the French and Venetians, to enter into a treaty with thoſe powers, which put a final period to the bloody and tedious war which the league of Cambray had occaſioned. This treaty was ſigned at Bruxelles, in the month of December, 1516, and comfirmed by an other treaty, concluded at Combray, in the month of March following.

A. D. 1517.] About the ſame period a more durable treaty was ſigned between the French and Swiſs; the five cantons who had refuſed to ſubſcribe the former conditions, now joined their countrymen, and acceded to a treaty of perpetual alliance: in conſideration of an additional penſion, they promiſed never to ſerve againſt France; and this treaty has ſubſiſted till the preſent time, without any alteration.

A. D. 1518.] The conſtable de Bourbon had been recalled from the Milaneſe, and was ſucceeded in his government by the mareſchal de Lautrac, who, intoxicated with the favour he enjoyed, and jealous of Triulzi, repreſented that gallant veteran, at the court of France, as a ſecret enemy to the country he profeſſed to ſerve. Triulzi, juſtly incenſed at this malicious imputation, immediately haſtened to France, in order to juſtify his conduct; but the reception he experienced from Francis, who, having inconſiderately given implicit credit to the baſe inſinuations of Lautrec, did not deign to ſpeak to him, made ſuch an impreſſion on his mind, as ſoon brought him to the grave. The death of Triulzi tended to alienate the affections of the Milaneſe, and their particular deteſtation of Lautrec, was ſpeedily converted into a general hatred of his countrymen.

Bonnevet, admiral of France, was now diſpatched to London, in order to gain the confidence and friendſhip of Henry the Eighth; and he was directed to employ all his inſinuation and addreſs, qualities in which he excelled, to procure himſelf a place in the good graces of Cardinal Wolſey, that monarch's prime miniſter and chief favourite. After the ambaſſador had ſucceeded in his purpoſe, he took an opportunity of expreſſing his maſter's regret, that, by miſtakes and miſapprehenſions, he had been ſo unfortunate as to loſe a friendſhip which he ſo much valued as that of his eminence. Wolſey was not deaf to theſe honourable advances from ſo great a monarch; and he thenceforth expreſſed himſelf in favour of the French alliance.

When matters ſeemed to be ſufficiently prepared, Bonnivet opened to the cardinal his maſter's deſire of recovering Tournay; and Wolſey, immediately, without heſitation, engaged to effect his purpoſe. He took an opportunity of repreſenting to Henry and the Engliſh counil, that Tournay lay ſo remote from Calais, that it would be very difficult, if not impoſſible, in caſe of war, to keep the communication open between theſe two places: that as it was ſituated on the frontiers both of France and the Netherlands, it muſt neceſſarily, either by force or famine, fall into the hands of the firſt aſſailant.

Theſe reaſons being deemed convincive by the Engliſh council, a treaty was concluded for the ceſſion of Tournay; and in order to give that meaſure a more graceful appearance, it was agreed that the dauphin and the princeſs Mary, daughter to Henry, both of them infants, ſhould be betrothed, and that this city ſhould be conſidered as the dowry of the princeſs. But as Henry had been at conſiderable expence in the erection of a citadel at Tournay, Franeis agreed to pay him ſix hundred thouſand crowns at twelve annual payments, and to put into his hands eight hoſtages, all of them noblemen, for the performance of the article*: and leſt cardinal Wolſey ſhould think himſelf neglected in theſe ſtipulations, Francis promiſed him a yearly penſion of twelve thouſand livres as an equivalent for his adminiſtration of the biſhoprick of Tournay. Wolſey attempted to procure the reſtitution of Calais, but found ſuch a ſtrenuous oppoſition to the diſtant overtures which he made for that purpoſe in the Engliſh council, that he did not think it prudent to proceed any farther in the buſineſs.

A. D. 1519.] But while Francis was diligenty employed in ſecuring the amity of the neighbouring powers, an event occurred, that formed a kind of æra in the general ſyſtem of Europe. This was the death of the emperor Maximilian, who expired at Lintz upon the Danube, on the twelfth of January, 1519.

On the death of Maximilian two candidates aſpired to the vacant dignity, Francis and Charles, and the attention of all Europe was fixed upon this competition, no leſs illuſtrious from the high rank of the candidates, than from the importance of the prize for which they contended. Each urged his pretenſions with ſanguine expectations, and no unpromiſing proſpect of ſucceſs. Charles conſidered the Imperial crown as belonging to him of right, from its long continuance in the Auſtrian line; he knew that no one of the German princes was ſufficiently powerful to become his rival; he flattered himſelf that no conſideration would induce the natives of Germany to exalt any foreign potentate to a dignity, which, during ſo many ages, had been deemed peculiar to their own nation; and leaſt of all, that they would confer this honour upon Francis, the ſovereign of a people whoſe genius, laws, and manners differed ſo widely from thoſe of the Germans, that it was hardly poſſible to eſtabliſh any cordial union between them. He did not, however, truſt the ſucceſs of his cauſe to theſe alone. Great ſums of money were remitted from Spain; and a conſiderable body of troops kept on foot by the ſtates of the circle of Suabia was ſecretly taken into his pay. The venal were gained by preſents; the objections of the more ſcrupulous were anſwered or eluded; and ſome feeble princes were threatened or overawed.†

Francis, on the other hand, ſupported his claim with equal eagerneſs, and no leſs confidence of its being founded on juſtice. It was contended by his emmiſaries, that it was now high time to convince the princes of the houſe of Auſtria that the Imperial crown was elective, and not hereditary; that other perſons might aſpire to an honour which their arrogance had, at length, led them to regard as the property of their family; that it required a ſovereign of mature judgment and approved abilities, to hold the reins of government in a country where ſuch unknown opinions concerning religion had been publiſhed (alluding to the doctrines of the reformers, then recently propagated) as had thrown the minds of men into an uncommon agitation, which threatened to be productive of the moſt violent effects. That the election of Charles would be inconſiſtent with a fundamental conſtitution, by which the perſon that holds the crown of Naples is excluded from aſpiring to the Imperial dignity; that his elevation to that honour would ſoon kindle a war in Italy, on account of his pretenſions to the duchy of Milan, the effects of which could not fail of reaching the empire, and might prove fatal to it.* As the expeditious method of tranſmitting money, and the decent mode of conveying a bribe by bills of exchange, was then little known, the French ambaſſadors travelled with a train of horſes loaded with treaſure.

Such was the ſituation of affairs when the diet was opened at Frankfort, on the ſeventeenth of June. The right of chuſing an emperor had long been veſted in ſeven great princes, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Electors. But, notwithſtanding the ſpecious arguments produced by the ambaſſadors of Charles and Francis, in favour of their reſpective maſters, and in ſpite of all their ſolicitations, intrigues, and preſents, the electors did not forget that maxim on which the liberty of the German conſtitution was thought to be founded. To elect either of the contending monarchs would have been a groſs violation of that ſalutary maxim; would have given to the empire a maſter inſtead of a head; and would have reduced themſelves from the rank of equals to the condition of ſubjects.†

Impreſſed with theſe ideas, all the electors directed their eyes to Frederick, duke of Saxony, a prince, who from the dignity of his virtues, and the ſplendour of his talents, had acquired the honourable appellation of The Sage, and they unanimouſly offered him the Imperial crown. Unſeduced by an object ſo alluring, Frederick required a ſhort time for deliberation, and magnanimouſly rejected the proffered diadem. His rejection of a gift which the proudeſt monarchs had courted with avidity, was accompanied by an obſervation on the impolicy of invariably adhering to a maxim, which, though juſt in many caſes, could not be applicable to all. "In times of tranquillity"—ſaid Frederick—"we wiſh for an "emperor who has not power to invade our liberties; times of danger require "one who has the ability to provide for our ſafety. The Turkiſh armies are "now aſſembling under the conduct of a prince diſtinguiſhed for his gallantry, "and fluſhed with conqueſt. They are preparing to ruſh like a torrent upon "Germany, with a violence unprecedented in former times. New conjectures call "for new expedients. Some hand more potent than mine, or that of any other

* Guicciardini.—La Palinus.—Robertſon. † Robertſon.

" German prince, muſt, at this period, be entruſted with the Imperial ſceptre; " for we poſſeſs neither dominions, revenues, nor authority, which can enable " us to face ſuch a formidable foe. Recourſe, therefore, muſt be had to one " of the rival monarchs, each of whom can bring into the field forces ſufficient " for our defence. But as the king of Spain is of German extraction; as he " is a member and prince of the empire, by the territories he inherits from " his grandfather; as his dominions lie contiguous to the frontier which is moſt " expoſed to attack; his claim is, in my opinion, preferable to that of a ſtranger " to our language, to our blood, and to our country; and, therefore, I give my " vote to raiſe him to the Imperial throne."

This opinion dictated by ſuch uncommon generoſity, and ſupported by arguments ſo plauſible, made a deep impreſſion on the electors. The Spaniſh party among the electors daily gained ground; and even the pope's nuncio, convinced of the inutility of farther oppoſition, endeavoured to acquire ſome merit with the future emperor, by offering voluntarily, in the name of his maſter, a diſpenſation to hold the Imperial crown in conjunction with that of Naples.*

On the twenty-eighth of June, five months and ten days after the death of Maximilian, this important conteſt, which had holden all Europe in ſuſpence, was decided. Six of the electors had already declared for the king of Spain; and the archbiſhop of Treves, the only firm adherent to the French intereſt, having, at laſt, joined his brethren, Charles was, by the unanimous voice of the electoral college, raiſed to the imperial throne, under the title of Charles the Fifth.

The French ambaſſador, Bonnivet, who had entertained the moſt ſanguine expectations of ſucceſs, was ſo mortified at the diſappointment he experienced on this occaſion, that it was ſome time before he could prevail upon himſelf to make his appearance at court. Francis himſelf, although he had been frequently heard to ſay to the Spaniſh ambaſſadors—" Your maſter and I are ſuitors to the " ſame miſtreſs; the more fortunate will carry her; but the other muſt remain content- " ed"—was equally mortified with his ambaſſador, though he took care to diſguiſe his feelings. From this moment, Charles, more fortunate or more politic, appears to have acquired an aſcendancy over Francis, which he always preſerved.

A. D. 1520.] Francis, alarmed at the augmented ſplendour and power of Charles, and mortified at the preference given to that prince in the ſight of all Europe, endeavoured, by a ſtrict alliance with Henry, to balance the acquiſion of his rival. He had before ſolicited an interview with the Engliſh monarch, which Charles had in vain endeavoured to prevent, by making a voyage to England, where he flattered the king, and detached his favourite Wolſey from the intereſt of France. Whatever impreſſion the engaging manners of Francis, or the liberal and unſuſpicious confidence with which he treated Henry, made on the mind of that monarch, was ſoon effaced by Wolſey's artifices, or by an interview he had with the emperor at Gravelines, on the tenth of July; which was conducted by Charles with leſs pomp than that near Guiſnes, but with greater attention to his political intereſt.

A. D. 1521.] By the treaty of Noyon, Charles had agreed to do juſtice to John d'Albret, the excluded monarch of Navarre, whom Francis was bound in honour, and prompted by intereſt, to reſtore to his throne; but though frequent applications had been made to Charles for the purpoſe, he continually eluded them upon frivolous pretexts; and Francis, therefore, thought himſelf authoriſed by that treaty to aſſiſt the exiled family. Henry d'Albret had ſucceeded to the claims of his father John, and an army, levied in his name, was deſtined under the conduct of Andrew de Foix, lord of Leſparre, and brother to Laurrec, to reſtore him to the throne of his anceſtors. The juncture appeared peculiarly favourable for ſuch an enterpriſe, Charles was at a diſtance from that part of his dominions; the troops uſually ſtationed there had been called away to quell the commotions in Spain; the Spaniſh malecontents warmly ſolicited Francis to invade Navarre, in which a conſiderable faction was ready to declare for the deſcendants of their ancient monarchs. Leſparre had neither talents nor experience for the diſcharge of that important truſt to which, through the powerful influence of his connections, he had been recommended; but as there was no army in the field to oppoſe him, he reduced in a few days the whole kingdom, without meeting with any obſtruction but from the city of Pampeluna; nor would the ſlight reſiſtance made by that fortreſs have deſerved notice, if Ignatius Loyola, a gentleman of Biſcay, had not been dangerouſly wounded in its defence. During the ſlow progreſs of a lingering cure, Loyola happened to have no other amuſement than what he could find in the peruſal of the lives of the ſaints. The effect of ſuch reading on his mind, naturally enthuſiaſtic, but ambitious and daring, was to inſpire him with ſuch a deſire of emulating the glory of theſe "fabulous worthies of the Roman church," as led him into the wildeſt and moſt extravagant adventures, which terminated in the inſtitution of the ſociety of Jeſuits, the moſt political and beſt regulated of all the monaſtic orders, and from which mankind have derived more advantage, and received greater detriment, than from any other of theſe religious fraternities*.

Had Leſparre, on the reduction of Pampeluna, been content with taking proper precautions for ſecuring his conqueſt, the kingdom of Navarre might ſtill have remained annexed to the crown of France in reality, as well as in title. But ſtimulated by the ardour of youth, and encouraged by Francis, who was too apt to be dazzled with ſucceſs, he imprudently entered the dominions of Spain, and laid ſiege to Logrogno, a ſmall town in Caſtile. This roufed the Caſtilians from the lethargy in which they had hitherto appeared to be involved, and having nearly compoſed their own private diſſentions, both parties exerted themſelves with emulation in defence of their country. The ſudden advance of their troops, together with the gallant defence made by the inhabitants of Logrogno, obliged the French general to abandon his raſh enterpriſe. The Spaniſh army, which daily encreaſed, haraſſing him during his retreat, he, inſtead of taking ſhelter under the cannon of Pampeluna, or waiting the arrival of ſix thouſand Navareſe, who were marching to his aſſiſtance, attacked the Spaniards in the plains of Squiros, though far ſuperior to him in number, with great impetuoſity, but with ſo little conduct, that his forces were totally routed; Leſparre himſelf was wounded and taken priſoner; and Spain recovered poſſeſſion of Navarre in ſtill leſs time than the French had ſpent in the conqueſt of it*.

While Francis endeavoured to juſtify his invaſion of Navarre, by carrying it on in the name of Henry d'Albret, the lawful ſovereign of that country, another ſubject for diſpute occurred between the rival monarchs:—Robert de la Mark, prince of Sedan, having abandoned the ſervice of Charles, on account of an encroachment which the Aulic council had made on his juriſdiction, and having applied for protection to the king of France, ſent a herald, in the heat of reſentment, to Worms, to declare war againſt the emperor in form. He then entered Luxembourg, with troops levied in France, and after ravaging the open country, laid ſiege to Vireton. Of this Charles complained loudly, as a direct violation of the peace which ſubſiſted between the two crowns, while Francis diſavowed the tranſaction, and conſented to ſubmit the deciſion of their differences to the arbitration of Henry of England, who accordingly ſent Wolſey to Calais, where the conferences were opened, and commanded de la Mark to diſband his troops.

Charles, meanwhile, had aſſembled an army of twenty thouſand men, which, under the count of Naſſau, invaded the territories of Robert, and in a few days reduced all the towns they contained, except Sedan. Having thus puniſhed the prince who had preſumed to defy him by a declaration of war, Charles would naturally have withdrawn his forces, had he been diſpoſed to the adoption of pacific meaſures; but before he had received any cauſe for complaint againſt Francis, he had formed a reſolution of humbling the power of a monarch who was as much his ſuperior in all the amiable and manly qualities of the human mind, as he fell ſhort of him in cunning, artifice, and fraud. For the promotion of his hoſtile and ambitious views, he had found means to engage in his intereſt the ſovereign pontiff, who preferred the labyrinth of politics to the plain path of religion. An ambitious prieſt is, at all times, a deteſtable character; but a miniſter of a God of Peace, who, actuated by an inſatiate thirſt of power, ſeeks to extend his authority by the effuſion of human blood, merits the execration of mankind. Leo, though poſſeſſed of many excellent endowments, fell into the ſame error, or rather adopted the ſame vices, by which too many of his predeceſſors had been diſtinguiſhed; purſuing the wretched ſyſtem of policy that prevailed among the Italian princes, and of which treachery and fraud formed the leading characteriſtics, he reſolved to ſacrifice his honour to his intereſt. He firſt concluded a treaty of alliance with Francis, by which he engaged to assist that monarch in recovering the kingdom of Naples, a part whereof was to be ceded to the pope's nephew, and the remainder to be governed by a papal legate, during the minority of young Henry, second son to the king of France, who was to be invested, by Leo, with the dignity of king of Naples*. But, allured by the prospect of reaping greater advantages from an alliance with the emperor, the perfidious pontiff soon deserted Francis, and made overtures of friendship, though with great secrecy, to Charles. A treaty was soon concluded, by which it was stipulated, that the pope and emperor should join their forces for the expulsion of the French from the duchy of Milan, the possession of which should be given to Francesco Sforza, (a son of Ludovico the Moor) who had resided at Trent, since the time his brother Maximilian had been dispossessed of his dominions by the French king; that Parma and Placentia should be restored to the church; that the emperor should assist the pope in conquering Ferrara; that the annual tribute paid by the kingdom of Naples to the holy see should be encreased; that the emperor should take the family of Medici under his protection; that he should grant to the cardinal de Medicis a pension of ten thousand ducats upon the archbishopric of Toledo; and settle lands in the kingdom of Naples to the same value upon Alexander, the natural son of Lorenzo de Medicis.

Charles having thus secured the alliance of the pope, and the friendship of Wolsey, for whom he had promised to obtain the papal dignity, on the death of Leo, resolved to embrace the first opportunity of coming to an open rupture with France. In consequence of this determination, the count of Nassua had no sooner dispossessed the prince of Sedan, than he received orders to advance towards the frontiers of France, where he, soon after, laid siege to Mousson. The cowardice of the garrison having obliged Montmort, the governor, to surrender almost without resistance, Nassau invested Mezieres, a place the possession of which would have enabled the Imperial army to penetrate into the heart of Champagne, where there was scarcely any other town capable of obstructing its progress.—Happily for France, the king, sensible of the importance of this fortress committed the defence of it to the chevalier Bayard, who had already signalized his zeal and courage in Italy, and who, by his valour and integrity, had merited and obtained the honourable appellation of—"The Knight without Fear, and without reproach† !"—In the defence of Mexieres Bayard displayed all the talents of a great general, and, by repeated exertions of valour and conduct, he contrived to protract the siege to a considereble length, and in the end obliged the Imperialists to retire, with infamy and loss‡. The services of Bayard, on this occasion, were rewarded with the collar of Saint-Michael, and a company of one hundred lances.

Mousson was soon retaken by the duke of Alençon, while the duke of Vendome reduced the towns of Bapeaume and Landrici. The Imperialists, flying before the ſuperior forces of France, retired to Valenciennes, where they were reinforced by a conſiderable body of troops, commanded by the emperor himſelf. The king, meanwhile, having entered Artois, threw a bridge over the Scheld, between Bouchain and Valenciennes. Naſſua had been detached by Charles to prevent the troops from paſſing the river, but he arrived too late; all the infantry had already paſſed, and were drawn up on the oppoſite ſide in order of battle; and while he was deliberating whether he ſhould attack them or not the cavalry joined them, when Naſſua thought it prudent to retire. The retreat of the Imperialſts was favoured by a fog; the French, were appriſed of the circumſtance ſoon enough to have followed them and cut off the whole army*; and the conſtable, la Trémouille and Chabannes, were eager to embrace the opportunity, but this was oppoſed by the duke of Alençon and Chatillon, and unfortunately their advice was ſuffered to prevail. A party, indeed, was already formed againſt the conſtable, and it was determined to reject whatever he ſhould propoſe; the king had juſt affronted that nobleman in the moſt ſenſible manner, by giving the command of the van to the duke of Alençon, though this poſt of honour belonged to Bourbon, as a prerogative of his office. Accordingly when, after that prince had revolted, he was called upon to reſign the conſtable's ſword, he replied, "The king took it from me at the paſſage of the Scheld." The king retook Bouchain; but he endeavoured in vain to relieve Tournay, which, after a ſix months ſiege, ſurrendered to the Imperialiſts. The reduction of Heſdin by the French concluded the campaign.

The French arms had been equally ſucceſsful in Navarre; d'Eſtiſſac having aſſembled the ſcattered remains of Leſparres' army, fortified the towns of Bayonne and Saint John-de-Luze, while the young king of Navarre reduced ſeveral other places. Bonnivet, who had become a favourite with the king, but ſtill more with the ducheſs of Angoulême, and had recently been promoted to the rank of general, was ſent to their aſſiſtance with an army of ſix thouſand Lanſquenets, under the count of Guiſe, and four hundred men at arms. After taking ſeveral fortreſſes in Navarre, they paſſed the river at Andaye, where they put a body of Spaniards to flight, and made a ſudden and unexpected attack on Fontarabia, which capitulated after the firſt aſſault. Bonnivet, proud of his ſucceſs, haſtened to court to reap the laurels which he flattered himſelf he had deſerved.

During theſe operations in the field, the conferences had been carried on at Calais; but when the conditions on which hoſtilities might be terminated came to be conſidered, the emperor's propoſals were ſuch as diſcovered either that he was utterly averſe from peace, or that he knew Wolſey would ſanction with his approbation whatever terms he might offer. He demanded the reſtitution of the duchy of Burgundy, a province, the poſſeſſion of which would have given him acceſs into the heart of the kingdom; and required a diſcharge of the homage due to the crown of France for the counties of Flanders and Artois, which had been paid by his anceſtors, and which he himſelf had, on the acceſſion of Francis, renewed. Theſe terms, to which an high-ſpirited prince would ſcarcely have liſtened, after the diſaſters of a moſt unfortunate war, Francis rejected with great diſdain; and Charles ſhewing no inclination to comply with the more equal and moderate propoſitions of the French monarch, that he ſhould reſtore Navarre to its lawful prince, and withdraw his troops from the ſige of Tournay, the congreſs broke up, without coming to any deciſion.

Meanwhile the league between the pope and the emperor produced great effects in Italy, and rendered Lombardy the theatre of war. The pride, rapacity, and imperious conduct of Lautrec, governor of the Milaneſe, and of his brother Leſcun, known by the name of the mareſchal de Foix, had totally alienated the affections of the people from France, driven many of the principal citizens into baniſhment, and forced others to retire for their own ſafety. Among the laſt was Jerome Moroné, vice-chancellor of Milan, a man diſtinguiſhed for his intriguing ſpirit and ſubtle genius. He repaired to Franceſco Sforza, whoſe brother he had betrayed, and ſuſpecting the pope's intentions of attacking the Milaneſe, although his treaty with the emperor had not yet been made public, he propoſed to Leo, in the name of Sforza, a ſcheme for ſurpriſing ſeveral places in that duchy by means of the exiles, who, from hatred to the French, and from attachment to their former maſters, were ready for any deſperate enterpriſe. Leo not only encouraged the attempt, but advanced a conſiderable ſum for the execution of it; and when, through unforſeen accidents, it failed of ſucceſs in every part, he allowed the exiles, who had aſſembled in a body, to retire to Reggio, which belonged, at that time, to the church. The mareſchal de Foix, who commanded at Milan, in the abſence of his brother Lautrec, informed of their reſort, marched into the eccleſiaſtical territories, and inveſted Reggio; but the vigilance and good conduct of Guicciardini, the hiſtorian governor of that place, obliged the French general to abandon the enterpriſe with diſgrace.* Leo eagerly ſeized this pretext for an open rupture with France; and now pretended to conclude a treaty with Don John Manual, the Imperial ambaſſador at Rome, although it had really been ſigned ſome months before; and publicly excommunicated de Foix as an impious invader of Saint-Peter's patrimony.

Francis, appriſed of the danger to which his Italian dominions were expoſed, immediately commanded Lautrec to repair to his government. That general, who was well acquainted with the great neglect of economy in the adminiſtration of the king's finances, and who knew how much the troops in the Milaneſe had already ſuffered for want of their pay, refuſed to ſet out, unleſs immediately ſupplied with the ſum of three hundred thouſand crowns. But the king, the ducheſs of Angouléme, and Semblancy, ſuperintendant of finances, having pledged their words, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that, on his arrival at Milan, he ſhould find remittances to the amount he demanded, he ventured to depart.

* Guicciardini, tom. iii. lib. 14.—Mem. de Du Bellay.

Theſe promiſes, however, were violated, and the ducheſs of Angoulême, partly from avarice, and partly from an inveterate diſlike ſhe had conceived to Lautrec, who had been rather too free in his remarks on the numerous adventures to which her amorous diſpoſition had given riſe, ſeized the three hundred thouſand crowns, and appropriated them to her own uſe.

Lautrec, however, ſtill continued to levy a powerful army, though far inferior in number to that of the confederates; acting chiefly on the defenſive, he perperpetually harraſſed the troops he could not venture to attack, and by his ſuperior ſkill kept the enemy in awe, and effectually impeded the progreſs of their arms. But all his meaſures were diſconcerted by an accident which no penetration could forſee, nor prudence prevent. A body of twelve thouſand Swiſs ſerved in his army under the banner of the republic, with which France was in alliance. By a law, eſtabliſhed among the cantons, their troops were not hired out by public authority to both the contending parties in any war. This law, indeed, had been ſometimes eluded, and private perſons had been allowed to inliſt in what ſervice they pleaſed, though not under the public banners, but under thoſe of their officers. The cardinal of Sion, (a Swiſs by birth) who ſtill preſerved his influence over his countrymen and his enmity againſt France, having prevailed on them to permit a levy of this kind, twelve thouſand Swiſs joined the army of the confederates. The cantons, ſeeing ſuch numbers of their countrymen and his enmity againſt France, having prevailed on them to permit a levy of this kind, twelve thouſand Swiſs joined the army of the confederates. The cantons, ſeeing ſuch numbers of their countrymen marching under hoſtile ſtandards, and intent on mutual deſtruction, became ſo ſenſible of the infamy to which they would be expoſed, as well as the loſs they might ſuſtain, that they diſpatched couriers, commanding their people to leave both armies, and to return forthwith into their own country. The cardinal of Sion, however, by corrupting the meſſengers appointed to carry this order, prevented it from being delivered to the Swiſs in the ſervice of the confederates; but being intimidated, in due form, to thoſe in the French army, they, fatigued with the length of the campaign, and murmuring for want of pay, inſtantly yielded obedience, in ſpite of Lautrec's remonſtrances. This defection of the Swiſs was followed by the reduction of Milan, which was betrayed to Colonna, the general of Leo; the other cities of the duchy ſoon imitated the example of the capital; Parma and Placentia were united to the domains of the church; and the town of Cremona, with the caſtle of Milan, and a few inconſiderable forts, only remained in the hands of the French. Lautrec, with the remains of his ſhattered army, retired precipitately towards the territories of the Venetiens, who had peremptorily rejected the ſolicitations of the pope, and faithfully adhered to their alliance with France.

The news of this ſucceſs had ſuch an effect upon Leo, that he was immediately ſeized with a fever, (if the French hiſtorians may be credited) which put an end to his exiſtence, on the ſecond of December, 1521. By this unexpected accident the ſpirit of the confederacy was broken, and its operations ſuſpended; the Swiſs were recalled by the cantons; ſome other mercenaries diſbanded for want of pay; and only the Spaniards, and a few Germans in the Imperial ſervice, remained to defend the Milaneſe: but Lautrec deſtitute both of men and money, was wholly unable to improve the favourable opportunity.

A. D. 1522.] In the conclave as in the cabinet, the policy of Charles prevailed over that of Francis, and the ſacred college, after much contention, raiſed cardinal Adrian of Utrecht, who governed Spain in the emperor's name, (and was conſequently devoted to his intereſt) to the papal dignity. The war in the Milaneſe was reſumed with freſh vigour; the Swiſs, enraged at the deception paſſed on them by the cardinal of Sion, cemented their alliance with the king of France, and ſent him a ſupply of ſixteen thouſand men; the Venetians, too, evinced the greateſt zeal for his ſervice. But all theſe appearances proved deceitful: Guicciardini, not leſs ſkilful as a general, than eminent as an hiſtorian, repulſed, by his valour and addreſs, a bold and vigorous attack which Lautrec made on the city of Parma, of which he was governor. The Venetians, by their negligence, ſuffered ſix thouſand Lanſquenets, under the conduct of Jerome Adorno, to effect a junction with the confederates; and another body, led by Franceſco Sforza, to advance as far as Pavia, where they halted; while the French army lay encamped at Caſſano, between that city and Milan. Here he was joined by a conſiderable reinforcement from France, under the conduct of his brother, the mareſchal de Foix, accompanied by Bayard and Navarre, who, on their road, had reduced the towns of Novara and Vigevano. Sforza, however, had contrived to elude the vigilance of Lautrec, and had marched to Milan, where he was received amidſt the acclamations of the people. The French were repulſed in an attack upon Pavia, and as a ſcarcity of proviſion began to be felt in their camp, they took the road to Mouza, and endeavoured to advance to Arona, whither the money deſtined for the pay of the troops had arrived from France; but the Imperialiſts, aware of their object, ſtationed their army in ſuch a poſition as to prevent its accompliſhment. The Swiſs, who had before been clamarous for their pay, now loſt all patience, and crowding around Lautrec, threatened inſtantly to retire, if he did not either advance the pay that was due, or promiſe to lead them next morning to battle. In vain did Lautrec expatiate on the impoſſibility of the former, and the temerity of the latter, which muſt be attended with certain deſtruction, as the enemy occupied a camp (at Bicocca) ſtrong by nature, and rendered almoſt inacceſſibly by art. Deaf to reaſon, and confident of ſucceſs, the Swiſs renewed their demand with encreaſed ferocity, and offered themſelves to lead the attack. Lautrec was thus compelled to act in oppoſition to his own jndgment, and when the morn approached, the Swiſs appeared in arms, and with intrepidity equal to their obſtinacy marched againſt the enemy, deeply entrenched on every ſide, ſurrounded with artillery, and prepared to receive them. As they advanced, they ſuſtained a furious cannonade with great firmneſs, and without waiting for their own artillery ruſhed impetuouſly upon the entrenchments. After incredible exertions of valour, which were bravely ſeconded by the French, they were compelled to give up the vain attempt, and to retire with the loſs of three thouſand men. To that courage which had deſpiſed all danger, ſucceeded a puſillanimity which rejected all reſource. They retired to a valley, and peremptorily refuſed to renew the attack in a quarter where they would have met with much leſs reſiſtance. The Venetians, too, remained in a ſtate of inactivity, and refuſed to make a diverſion unattended with danger, and the only object of which was to prevent the enemy from directing their whole force againſt the mareſchal de Foix, who, by a deſperate effort of valour, had forced his way over a ſtone bridge into the camp. Not being ſeconded, he was compelled to retreat by the ſame bridge, a taſk of extreme difficulty, but which, by a diſplay of prudence equal to his courage, he did in good order. Lautrec was preſent every where; never had he diſplayed greater ſkill: and notwithſtanding the innumerable difficulties he had to encounter, he would inevitably have gained the victory had his orders been obeyed. He propoſed to renew the attack the next morning, but the Swiſs, diſcouraged by the loſs they had already ſuſtained, not only refuſed to fight, but left the camp, and ſet out for their own country. Lautrec deſpairing, after this diminution of his forces, to make any farther reſiſtance, retired into France, after throwing garriſons into Cremona and ſome other places, all of which, except the citadel of Cremona, ſoon ſurrendered to the confederates.

Theſe diſaſters were ſpeedily ſucceeded by the loſs of Genoa and the defection of the Venetians, who were, at length, induced to conclude a peace with the emperor; and Francis had now to oppoſe a confederacy of all the Italian princes, excepting only the duke of Savoy.

A. D. 1523.] The Spaniards, meanwhile, had attacked Fontarabia, which was gallantly defended by Du Lude, during a vigorous ſiege of thirteen months, when the approach of Chabannes, with a powerful reinforcement, compelled the enemy to retire; but on the return of Du Lude to France, the command of that important fortreſs devolved on Frauget, who, on a renewal of the ſiege, immediately ſurrendered it to the Spaniards; an act of cowardice which was puniſhed by degrading him from the rank of a nobleman.

Meanwhile, the duke of Bourbon, inflamed by a repetition of injuries, had recourſe to meaſures which deſpair alone could have dictated. He entered into intrigues with the Imperial court, and offered to transfer his allegiance from his natural ſovereign to the emperor, and to aſſiſt him in the conqueſt of France. Charles, as well as the king of England, to whom the ſecret was communicated*, expecting to derive great advantage from his revolt, were ready to receive him with open arms, and ſpared neither promiſes nor allurements which might tend to confirm him in his reſolution. He was included as a principal in the treaty between Charles and Henry; and the counties of Provence and Dauphiné were to be ſettled on him, with the title of king.

The rumour of Bourbon's intrigues had reached the ear of Francis, who, far from giving credit to the report, had an interview with the duke at Moulin, where he informed him of what he had heard, at the ſame time aſſuring him of his friendſhip, and requeſting he would accompany him to Italy. The conſtable acknowledged that he had received ſome propoſals from the emperor, but declared that he had rejected them with diſdain, and only wiſhed for an opportunity of ſignaliſing his zeal and fidelity to his ſovereign. Francis paid implicit belief to what he ſaid, and proceeded on his journey; the conſtable ſet out ſoon after, apparently with an intention of following him, but turning ſuddenly to the left he croſſed the Rhone, eſcaped all the parties which the king (ſenſible too late of his credulity) ſent out to intercept him, and joined the emperor's army in Italy.

The king took every poſſible precaution to avert the ill effects of the irreparable error which he had committed. He ſecured all the towns in the conſtable's territories; he ſeized all the gentlemen whom he could ſuſpect of being his aſſociates; and as he had not yet diſcovered the whole extent of the conſpiracy, he relinquiſhed his intention of leading his army in perſon into Italy, and entruſted the command of that expedition to admiral Bonnivet, who paſſed the Alps with thirty thouſand men.

Colonna, who was entruſted with the defence of the Milaneaſe, was by no means, prepared to reſiſt ſuch a formidable force; deſtitute of reſourſes, he could only attempt to guard the paſſage of the river Teſino againſt the French; but in this he was foiled; Bonnivet croſſed the river without loſs, at a ford which had been neglected, and, at his approach, the Imperialſt's retired to Milan, preparing to abandon the town as ſoon as the French ſhould appear before it. By an unaccountable negligence, which Guicciardini aſcribes to infatuation, Bonnivet delayed his march for three or four days, and thereby loſt the opportunity with which good fortune had preſented him. The citizens recovered from their conſternation; Colonna, ſtill active at the age of fourſcore, and Moroné, whoſe enmity to France rendered him indefatigable, made every preparation for a vigorous defence; and when Bonnivet arrived, after a fruitleſs attack on the town, he was obliged, by the inclemency of the weather, to retire into winter quarters.

During theſe tranſactions, pope Adrian died, to the great joy of the Roman people, who publickly hailed his phyſican, as The Deliverer of his Country. He was ſucceeded in the chair of Saint Peter by the cardinal de Medicis, who aſſumed the appelation of Clement the Seventh.

La Trémouille had a more formidable enemy to encounter in Picardy, invaded by the united armies of England and Flanders, amounting to four-and-twenty thouſand men. The duke of Suffolk, who commanded them, penetrated as far as the banks of the Oyſe, within eleven leagues of Paris, filling that capital with conſternation. But the arrival of the duke of Vendóme, with a body of troops detached by the king, who was ſtill at Lyons; the active gallantry of the French officers, who perpetually haraſſed the enemy; the rigour of a ſeaſon more than uſually inclement, together with a ſcarcity of proviſions, compelled the Engliſh to retire; and la Trémouille had the glory of having, with a handful of men, checked the progreſs of a formidable army, and of expelling them with ignominy from the territories of France.

ADMIRAL COLIGNY.

Published by James Stewart & Co. May 30th 1797.

A. D. 1524.] Francis having repelled this formidable invaſion, ought certainly to have contented himſelf with providing for the future defence of his kingdom againſt ſimilar attacks; but having a numerous and well-appointed army at his command, he could not withſtand the temptation which now preſented itſelf to his view, for the recovery of the Milaneſe. In vain did his wiſeſt miniſters and generals attempt to diſſuade him from this imprudent enterpriſe, by repreſenting the danger of taking the field at ſuch an advanced ſeaſon of the year, with an army compoſed chiefly of Swiſs and Germans, to whoſe caprices he muſt be ſubject in all his operations, and on whoſe fidelity his ſafety muſt abſolutely depend. Francis was deaf to their ſolicitations, and began his march, croſſed the Alps at Mount Cenis, and advanced directly to Milan, where their unexpected arrival occaſioned ſuch conſternation, that although Peſcara entered the city with ſome of his beſt troops, he found it impoſſible to defend it; and having thrown a garriſon into the citadel, he retired through one gate while the French entered at another. Francis was guilty of a fatal error, in not immediately purſuing the Imperialiſts, who repaired to Loda on the Adda, an untenable poſt, which they had reſolved to abandon on his approach. Inſtead of doing this, to which he was adviſed by his moſt experienced generals, he unfortunately eſpouſed the opinion of Bonnivet; and, on the eighteenth of October, laid ſiege to Pavia on the Teſino. The poſſeſſion of Pavia would, indeed, have been an object of importance, ſince it would have opened to the French a free paſſage into a country, fertile and extenſive; but the ſeaſon was too far advanced for forming the ſiege of a place ſo ſtrongly fortified, and garriſoned by ſix thouſand veterans, under the command of a brave and experienced general.

The king proſecuted the ſiege with vigour, and during three months every exertion of art and valour was employed for reducing the town, but the vigilant activity and enterpriſing ſpirit of the governor, Antonio de Leyva, rendered them all fruitleſs.

While Francis lay before the town, Clement the Seventh, jealous of the emperor's power, endeavoured to bring about a peace, which would leave the king in poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe; and when Charles rejected his propoſals with diſdain, he immediately concluded a treaty of neutrality with the king of France, in which the republic of Florence was included*. Francis having thus deprived the emperor of his two moſt powerful allies, and ſecured a paſſage for his own troops through their territories, was ſo imprudent as to detach ſix thouſand men, under the command of John Stuart, duke of Albany, to invade the kingdom of Naples, in the vain hope that Lannoy would be induced to recal a part of the Imperial army from the Milaneſe.

A. D. 1525.] The garriſon of Pavia was, by this time, reduced to the greateſt extremity; and the Germans, having received no pay for ſeven months, threatened to deliver the town to the French, a diſaſter which the Imperial generals reſolved to avoid by immediately marching to their relief. This they were compelled to do, by the arrival of twelve thouſand Germans, whom Bourbon had juſt brought to their aſſiſtance, which gave them a ſuperiority over the French, who were conſiderably weakened, as well by the detachment ſent to Naples, as by another, under the command of the marquis of Saluzzo, which had reduced Savona, defeated four thouſand Spaniards, and inſulted the city of Genoa: and, laſtly, by the defection of the Griſons, who were recalled to the defence of their own territories.

Two falſe attacks were made by the enemy on the French camp, in the night of the twenty-third of February; while they were employed in deſtroying the wall by ſapping; this they did ſo effectually, that at break of day on the twenty-fourth, a breach ſixty toiſes in length was effected, by which the Imperialiſts entered the camp. They ruſhed on with ſuch impetuoſity, that the caſtle of Mirabello was reduced in an inſtant, and the garriſon taken priſoners; but a detachment of the Imperialiſts, who were advancing towards the town, were attacked and defeated by Chabot Brion, while the artillery was ſo well pointed and ſucceſsfully played by Galiot de Genouillac, that if that officer had been ſuffered to purſue his own plan, it would have ſufficed, of itſelf, to deſtroy the enemy's army. All the efforts of the Imperialiſts were directed againſt the center; but Bourbon, with his Germans, attacked the black-bands, who, after they had diſplayed the moſt intrepid valour, were all cut to pieces. The king continued fighting, till exhauſted with fatigue, and ſcarcely capable of farther reſiſtance, he was left almoſt alone, expoſed to the fury of ſome Spaniſh ſoldiers. At that moment came up Pomperant, a French gentleman, who had accompanied Bourbon in his flight, and placing himſelf by the ſide of the monarch, againſt whom he had rebelled, aſſiſted in protecting him from the violence of the ſoldiers, at the ſame time conjuring him to ſurrender to Bourbon, who was not far diſtant; but the name of Bourbon rouſed the indignation of Francis, who called for Lannoy, and gave up his ſword to him. Francis was immediately conducted to the Imperial camp, where his wounds were dreſſed, and whence he diſpatched this laconic but expreſſive note to his mother—"Madame, all is loſt, except our honour."*

Ten thouſand men fell in this fatal action, and the field of Pavia was ſtained with the beſt blood of France. Lewis d'Ars, la Trémouille, Chabannes, Bonnivet, and San Severino, were among the ſlain. The king of Navarre, the prince of Bozzolo, the count of Saint-Pol, Montmorenci, Saint-Marceau, Brion, Monchenu, Fleuranges, de Lorges, du Bellai-Langeac, la Roche-du-Maine, and many other illuſtrious warriours, ſhared the fate of Francis.

Lannoy treated his royal captive with every mark of reſpect; but ſolicitous to prevent a poſſibility of eſcape, he conducted him the day after the action to the ſtrong caſtle of Pizzighitone, near Cremona, where he was committed to the cuſtody of Don Ferdinand Alarcon, general of the Spaniſh infantry, a man of ſtrict honour, and incorruptible integrity. The feeble garriſon of Milan, on the firſt news of the defeat, retired without being purſued; and in two weeks after the battle not a Frenchman remained in Italy.

Henry the Eighth had been ſtartled at the fatal event of the battle of Pavia, and had become ſenſible of his own danger, as well as that of all Europe, from the loſs of a proper counterpoiſe to the power of Charles the Fifth; while his miniſter, Wolſey, was enraged at the recollection of the emperor's treachery, in having deluded him with vain promiſes of the papal crown. The Engliſh monarch, however, though reſolved on a change of meaſures, deemed it prudent to ſave appearances, and he cauſed public rejoicings to be made throughout his dominions, on account of the victory of Pavia, and the captivity of Francis; he alſo diſmiſſed the French envoy, whom he had hitherto allowed, notwithſtanding the war, to reſide at London*. But upon the ſubmiſſive applications of the ducheſs of Angouléme, he renewed his correſpondence with her, and beſides aſſuring her of his friendſhip and protection, he exacted a promiſe that they ſhould never conſent to the diſmembering any province of the monarchy for her ſon's ranſom. To the emperor, however, he held a different language; he reminded him that the hour was now come for extinguiſhing the monarchy of France: he required that Charles ſhould immediately invade Guienne with a powerful army, in order to put him in immediate poſſeſſion of that province; and he demanded that Francis ſhould be delivered to him, in conſequence of his claim to the crown of France, and an article of the treaty of Bruges, by which each party was bound to ſurrender all uſurpers to him whoſe rights they had invaded. Theſe propoſals were received by the emperor with the diſdain that was expected, and his rejection of them afforded Henry a decent pretence for withdrawing from his alliance.

Lannoy, anxious to convey his priſoner ſafe into Spain, flattered Francis with the hope that a perſonal interview with the emperor would accelerate his releaſe from captivity on more equitable terms; and the French monarch, anxious to graſp at any thing which could afford him the ſmalleſt proſpect of procuring his liberty, furniſhed the gallies neceſſary for the voyage, and commanded his admiral Doria, to ſuffer them to paſs without moleſtation. Bourbon and Peſcara were deceived by the pretence that Lannoy meant to transport his priſoner to the caſtle of Naples; and the latter officer embarking with the king at Portofiero, landed, on the ſeventeenth of June, 1525, at Palamos, in Catalonia. Francis was then conveyed to Madrid, and lodged in the Alcazar, under the care of the vigilant Alarçon.

The continuance of this harſh treatment for ſix months threw him into a fever; and the emperor, fearful of loſing by his death all the fruits of his victory, condeſcended to make him a conſolitary viſit, and as he approached the bed in which Francis lay, the ſick monarch called to him—"You come, ſir, to viſit your pri-

"ſoner."—"No," replied Charles, "I come to viſit my brother, and my "friend, who ſhall ſoon obtain his liberty." This friendly language, and the ſpecious promiſes of the emperor, had ſo good an effect on the king, that he daily recovered; but the flattering expectations he had been led to entertain vaniſhed with the return of health; and Frances, in deſpair, entruſted to his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Alençon, a deed, by which he reſigned his kingdom to the dauphin.

A. D. 1526.] Charles, being appriſed of this circumſtance, and farther induced by a confederacy of the Italian powers, who, alarmed at the rapidity of his progreſs, had entered into an alliance with the ducheſs of Angouléme, began ſeriouſly to think of treating with the king; while Francis, on his ſide, was perſuaded by his friends to accede to any terms that might be propoſed to him, under the idea that engagements contracted under ſuch circumſtances could never be deemed binding. Accordingly, on the fourteenth of January, 1526, a treaty was concluded between the rival princes, after Francis had ſecretly proteſted, in the preſence of his friends, againſt the validity of a contract extorted, as it were, by force.

It was foretold by many of Charles's miniſters, that, however ſolemn the oaths, promiſes, and proteſtations exacted of Francis, he would never execute a treaty ſo diſhonourable to himſelf, and ſo diſadvantageous to his country. By reſigning Burgundy to emperor, he gave his powerful enemy a free paſſage into the heart of the kingdom; by ſacrificing his allies in Italy, he deprived himſelf of all foreign aſſiſtance, and rendered his oppreſſor irreſiſtible, by arming him with the whole force and wealth of that opulent country. To theſe great views of intereſt, were added the motives, no leſs cogent, of paſſion and reſentment. While Francis, a prince who piqued himſelf on generoſity, reflected on the rigour with which he had been treated during his captivity, and the cruel terms which had been exacted of him for the recovery of his freedom.

Such was the reaſoning of ſeveral of the Imperial miniſters, particularly of Gattinara, the chancellor*, who adviſed his maſter to treat Francis with more generoſity, and to give him his liberty on ſuch terms, as would engage him, not on the feeble bond of treaties, but, by the more forcible tie of honour, to a ſtrict and faithful performance. But the emperor's avidity prevented him from following this wiſer and more honourable council; at the ſame time that the proſpect of a general combination of the European powers, prevented him from detaining Francis in captivity, and taking advantage of the confuſions which his abſence muſt neceſſarily occaſion in his kingdom. Still ſuſpicious, however, of the ſincerity of his priſoner, he took an opportunity, before they parted, of aſking him privately, and as a friend, whether he ſeriouſly intended to execute the treaty of Madrid; proteſting that, at all events, he himſelf was firmly determined to reſtore him to liberty, and that the proſpect of obtaining this advantage, needed no longer engage him to diſſemble. Francis was too well acquainted with Charles's character to truſt to the ſincerity of this proteſtation; and, therefore, renewed his aſſurances of fidelity, and a ſtrict obſervance of his word.

Francis was conducted to Fontarabia on the eighteenth of March, 1526, and haſtened to the banks of the Bidaſſoa, accompanied by Lannoy, Alarçon, and an eſcort of fifty horſe, while his two ſons appeared on the oppoſite ſhore, under the care of mareſchal de Lautrec. The exchange being made, the king croſſed the river, and inſtantly mounting a Turkiſh horſe, waved his hand over his head, and exclaiming, "I am yet a king!" galloped full ſpeed to Saint-John de Luz, and from thence to Bayonne, where he was joyfully received by the ducheſs of Angoléme and the whole court. He was ſoon followed by a Spaniſh envoy, who came to demand his ratification of the treaty of Madrid; but Francis waved the propoſal, under pretence that he muſt previouſly aſſemble the ſtates of Burgundy, and obtain their conſent to the ceſſion of that province. As ſoon as he had diſmiſſed the envoy with this unſatisfactory anſwer, he wrote to the king of England, acknowledging that to his good offices alone he was indebted for his liberty, and proteſting that he ſhould be entirely governed by his councils in all tranſactions with the emperor*. He then proceeded to fill up all the vacant poſts in the miniſtry.

After the king had made theſe regulations he repaired to Coignac, to receive the ambaſſadors from the Italian princes, with whom he was about to form a league for fruſtrating the ambitious ſchemes and uſurpations of the emperor. At the ſame time Lannoy, who had remained at Vittoria, with the hoſtages and queen Eleanora, ready to conduct them to France as ſoon as the treaty ſhould be executed, went to Coignac, accompanied by Alarçon, to ſummon Francis to fulfil his engagements. The king made the ſame reply as before, and Lannoy waited to hear the determination of the ſtates of Burgundy, who declared againſt the clauſe which contained an engagement for alienating their province, and expreſſed their reſolution of oppoſing, even by force of arms, the execution of ſo ruinous and unjuſt an article. The Imperial miniſter then required, that Francis, in conformity to the treaty of Madrid, ſhould return to his priſon; but the king, inſtead of complying with his requeſt, made public, on the twenty-eighth of June, the treaty which he had concluded with the Italian powers†.

The pope, the Venetians, and other Italian ſtates, who were deeply intereſted by theſe events, had been holden in the moſt anxious ſuſpence, with regard to the reſolutions which Francis ſhould take, after the recovery of his liberty; and Clement, who ſuſpected that this monarch would never execute a treaty ſo prejudicial to his intereſts, and even deſtructive of his independence, had very frankly offered him a diſpenſation from all his oaths and engagements. Francis did not heſitate, but immediately entered into the confederacy propoſed to him. It was ſtipulated by that prince, the pope, the Venetians, the Swiſs, the Florentines, the duke of Milan, among other articles, that they would oblige the emperor to deliver up the two young princes of France, on receiving a reaſonable ſum of money; and to reſtore Milan to Sforza, without farther additions or incumbrances, Francis renouncing all his pretenſions in Italy, reſerving only for himſelf Genoa, and the county of Aſte. The king of England was invited to accede, not only as a contracting party, but alſo as a protector of the Holy League, as this confederacy was called.

A. D. 1527.] Francis hoped that the appearance of this powerful confederacy would engage the emperor to relax ſomewhat of the extreme rigour of the treaty of Madrid, and, at leaſt, to accept the two millions of crowns which he had offered to him in lieu of the duchy of Burgundy; and led away by theſe hopes he neglected to ſend, in due time, reinforcements to his allies in Italy, and, indeed, forgot the whole world in the arms of his favourite miſtreſs, Anne de Piſſeleu, afterwards ducheſs of Etampes. The duke of Bourbon had got poſſeſſion of the whole Milaneſe, of which the emperor intended to grant him the inveſture; and having levied a conſiderable army in Germany, he became formidable to all the Italian potentates, and not leſs ſo, becauſe Charles, deſtitute of money, had not been able to remit any pay to the forces. The duke was extremely beloved by his troops, and, in order to prevent thoſe mutinies which were ready to break out every moment, and which their affection for him had, alone, hitherto reſtrained, he led them to Rome, and promiſed to enrich them by the plunder of that opulent city. On the ſixth of May, 1527, the aſſault was given: Bourbon was killed by a random ſhot as he was planting a ladder to ſcale the walls; yet the army, the command of which devolved on Philibert, prince of Orange, rather enraged than diſcouraged by the death of their leader, entered the city ſword in hand, and exerciſed all thoſe brutalities which may be expected by ferocity excited by reſiſtance, and from inſolence inflated by ſucceſs.

Clement himſelf, who had truſted for protection to the ſacredneſs of his character, and neglected to make his eſcape in time, was taken priſoner; and found that his dignity, which procured him no regard from the Spaniſh ſoldiers, did but draw on him the inſolent mockery of the Germans, who, from their attachment to the Lutheran principles, were pleaſed to gratify their animoſity by the abaſement of the ſovereign pontiff.

When the emperor was informed of the ſucceſs of his arms. He put himſelf and all his court into mourning: he ordered prayers, during ſeveral months, to be offered up for the pope's liberty, which a letter under his hand would, it was well known, have ſufficed to procure.

The concern expreſſed by Francis and the king of England for the misfortune which had befallen their ally, was much more ſincere. Theſe two monarchs had on the thirtieth of April, concluded a treaty, in which, beſides renewing former alliances, they agreed to ſend ambaſſadors to Charles, requiring him to accept of two millions of crowns as the ranſom of the dauphin Francis, and his brother, Henry duke of Orleans, and to repay the money borrowed of the Engliſh monarch; and, in caſe of refuſal, the ambaſſadors, attended with heralds were ordered to denounce war againſt him.

The more to cement the union between theſe princes, a new treaty was concluded at London, on the eighteenth of September; by which Henry agreed to renounce for ever all claims to the crown of France. As a return for this conceſſion, Francis bound himſelf and his ſucceſſors to pay, for ever, fifty thouſand crowns a year to Henry and his ſucceſſors; and that a greater ſolemnity might be given to this treaty, it was agreed, that the parliaments and principal nobility of both kingdoms ſhould give their aſſent to it. The mareſchal de Montmorenci, accompanicd with many perſons of diſtinction, and attended by a pompous equipage, was ſent over to England to ratify the treaty, and was received at London with all the parade which ſuited the occaſion.

The king, meanwhile, had holden a Bed of Juſtice, at which deputies from all the towns in the kingdom attended, who were unanimous in their opinions that he was not bound to obſerve the treaty of Madrid, which had been the reſult of force, and was contrary to the laws of the realm; and they agreeed that he had a right to levy on his ſubjects whatever money might be neceſſary for the ranſom of his ſon, and the other wants of the ſtate.* In conſequence of this determination, Francis reſolved to proſecute the war with vigour, and having aſſembled a powerful army, he appointed the mareſchal Lautrec to command it. The Italian ſtates received Lautrec with open arms, who inſtantly ſeized Alexandria, and reduced all the country on that ſide of the Teſino. Pavia was taken by aſſault, and the whole Milaneſe muſt have been reſtored to the dominion of France, had not Lautrec been fearful of exciting the jealouſy of the confederates. He therefore directed his march towards Rome; the terror of his approach induced Charles to reſtore Clement to liberty, and directed the ſubſequent operations of the war againſt the kingdom of Naples.

A. D. 1528.] Meantime Lautrec purſued his conqueſts in Italy with vigour and effect. He ſpeedily reduced the whole kingdom of Naples, except Gaieta and the capital; Andrew Doria, a citizen of Genoa, the ableſt ſeaman of his age, and the admiral of Francis, had gained a victory over the ſuperior fleet of the emperor, and every thing ſeemed to favour the progreſs of the French arms.

But the imprudence of Francis ſoon blaſted this flattering proſpect; he had neglected to make proper remittances for the ſupport of the Italian army; and he was prevailed on, by the fatal councils of his miniſters, to diſguſt his admiral Doria; who, though in the ſervice of France, maintained the independant ſpirit of a republican, and often preferred his complaints with freedom and boldneſs. He was anxious to re-eſtabliſh the republican form of government in Genoa; to have his countrymen regarded by the French not as ſubjects but allies; and he oppoſed, with threats, the deſign of Francis to reſtore the harbour of Savona, an adjacent town, which the Genoeſe had long regarded with jealouſy. Francis, irritated by his contemptuous expreſſions, commanded him to be inſtantly arreſted; but Doria, appriſed of his danger, retired with his gallies to a place of ſafety; entered into a negociation with the emperor, who granted him whatever terms he required, and ſailed back to Naples, not to block up the harbour of that city, but to afford it protection and relief.

The communication with the ſea being thus opened, plenty was reſtored to Naples; the French in their turn began to experience a ſcarcity of proviſions, and they were inceſſantly harraſſed by the Imperialiſts, under the conduct of the prince of Orange. To the ravages of famine thoſe of peſtilence ſucceeded; and the unfortunate Lautrec, after long ſtruggling with the difficulties of his ſituation, expired the victim of diſeaſe and diſappointment.

Theſe diſaſters were followed by the loſs of Genoa, the garriſon whereof was reduced by deſertion to an inconſiderable number. Doria, impatient to deliver his country from a foreign yoke, ſailed into the harbour, and was received by the acclamations of his fellow-citizens. The French retired into the citadel, but were ſoon obliged to ſurrender; while Doria, inſtead of uſurping the ſovereign power, eſtabliſhed the government nearly the ſame as it ſubſiſts to this day, and has obtained from the gratitude of poſterity the honourable appellations of THE FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, AND THE RESTORER OF ITS LIBERTY.

A. D. 1529.] In the duchy of Milan the French were totally defeated by the Imperialiſts, under Antonio de Leyva, and Francis, diſcouraged and exhauſted by ſo many unſucceſsful enterpriſes, began to entertain ſerious thoughts of peace. The emperor, alſo, alarmed at the rapid progreſs of the Turkiſh arms, embarraſſed by the propagation of the doctrines of Luther in Germany, and the ſeditious murmurs of his ſubjects in Spain, evinced an inclination to liſten to his propoſals. Margaret of Auſtria and the ducheſs of Angouléme, mother to Francis, met at Cambray, and ſettled the terms of pacification. The king of England, the republic of Venice, the dukes of Milan and Ferrara, ſent ambaſſadors to aſſert or diſcuſs their reſpective rights. By this treaty, concluded on the fifth of Auguſt, 1529, the king renounced all pretenſions to the duchy of Milan, the county of Aſte, and the kingdom of Naples; engaged to compel the Venetians to reſtore all the places of which he himſelf had put them in poſſeſſion; and relinquiſhed his rights to the ſovereignty of Flanders and Artois, and the poſſeſſion of Tournay and Arras. Charles agreed to accept of two millions of crowns in lieu of Burgundy, as the ranſom of the French princes, reſerving, however his pretenſions to that duchy in full force; and Francis conſented immediately to conſummate his marriage with Eleanora the emperor's ſiſter. The king of England was ſo generous to his friend and ally, Francis, that he ſent him an accquittal of ſix hundred thouſand crowns, which that prince owed him.

A. D. 1530, 1531.] It was with the utmoſt difficulty that the king could raiſe the ſum ſtipulated for the ranſom of his ſons, who did not arrive in France till the firſt of June, 1530, when they were met by Francis at the abbey of Vegin, where he conſummated his marriage with Eleanora, a princeſs whoſe perſonal charms were inſufficient to fix the wavering affections of an amorous monarch. During this interval of tranquillity, Francis indulged in ſorrowful reflections on his paſt misfortunes, which he vainly ſought to remedy by the pitiful ſubterfuge of a ſecret proteſtation againſt the treaty of Cambray.

Meantime the progreſs of Lutheraniſm in Germany was rapid and extenſive; and the princes of the empire who profeſſed theſe doctrines, finding that liberty of conſcience was denied them, had combined in a league for their own defence at Smalcalde; and becauſe they proteſted againſt the votes paſſed by the Catholic princes in the Imperial diet at Spires, for the defence of the eſtabliſhed faith, they thenceforth received the appellation of Proteſtants. Charles had undertaken to reduce them to obedience; and, on pretence of ſecuring the purity of religion, he had laid a ſcheme for aggrandizing his own family, by extending its dominion over all Germany.

A. D. 1532, 1533, 1534.] The death of the ducheſs of Angoléme, which happened on the twenty-ſecond of September, 1531, had delivered Francis from a councillor whoſe paſſions had frequently endangered the kingdom, which her wiſdom and magnanimity had contributed to protect; yet mindful of her councils, he completed her favourite project of annexing the duchy of Britany to the crown: the ſtates of that province were, after much difficulty, prevailed on to abandon their claim of a free and ſeparate principality, and, in the month of Auguſt, 1533, the long wiſhed-for annexation took place.

A. D. 1535, 1536.] Francis having by this time recruited his finances, and indignant at the humiliating conditions of the treaty of Cambray, ſeized the opportunity of his rival's abſence, then engaged in breaking the chains of the Chriſtian captives in Africa, to renew his intrigues in Italy. The execution of Merveille, his ambaſſador at Milan, whom Sforza cauſed to be privately put to death, afforded him a pretence for public hoſtilities; and the duke of Savoy, by refuſing permiſſion to the French troops to paſs through Piedmont, drew upon himſelf the firſt operations of war.

Velley, at the laſt audience he had of the emperor, preſſed the prince to tell him in what manner he ſhould juſtify himſelf to his maſter for having given credit to his promiſes: "I beg your majeſty"—ſaid the ambaſſador—"to declare before his holineſs, whether it be not true, that you promiſed me the Milaneſe for the duke of Orleans?" The emperor, ſomewhat diſconcerted by a queſtion thus preciſe, remained ſilent for ſome time, but being preſſed for an anſwer, he acknowledged that he had made ſuch a promiſe, but under conditions which had not been fulfilled: Velly then offered to fulfil thoſe conditions; Charles replied that it was impoſſible. "Why then did you promiſe them?" returned Velley. The emperor had recourſe to freſh evaſions; he obſerved that the time was paſt; that the king, by his invaſion of Piedmont, had releaſed him from his engagements, and that the Italian princes would oppoſe any attempt to fulfil them.—To ſuch pitiful ſubterfuges was this powerful monarch reduced by his artifice, diſſimulation, and treachery!

War was now unavoidable, and both monarchs prepared for the conteſt with a vigour and alacrity equal to their reſentment: but Francis, warned by the fatal defeat of Pavia, reſolved not to riſk any deciſive action, but to act chiefly on the defenſive. He ſtrengthened the fortifications of all thoſe towns which were moſt open to attack; he recruited his armies, and repleniſhed his coffers. The chief command of the troops, deſtined for the defence of Picardy, was conferred on the duke of Vendóme, who was aſſiſted by the mareſchal de Montmorenci; the duke of Guiſe commanded in Champagne; Humieres was ordered to defend the province of Dauphiné, and to guard the paſſes of the Alps: Barbeſieux was ſtationed at Marſeilles; and the king himſelf, with a powerful army, undertook to defend the remaining part of Provence, againſt which he juſtly concluded the principal attack would be directed.

De Leyva, meanwhile, made a fruitleſs attempt to enter Dauphiné, but the emperor's real deſign was to get poſſeſſion of Provence, which he claimed as well in his own right as in conſequence of the ceſſion which the duke of Bourbon had made him of that country. From the magicians and aſtrologers, whom he conſulted on this occaſion, he received the greateſt hopes of ſucceſs; and ſo thoroughly was he convinced that he ſhould complete, with facility, the conqueſt of France, that he diſtributed a variety of governments and poſſeſſions, in that kingdom, to his favourites and friends.

The king, meanwhile, had completed the fortifications of ſuch towns as were capable of defence, demoliſhed others, and laid waſte the open country: in his camp at Valence he was prepared to ſend ſuccours wherever they might be wanted, while Montmorenci was ſent to command the camp at Avignon, with orders to conduct himſelf with the utmoſt caution and prudence, and particularly, not to hazard a deciſive action. Montmorenci arrived at Avignon on the fourth of Auguſt, and, in a council of war, it was determined to confine his operations to the ſecuring his camp from inſult, and to the preventing the enemy from forming any eſtabliſhment on the rivers Rhone and Gurance. As the Imperialiſts approached they were alarmed at the face of deſolation which the country preſented, deſtitute alike of food and ſhelter: even Aix was diſmantled, notwithſtanding the offer of Montejan to take the command of it, and that of the inhabitants to defend it to the laſt extremity.

A victory obtained by the van of the Imperial army, over a detachment of the French, under the command of Montejan and Boiſy, who had extorted from Montmorenci a reluctant permiſſion to harraſs the enemy on their march, ſerved both to inflate the Germans and diſcourage the French, who began to tremble in their camp. The news of this check did not ſo much mortify the king as the intelligence which he received, at the ſame time, of the reduction of Guiſe in Picardy. The counts of Naſſau and Rieux had entered that province, where the duke of Vendóme commanded; and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes had taken place with little advantage on either ſide. But Naſſau, after an unſucceſsful attempt on Saint-Riquier, at which the female inhabitants greatly contributed to his defeat, took by ſurpriſe the town of Guiſe. The neglect and cowardice of the garriſon were ſeverely puniſhed, and all the nobility, who were in the place at the time, were degraded from their rank. But theſe diſaſters were trifling when compared to one which now reached the ears of the king. The dauphin, on the road to join the army, had ſtopped at Tournon, where, after heating himſelf at tennis, he was ſo imprudent as to drink a glaſs of cold water, in conſequence of which he expired in four days. The cardinal of Lorraine was appointed to convey the dreadful intelligence to the king, but his tears ſtopped his utterance, and the monarch, by one of thoſe preſentimens which, though often felt, cannot eaſily be accounted for, was appriſed of that which no one dared to communicate. Francis felt as a father, and the whole kingdom joined in his lamentations for the loſs of a ſon, who was an object of univerſal eſteem.

During theſe tranſactions, the emperor advanced as far as Marſeilles, but all his attempts to reduce that city proved ineffectual, and he was finally compelled to relinquiſh the inglorious ſiege. Finding his army conſiderably reduced, and having loſt many of his braveſt officers, he, at length, was prevailed on to quit the territories of France, where he had neither gained honour nor advantage. He retreated in the greateſt confuſion, and the king might eaſily have deſtroyed his army, had he not been reſtrained by the pertinacious caution of Montmorenci, and by his deſire of reinforcing the duke of Vendôme, and of quieting the apprehenſions of the Pariſians. In Picardy, the count of Naſſau, after the reduction of Guiſe, had laid ſiege to Peronne, which was ably defended by the mareſchal de Fleuranges, who repulſed the enemy in four ſucceſſive aſſaults, and compelled them to abandon the hopeleſs enterpriſe; ſo that Francis, by the prudence of his own meaſures, and the union and valour of his ſubjects, rendered abortive the formidable ſchemes of his rival.

A. D. 1537.] Francis, on his return to Lyons, at the end of the campaign, found James the Fifth, king of Scotland, who had, without ſolicitation, ſailed to the aſſiſtance of his ancient ally, with an army of ſixteen thouſand men; though contrary winds had prevented him from landing, until the campaign was cloſed, and the emperor had retired. The king was ſo well pleaſed with the generous conduct of the Scottiſh monarch, that he gave his daughter, the princeſs Magdalen, in marriage, and the nuptials were celebrated on the firſt of January, 1537. Magdalen dying within the year, James took, for his ſecond wife, Mary, daughter to the duke of Guiſe, and widow to the duke of Longuville, who became mother to the celebrated Mary Stuart, not leſs famous for her beauty and accompliſhments, than for the perſecution which ſhe ſuſtained during her life, and the calumnies which have been heaped, with illiberal profuſion, on her memory.

A. D. 1538.] The enmity of Francis and Charles appears to have exceeded their ſtrength, and their coffers were exhauſted by their frequent and bloody wars. The mediation of the pope was offered and accepted, and an interview at Nice appointed between the rival princes. The emperor accordingly repaired, on the third of March, to Villa-Franca; and the king arrived, about the ſame time, at Villa-Nuova; but ſtill the two monarchs did not meet. Mezerai is of opinion, that the emperor was fearful of being preſſed on the ſubject of the inveſture of the Milaneſe, and of having a promiſe extorted from him in the preſence of the pope. Both Charles and Francis viſited his holineſs, though at different times; and, after much altercation, a truce for nine years was at length concluded between them, on the eighteenth of June, 1538.

A. D. 1539.] The emperor, meanwhile, found ample occupation in his own dominions: the citizens of Ghent, mindful of their former immunities, and tenacious of their ancient privileges, had refuſed to contribute to the ſupport of the late war; and erecting the ſtandard of rebellion, had offered, by their deputies, to acknowledge the ſovereignty of the king of France; but that monarch ſtill flattering himſelf with the vain hope of obtaining the inveſture of Milan from the juſtice of the emperor, rejected the propoſals of the Flemings, and communicated their ſchemes and intentions to his rival—Charles, though free from any danger on the ſide of France, was alarmed at the revolt of a people, rich, turbulent, and obſtinate. The exigency, he was aware, demanded his immediate preſence, but his dignity would not allow him to paſs through Germany without a train of attendants and troops that muſt neceſſarily have delayed him; and the voyage by ſea was dangerous at that advanced ſeaſon of the year. In this dilemma, contrary to the opinions of his moſt experienced counſellors, he reſolved, as the ſhorteſt way, to demand a paſſage through the dominions of his rival. To Francis he, at the ſame time, made a promiſe to inveſt the duke of Orleans with the duchy of Milan*. The French council aſſembled on the occaſion; they were unanimous in agreeing that the emperor's requeſt ſhould be complied with, but the majority were of opinion that the inveſture of Milan ſhould be firſt granted; this, however, was over-ruled by Montmorenci (who had recently received the conſtable's ſword) as well as by Francis himſelf; who inſiſted on the propriety of placing a full reliance on the generoſity and juſtice of Charles.

A. D. 1540.] On the firſt of January, the emperor made his public entry into Paris, attended by all the nobility, magiſtrates, and municipal bodies; the dauphin and the duke of Orleans rode on either ſide of him, and the conſtable followed him. But this profuſion of honours was inſufficient to remove the apprehenſions of Charles, who, conſcious that he merited no kindneſs from his rival, began to blame his own imprudence in putting himſelf in his power: Impreſſed with theſe ideas, he was greatly alarmed at a joke paſſed on him by the duke of Orleans, who jumped up behind him, and throwing his arms around his waiſt, exclaimed—"Your Imperial majeſty is now my priſoner." Another time, the king, who was candour itſelf, told him, That the ducheſs of Etampes was of opinion he ſhould not ſuffer him to leave Paris, until he had revoked the treaty of Madrid: "If the advice be good," replied the emperor, greatly diſconcerted, "you ought to follow it;" at the ſame he purpoſely let fall a ſuperb diamond, which the ducheſs picked up, and which he begged her to accept; ſhe complied with his requeſt, and, in the ſequel, repaid his attention by betraying the intereſts of her ſovereign. The king's fool having placed the emperor's name on his liſt, for having put himſelf in the power of his rival, obſerved, that if the king ſuffered him to eſcape, he would efface the emperor's name, and inſert his maſter's in the place.

Charles remained ſix days at Paris, but he had no ſooner reached his own territories, than the French ambaſſadors demanded the reſtitution of the Milaneſe; Charles relinquiſhed the diſguiſe which was no longer neceſſary to his intereſt; he peremptorily refuſed to grant the inveſture of the Milaneſe, and denied that he had ever made any promiſe that could bind him to an action ſo weak and imprudent.

A. D. 1541.] Francis was greatly enraged when he found himſelf the dupe of his unprincipled rival; and his indignation was augmented in proportion as he perceived that the credulous ſimplicity with with which he had truſted him, expoſed him to the ridicule of Europe. He ſuſpected the treachery of his own ſervants; and, though he had reſolved on a renewal of the war, he diſmiſſed his beſt general, Montmorenci. The cauſe of the conſtable's diſgrace—who received orders to retire from court, whither he did not return until the following reign—has never been well aſcertained. Some authors pretend that the king reproached him with the advice he had given to truſt to the generoſity of the emperor, and even go ſo far as to ſay that the conſtable maintained a criminal correſpondence with Charles.

The next object of the king's diſpleaſure was Brion, whoſe pride was inſupportable, but whoſe probity was undoubted: having expreſſed his intention of humiliating the admiral, the chancellor Poyet (who had been entruſted with the ſeals, on the death of du Prat, in 1535,) with the prompt zeal of a courtly ſycophant, inſtituted a proceſs againſt him for extortion and malverſation, and, by a baſe proſtitution of the laws, pronounced a ſentence which condemned Brion to perpetual baniſhment, and to pay a fine of fifteen hundred thouſand livres. The king, enraged at this unjuſt proceeding, revoked the ſentence, and reſtored the admiral to the poſſeſſion of his honours and eſtates; but Brion was ſo deeply affected by the attack which had been made on his honour, that he ſurvived the revocation of his ſentence only two years. Poyet himſelf was diſgraced, and by a ſentence of the parliament, pronounced on the twenty-fourth of April, 1545, was declared incapable of holding any office whatever, and condemned to pay a fine of one hundred thouſand livres, and to be impriſoned for five years.

Francis filled every court in Europe with his negociations; but Henry of England had lately beheld with a ſuſpicious eye his frequent interviews with the emperor, and his alliance with the king of Scotland; the pope ſtill maintained a ſtrict neutrality; and ſultan Solyman alone embraced his proffered alliance, and declared himſelf ready to avenge his wrongs. Two of the ambaſſadors of Francis, on their road to Venice, were aſſaſſinated near the mouth of the Teſino, at the inſtigation of the marquis del Guaſto, governor of the Milaneſe. The French monarch loudly complained of this baſe violation of the laws of nations; and demanded the puniſhment of the atrocious contriver of the guilty deed; but his demands were eluded, and he gladly embraced the opportunity of extorting by arms that juſtice which he vainly ſought to obtain by negociation.

A. D. 1542.] Piedmont and the Netherlands had been deſtined by du Bellay to become the theatre of war, but the new council rejected his plan, and regulated, on a far different ſcale, the operations of the enſuing campaign. It was determined to direct the principal efforts o the troops againſt Perpignan, the capital of Rouſſillon, which was falſely aſſerted to be in a defenceleſs ſtate, while another army was to be ſent into Luxembourg, to aſſiſt the duke of Cleves, who claimed the king's protection, to enable him to recover the duchy of Gueldres, which had been wreſted from him by the houſe of Auſtria. In purſuance of this plan, the dauphin was appointed to command the army deſtined for Rouſſillon; he had under him Annebaut and Montpezat, and his orders were to lay ſiege to Perpignan, to the relief of which place it was expected the emperor would march in perſon, and in that caſe the king intended to repair, himſelf, to the ſcene of action. The troops that were ſent to Luxembourg were commanded by the duke of Orleans, who was accompanied by the duke of Guiſe and his ſon, the count of Aumale; and by the young count of Enguien.

In Rouſſillon the French arms were far from ſucceſsful; conſiderable delays had occurred in collecting the troops deſtined for that quarter, and ſupplying them with proviſions; ſo that the emperor had ſufficient time to put Perpignan in a proper ſtate of defence, and to furniſh it with every requiſite for ſuſtaining a long ſiege. Charles, however anxious he might be for the fate of that city, determined not to hazard a deciſive engagement; but committed the defence of it to the perſevering valour of the duke of Alva. The French, after a ſiege of three months, waſted by diſeaſe, and repulſed in various attacks, received orders from Francis to abandon the enterpriſe, and return to their own country: the duke of Alva made a vain attempt to harraſs them on their retreat; his efforts were fruſtrated by the vigilance of the dauphin; and the army reached France in ſafety.

A. D. 1543.] In the enſuing campain the plan of operations was changed, Rouſſillon was neglected, and the principal efforts of the French were directed againſt the Netherlands. The intention of Francis was to fortify Landrecy, for which purpoſe he fixed his camp at Marolles. A detachment of the army, commanded by the dauphin, reduced Aimeries, Maubeuge, and Barlemont-upon-Sombre; while the count of Aumale extended his incurſions to the gates of Aveſne.

As ſoon as the fortifications of Landrecy were completed, the king left his camp at Marolles, and laid ſiege to Luxembourg, which he ſpeedily reduced, and which he expreſſed his determination of keeping as an amends for the loſs of the Milaneſe. He then detached Annebaut, with ten thouſand infantry, and four hundred men at arms, to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Cleves; but that prince had already made his peace with the emperor, and agreed to join Charles againſt Francis, his friend and ally. The Imperialiſts, meanwhile, under the counts of Roeux and Roquenldoff, had inveſted Landrecy, and the king now marched with his whole army to the relief of that town, where he firſt received intelligence of the alliance which had been formed between the emperor and the king of England.

On the fourteenth of September, 1542, James the Fifth, king of Scotland, had expired in the flower of his age, leaving only an infant-daughter, the celebrated Mary Stuart, by his conſort Mary of Lorraine. The diſputes with regard to the regency, during the minority of the young princeſs, filled Scotland with confuſion. Henry formed the deſign of uniting Scotland to his own dominions, by marrying his ſon Edward to the heireſs of that kingdom; and he engaged Hamilton, earl of Arran, who claimed the regency, as next heir to the crown, after Mary, to ſecond his plan. But his project was thwarted by cardinal Beaton, primate of Scotland, who alſo aſpired to the regency, and who perſuaded the majority of the Scottiſh nobles to oppoſe the projected alliance with England. As a war was fully expected to be the conſequence of this oppoſition, the cardinal found it neceſſary to make an immediate application to France, and to crave the aſſiſtance of that ancient ally, during the preſent diſtreſſes of the Scottiſh nation. Mathew Stuart, earl of Lenox, a young nobleman of a great family, was, at that time, in the French court; and Francis being informed that he was engaged in ancient and hereditary enmity with the Hamiltons, who had murdered his father, ſent him over to his native country, as a ſupport to the cardinal and the queen-mother; and he promiſed that a ſupply of money, and, if neceſſary, even military ſuccours, ſhould be ſoon diſpatched after him. By this means the French party acquired a decided ſuperiority over that of the Engliſh in Scotland.

Henry now reſolved to break with France, and to unite his arms with thoſe of the emperor, notwithſtanding the ill treatment he had formerly experienced from Charles. He pretended that Francis had engaged to ſupport the Scots againſt the power of England*. He had received information of ſome railleries which the French king had thrown out againſt his conduct with regard to his wives; he was diſguſted that Francis, after ſo many obligations which he owed him, had ſacrificed him to the emperor; and in the confidence of friendſhip, had raſhly revealed his ſecrets to that ſubtle, intriguing, and intereſted monarch; and he complained, that regular payments were never made of the ſums due to him by France, and of the penſion which had been promiſed. Impelled by theſe various motives, he alienated himſelf from his ancient friend and confederate, and formed a league with the emperor, who very earneſtly courted his alliance.

In conſequence of this league, ſix thouſand Engliſh troops were ſent to join the Imperialiſts, then engaged in the ſiege of Landrecy, which the emperor covered with an army of above forty thouſand men. Francis advanced at the head of an army not much inferior, as if he intended to give the emperor battle, or oblige him to abandon the ſiege: but while theſe rival monarchs were facing each other, the French king found means to throw ſuccors into Landrecy; and having thus effected his purpoſe, he ſkilfully made a retreat. Charles ſent Gonzaga to attack the rear of the French army; but that general was vigourſly received and ſucceſsfully repulſed by Briſſac; and the emperor, finding the ſeaſon far advanced, deſpaired of ſucceſs in his enterpriſe, and found it neceſſary to raiſe the ſiege; in his retreat, however, he took Cambrai by ſurpriſe, and placed an Imperial garriſon in that city.

A. D. 1544.] The next campaign opened with greater vigour, and was attended with greater ſucceſs. The young count of Enguien, who was now entruſted with the command of the French forces in Piedmont, greatly reſembled the unfortunate duke of Nemours, who was killed at the battle of Cerignoles; with the valour of the braveſt ſoldier he combined the ſkill of the moſt experienced general, and he had the advantage of the duke, inaſmuch as his military talents were not ſullied by temerity. On the fourteenth of April the two armies met near Cerizoles; victory for a while remained doubtful; ſhe then ſeemed to incline to the Imperialiſts, and the flight of a body of Italians, under the count de Gryeres, induced Enguien to believe the day was loſt; but the ſpirited exertions of the French nobility and their gallant followers ſoon reſtored order to the army, and, preſſing forward with impetuous valour, the enemy were routed and put to flight. Enguien wiſhed to purſue them, but he was checked by the prudent advice of an old officer, who begged him to recollect the fate of the duke of Nemours. The victory was complete; ten thouſand of the Imperialiſts periſhed on the field, four thouſand were taken priſoners, and all their baggage, artillery and ammunition fell into the hands of the French. Del Guaſto, who had received a wound in the knee, retreated to Aſte, but the inhabitants refuſing to admit him, he haſtened to Milan. Enguien now reduced, with facility, the town of Carignano, and the greater part of the marquiſate of Montferrat; intelligence of his ſucceſs being diſpatched to the king, it was ſpeedily forwarded to all the foreign courts; the duchy of Milan was ready to ſubmit to the French; all Italy was in motion; even the kingdom of Naples exhibited ſymptoms of diſcontent; but Enguien was unfortunately, incapicitated from improving theſe advantages, by the formidable preparations of the king of England. Henry, on the fourteenth of July, landed at Calais with thirty thouſand men, attended by the principal nobility and gentry of England. The Engliſh army was ſoon joined by the count of Buren, admiral of Flanders, with ten thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe.

The emperor, with an army of near ſixty thouſand men, had taken the field much earlier than Henry; and that he might loſe no time while he waited for the march of his confederate, he ſate down before Luxembourg, which he took; he thence proceeded to Commercy on the Meuſe, which was ſurrendered to him: but the obſtinate reſiſtance of the garriſon of Saint Dizier made the emperor deſpair of reducing the place, and (as a ſcarcity of proviſions began to prevail in his camp) had the dauphin's army marched to its relief, it is moſt probable he would have raiſed the ſiege. But the dauphin was reſtrained from acting by the king's poſitive orders; and the treachery of the ducheſs of Etampes relieved Charles from the difficulties under which he laboured; ſhe gave him ſecret intelligence of the proceedings of the French council; ſhe informed him of the place where the dauphin had left, under a ſlender guard, an ample ſupply of proviſions; and ſhe even forged the ſignature of the duke of Guiſe, in a letter addreſſed to the count of Sancerre, requeſting that nobleman to give up Saint Dizier, as it would be impoſſible to march to its relief *. This town was accordingly ſurrendered to Charles, after it had ſuſtained a ſiege of ſix weeks.

The emperor, after the reduction of Saint Dizier, purſued his march along the banks of the Marne, and pitched his camp immediately oppoſite to that of the French, who were only divided from him by the river. As the dauphin was not permitted to hazard a battle, Charles proceeded to take poſſeſſion of Epernay and Chateau-Thierry. The news of his progreſs filled the Pariſians with alarm; they haſtened to quit the capital, and the roads to Rouen and Orleans were covered with waggons loaded with their wives, children and effects. The king endeavoured, by his preſence and exhortations, to inſpire his ſubjects with confidence; while the dauphin, by a forced march, contrived to throw himſelf between the forces of Charles and the capital; and he ſent a ſtrong detachment of ſeven or eight thouſand infantry, and four hundred men at arms, to the aſſiſtance of the Pariſians, under the conduct of de Lorges, who fixed his camp at Lagny. The emperor, aſtoniſhed at the dauphin's vigilance and activity, turned to the left, and marched to Soiſſons. Finding his ſchemes for ſubduing France were likely to prove abortive, he propoſed terms of accommodation to the king, and conferences were accordingly opened at Creſpy in the Laonnois, and a treaty was concluded on the eighteenth of September, 1544. Francis agreed to relinquiſh his acquiſitions in Piedmont and Savoy; and the emperor engaged, in the ſpace of two years, to beſtow on the duke of Orleans his daughter or his niece in marriage, with the Low Countries or the Milaneſe as a dower. This peace, though highly advantageous to the king, as it relieved him from the efforts of his moſt powerful enemy, was highly blamed by his ſubjects.

A. D. 1545.] The war between England and France was not diſtinguiſhed this year by any memorable event. Francis equipped a fleet of above two hundred ſail, beſides gallies, which he entruſted to the command of the admiral Annebaut; and having embarked ſome land forces on board, he ſent them to make a deſcent in England†. They ſailed to the iſle of Wight, where they found the Engliſh fleet lying at anchor at Saint Helen's. It did not exceed one hundred ſail; and the Engliſh admiral thought it moſt adviſable to remain in that road, in hopes of drawing the French among the narrow paſſages and rocks which were unknown to them. The rival fleets cannonaded each other for two days; and, except the ſinking of the Mary Roſe, one of the largeſt veſſels in the Engliſh fleet, the damage on both ſides was inconſiderable. The French landed troops in the iſle of Wight, and committed depredations on the circumjacent country, but being repulſed by the provincial militia, they retired to their ſhips, and ſoon after ſet ſail for France. They were, however, again driven by the wind on the coaſt of England, where they met with the Engliſh fleet, and a freſh cannonading enſued, which proved no more deciſive than the foregoing. It was indeed ſcarcely poſſible, that a fleet could, at that time, without boarding, obtain any conſiderable advantage over the enemy. The cannon were commonly ſo ill ſerved, that Du Langey obſerves in his memoirs, as a circumſtance ſomewhat ſingular, that each of theſe numerous fleets, in an engagement which laſted two hours, fired full three hundred ſhot; when a ſingle veſſel could now, without difficulty, perform thrice as much.

Francis's chief intention in equipping ſo powerful a fleet was to prevent the Engliſh from throwing ſuccours into Boulogne, which he intended to beſiege; and, for that purpoſe, he ordered a fort to be built, by which he propoſed to block up the harbour. After a conſiderable loſs of money and time, the fort was found ſo ill-conſtructed, that he was obliged to abandon it; and though he had collected, on that frontier, an army of near forty thouſand men, he was not able to effect any conſiderable enterpriſe. He broke into the territory of Oye, an extent of country which lies near Calais, and which ſerved commonly to ſupply the garriſon with proviſions; and he laid it entirely waſte by fire and ſword. Several ſkirmiſhes enſued between the French and Engliſh, in one of which the count of Aumale received a remarkable wound. A lance was run into his head between his eye and noſe; and notwithſtanding that the lance broke, and the head of it remained in the wound, he was not diſmounted by ſo violent a ſhock, and the head of the lance being extracted by the ſkill of an eminent ſurgeon, Aumale afterwards recovered, and became extremely famous under the name of duke of Guiſe.

A. D. 1546.] A new war was now expected with the emperor, as the treaty of Creſpy had been rendered void by the death of the duke of Orleans. Annebaut and the chancellor Olivier were diſpatched to the Imperial court, to propoſe a freſh treaty to Charles; but that prince, who was then occupied with the troubles occaſioned by the league of Smalcalde, deferred his anſwer, under various pretences, until he had obtained from the Flemings the ſuccours he had demanded, and had ſucceeded in his efforts to diſunite the league; he then replied—without explaining his intentions—that he ſhould not engage in a war unleſs he were attacked. This was conſtrued into a refuſal of the king's demands; and Francis, accordingly, put all his frontier towns in a proper ſtate of defence. The emperor ſtated ſome objections to the fortifying Villa-Franca, which, he pretended, was a fief of the empire; but du Bellay, by the production of ancient records, convinced him of his error. Charles gave up the point, but, in order to oppoſe one barrier to another, he reſtored the fortifications of Damvilliers, which had been diſmantled by the duke of Orleans, in 1542.

A. D. 1547.] The death of the duke of Orleans was followed by that of the count of Enguien, who had acquired an immortal reputation by the victory of Cerizoles; and the loſs of both theſe princes impreſſed Francis with a grief which nothing could mitigate. The remaining hours of his life were embittered by domeſtic contention, ariſing from the diſputes which prevailed between the ducheſs of Etampes and Diana of Poictiers; he was ſenſibly effected by the death of Henry of England, to whom he was perſonly attached. A ſlow fever continually preyed upon him; he wandered from one palace to an another, in a ſtate of languor and depreſſion, and, at length, expired at Rambouillet, on the thirty-firſt of March, in the fifty-third year of his age, and the thirty-third of his reign.

Francis employed his laſt moments in giving uſeful council to the dauphin; he adviſed him never to recal Montmorenci; not to promote the elevation of the Guiſes; to retain in his ſervice the cardinal de Tournon, and the admiral Annebaut; and, finally, to ſpare protect, and relieve his ſubjects: but, unhappily, no part of this advice was followed.

Francis had, for his firſt wife, Claude of France, daughter to Lewis the Twelfth, and Anne of Brittany; this princeſs died in 1524. In 1530 he married Eleanora of Auſtria, ſiſter to Charles the fifth, and widow to the king of Portugal. By his ſecond wife he had no children; by the firſt, he had the dauphin, Francis, who died in 1545; Henry, who ſucceeded him on the throne; Charles, duke of Orleans, who died in 1545; Louiſa-Charlotta; Magdelen, who married James the Fifth of Scotland: and Margaret, who eſpouſed Emanual Philibert, duke of Savoy.

Francis, who was a great patron of the ſciences, had formed a plan for the erection of a college for the ſtudy of dead languages; but he never put it in execution: he eſtabliſhed, however, ſalaries for profeſſors of Greek, Hebrew, and Latin, phyſic and ſurgery. A mathematical profeſſor was alſo eſtabliſhed during his reign; and the ſtudy of natural pliloſophy began to be cultivated with dilligence and ſucceſs.

From the year 1528 to 1534, perpetual ſummer prevailed in France; during four years not two days' froſt was experienced; nature, exhauſted by a continued heat, inceſſantly prodcued bloſſoms, but had not ſtrength to bring the fruit to maturity: a ſcarcity of proviſions was the conſequence of this phenomenon; the harveſt was ſcarcely ſufficient to ſupply ſeed for the following year. Worms, and inſects of every kind, multiplied ad infinitum, and deſtroyed the little fruit which the earth yielded. A moſt dreadful famine prevailed, and the conſumption of unwholeſome food gave riſe to a diſorder which carried off one-fourth of the inhabitants of France*.

HENRY THE SECOND.

A. D. 1547.] HENRY the Second completed his twenty-eighth year, the very day on which he ſucceeded to the throne, which was the thirty-firſt of March; though the ceremony of his coronation did not take place till the twenty-eighth of July. He was poſſeſſed of the full vigour both of body and of mind; handſome in his perſon, but aukward in his manners and addreſs; accompliſhed in all the martial exerciſes of the age, but averſe from application to buſineſs, and from every purſuit which required ſtudy and attention*. An ardent admirer of the fair ſex, he was grateful to all who favoured his prevailing paſſion; and as Diana de Poictiers had firſt initiated him in the ſchool of love, ſhe had acquired an unlimited aſcendancy over the mind of the youthful monarch.

Notwithſtanding the dying injunctions of his father, Henry haſtened to recall the conſtable Montmorenci, whom he re-eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of all his honours, and to whom he paid the ſum of one hundred thouſand crowns, the amount of his ſalary, as conſtable, during the five years which he had paſſed in exile. The conſtable exerted his newly-acquired power for the gratification of his private revenge. The ducheſs of Etampes, who had greatly contributed to procure his baniſhment, was the firſt to feel the effects of his reſentment: ſhe was ſent back to her huſband, and ſtripped of all the poſſeſſions which the profuſe bounty of the late monarch had laviſhed on her. The hotel d'Etampes was given to Diana of Poictiers, and her eſtate at Chevreuſe to the cardinal of Lorraine†. All the old miniſters were diſmiſſed, ſome of them impriſoned, and moſt of them perſecuted. The requeſt of Francis the Firſt to his ſon to repreſs the dangerous ambition of the houſe of Guiſe, was equally diſregarded with his other injunctions, and that potent family was ſoon received into favour, and entruſted with the confidence of Henry. To this imprudent conduct may be traced the origin of thoſe factions and leagues which tended, at a ſubſequent period, to deſolate the kingdom. Five different parties were already formed in France; the firſt of which was headed by Diana of Poictiers; the ſecond, by the conſtable; the third, by the houſe of Guiſe; the fourth, by the mareſchal St. André; and the fifth, by Catherine of Medicis.

Montmorenci, by being placed at the head of the adminiſtration, and by enjoying the two important offices of ſecretary of war, and ſecretary for foreign affairs, poſſeſſed the means of augmenting the number of his creatures and partizans; but the extreme ſeverity of his diſpoſition, his avarice, and exceſſive partiality for his numerous relations, diſguſted a conſiderable part of the higher order of nobles. During the preceding reign he had ſcarcely ſuffered a ſingle year to paſs away, without extending his domains by ſome new acquiſitions. He diſplayed leſs ardour in the attainment of titles and honours, than in the acquiſition of wealth; and as he was in no haſte to procure the dignity of a duke, he had the mortification to ſee himſelf preceded in all the public ceremonies by the princes of the houſe of Guiſe.

Thoſe princes purſued a very different line of conduct from that which had been adopted by the conſtable: affable, generous, and more anxious to obtain honours than to accumulate wealth, they ſought no other poſſeſſions than what they inherited from their anceſtors, and titles were the ſole objects of their ſolicitations. Beſides the two duchies of Guiſe and Aumale, they procured the erection of ſeveral eſtates they poſſeſſed in the province of Maine into a marquiſate, and the barony of Joinville into a principality.

Catharine of Medicis had been married to the king while only duke of Orleans, and when he had barely completed his thirteenth year; ſhe had ſome time ſince, brought him a ſon, who was named Francis; but ſhe was nevertheleſs holden in contempt, as well by Henry himſelf, as by all who ſurrounded him; yet the pliancy of her diſpoſition, and her profound diſſimulation, had, at length, enabled her to become the head of a party. By careſſing the ducheſs of Valentinois, whom ſhe deteſted; by perpetually flattering the pride, and aſking the advice of the conſtable, whom ſhe conſidered as her greateſt enemy; and by ſtopping at nothing which could, in the ſmalleſt degree, promote the object ſhe had in view; ſhe obtained many conſiderable favours, as well for herſelf as her partiſans.

The reſt of the court, or rather the whole nation, were divided between the four firſt parties, by whoſe recommendation all military promotions, all offices, civil and eccleſiaſtical, all penſions and employments, were diſtributed; ſo that the king, no longer conſidered as the fountain of honours and rewards, was holden in little eſtimation by his ſubjects.

Francis de Vivonne, lord of Chateigneraie, and Guy de Chabot, lord of Jarnac, both natives of the province of Angoumois, had been introduced at the court of Francis the Firſt, nearly at the ſame time; one of them was placed in the dauphin's houſhold, and the other in that of the duke of Orleans; and notwithſtanding the antipathy which prevailed between their reſpective maſters, and which extended to the partiſans and dependants of either prince, theſe young noblemen had ever preſerved a ſincere friendſhip for each other. The whole court was aſtoniſhed at the magnificence diſplayed by Jarnac; and la Chateigneraie, who was better acquainted than any one elſe with the circumſtances of his friend, having expreſſed a wiſh to know whence he derived his reſources, was informed by Jarnac, in confidence, that he was ſupplied with money by his mother-in-law, with whom he maintained a criminal connection; this report ſoon reached the ears of Jarnac's father. He immediately ſent for his ſon, who denied the charge, and requeſted he would inſtantly accompany him to court, that he might ſee in what manner he would confound the perſon who dared to caluminate him. They accordingly repaired thither, and entering the apartment where the court was aſſembled, young Jarnac exclaimed aloud, that whoever aſſerted that he maintained a criminal intercourſe with his mother-in-law, was a liar, and a coward. As la Chateigneraie could not ſuffer this challenge to remain unanſwered without diſhonouring himſelf in the eyes of his maſter, and, indeed, without expoſing the dauphin himſelf to the imputation of falſhood, he boldly replied, that Jarnac had imprudently boaſted of that which he now ſo proudly denied; and that he would extort from him a confeſſion of the fact: it was now reſolved that a judicial combat ſhould take place; and the liſts were accordingly marked out at Saint German en Laye, where Henry attended in perſon, and the conſtable, aſſiſted by the mareſchals of France, was judge of the field.

Having obſerved all the forms preſcribed by the laws of chivalry, the two combatants attacked each other ſword in hand; la Chateigneraie, who was one of the moſt robuſt men of the age, confided in his ſtrength, while Jarnac truſted to his ſuperior agility; the latter, covering his head with his ſhield, bent beneath the vigorous blows of his adverſary, till having watched an opportunity, he aimed two ſucceſsful ſtrokes at his left ham, which was left uncovered that the motion of his leg might not be impeded. The aſtoniſhment of the ſpectators, when they beheld that warrlor whoſe brows they were in momentary expectation of ſeeing encircled with the wreath of victory, lay proſtrate on the ground, was inexpreſſible. While la Chateigneraie lay in a ſtate of inſenſibility, Jarnac approached the ſcaffold where the king was ſeated, and falling on his knees, exclaimed, "Sire, I am ſufficiently revenged if you believe me innocent. I reſign "my adverſary to you, and entreat you to impute all that has paſſed entirely to "to our own levity and thoughtleſſneſs." He then returned to la Chateigneraie, who had, by this time, recovered his ſenſes, and endeavoured to extort from him an acknowledgment of his innocence; but the wounded warrior riſing on his knees, drew his dagger, and endeavoured to reach his opponent; but his ſtrength failed him, and he again ſunk to the ground. Although la Chateignaraie had loſt a vaſt quantity of blood, the ſurgeons, after examining the wound, expreſſed their opinion that a cure might eaſily be effected; but their patient, indignant at the triumph of his adverſary, tore off the dreſſings, and obſtinately rejecting all offers of aſſiſtance, ſoon after expired.

The rapaciouſneſs of the leaders of the different factions, by occaſioning the creation of many new places, greatly encreaſed the public expenditure, and, of courſe, cauſed a deficit in the revenue. As it was deemed impolitic to mark the commencement of a reign by an augmentation of impoſts, indirect means for procuring the neceſſary ſum were ſought for, and the following adopted:—the value of the mark of gold was raiſed ſix livres, twelve ſols, ſix derniers, which made it worth one hundred and ſeventy-two thouſand livres, the mark of ſilver was raiſed from fourteen livres ten ſols, to fifteen livres: crown lands, to the amount of one hundred and fifty thouſand livres were expoſed to ſale; the tenths levied on the clergy were doubled; a free gift was exacted from the principal towns in the kingdom; and ſome trifling additions were privately made to the Gabelle in the provinces beyond the Loire.

The Roman pontiff, with much reluctance, and after long delays, had at laſt ſummoned a general council, which had aſſembled at Trent, on the thirteenth of December, 1545, and had for the ſpace of fifteen months been employed, both in correcting the abuſes of the church, in aſcertaining her doctrines, and in condemning the tenets of Luther. The French monarch had obſerved with concern, that the emperor, at whoſe inſtigation this aſſembly had been ſummoned, aſſumed a kind of dictatorial authority over the fathers, and ſought to render them the inſtruments of his ambition and policy.

Charles the Fifth had long been accuſtomed to make religion ſubſervient to his intereſt: he was reſolved to employ the imputation of hereſy as a pretence for ſubduing the proteſtant princes, and oppreſſing the liberties of Germany; but found it neceſſary to cover his intentions under deep artifice, and to prevent the combination of his adverſaries. He ſeparated the palatinate and the elector of Brandenburgh from the proteſtant confederacy: he took arms againſt the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe: he took the former priſoner at the battle of Mulhauſen, and treated him in the moſt unfeeling and inhuman manner: by a baſe violation of his word, and a dereliction of every principle of honour, he detained the latter captive, after he had granted him a ſafe-conduct. He ſeemed to have obtained the ſummit of his ambition; and the German princes, aſtoniſhed at his ſucceſs, and deprived of their uſual reſources by the death of Francis the Firſt, and Henry the Eighth, were no longer able to withſtand his power. Henry indeed, was willing to afford them aſſiſtance, but he rather choſe to interfere in favour of Scotland, his ancient ally, which, even before the death of the late king, had loudly claimed the protection of the French monarchy.

Henry who was deeply intereſted in preventing the union of Scotland and England, conſented to furniſh, at his own expence, the ſuccours required for the defence of the former kingdom, on condition that the Scottiſh parliament ſhould, by a formal act, decree that their young ſovereign ſhould give her hand to the dauphin Francis, who, in conſequence of this alliance, ſhould govern both kingdoms. The parliament was accordingly ſummoned to meet in an abbey, near Haddington, where the propoſal of Henry was ſubmitted to their conſideration. The arguments were carried on with great warmth and ability on both ſides; it was objected by ſome, that the meaſure propoſed was a deſperate one, that it allowed no reſource in caſe of miſcarriage; expoſed the Scots to be ſubjected by foreigners; and involved them in perpetual war with England. On the other hand, it was urged, that the queen's preſence was the very cauſe of war with England; that that nation would deſiſt when they found that their views of forcing a marriage had become altogether impracticable; and Henry, being engaged by ſo high a mark of confidence, would take their ſovereign under his protection, and uſe his utmoſt efforts to defend the kingdom. And as the Scottiſh clergy dreaded the conſequence of the Engliſh alliance, they ſeconded this meaſure with all the zeal and induſtry which either zeal or intereſt could inſpire, ſo that it was finally determined to accept the propoſals of the king of France.

Henry was no ſooner informed of the reſolution of the Scottiſh parliament, than he gave orders for the embarkation of three thouſand of his beſt infantry, to which he joined the ſame number of Lanſquenets, under the command of the Rhinegrave, and ſix companies of light horſe*. This army was entruſted to the conduct of Andrew Montalembert, lord of Eſſé.

The fleet which had conveyed theſe troops to Scotland, was deſtined to bring back Mary Stuart to France; Leo Strozzi, who commanded it, fearful of being intercepted by the Engliſh, if he employed all his ſhips for that purpoſe, detached the chevalier Villegagnon, with four gallies, then lying in the Frith of Forth, who ſet ſail as if he intended to return home: but when he reached the open ſea, he turned northwards, paſſed by the Orkneys, and came in on the weſt coaſt at Dunbarton. The young queen was there committed to his care; and being attended by two Scottiſh noblemen, ſhe put to ſea, and, after meeting with ſome tempeſtuous weather, arrived ſafely at Breſt, whence ſhe was conducted to Paris, and ſoon after betrothed to the dauphin.

A. D. 1548.] The rapid ſtrides which the emperor continued to make towards the accompliſhment of his ambitious projects gave ſerious inquietude to Henry, who, anxious to perſuade the pope to take up arms againſt Charles, levied an army, with which he entered Italy; but the Roman pontiff was too far advanced in years to think of engaging in a war, and the king himſelf was ſpeedily compelled to repaſs the Alps, in order to quell a dangerous ſedition which broke out in Guienne, in conſequence of the rapacious conduct of the officers of the revenue employed in collecting the oppreſſive duties upon ſalt.

A. D. 1549.] In the month of June, this year, the king made his ſolemn entry into Paris, where his acceſſion to the throne was celebrated by tilts and tournaments, and by every kind of rejoicing then in vogue; but the chief object of theſe rejoicings was to collect together all the nobility in the kingdom, in order to accelerate the execution of a project which the confuſion that prevailed in the Engliſh council had led him to form. Having, accordingly, collected a powerful army, Henry marched from Paris in the month of Auguſt, and directed his courſe towards the Boulonois, which he had reſolved to recover by force of arms. He arrived at the place of his deſtination, and falling on the Boulonois, ſpeedily reduced the forts of Sallacques, Ambleteuſe, and Blacquenai, though well ſupplied with every thing requiſite for ſuſtaining a ſiege. He endeavoured to ſurpriſe Boulenburg, and was repulſed; but the garriſon, not thinking the place tenable after the loſs of the other fortreſſes, deſtroyed the works, and retired to Boulogne. The rains, which fell in great abundance during the autumn, deprived Henry of all hopes of ſucceſs againſt Boulogne itſelf; and he returned to Paris, leaving the command of the army to Gaſpar de Coligni, lord of Chatillon, (afterwards ſo famous by the name of admiral Coligni) who had orders to renew the ſiege in the ſpring.

A. D. 1550.] During theſe tranſactions, a powerful party had been formed in England againſt the duke of Somerſet, who was, at length, compelled to reſign the protectorſhip. The earl of Warwick, who was now at the head of affairs, finding it neceſſary to conclude a peace with France, ſent over Guidotti, a Florentine merchant, to Paris, to negociate, in a private manner, with the conſtable Montmorenci. Preliminaries being ſettled, the conſtable ſent his nephew, de Coligni; his brother, Francis Montmorenci, lord of Rochepot; Andrew Guillard, lord of Mortier; and William Botchetel, lord of Saſſi, ſecretary of ſtate, to meet the Engliſh plenipotentiaries; and, after ſome diſcuſſion, it was agreed to give four hundred thouſand crowns for the immediate reſtitution of Boulogne: one half to be paid immediately, the other in Auguſt following. Six hoſtages were given for the performance of this article. Scotland was comprehended in the treaty, which was ſigned on the twenty-fourth of March. An agreement, ſome time after, was formed for a marriage between the king of England and Elizabeth, a daughter of Francis; all the articles were, after a little negociation, fully ſettled: but this project never took effect.

A. D. 1551.] Meanwhile the council had, by the pope's orders, reaſſembled at Trent; but many of the Italian prelates being prevented, by this war, or the preparations for it, from repairing to that city on the firſt of May, the day appointed; the papal legate and nuncios were compelled to adjourn till the firſt of September, when about ſixty prelates, moſtly from the eccleſiaſtical ſtates, or from Spain, were convened*. The ſeſſion was opened with the accuſtomed formalities, and the fathers were about to proceed to buſineſs; when the abbot of Bellozane appeared, and, preſenting letters of credence from the French king, demanded audience. Having obtained it, he proteſted, in the name of his maſter, againſt an aſſembly called at ſuch an improper juncture, when a war, wantonly kindled by the pope, made it impoſſible for the deputies from the Gallican church to reſort to Trent in ſafety, or to deliberate concerning articles of faith and diſcipline, with the requiſite tranquility; he declared, that his maſter did not acknowledge this to be a general or æcumenick council, but muſt conſider, and would treat it, as a particular and partial convention. The legate affected to depiſe this proteſt; and the prelates proceeded, notwithſtanding, to examine and decide the great points in controverſy, concerning the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, penance, and extreme unction. This meaſure of the French monarch, however, gave a deep wound to the credit of the council, at the very commencement of its deliberations.

Early in the winter, Henry entered into a negociation with the Roman pontiff, and ſoon concluded a truce for two years, that he might be at liberty to direct all his efforts againſt the emperor. While Charles was employed in ſubverting the liberties of Germany, Maurice, duke of Saxony, couſin to the depoſed elector, and a proteſtant prince himſelf, had, from motives of intereſt, ſeconded his deſigns, and acquired his favour: but he was no ſooner inveſted with the ſpoils of his degrading kinſman, than he reſolved to reſcue them from the caprice of a maſter whom he dreaded, and more firmly to eſtabliſh a religion, the exerciſe of which he had contributed to reſtrain. He ſecretly negociated a new confederacy of the proteſtants, and he earneſtly courted the aſſiſtance of Henry to oppoſe the deſpotiſm which Charles laboured to eſtabliſh.

John de Freſſe, biſhop of Bayonne, whom Henry had ſent into Germany, under pretence of hiring troops to be employed in Italy, was empowered to negociate with Maurice and his aſſociates; and a formal treaty was, accordingly, concluded on the fifth of October*. The preparatory negociations for this treaty were conducted with ſuch profound ſecrecy, that, of all the princes who afterwards acceded to it, Maurice communicated his plans only to two of them, John Albert, the reigning duke of Mecklenburgh, and William of Heſſe, the Langrave's eldeſt ſon. The league itſelf was no leſs anxiouſly concealed, and with ſuch fortunate care, that no rumour concerning it reached the ears of the emperor or his miniſters; nor do they ſeem to have conceived the moſt diſtant ſuſpicion of ſuch a tranſaction†.

A. D. 1552.] The king haſtened to make the neceſſary preparations for fulfilling the engagements he had contracted, but he found an extreme difficulty in raiſing a ſufficient ſum for defraying the expences of his expedition. The war in Italy had already exhauſted the treaſury, and compelled the government to have recourſe to exactions both odious and onerous. He now opened a loan at Lyons; and demanded a free gift from the city of Paris, in return for which he granted a duty of two ſols ſix deniers on every hogſhead of wine introduced into the capital. But theſe expedients proving inſufficient, he had recourſe to others of greater extent and importance. By the advice of the cardinal of Lorraine, he inſtituted ſixty new courts of juſtice in the different towns of the kingdom, by which means nearly ſix hundred offices were expoſed to ſale*. The king alſo obtained from the clergy a promiſe of three millions of livres, payable in ſix months, on condition that he ſhould paſs an edict, reſtoring to the eccleſiaſtical courts the ſame degree of power which they enjoyed previous to the year 1539; the money was paid, and the edict paſſed; but the parliament refuſing to regiſter it, it was not enforced. A farther ſum was raiſed by the erection of other new offices, as well in the court of aids, as in the chamber of accompts.
